Trenches; drew nearer and nearer unto him, continually ſkirmiſhing with ſuch as he ſent out, daring him to the Field, and braving him unto his Trenches, in ſuch ſort, as if he would have forced the ſame, and by ſtrong hand have ſet him out thence; whereat the Turks fretted and chafed exceedingly, inſomuch that they were ready to riſe againſt their General, becauſe he would not lead them forth to Battel, but ſuffer them to be ſo diſgraced. Balabanus mindful of that he had promiſed to Mahomet his great Lord and Maſter, did what he might to have deferred time; but when he ſaw that his Fellow came not, and that he could no longer delay the matter; being ſo continually aſſailed and braved by Scanderbegs Souldiers, that his Turks therewith provoked, were ready oftentimes to have iſſued out without his direction, and no remedy but that he muſt needs fight, placed his men in good order, and ſo went out of his Trenches to give Battel, himſelf leading the left Wing thereof; where betwixt him and Scanderbeg was made a fierce Fight, many falling on both ſides. But Scanderbeg ſtrengthened with the old Garriſon of Croia, and the moſt expert Souldiers of Dibra, prevailed upon the Turks and forced them to give ground, yet ſtill keeping their order. The Fight was ſo great in this part of the Battel, that in other places they ſtood almoſt ſtill as lookers on, expecting the doubtful fortune of their Generals, which thing Scanderbeg perceiving, drew certain Troops out of the right Wing, whereas he ſaw was leaſt danger, which ſpeedily fetching a compaſs about, charged the ſide of the Enemies Army; and again withdrawing themſelves, and with wonderful celerity wheeling about, ſet upon the back of them that fought in the left Wing; ſo that the Turks there fiercely charged both before and behind, by the Wing of Scanderbeg his Army, fell in other places with a great Slaughter. Balabanus with exceeding Courage gainſtood his Enemies, ſo long as there was any hope left; but when he ſaw the fortune of Scanderbeg to prevail, and all about him to become deſperate, he made ſhift for himſelf, and fled out of the Battel as faſt as he could. The reſt of the Army being in other places before troubled and diſordered fled alſo, ſome one way, ſome another, every man as his Fortune led him. Some few that followed Balabanus eſcaped; the reſt were for moſt part either ſlain or taken Priſoners.

Scanderbeg had ſcarcely well breathed himſelf after this Victory, and divided the Spoil amongſt his Souldiers, but that news was brought to him in Poſt from the Lady Mamiza his Siſter, then lying at Petrella, That Jacuppe Arnauth was by the way of Belgrade come into Epirus with an Army of ſixteen thouſand Horſemen, burning and deſtroying the Country before him, and then lay incamped in the Plains of Tyranna the leſs. When Scanderbeg to prove the minds of his Souldiers, had chearfully imparted unto them ſuch news, as was like to be the beginning of new labour and peril; they were therewith nothing diſmaied, but ready to follow him with ſuch chearfulneſs of countenance and mind, as if they ſhould have gone to ſome great Feaſt or Banquet; reckoning of them, but as of the remnant of a diſcomfited Army. This chearfulneſs of his Souldiers, Scanderbeg took as an aſſured token of his good ſucceſs; and having all things in readineſs, preſently ſet forward, and in ſhort time came to the place where the Enemy lay. Jacuppe hearing of his coming, removed his Camp into a corner of the Plain of Tyranna, near unto a little Hill, as a place of more ſafety for his Army to lie in. Scanderbeg having taken the Plain, incamped his Army in the ſame place from whence Jacuppe was but a little before departed, where he reſted one whole day. The next morning, to terrifie his Enemies (who as yet had not heard of the overthrow of Balabanus) he cauſed divers of the Turks Heads which were ſlain in the late Battel (which he had brought for that purpoſe) to be caſt before the Trenches of the Enemy; and withal, divers of them which were taken Priſoners, to be ſhewn; which Jacuppe beholding, in great deſpair ſaid, I ſee the evil hap of Mahomet. Immediately after Scanderbeg ſent forth five hundred Horſemen to skirmiſh with the Turks, commanding them, ſo ſoon as they were charged by the Enemy, to retire, if happily they might be ſo drawn into Battel. Which fell out accordingly; for Jacuppe now ſeeing his Fellow was not to be looked for, and willing alſo without further delay to try his Fortune, came readily into the Field, and began a fierce Battel; which endured not long; for Scanderbeg perceiving in what part of the Army Jacuppe was, bent his greateſt Force that way, and ſingling him out, with his own hand ſlew him. Wherewith the Turks being diſcouraged, forthwith betook themſelves to flight, and in flying were for moſt part ſlain or taken. Thoſe which eſcaped the preſent fury of the Sword, ſtragling through the Country by thick woods and blind ways, were by the Country People either ſlain or taken Priſoners. In theſe two Battels were ſlain of the Turks four and twenty thouſand, and ſix thouſand taken. And of Scanderbeg his men were loſt about a thouſand. Scanderbeg and his Souldiers were ſo weary of the ſlaughter of the Turks, that when it was told him the next day, That Balabanus was fled but with one Cornet of Horſemen, and might eaſily be ſurpriſed if he were well purſued; he ſaid, O let ſome of our Enemies live to report their own Slaughter, and our Victory. After that Scanderbeg had in this ſort vanquiſhed theſe great Captains, he preſently entred into the Frontiers of the Turks Dominions, and roaming up and down at his pleaſure without reſiſtance, made havock of all that came in his way; and after returning to Croia with Victory, brake up his Army, and gave his Souldiers leave to depart, every man to his own dwelling.

1465. Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Mahomet had with great rewards procured two Turks to undertake to kill Scanderbeg. Theſe Traitors came unto Scanderbeg as Fugitives, making ſuch ſhew of the deteſtation both of Mahomet his Tyrannical Government, and vain Superſtition, that they were both of Scanderbeg and others, reputed to be indeed the men, they deſired to be accounted; and ſo after they had learned the principles of the Chriſtian Religion, were by their own deſire baptized. But Treaſon againſt Princes whom God hath in his moſt mighty protection, cannot be long covered; much leſs, without his great ſufferance performed. So fortuned it, that theſe two falſe diſſembling Traitors, expecting nothing but opportunity to perform their diveliſh device, upon ſome occaſion fell at variance betwixt themſelves, and in their heat let ſome ſuch words fall, as being taken up by ſome there preſent, drew them both into ſuſpition; and thereupon being ſtraitly examined, it was at laſt by them confeſſed, That they were ſent by Mahomet, of purpoſe to have ſlain Scanderbeg; for which their Treaſon they were both preſently executed, as they had right well deſerved. When Mahomet underſtood that Balabanus was overcome, Jacuppe ſlain, and both their Armies almoſt quite deſtroyed, he after his impatient manner fell into a great rage, and became as a Man almoſt frantick; and afterwards calling together his great Baſſa's, reſolved by their advice, not to ſend any more Generals againſt Scanderbeg, but to go himſelf in perſon, with ſuch an Army as ſhould at once make an end of his Wars in Epirus for ever. Hereupon Commiſſions were directed through all his Kingdom, and an Army raiſed of two hundred thouſand men. Whereof Scanderbeg having certain advertiſement, fortified all his Cities and ſtrong holds, eſpecially the City of Croia, upon the fortune whereof depended the whole State of his Kingdom. Into this City he put a ſtrong Garriſon of his moſt valiant and faithful Souldiers, and throughly furniſht the ſame with all things neceſſary for the enduring a long Siege; and left one Balthazar Perduci (a grave and worthy Captain) Governor thereof. With like care he provided for the ſafety of his other Cities, and took order that the Country People were either received into the ſtrong Towns, or elſe conveyed into other places of refuge, and left nothing abroad in the Country for the Turks to prey upon; as he had in like caſe done long before, at the coming of old Amurath to the ſiege of Croia, as is before in his life declared.

By that time that Scanderbeg had ſet all things in order, his old Friend Balabanus with fourſcore thouſand Horſemen (the forerunners of Mahomet his Army) was entred into Epirus, and ranging over the Country two days, came and ſate down before Croia; upon whom the Governor at his firſt coming made many brave Sallies. In few days after came Mahomet with his huge Army, and there incamped alſo; who at his firſt coming ſummoned the City, requiring to have it delivered unto him, upon ſuch unreaſonable Conditions as it pleaſed himſelf, (as the manner of the Turk is;) whereunto the worthy Governor returned him no other anſwer, than by continual thundring Shot into his Camp. Whereupon Mahomet cauſed ſuch Ordnance as he had to be planted for battery; and commanded other new to be caſt, of ſuch mettal as he had for that purpoſe brought in maſs; all which, he did rather to ſtrike a terror into the minds of the Defendants, than for any great hope he had of taking the City by force; knowing by his own experience, that it was a place almoſt impregnable. Whilſt Mahomet was thus buſied, and little or nothing prevailed, Scanderbeg lying abroad in the Woods and Mountains, with a ſmall Army of moſt valiant and couragious Souldiers, continually cut off the forragers of Mahomets Army, and ſuch as brought in victual or neceſſaries for his Camp; and many times in the night ſuddainly brake into one quarter or other of the Turks great Camp with great ſlaughter, and with continual Alarms never ſuffered them to reſt in quiet. Mahomet ſeeing his Army to decreaſe dayly, and no hope of winning the City but by Famine, which would require a long Siege; and fearing alſo to make that ſame place again famous by ſome notable miſchance which might happen unto himſelf under the Walls of Croia, as had before unto his Father Amurath; determined to return himſelf to Conſtantinople, and to leave Balabanus, with a great part of his Army to continue the Siege. Upon which determination, he committed the charge and ordering of the whole matter for the continuing of the Siege, to Balabanus, joyning unto him eight of his moſt expert Captains; yet ſo, as that they ſhould be all at Balabanus his Command. And ſo leaving with him three and twenty thouſand of his beſt Souldiers, and with every one of the other eight Captains ſeven thouſand more, departed himſelf with the reſt of his Army from Croia, towards Conſtantinople. But by the way as he went he took from Scanderbeg certain ſmall Forts, and with fair promiſes corrupting the Governor of a place called Chidna, wherein eight thouſand of Scanderbeg his Souldiers lay, had the ſame delivered into his power, upon his Faith before given, That all the Souldiers with the reſt of the People ſhould in ſafety depart thence. But after the Tyrant had them in his power, without regard of Faith or Promiſe, he cauſed them all moſt cruelly to be cut in pieces, ſparing neither Man, Woman, nor Child, to the great grief and weakning of Scanderbeg, who had not at any time before received ſo great a loſs. And after he had ſo raged, he in great melancholy returned unto Conſtantinople.

Scanderbeg diſdaining to have his chief City beſieged by Balabanus, (ſometime one of the baſeſt of his Fathers Subjects) and yet finding himſelf unable to relieve the ſame, for as much as the Souldiers were with continual Wars ſore waſted, and his wary Enemies lay ſo encamped, as that they were not but by a ſtrong Army to be removed, ſent unto the Venetians and other the confederate Princes of Albania, Illyria, and Dalmatia, praying of them aid now at his need againſt that Enemy, which prevailing againſt him, would forthwith ſet upon them. All which Princes promiſed forthwith to ſend their Succors. At the ſame time alſo he paſſed over into Italy ſecretly, and diſguiſed in ſimple Attire, came to Rome, to crave aid of Paulus the Second of that name, then great Biſhop; by whom he was honourably entertained, but obtained nothing of that he came for; ſo cold was his Devotion; only at his departure he gave unto Junetrio, Scanderbeg his Treaſurer, a poor Alms of three thouſand Ducats.

Scanderbeg ſurpriſeth Ionima the Brother of Balabanus and Hedar his Son.

Scanderbeg returning into Epirus, found all ſuch aid ready as was promiſed by the confederate Princes, but eſpecially from the Venetians, which was for moſt part drawn out of their Garriſons of Scutari, Drivaſto, Alyſſa, and Dirrhachium; ſo that he had in few days in his Army thirteen thouſand four hundred choice Souldiers. With this Strength he marched towards Croia; but underſtanding by the way, that Ionima was within a days journey, coming with a new ſupply to his Brother Balabanus, he drew out certain Troops of his beſt Horſemen; and coaſting over the Country in the night, ſuddainly came upon the Turks, and put them to flight; where amongſt others, Ionima himſelf, with his Son Hedar, were taken Priſoners; whom he ſhewed the next day in bonds to Balabanus. This exploit ſo happily performed, he with all ſpeed returned to his Army; and ſo marching to Croia, by plain force drove the Turks from the Mountain Cruina, their greateſt Strength, and neareſt to the City of Croia. Which thing when Balabanus ſaw, he with certain Troops of Horſemen rid even to the Gates of the City, perſwading the Defendants to yield the City, making them in the name of his Maſter ſuch Offers and Promiſes as he thought might moſt move them. But they nothing regarding his words, but rather incenſed with his preſumption, ſallied out upon him, and inforced him to retire; but he therewith enraged, and half mad for anger, came upon them with a freſh charge, thinking by plain force to have driven them back into the City. In which skirmiſh he was by one Georgius Alexius, with a Bullet, ſhot quite through the Throat; and feeling himſelf mortally wounded, ſetting ſpurs to his Horſe, ran as faſt as he could to his Camp, where he preſently fell down from his Horſe and died.

The Turks diſcouraged with the death of their General, and the coming of Scanderbeg, roſe the ſame night, and with great ſilence retired themſelves unto the Plain of Tiranna, about eight miles from Croia. Scanderbeg the next morning entring the forſaken Tents of the Turks, found therein greatſtore of Corn and other Victuals; which he cauſed to be forthwith conveighed into the City, and in triumph followed after himſelf, to the great joy and comfort of his late beſieged Subjects; whom he highly commended for their Fidelity, and bountifully rewarded according to their deſerts. The ſame day he ſent certain companies of Souldiers to take the ſtrait paſſages whereby the Turks muſt needs paſs in their return out of Epirus; which when the Turks underſtood, they ſent two Meſſengers to Scanderbeg (who ſeemed to be men of good account in the Army) offering in the name of the reſt of the Captains and Commanders, to deliver unto him their Horſes and Arms, ſo that they might in ſafety depart with their lives. Which their requeſt Scanderbeg propounding to his Counſellors and Captains, was by them diverſly digeſted. In concluſion, they received this anſwer from Scanderbeg himſelf; That as they came into his Country without his Commandment, ſo ſhould they not by his leave depart thence. The Turks receiving this ſhort anſwer by their Meſſengers, and conſidering that they muſt needs in that bare Country in ſhort time periſh, either with Famine or with the Sword; the ſame night departed from Tiranna, and in the dead time of the night entring the aforeſaid Straits, by plain force deſperately brake through and eſcaped, but not without their great loſs; for whoſe eſcape the common Souldiers murmured grievouſly againſt Scanderbeg, and were not without much ado appeaſed. In ſhort time after, Scanderbeg recovered all ſuch places as Mahomet had before taken from him, and put to Sword the Souldiers he had left for the keeping of the ſame; which done, he brake up his Army, retaining only two thouſand Horſemen and a thouſand Foot for the defence of his Frontiers.

The Turkiſh Tyrant hearing of the evil ſucceſs of his Affairs in Epirus, as that his General was ſlain, Croia relieved, his Army diſcomfited, and all that he had done, brought to nought; fretted thereat exceedingly, and was therewith ſo much grieved, that he could not for a ſeaſon eat or drink, or take reſt, his diſcontented thoughts ſo much troubled him. In the end, to remedy the matter, he reſolved the next Spring to go again in perſon himſelf with a moſt puiſſant Army into Epirus, and ſo if it were poſſible, to make a full Conqueſt thereof; of which his purpoſe Scanderbeg underſtanding, provided for his coming, as he had in former time. The Spring being come, Mahomet according to his former reſolution, with a mighty Army entred into Epirus, and there with exceeding labour and charge, firſt repaired or rather re-edified the old ruines of the City of Valmes, wherein he left a ſtrong Garriſon, of purpoſe to trouble that part of the Country. From thence he marched to Dirrachium (now called Durazzo, but of old time Epidamnum) a City upon the Sea-coaſt, then in the poſſeſſion of the Venetians, famous for many things in the time of the Roman Empire, but eſpecially for the Flight of the Roman Senate thither, and their entertainment there in the time of the civil Wars betwixt Cæſar and Pompey. This City Mahomet thought to have taken unprovided, and ſo upon the ſuddain to have carried it; but was therein much deceived, finding it ſtrongly fortified and manned both by the Venetians and Scanderbeg. Where when he had there ſpent ſome time, and to his great loſs in vain attempted the City, he roſe upon the ſuddain, and retiring into Epirus, came and ſate down again before Croia, of purpoſe by his ſuddain coming to have terrified the Citizens; and vainly perſwaded, that he had left Scanderbeg in Dirrachium, for that in the aſſailing thereof he had diſcovered many of Scanderbegs men, and thereby ſuppoſed him to have been there alſo; the greateſt cauſe why he ſo ſuddainly roſe and came to Croia. At his firſt coming he offered great rewards and large priviledges unto the Citizens, if they would forthwith yield up their City; otherwiſe he threatned unto them all the calamities of War, vowing never to depart thence before he had it; whereunto he received no other anſwer out of the City than was ſent him by the mouth of the Canon, or brought him by many moſt brave Sallies. Scanderbeg in the mean while continually moleſting his Camp, and every night falling into one quarter or another thereof. Mahomet taught by experience, to what ſmall purpoſe it would be for him to lie there long, roſe with his Army, and marched again to the Sea ſide, to a place now called the head of Redon upon the Gulf of Venice, not far from Dirrachium, where Scanderbeg had begun to build a new City called Chiuril, not yet finiſhed; which Mahomet in deſpight of the man, raſed down to the ground. After that, hearing that many of the Epirots were retired into the Mountains, he went to ſeek them out, and was with great loſs by thoſe Mountain People repulſed; Scanderbeg ſtill following them at the Heels, and awaiting all opportunities, daily cut off part of his Army. So that at laſt the Tyrant deſpairing of any good to be done in that Expedition, was glad to depart out of Epirus, having atchieved nothing worth his coming, and ſo, full of diſcontentment and melancholy returned to Conſtantinople.

After all theſe great troubles, Scanderbeg rid over moſt part of Epirus, to view the ſtate of his Kingdom, and ſo at laſt came to Lyſſa (a City of the Venetians, which he had alwaies eſpecially liked) there to confer with the Venetian Legate and other the confederate Princes, of matters concerning their ſtate in general, as his manner was; but more particularly how they might take the City of Valmes, which Mahomet had the laſt year built in the Seigniory of Ariannites Comynat, and much troubled that part of Epirus. But whilſt he lay there, he fell ſick of a Fever, which daily ſo increaſed upon him, that he became ſick even unto death; and now perceiving his end to draw nigh, ſent for his Wife and Son, with the Princes and Lords his Confederates, and the Embaſſadors of the Venetians, into his Bed-Chamber. Where after he had at large with greater pain notably diſcourſed of his troubleſome life led among them, than he had before paſſed the ſame, and carefully forewarned them of the dangers like to enſue, he earneſtly exhorted them to continue in Unity and Concord, and valiantly to ſtand in defence of their Religion, Country, and Liberty. And afterwards turning his Speech to his Wife and his Son, commended them both with his Kingdom to the tuition of the Venetians; who by the Articles of the Confederation betwixt him and them, were in honour bound to protect his Son and Kingdom, during the time of his Minority, and afterwards peaceably to place him in the ſame. In fine he willed his Wife after his Death to paſs over with her Son into Apulia, where they might in ſafety and quiet live upon ſuch Poſſeſſions as he there held held by the Gift of King Ferdinand. And ſo after he had with moſt fervent prayer commended his Soul into the hands of Almighty God, departed in peace the 17*th* day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1466. when he had lived about 63 years, and thereof raigned about 24. His death was worthily lamented of all Chriſtian Princes, but eſpecially of the Venetians and Princes of Albania, who had now loſt their moſt careful Watchman and invincible Champion; the ſorrow of his Subjects is not to be expreſſed, every man bewailing him, as the only ſtay of the Common-weal, and as if with him they had loſt all their hope. His dead Body was with the general Lamentation of all Men royally buried in the Cathedral-Church of St. Nicholas at Lyſſa; where it reſted in peace, until that about nine years after, the Turks coming to the Siege of Scodra, by the way took the City of Lyſſa, and there with great devotion digged up his Bones, reckoning it ſome part of their happineſs, if they might but ſee or touch the ſame; and ſuch as could get any part thereof, were it never ſo little, cauſed the ſame to be ſet, ſome in Silver, ſome in Gold, to hang about their Necks, or wear upon their Bodies; perſwading themſelves by the wearing thereof to be partakers of ſuch good fortune and hap as had Scanderbeg himſelf whilſt he lived; which is not unaptly by Gabriel Fairnus of Cremona, thus in Verſe expreſſed:

The death of Scanderbeg

The body of Scanderbeg digged up by the Turks, and of them greatly honoured.

The bloody Bane of faithleſs Turks, and terrour of their Name,
Epirus ſtrong defence and guard, lay buried there with fame:
Within that Tomb wherein long ſince, Great Caſtriotus lay;
But now thoſe Limbs and Tomb defac'd, are carried quite away.
The remnants of that worthy Wight out of his grave were torn;
And being dead, could find no reſt, but were for Jewels worn.
For after he, far ſpent with age, gave place to fatal Doom,
Forthwith the cruel Turks prevail'd,and all things there poſſeſt:
Who worſhipping his ſtately Tomb, and place of quiet reſt, Dig'd up his Bones, and brake the Tomb wherein he did remain:
And glad was he that could thereof ſome little part obtain.
As if in them ſome Martial force, or vertue great had been:
Or fortune rare, ſuch as before in him was living ſeen.
So Vertue, which to others gives a Sepulture and Grave, Bereft it him, yet forc'd his Foe in Honour it to have.

Moſt part of the times of thoſe Wars betwixt Mahomet and Scanderbeg, the Venetians by Sea and the Hungarians by Land, kept the Turks throughly buſied. Mathias Corvinus King of Hungary (according to his promiſe made unto the Venetians) entred into the Kingdom of Boſna, where by force he overthrew the ſtrong Forts which the Turks had built for the defence of their Frontiers, and manfully drave them out before him until he came to Jaziga (of ſome called Jaitze) the chief City of Boſna, which he at length took; and following the courſe of his Victory, ſcarcely ſufferd the Turks to breath, until he had by force wreſted all that Kingdom out of their hands. Wherewith Mahomet being exceedingly grieved, in great fury came with a ſtrong Army into Boſna, and laid hard Siege to Jaziga, which was by the Chriſtians right valiantly defended, until Mathias with a puiſſant Army came to the Relief thereof; who ſo troubled the Turks Camp with continual Skirmiſhes on the one ſide, and they of the Town with deſperate Sallies on the other; that at length the proud Turk was driven to ſuch extremity, that he was glad ſecretly to ſteal away by night with all his Army into Servia; and for haſt to leave behind him both his Tents and great Ordnance, which (the Turks Hiſtories report) he cauſed to be caſt into the River, becauſe it ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians. Mathias after he had thus valiantly put to flight his Enemies, and relieved his City, followed the Turks into Servia, and took part of that Country alſo, which together with Boſna he united to the Kingdom of Hungary. In theſe Wars, Mahomet had ſuch proof of the Force and Power of Mathias and the Hungarians, that for a good while after he had no great ſtomach to provoke them farther; for why, the name of Mathias was now become unto the Turks no leſs dreadful, than was ſometime the name of his Father the valiant Huniades.

The Venetians at the ſame time alſo with their Gallies ſcoured the Seas, and landing their Men ſometime in one place, ſometime in another, did great harm in many places of the Turks Dominion near unto the Sea coaſt. Amongſt other their Generals at divers times ſent from that State, one Nicholas Canalis ſucceeding Lauretanus (whom we have before ſpoken of) as ſoon as he had received his Charge, came with his Fleet into the Bay of Salonichi, and landing his Men, burnt divers Towns and Villages alongſt the Sea ſide: And afterwards returning into Peloponneſus, he fortified the Town of Legoſticium in the Gulf of Patras; which work the Turks with their often Skirmiſhes laboured to have hindred, but in deſpite of all they could do, it was brought to perfection, and a ſtrong Garriſon therein left for the defence thereof; which done, he returned again to Eubœa Shortly after, he with the ſame Fleet put to Sea again; and ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Macedonia and Thracia, ſurpriſed the City of Ænus which ſtandeth upon the mouth of the River Meritza, called in ancient time Hebrus, upon which River the famous Cities Andrianople and Philippopolis are alſo ſituate. Canalis after he had taken the ſpoil of the City, returned to his Gallies, carrying away with him two thouſand Captives into Eubœa. At the ſame time alſo, the Venetians giving Aid unto Nicholas Duchaine againſt his Brother Alexius, then at variance for the Principality of Zadrima, near unto the River of Drino in Epirus, gave a great Overthrow to the Turks which came in the quarrel of Alexius.

1470. Mahomet not a little offended with the harms done unto him by the Venetians, and perceiving that the Iſland of Eubœa (now called Nigroponte) was for the commodious ſituation and ſtrength thereof, the chief place from whence they wrought him all theſe wrongs, and whither they afterwards retired again, as unto a moſt ſure place of Refuge; determined with himſelf at once to be even with them for all, and to imploy his whole Forces both by Sea and Land for the gaining of that place. This Iſland of Eubœa is about an hundred miles in length, and lieth over againſt that part of Græcia which was of old called Bœotia, from whence it is ſeparated with a narrow ſtrait of the Sea; it aboundeth with Corn, Wine, Oil, Fruit, and Wood fit for ſhipping. The chief City thereof, was in ancient time called Chalcide, and of latter time Nigroponte, by which name alſo the whole Iſland was known; albeit the Turks now call it Egribos; a populous, rich, and ſtrong City; ſo fortified with Walls and Bulwarks, that (in moſt mens judgment) it ſeemed a place impregnable. Unto this ſtrong City, Mahomet reſolved to lay ſiege, knowing well, that upon the fortune thereof dependeth the ſtate of the whole Iſland. Wherefore he aſſembled a mighty Army, and made great preparation both by Sea and Land; and when all things were in readineſs, ſent Mahomet (the great Baſſa of the Court) with a Fleet of three hundred Gallies, and certain other ſmall Veſſels well furniſhed with Souldiers, Mariners, and all things neceſſary, by Sea into Eubœa; and with a great Army marched himſelf by Land through Achaia, until he came over againſt the City of Chalcis. The Venetian Admiral hearing of the coming of the Turks Fleet, ſet forward to have met them near unto the ſtraits of Helleſpontus; but after he had by his eſpials deſcried the great number of the Enemies Fleet, finding himſelf too weak, ſhaped his courſe to the Iſland of Scios. The Baſſa coming out of the Straits of Helleſpontus, covered the Sea with his Fleet, and holding on his intended courſe without let came to Eubœa; where at his firſt landing, he took Stora and Baſilicon, two ſmall Towns, which he raſed to the ground, and from thence went directly to Chalcis. As ſoon as this great Fleet was there arrived, Mahomet cauſed a great Bridge to be made of his ſmaller Veſſels over the Strait betwixt Achaia and Eubœa; whereby he paſſed all his Army, and ſo belayed the City round both by Sea and Land. And after he had planted his Battery, began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the Walls; wherein he had in ſhort time made fair Breaches, and the ſooner, for that one Thomas of Liburnia (chief Canoneer of the City) before corrupted by the Turks, by ſigns agreed upon, gave them certain knowledge in what places the Walls were weakeſt; whereby they ſo aptly planted their Battery, as if they had taken view on the inſide of the Walls. Which foul Treaſon was at length perceived, and the Traytor therefore worthily executed. Yet little prevailed the Tyrant thereby; for ſuch was the induſtry of the Defendants, that whatſoever he had by the fury of his great Ordnance beat down by day, that they with reſtleſs labour repaired again by night. Thus was the Siege continued thirty days, in which ſpace many a ſharp Aſſault was given by the Turks, to their great loſs; and the City ſtill valiantly defended by the Chriſtians. At length the Venetian Admiral (to the great comfort of the beſieged) came with his Fleet within view of the City, making ſemblance as if he would have given the Turks battel. Whereupon it is reported, that Mahomet was about to have raiſed his Siege, and have got himſelf over into the Main, for fear the Venetians ſhould with their Gallies have broken the Bridge, and ſo have ſhut him up into that Iſland; which thing it was thought the Admiral might have done to his great praiſe, if he would as a couragious Chieftain have adventured the matter, as he was earneſtly requeſted by the Captains of every private Gally; who generally grieved to ſee him ſo great a Commander, to let ſlip ſo fair an opportunity. But he fearing to come any nearer, came to an Anchor and moved not, neither gave any ſign of comfort or relief to the beſieged. Which thing the Turkiſh King quickly perceiving, and therewith encouraged, having now in divers places beaten down the Walls, and made them aſſaultable, brought on his Men to the Breaches, promiſing them the ſpoil of the City, with many other great Rewards and high Preferments according to their particular Deſerts, whereof he ſaid, He would Himſelf be an Eye-witneſs. Hereupon the Turks gave a moſt fierce and furious Aſſault; which the Defendants with invincible courage received, and made ſuch ſlaughter of them, that the Ditches were fill'd, and the Breaches made up with the bodies of the dead Turks. But ſuch was the number of that populous Army (the greateſt ſtrength of the Turks) that the living little felt the loſs of the dead: Mahomet continually ſending in new ſupplies of freſh Men, in ſtead of them that were ſlain or wounded; ſo that one could no ſooner fall, but two or three ſtept up in his room, and ſo ſucceſſively, as if new Men had ſprung out of the Bodies of the dead. Twice they had even won the Breaches, and were both times with wonderful ſlaughter beaten out again. This deadly and dreadful Aſſault, was maintained a whole day and a night without intermiſſion. At length the Defendants being for the moſt part ſlain or wounded, and the reſt wearied with long fight, and unable to defend the Town now aſſaulted almoſt round, retired from the Breaches into the Market-place, and there like reſolute Men, ſold their lives at a dear price unto the Turks. Amongſt the ſlain Chriſtians, were found the dead bodies of many notable Women, who ſeeing the ruine of the City, choſe rather to die with their Friends in defence thereof, than alive to fall into the hands of their barbarous Enemies.

Treaſon in the City.

Chalcis is taken by the Turks.

Mahomet being now become Lord of the City, and having loſt forty thouſand of his Turks in that Siege, in revenge thereof cauſed all the men that were found in the City alive, to be put to moſt cruel death, eſpecially the Italians, upon whom he ſhewed his Tyranny with moſt exquiſite and horrible Torments. Paulus Ericus Governor of the City, with a few others, who with him were fled into the Caſtle, without reſiſtance delivered the ſame unto him, upon his faithful Promiſe, that they might in ſafety depart; but after he had got them into his Power, the perfidious Tyrant without regard, commanded them all to be cruelly murthered. The Governors Daughter a Maiden of incomparable beauty, was amongſt the reſt taken Priſoner, and for her rare Perfection, by them that took her, preſented to Mahomet as the Mirrour of Beauty: The barbarous Tyrant greedy of ſo fair a Prey, ſought firſt by flattering words and fair perſwaſion, to induce her to conſent to his deſire; but when he could not ſo prevail, he fell into another vain, and began to ſhew himſelf in his own nature, threatning her with Death, Torture, and Force, worſe than Death it ſelf, if ſhe would not otherwiſe yield unto his Appetite. Whereunto the conſtant Virgin (worthy eternal Fame) anſwered ſo reſolutely, and ſo contrary to the Tyrants expectation, that he being therewith enraged, commanded her to be preſently ſlain. The horrible and monſtrous Cruelty, with the filthy Outrages by that beaſtly and barbarous people committed, at the taking of that City, paſſeth all credit. Chalcis thus won, the reſt of that fruitful Iſland without further reſiſtance yielded unto the Turiſh ſlavery, under which it yet groaneth. This Calamity happened unto the Venetian State, or rather (to ſay truly) to the general hurt of the Chriſtian Common-weal, in the year of our Redemption, 1470.

The fruitful Iſland of Eubœa taken by the Turks.

Canalis the Venetian Admiral, who all the time of the Siege, had in the ſight of the City lien at Anchor as a looker on, fearing now the City was loſt, to be ſet upon by the Turks Fleet, hoiſed Sail, and laded with diſhonor returned in haſte unto Venice, where he was by the Commandment of the Senate committed to Priſon, and afterward with all his Family exiled to Utinum.

1471. Shortly after, when Mahomet was departed with his Army out of Eubœa, and his Fleet returned to Conſtantinople; the Venetians with their Gallies, attempted to have upon the ſudden ſurpriſed the City, a little before loſt. But Mahomet had therein left ſo ſtrong a Garriſon, that when the Venetians had landed their Men, they were again enforced to retire to their Gallies, and to forſake their Iſland.

Chalcis thus loſt with all the Iſland of Eubœa, the Venetians choſe Petrus Mocenicus, a valiant and diſcreet Gentleman, Admiral of their Fleet, in ſtead of Canalis; and by their Embaſſadors ſolicited Sixtus the Fourth of that Name, then Biſhop of Rome, and Ferdinand King of Naples, with Lewis King of Cyprus, and the grand Maſter of the Rhodes, to joyn their Forces together with theirs againſt the great and common Enemy; which thing all the aforeſaid Chriſtian Princes promiſed them to do. And the more to intangle the Turk, they at the ſame time ſent Caterinus Zenus their Embaſſador with rich Preſents unto Alymbeius Uſun-Caſſanes, the great King of Perſia, to incite him on that ſide againſt the Turk; in which Negotiation Zenus ſo well behaved himſelf, that the next year following, that great King took up Arms againſt Mahomt, and had with him mortal Wars, as ſhall be in convenient place hereafter declared. Mahomet not ignorant of the proceedings of the Venetians, and that they did what they might to ſtir up as many Enemies as they could, and to bring him (if it were poſſible) into hatred with the whole World; and well knowing how much he had offended the minds of the Chriſtian Princes with the cruelty he had of late uſed againſt them of Chalcis, thought it not beſt as then further to provoke them, and ſo happily to bring all at once about his ears, but for a ſeaſon to lie ſtill at Conſtantinople, as if he had been deſirous now to live in peace, not meaning further harm; hoping thereby, that although he concluded no Peace with any of them (which inded he was not deſirous of) yet that tract of time might mittigate the hainouſneſs of the fact, and cool the heat of their diſpleaſure; whereby it came to paſs as he wiſhed, that nothing worth the ſpeaking of was that year attempted againſt him; and becauſe the Perſian King was the man of whom he ſtood moſt in doubt, he ſought by his Embaſſadors to pacifie him, and to withdraw him from the League of the Chriſtians; requeſting him, if it were for nothing elſe but for the Community of the Mahometan Religion, wherein they well agreed, and were thereby the profeſſed Enemies of the Chriſtians, to withdraw his hand, and in their cauſe to ceaſe to take up Arms; urging now (for that it ſo ſtood with his purpoſe) the zeal of Religion, whereas otherwiſe he regarded (as was thought) no Religion at all. But Zenus the Venetian Embaſſador lying continually in the Perſian Court, ſo wrought the matter with Uſun-Caſſanes, that he told the Turks Embaſſadors plainly, That he could nor would not longer endure the manifeſt injury and wrong done unto him by the Turkiſh King; and farther, that he had made a faithful League with the Chriſtian Princes, and therefore would to the uttermoſt of his Power make it known unto the World, that he would effectually perform what thing ſoever he had promiſed; and ſo diſmiſſed them, now no leſs diſcontented than were before the Perſian Embaſſadors at ſuch time as they returned from the Turks Court, having obtained nothing they then requeſted concerning the Emperor of Trapezond.

1472. The year following, Mocenicus the Venetian Admiral with his Fleet arrived in the Iſle of Lesbos, where he did great harm. From thence he paſſed the Bay of Adramittium into the leſſer Aſia, and ſo ſpoiled the Country about Pergamus. After that he landed again at Cnidus upon the coaſt of Caria, where he took a great Booty; and ſo having done the Turks exceeding much harm in Aſia all alongſt the Sea coaſt oppoſite to Græcia, he returned laden with ſpoil towards Peloponneſus. In his return about the Promontory of Malea, upon the coaſt of Peloponneſus, he met with Richaienſis coming unto him with ſeventeen Gallies from King Ferdinand; by whom he was certified, that the great Biſhops Fleet was ready to come forth alſo. After mutual Gratulation, as the manner at Sea is, the Admirals joyning their Fleets in one, landed at Methone, now called Modon, then a City of the Venetians in Peloponneſus; where after they had well refreſhed their Souldiers, and taken in freſh Victuals, they put to Sea again; and ſailing through the Iſlands, landed in Aſia, where they were at their firſt landing encountred by the Country Turks, whom at laſt they put to flight, and by the ſpace of four days took what pillage they could in the Country; where the Souldiers found great ſtore of rich Booty, eſpecially of Turky Carpets, which are there made in great abundance. From thence they ſailed to Halicarnaſſus, which is part of Caria (where ſometime ſtood the ſtately Tomb which Queen Artemeſia built for her Husband Mauſolus, accounted amongſt the Wonders of the World) where they took a wonderful ſpoil. There came unto them Nicholas Biſhop of Modruſſa, with twenty Gallies ſent from the great Biſhop; whom the other two Generals welcomed with great joy. At the ſame time alſo came thither two Gallies from the great Maſter of the Rhodes. With this Fleet of eighty five Gallies, they ſailed to the Iſle of Samos over againſt Epheſus (ſome-time a place of great Fame, but then altogether deſolate and unpeopled) there to conſult for their further proceedings in thoſe Wars. Looſing from Samos, they took their courſe alongſt the Sea coaſt of Aſia, and landed at Attalia, the chief City of Pamphilia, a place of great Traffique; where they found in the Suburbs of the City great ſtore of many rich Commodities, brought thither out of Egypt and Syria; whereof they took what pleaſed them, and burnt the reſt together with the Suburbs. Unto the City it ſelf they began to lay ſiege, but perceiving that it was not without great loſs of their Men to be taken, they departed thence; and running all alongſt the coaſt of Pamphilia, burnt and deſtroyed what came in their way, and ſo returned back again to Rhodes; where they met an Embaſſador from Uſun-Caſſanes the Perſian King, to the Biſhop and the Venetians, for great Ordnance; whereof that ſo mighty a Prince was altogether unfurniſhed. Of this Embaſſador they underſtood, that Uſun-Caſſanes was entred into League with the Chriſtian Princes, and now buſie in making preparation againſt the Turk. At which time Mahomet requited the Venetians with no leſs harm in Epirus and Dalmatia, than they had done to him in Aſia; for now that Scanderbeg was dead, the Turks mightily prevailed upon the weak Princes of Epirus and Albania, with the Countries adjoyning. The Chriſtian Fleet departing from the Rhodes, landed in the Country of the Myndians, a part of Caria, and with great ſpoil returned to the Iſland of Naxos, one of the Cyclades; from whence King Ferdinand his Gallies returned home, laded with much rich ſpoil; for now the year was far ſpent. Yet after the departure of the Kings Gallies, Mocenicus with the Legate returned back again into Aſia, and there landing their Men, took the famous City of Smyrna in Ionia, and when they had taken the ſpoil thereof, ſet it on fire. At which time alſo they did great harm about Clazomene, not far from Smyrna. So Winter drawing now faſt on, they returned, laded with the rich ſpoils of Aſia; the Legate into Italy, and Mocenicus into Methone.

The inſatiable deſire of Soveraignty, whereunto the Turkiſh King was naturally inclined, had continually armed him, not only againſt the Chriſtian Princes, but againſt others alſo even of his own Superſtition; making no great difference betwixt the one and the other, if ſo he might extend his Dominion. He had long before under the pretence of a friendly Parley craftily circumvented the King of Myſia, a Country in Aſia, and having got him within his danger, cruelly put him to death, and by force ſubduing his Kingdom, left not one of the Kings blood alive. After that he invaded Cilicia, which the Turks call Caramania, where the two young Brethren, Pyramet and Caſſambet reigned, and drave them both out of Cilicia; of whom Pyramet the elder, fled for refuge to Uſun-Caſſanes; Caſſambet the younger aſſiſted by his old Friends, ſought by force of Arms to recover again his Inheritance wrongfully by the Turks poſſeſſed, and was beſieging certain Towns upon the Sea coaſt, which being taken from the Turks would eaſily draw all the reſt of the Kingdom after them. Mocenicus the Venetian Admiral being now with the firſt of the Spring come upon the coaſt of Cilicia, at the requeſt of Caſſambet, landed certain Companies of Men under the leading of Victor Superantius, and certain pieces of great Artillery, wherewith he ſo battered the Walls of Sichinum, that he enforced the Turks therein to yield up the City; which he delivered to Caſſambet. In like manner he took the City of Corycus, which he alſo reſtored to Caſſambet. At laſt he laid ſiege to Seleucia, which ſtandeth upon the River Orontes, and was built by King Seleucus, one of the Succeſſors of Alexander the Great, diſtant from the Sea about five miles; the Governor of this City diſcouraged with the ſight of the great Artillery, delivered the City to the Venetian Captain, who by the appointment of the Admiral reſtored the ſame to Caſſambet. Who by this means brought again into his Kingdom, gave great thanks unto the Admiral, promiſing both for himſelf and for his Brother to be always Friends unto the Venetians. Mocenicus departing from Cilicia, landed his Men in Lycia, and harried that Country alongſt the Sea coaſt. And this Mocenicus ſailed into Cyprus, to appeaſe a great Inſurrection there raiſed againſt the Queen, who was by her Husband at his death left to the Protection of the Venetians; which Rebellion when he had well quieted, hearing that Triadanus Grittus, was by the Decree of the Senate appointed Admiral, and already come into Peloponneſus, he with as much ſpeed as he could haſted thither, to give up his Charge, and ſo to return home again to Venice.

About this time the great Perſian King Uſun-Caſſanes began to make War upon the Turkiſh Emperor Mahomet, for the better underſtanding whereof, it ſhall not be from our purpoſe briefly to ſhew by what means this Uſun-Caſſanes, of a ſmall Prince aſpired to the Kingdom of Perſia, and ſo in ſhort time grew to that greatneſs, that he was juſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt Monarchs of the World then living; as appeareth by theſe Wars betwixt him and the great Turkiſh Emperor Mahomet. This Uſun-Caſſanes of whom we now ſpeak, was the Son of that Tachretin, who with other poor Princes was driven into Exile by the violence of Bajazet the firſt, great Grandfather to this Mahomet the Great, Emperor of the Turks, and was again reſtored by great Tamerlane, as is before declared in the life of Bajazet. By the death of Tachretin, his Son Uſun-Caſſanes (of ſome called alſo Aſymbeius) obtained that ſmall Territory which his Father had in Armenia; nothing anſwering unto the greatneſs of his conceits. Wherefore not contented with ſuch Poſſeſſions as was from his Father deſcended unto him, he began to ſhoulder for more room, with ſuch weak Princes his Neighbours as he thought he might beſt deal withall; wringing one Province from this Prince, another from that, and thruſting ſome others quite out of all that they had; and in ſhort time ſo inlarged his Dominion, that he had got into his hands a great part of Armenia, and was reputed both for a mighty and fortunate Prince. Inſomuch that Calo Joannes, then Emperor of Trapezond (whoſe Power altogether anſwered not to the greatneſs of his Stile, being for moſt part ſhut up within the bounds of Pontus, and fearing the greatneſs of the Turkiſh Emperor Mahomet, whoſe name began then to grow dreadful unto his Neighbour Princes) gave to him his only Daughter Deſpina in Marriage, by ſuch Alliance to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt the Turkiſh Tyrant, if need ſhould require. At which Marriage it was agreed, That Uſun-Caſſanes ſhould in the right of his Wife enjoy all the Kingdom of Pontus, after the death of Calo Joannes her Father, and of David his Brother; and that Deſpina ſhould ſo long as ſhe lived have the free Exerciſe of her Chriſtian Religion.

By this Woman, Uſun-Caſſanes had a Daughter called Marthu, whom I willingly remember, for that ſhe was the Mother of Hyſmael, afterwards the great King of Perſia, commonly called Hyſmael the Sophy; of whom more ſhall be ſaid hereafter in the Life of Selymus. Uſun-Caſſanes honoured with this Marriage, and ſtrengthened with this new Alliance, ceaſed not, after his wonted manner, daily to encroach upon his Neighbour Princes; and proceeded ſo far, that at length he began to lay hand upon a part of Armenia, which was then part of the Dominion of the Perſian King. Zenza (whom ſome call Tzokies, which was indeed the name of his Father) reigning then in Perſia, by his Embaſſadors admoniſhed, and in ſhort commanded Uſun-Caſſanes to hold himſelf content with his own, or at leaſt, with that he had already wrongfully taken from others, and not to preſume to come within the bounds of his Dominion, threatning otherwiſe to take him as an Enemy to his State, and to turn his Forces upon him. With which Embaſſage Uſun-Caſſanes being much offended, gave the Embaſſadors no entertainment, but commanded them with ſpeed to get them out of his Kingdom, and to tell their Maſter, That he would ſhortly himſelf in perſon come and debate the matter with him face to face. With which proud Anſwer from ſo mean a Prince the Perſian King moved, levied ſuch an Army for the invading of him, as was thought to have been ſufficient to have ſubdued a far greater Prince; and ſo appointed, ſet forward toward Armenia. Uſun-Caſſanes much inferiour to this great King in Wealth and Number of Men, but not in Haughtineſs of Mind, and Valiantneſs of Courage, ſtayed not to expect the coming of ſo puiſſant an Enemy, but full of hope ſet forward to meet him, and by great journeys ſought to come upon him before he could have any knowledge of his coming; yet had he then in his Army ſcarce one man to ten, but all armed with couragious Hearts, and conducted by a moſt fortunate Chieftain which feared nothing. So holding on his way, at length he met with a great Army of the Perſians, with whom he preſently joyned Battel, and after a long and cruel Fight overthrew them in the plain Field, with ſuch a Slaughter as might well have weakned the Forces of a right great Kingdom. The great King more inraged than diſcouraged with his overthrow, raiſed a far greater Army than before, the very Strength of his Kingdom; reſolving now, not to ſend any more his Lieutenants, but to go in perſon himſelf againſt ſo deſperate an Enemy. All things being in readineſs, he ſet forward, and at length met with the Armenian Prince, whom he found as ready to give Battel, as he was at the firſt. So being both deſirous to trie their fortune, they joyned battel; wherein the Perſians were again diſcomfited and put to flight, and more of them ſlain in that Battel, than were brought into the Field in the firſt Army. Zenzes the Perſian King was there ſlain with Uſun-Caſſanes his own hand, and Cariaſuphus his Son taken Priſoner; whom the Armenian Prince uſed with the greateſt honour could be deviſed, giving unto him the Honour and Title due to the Perſian King, taking to himſelf the bare name of the Protector of the Perſian State. Which he did only to pleaſe the Perſians, and to keep them quiet until he had got ſome more aſſured poſſeſſion of that Kingdom. But after he had in the two former Battels broken their greateſt Strength, and then under the colour of a peaceable Governor got into his power the regal City of Tauris, with the reſt of the Cities and ſtrong places of that great Kingdom, and that all men had him now in great reverence and admiration for his great vertues; he ſecretly diſpatched out of the way the poor titular King his Priſoner, (the laſt of the Poſterity of the mighty Tamerlane) and took upon himſelf the higheſt place, which admitteth no Partner. Whilſt this reſtleſs Prince was thus tumbling in the World, and not yet well ſetled in his new gotten Kingdom, Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor, no leſs ambitious than himſelf, had ſcornfully rejected the Embaſſadors and Preſents which Uſun-Caſſanes had ſent; and having ſhamefully put to death David the Emperor of Trapezond, his Allyance, had converted all the Kingdom of Pontus (which Uſun-Caſſanes of right claimed as his Wives Dowry) into the form of a Province, and ſo united it to the Turkiſh Empire. Which ſo manifeſt a wrong, Uſun-Caſſanes in the newneſs of his ſo late atchieved greatneſs, durſt not adventure to addreſs; but after that he was ſurely ſeated, and had with the courſe of time overcome all dangers at home, being daily prickt forward with the remembrance of the former injuries (ſtill ſuggeſted by the importunity of his Wiſe Deſpina, and the ſollicitation of the Venetians, to whom he had by ſolemn promiſe bound himſelf) he determined now to take the matter in hand, and to try his Forces upon his proud Enemy the Turkiſh Emperor. Hereupon he raiſed a great Army, and being well appointed of all things neceſſary, paſſing through Armenia toward Pontus, near unto the River Euphrates was encountred by Muſtapha (Mahomets Eldeſt Son, a young Prince of great hope) and Amurath the great Baſſa of Romania, whom Mahomet (fearing ſuch a matter) had ſent before with a ſtrong Army out of Europe, to joyn with ſuch Forces as Muſtapha had already raiſed in Aſia, ſo to withſtand the invaſion of the Perſian. Theſe two great Commanders Muſtapha and Amurath joining Battel with Uſun-Caſſanes, were by him in the plain Field overthrown; where Amurath the great Baſſa himſelf, with thirty thouſand Turks were ſlain; Muſtapha with the reſt of the Army by ſhameful flight ſaving themſelves.

Two huge Armies of the Turks and Perſians in field together.

Now when Mahomet underſtood that Amurath was ſlain, and his Army diſcomfited, he was therewith exceedingly troubled; but purpoſing to be thereof revenged, gave order into all parts of his Dominions for the levying of new Forces; ſo that at the time by him appointed, was aſſembled a great and mighty Army of 320000 men. Uſun-Caſſanes in like manner was in the Field with an Army, nothing in number inferior unto his Enemy. Theſe two Mahometan Kings, drawing after them their huge Armies met together near the Mountains of Armenia, where at the firſt encounter one of the Turks great Baſſa's was ſlain, with 40000 Turks. With which hard beginning the proud Tyrant was ſo daunted, that he could hardly be perſwaded to prove his fortune any further, but contenting himſelf with that loſs, was about to have retired; and had undoubtedly ſo done, if ſome of his moſt expert and valiant Captains which might be bold with him, had not ſharply reproved him, that having ſo populous an Army as ſcarcely felt that ſmall loſs, he ſhould once think of returning without Victory. With which their comfortable perſwaſions he was again encouraged to give Battel. Yet for his more ſafety he withdrew his Army into a Strait betwixt two Mountains, and with his Carriages fortified the front thereof, as with a Trench; behind which Carriages he placed his great Ordnance, and on either ſide his Archers. The Perſians as men of great Valour, and thereto encouraged with their former Victories, came on as men fearing no peril, to have charged the Turks even in their Strength; preſenting their whole Army before they were aware, into the mouth of the Turks Artillery; which ſuddenly diſcharged amongſt the thickeſt of them, brake their Ranks, and took away a number of them. Beſides that, the Perſian Horſes terrified with the unacquainted and thundering report of the great Ordnance, were not to be ruled by their Riders, but ſtarting back, ran ſome one way, ſome another, as if they had felt neither Bit nor Rider. Which their confuſion Mahomet perceiving, preſently took hold of the occaſion offered, and with his Horſemen fiercely charged them, being now by themſelves intangled and out of order. Nevertheleſs the Perſians made great reſiſtance, and ſlew many of the Turks; but ſtill fighting confuſedly and out of order, they were at the laſt inforced to flie; in which Flight a great number of them were ſlain, and their Tents alſo taken. Zeinal Uſun-Caſſanes his eldeſt Son, labouring to ſtay the Flight of the Perſians, was ſlain with a ſmall ſhot. So the Honour of the day remained with the Turks; yet they had no great cauſe to brag of their winnings, having loſt in that Battel forty thouſand Souldiers; whereas of the Perſians fell not above ten thouſand. Mahomet contenting himſelf with this dear bought Victory, returned homewards; and Uſun-Caſſanes leaving another of his Sons with his Army for the defence of Armenia, returned likewiſe to Tauris. But whilſt the Chriſtian Princes were in their greateſt expectation, what might be the Event of theſe Wars betwixt theſe two mighty Mahometan Kings; they upon the ſuddain concluded a Peace, and confirmed the ſame with new Affinity, excluding the Chriſtians quite out of the ſame. This laſt Battel betwixt Mahomet and Uſun-Caſſanes, was fought in the year of our Lord 1474, about four years before the death of Uſun-Caſſanes, who died the fifth of January in the year 1478.

The death of the noble Muſtapha Mahomet his eldeſt Son.

In the time of theſe Wars died the noble Muſtapha, Mahomet his eldeſt Son, at Iconium, having ſpent himſelf with reveling amongſt his Paragons; or as ſome write, commanded to die, by his Father, upon this occaſion. This youthful Prince upon a time coming to the Court to ſee his Father (or as they term it, to kiſs his hand) became amorous of the Wife of Achmetes Baſſa, a Lady of incomparable Beauty, and Daughter to Iſaac Baſſa, the chief men in the Turkiſh Empire, next unto Mahomet himſelf; but finding no means to compaſs her in whom his Soul lived, he awaited a time when as ſhe (after the manner of the Turks) went to bath her ſelf; and there as he found her all diſroabed, ſhamefully forced her, without regard either of his own Honour, or of hers. Of this ſo foul an outrage, Achmetes her Husband, with his cloaths and hat all rent for madneſs, came and grievouſly complained to Mahomet, craving vengeance for the ſame. Unto whom Mahomet again replied, Art not thou thy ſelf my Slave? and if my Son Muſtapha have known thy Wife, is ſhe not my Bondſlave he hath had to do withal? Ceaſe therefore thus to complain, and hold thy ſelf therewith content. Nevertheleſs he in ſecret ſharply reproved his Son for ſo hainous and diſhonorable a Fact by him committed, and commanded him out of his ſight; and as he was of a ſevere nature, cauſed him within a few days after to be ſecretly ſtrangled. Nevertheleſs, the wrong done unto the Baſſa, ſunk ſo deep into his haughty mind, as that he would never admit excuſe therefore, but put away his Wife, the ground of the implacable hatred betwixt him and the great Baſſa Iſaac his Father-in-law; and in fine, the very cauſe of his utter deſtruction, as is afterward declared in the life of Bajazet.

Mahomet delivered of his greateſt fear, by the Peace he had lately concluded with Uſun-Caſſanes the Perſian King, was now at good leiſure to imploy all his Forces againſt the Chriſtians. And bearing a deadly hatred againſt the Princes of Epirus and Albania, with a wonderful deſire to extend his Empire unto the Ionian and Adriatick, that he might from thence but look toward Italy, which he began now to long after; he determined with himſelf, firſt to ſubdue thoſe Countries, as ſtanding in his way, both for the invaſion of Italy, and of the Territories of the Venetians. And foraſmuch as the ſtrong City of Scodra (otherwiſe called Scutary) then in the poſſeſſion of the Venetians, for the commodious Situation thereof ſeemed to give him the beſt entrance into the Countries of Albania, Epirus, Dalmatia, and to ſuch Cities as the Venetians held alongſt the Sea coaſt, he reſolved there to begin his Wars.

Solyman Baſſa beſiegeth Scodra with an Army of eighty thouſand men.

This City was of great Strength, as well for the natuaral Situation thereof, as for the ſtrong Fortifications therein made by the hand of man; which thing Mahomet was not ignorant of, but preſuming of his own Strength and Power, vainly perſwaded himſelf, that no place was now able long to hold out againſt him. Wherefore having prepared all things fit for the beſieging thereof, he ſent Solyman Baſſa an Eunuch (whom he made his Lieutenant General in Europe, in the place of Amurath Baſſa, before ſlain by Uſun-Caſſanes) with eighty thouſand Souldiers to beſiege Scodra. This great Baſſa according to his charge came, and with great pomp incamped round about the City, the 25 of May. Shortly after having planted his battery, he began moſt furiouſly to ſhake the Walls, and ceaſed not by all means he could deviſe, to trouble the Defendants; and when he had by force of the Canon done what he could, gave divers ſharp aſſaults unto the City, but was ſtill with great loſs valiantly repulſed by them of the City. Long it were to declare, how often, and in what terrible manner that warlike Baſſa Mahomet, his chief Captain, attempted to have won the City; as alſo to ſhew how they of Scodra, directed by their worthy Governor Antoninus Lauretanus, valiantly defended themſelves and their City; nothing was omitted that the Enemy could do or deviſe for the gaining thereof; but all his devices and attempts were ſo met withal by the Defendants, that they ſerved him to no other purpoſe but to the deſtruction of his people. Whilſt the Baſſa thus lay at the Siege of Scodra, Mocenicus having received ſuch commandment from the Senate, came and joyned himſelf to Grittus the new Admiral, who then lay with his Fleet in the mouth of Boliana, a great River running out of the Lake whereupon the City of Scodra ſtandeth. Theſe two great Commanders being met together, were both as one man, and with a wonderful conſent did what they might for the furtherance of the Common good, a thing not common; firſt they put ſtrong Garriſons, with all things neceſſary, into Colchinum, Lyſſa, Dirrhachium, and other Cities of their Seigniory upon the Sea coaſt. After that, they went up the River Boliana with certain Gallies, and came within ſight of Scodra, and there by Fires in the night, and other tokens of comfort, encouraged the Defendants, as with an aſſured promiſe of relief; which thing it grieved the Turks to behold, who therefore went about to have ſhut in thoſe ſame Gallies with a great Chain drawn croſs the River, where it was narroweſt betwixt them and the Sea; but in doing thereof, the Venetians out of their Gallies ſlew five hundred of the Turks, and wounded divers others, and ſo returned again to Sea. It was afterward attempted by the aforeſaid Admirals, if a new ſupply might have been put into the City; but the Enemy had ſo beſet the ſame that it was not poſſible to be done. In the mean time, Matthias King of Hungary (receiving a great yearly portion of the Venetians for the defence of their Countries againſt the Turk) hearing that Scodra was beſieged, began to make ſuch Spoil in the Turks Dominions bordering upon him, that Mahomet was glad to call home the great Baſſa from the Siege of Scodra, to defend his own Frontiers. So the Baſſa after he had lien three months with his great Army at the Siege, and loſt fourteen thouſand of his men, whereof the greateſt part died of Sickneſs taken by long lying in the rotten mooriſh ground near unto the River; by commandment from his Maſter, roſe with his Army and departed. The Venetians alſo, which lay all that while thereabout in their Gallies, were toucht with the ſame contagion; Triadanus Grittus died thereof; and Mocenicus the other Admiral fell thereof dangerouſly ſick, but being ſomewhat recovered, returned home, and was ſhortly after for his good ſervice choſen Duke of Venice, Marcellus the old Duke being dead. With this diſhonour taken at Scodra Mahomet was ſo diſcontented, that he appointed a yearly Fee unto one, to put him in mind dayly of the Siege of Scodra.

1476. The ſame year that this great Baſſa Solyman had in vain beſieged Scodra, he was afterward ſent with a great Army into Valachia, where he was ſo intangled in the Woods and Fens, by Stephanus the Vayvod, that he loſt all his Army, and with much ado eſcaped himſelf, by the wonderful ſwiftneſs of a Mare whereon he rid.

The year following, which was the year 1476, Mahomet ſent out a great Fleet to Sea, under the conduct of Geduces Achmetes, his chief Counſellor and Man of War, (whoſe very name was dreadful in all places where he came) in hope to have by Treaſon ſurpriſed the Iſland of Crete, but that Plot was in good time by the Venetians perceived, the Traitors executed, and he of his purpoſe diſappointed. Whereupon he changed his former purpoſe for Crete, and ſent the ſame Achmetes with his Fleet into the Euxine (or as the Turks call it, the Black Sea) to beſiege the rich City of Caffa. This City was in ancient time called Theodoſia, ſituate in the Country of Taurica Cherſoneſus, faſt by the Sea ſide, and had of long time been in poſſeſſion of the Genowaies, and was a place of exceeding great Trade, until that this great Emperor Mahomet having taken Conſtantinople, and falling out with the Venetians, had by his ſtrong Caſtles built upon the Straits of Helleſpontus and Boſphorus, taken away both the traffique of Merchants into thoſe Seas, and all poſſible means for the Genowaies to ſend Succour to that City; yet it is credibly reported, that one valiant Captain undertook to carry his Company (in number not above one hundred and fifty men) by Land from Genoa to Caffa, not much leſs than two thouſand miles, and worthily performed what he had undertaken. Achmetes coming thither with his Fleet, encloſed the City both by Sea and Land; which divided in it ſelf by reaſon of the diverſe diſpoſition of the Inhabitants, being of divers Nations, ſome Genowaies, ſome Greeks, ſome Armenians, but moſt Tartars, could not long hold out, but was in ſhort time given up to the Baſſa, upon condition, That the Genoway Merchants, who were there both in number many, and exceeding rich, might in ſafety depart thence with their Wealth. Which promiſe the Baſſa performed not; but when he was poſſeſſed of the City, ſent ſuch as he thought good, to Conſtantinople, and commanded the reſt upon pain of death, not to depart thence, or to convey away from thence any part of their Subſtance. In ſhort time after, the whole Country of Taurica Cherſoneſus yielded unto the Turkiſh Obeiſance. At which time alſo the Tartar Princes, namely the Precopenſes and Deſtenſes, terrified with the greatneſs of the Turk, cowardly yielded themſelves as Tributaries unto him; ever ſince which time they have lived a moſt ſervile and troubleſome life, ſubject to every command of the Othoman Emperor; for whom they have done great ſervice many times in their Wars, againſt the Perſians, the Polonians, the Hungarians, Tranſylvanians, and Germans, as in the proceſs of this Hiſtory well appeareth; and as the aforeſaid Nations their Neighbours, with others alſo further off, have even of late to their great loſs felt.

Although the Venetians had in theſe late Wars loſt the great and fertile Iſland of Eubœa, with the ſtrong City of Chalcis, the ſureſt harbour for their Gallies; yet held they ſtill divers ſtrong Towns and commodious Havens by the Sea-Coaſt, both within Peloponneſus and without; as Methone, Corone, Tenarus, Naupactum and others; which ſtanding as it were in the boſome of his Empire, Mahomet ſore longed after. And therefore to ſatisfie his ambitious deſire, ſent Solyman (the great Baſſa of Europe) with a ſtrong Fleet into Peloponneſus. Who entring the Gulf of Corinth, at his firſt coming laid Siege to Naupactum, now called Lepanto, a City ſtanding in the Gulf of Corinth, in the Country of Ozolæ near unto Locris, over againſt Peloponneſus. Antonius Lauretanus (for his late good ſervice done in defending of Scodra) made Admiral for the Venetians, came with ſpeed to Naupactum, and in deſpight of the Enemy ſo furniſhed the City both with men and whatſoever elſe was needful, that the Baſſa now out of hope to win the City, roſe upon the ſuddain with his Army, and in a great fury departed, after he had lien there four months. In this fret returning towards Conſtantinople, he put certain Companies of his men to ſhore in the Iſland of Lemnos, in hope to have upon the ſuddain ſurpriſed the City of Coccinum; but as they were about to have entred, they were contrary to their expectation, manfully reſiſted by ſuch Chriſtians as by chance were next the Gate; where the notable Courage of Marulla (a maiden of that City) was much commended; who ſeeing her Father ſlain in the Gate, took up the Weapons that lay by him, and like a fierce Amazon notably revenged his death, deſperately fighting in defence of her Country, with thoſe few which were there at the firſt; and ſo kept the Turks out, until the reſt of the Citizens (moved with the Alarm) came to the Gate, and forced them, not without ſome loſs, to retire again to their Gallies. Not long after, Lauretanus came thither with his Fleet; but before his coming, the Baſſa was departed thence for Conſtantinople, having in this expedition done nothing that was expected at his hands. 1477.

part, ſometime another, had ſubdued moſt part thereof. And about this time his Army lay at the Siege of Croia; for relief whereof, the Venetians (in whoſe protection it was) ſent Franciſcus Centarenus, a Noble Gentleman, their Lieutenant, with ſuch Forces as were ſufficient for the raiſing of the Siege. He finding the Turks in the Plain of Tyranna, gave them Battel; which a great while ſtood doubtful; at length Victory inclining to the Venetians, the Turks began to flie; after whom the Venetians made no great purſuit, but contented to have put them to flight, took their Tents, with ſuch Forts as they had raiſed againſt the City. Thus whilſt the Venetians think themſelves in ſure poſſeſſion of the Victory, and out of fear of their Enemies, they were through their own too much ſecurity, by and by themſelves overthrown: For whilſt the common Souldiers having their minds more ſet upon the Spoil, than upon the purſuit of the Enemy (the Battel as yet ſcarce ended) ſcatter themſelves, and the Captains were conſulting, whether they ſhould lodge that night (which began then to approach) in the Enemies Tents, or not; in the midſt of their conſultation, the Turks having perceived their diſorder, ſuddainly returned again upon them, and without great reſiſtance overthrew them, and put them to flight. In which flight a thouſand of them fell, amongſt whom Contarenus the General, and divers others of good place and calling, were ſlain alſo. This overthrow the Venetians took a great deal better than that which ſhortly after followed in the confines of Italy, at the River of Sontium.

Contarenus the Venetian General ſlain.

Mahomet having conquered a great part of Albania, and dayly incroaching upon the Chriſtians, made divers incurſions into the Countries of Dalmatia, Hiſtria, and Carniola; yea, and ſometimes went ſo far, that he and his Turks entred into the Province of Friuli, called in ancient time Forum Julij, a part of the Venetian Seigniory, and ſo carried away with them many Priſoners, with much Spoil. For remedy whereof, the Venetians with exceeding charge and wonderful labour fortified alongſt the River of Sontium, from Goritia, to the Fens of Aquilea, the ſpace of twelve miles, and there built two Forts, wherein they continually kept ſtrong Garriſons for the defence of the Country. Whereby the Country People thinking themſelves now in ſafety, began to fall into ſecurity (the dangerous ſickneſs of all Common-Weals) neglecting by their careful watch to foreſee a far off the Enemies coming, as they had before uſed. It fortuned at this time, that Aſa-beg (whom ſome call Marbeck) one of the Turks great Captains, upon the ſuddain when no ſuch thing was feared, came and ſhewed himſelf in an Evening upon the further ſide of the River of Sontium, with a thouſand Horſemen; upon the ſight of whom, an Alarm was raiſed in both Forts, and every man put himſelf in readineſs, as if they ſhould even preſently have joyned Battel; but it was ſo nigh night, as that nothing could as then be done; yet the Venetian Garriſons joining themſelves together, watcht all that night in Arms. There was at that time in both theſe Forts, three thouſand Horſemen, and ſome few Companies of Footmen, all under the command of Hieronimus Nowel Count of Verona, a famous Captain of that time; who with the reſt of the Captains reſolved if they could, to keep the Turks from paſſing the River; if not, then to give them battel. Marbeck General of the Turks Army, taking good view of the place, in the night time ſecretly conveighed a thouſand of his beſt Souldiers over the River, four miles off, in ſuch a place as the Venetians feared leaſt, deeming it impoſſible for any man, there to have paſſed over. Theſe men he appointed to lie cloſe in ambuſh behind a great Hill, in ſight, not far from the other ſide of the River, and upon a ſign given, preſently to diſcover themſelves and charge the Enemy. The next morning very early, he ſent certain Troops of his readieſt Horſemen over the River, which by offering to skirmiſh with the Venetians, might draw them into the Field; and then as men in doubt whether to fight or to flie, to tole them on to the place where the ambuſh lay. The Venetians had divided themſelves into three Battalions; whereof the General himſelf had the leading of the firſt, who ſeeing theſe diſordered Troops coming to skirmiſh with him, encountred them fiercely, and eaſily put them to flight, (being ſo determined before) and in that flight earneſtly purſued them; eſpecially the Counts Son, a valiant young Gentleman, who with others like himſelf, thought by that days good ſervice to gain unto themſelves great Honour. When the Turks General ſaw that the Venetians following the chaſe, were gone a great way from the River, he forthwith paſſed over with the reſt of his Army, and followed the Venetians at the Heels; which the Turks which before fled, now beholding, turned again upon their fierce Enemies, and valiantly withſtood them. At which very inſtant the other Turks upon ſign given ariſing out of ambuſh, came down from the Hill Licinis, with ſuch violence and clamour, that the Venetians therewith diſcouraged would have fled if they could have told which way; but they were on every ſide ſo beſet, that there was no way left for them to eſcape; but were there all ſlain, except ſome few which yielded themſelves, and ſo were ſaved. The other two Battalions of the Venetians, diſcouraged with the ſlaughter of the firſt, fled incontinently, and in flying were many of them ſlain. In this Battel the Count himſelf, with his Son, and many other notable Gentlemen, and half the Horſemen were loſt. The Turks encouraged with this Victory, the next day ſpoiled all the Country of Friuli, betwixt the Rivers of Sontium, (otherwiſe called Liſonzo) and Tiliaventum, and cruelly burnt all the Country before them; ſo that at once an hundred Country Villages were to be ſeen on a light fire together, which ſtood ſo thick, that it ſeemed as if one continual Fire had wholly covered all the face of the Country. The barbarous Turks laden with the Spoil of that rich Country, and driving before them great numbers of miſerable Captives, as if they had been Flocks of Sheep, returned to Sontium. But when they had paſſed the River, and had travelled homeward one days journey, and all men thought they had now been quite gone, they ſuddainly returned back again, and poſting through the Country they had before ſpoiled, came to the River of Tiliaventum, which they deſperately paſſed, and did no leſs harm on that ſide the River, than they had before on the other; and ſo carrying away with them what they pleaſed, returned by the ſame way they came, having filled all that part of Italy with terror and fear. This overthrow of Sontium the Venetians account amongſt the greateſt loſſes which they received from the Turks in all theſe their long Wars.

The Turks ſhew themſelves at the River of Sontium.

The Country of Friuli ſpoiled by the Turks.

The next year about Harveſt the Turks came again with a far greater power; and paſſing the River of Sontium, came before the Forts of Gradiſca, where Carolus Fortebrachius lay with a ſtrong Garriſon of the Venetians, offering him skirmiſh, ſo to have drawn him into the Field. But the wary Captain conſidering the great ſtrength of the Enemy, and the loſs received the year before, would not be drawn out of his ſtrength, but ſtood upon his guard, expecting to take the Enemy at ſome more advantage; which thing the Turks fearing, durſt not diſperſe themſelves abroad for the Spoil of the Country, leaving ſo ſtrong a Garriſon of the Enemies behind them. And therefore when they had gon about four miles into the Country, they turned their courſe up into the Mountains (which are part of the Alps) towards Germany, and there grievouſly ſpoyled the Mountain People ſtrangely paſſing through thoſe abrupt and high Mountains with their Horſes, where men could hardly either go or ſtand on Foot without ſomething to ſtay upon. And ſo when they had done what harm they could, taking a great compaſs about, returned home another way.

Mahomet remembring the ſhameful repulſe he had about four years before received at Scodra, 1479. and having the name of that City daily ſounding in his ears, determined now once again to gage his whole Forces upon the winning thereof, and ſo to give Peace to his ambitious deſires. And becauſe he would not again be diſhonoured with that he purpoſed to take in hand, he gave out order into all parts of his Dominions, both in Europe and Aſia, for the aſſembling of his beſt Souldiers and Men of War. Now when all things were in readineſs, and ſuch an Army aſſembled, as he ſeldom or never had a ſtronger; firſt he ſent forth Aly-beg (Warden of the Frontiers of his Kingdom alongſt the River Danubius) with eighty thouſand of the Souldiers called Achanzij, towards Scodra. Theſe Achanzij are Horſemen, which for their good ſervice, according to their deſerts, have certain Lands given them by the King to live upon during their Lives; for which they are of duty bound to ſerve upon their own charge, as the forrunners of the Turk his Army, whenſoever he goeth to beſiege any place; theſe be they which firſt enter into the Enemies Country, burning and ſpoiling what they can, until they come unto the place appointed; and have this priviledge, That ſo ſoon as all the Army is come unto the place to be beſieged, they may then at their pleaſure either depart or ſtay.

Vid. Marinum Barletium de expug. Scodrenſi.

The Governor of Scodra underſtanding both by common fame and certain intelligence, of the Turks deſigns, with all care and diligence fortified the Town, labouring continually both night and day at the Rampiers, as if the Enemy had been already preſent; and plentifully provided all things neceſſary for the enduring of a long Siege. The aged and unneceſſary People, he ſent out of the City into other places of more ſafety farther off; in whoſe ſtead he took in great numbers of ſtrong and able men which dwelt in the Country round about; amongſt whom were many Mariners taken out of the Gallies, and other men of like quality, which got their living upon the River and Lake of Scodra, luſty bodies enured to hardneſs, who in the long Siege following did great ſervice.

Whilſt this preparation was making in Scodra, behold the Mountains a far off Northward from the City, began to ſhine with many great Fires, and all the Country was covered with thick ſmoak, which every hour ſeemed to draw nearer and nearer; when within ſhort time after, the poor Country People (which as yet were not all fled) with ſuch Traſh as they could well carry, came running for life all over the Country to the ſtrong Cities upon the Sea ſide, crying out that the Turks were come.

The next day, which was the fourteenth of May, Aly-Beg with his eighty thouſand Achanzij, came into the Suburbs of the City, and there encamped; ſo that none could go in or out of the Gates; which was not the leaſt part of his charge. To him, by the commandment of Mahomet, had Scander-Beg Governor of Boſna, and Malcotius with ſeven thouſand Horſemen, joyned themſelves upon the way. Of this Malcotius it is reported (as was of Auguſtus) that the majeſty of his countenance, with the reſplendant beams iſſuing out of his Eyes (as if it had been the Rayes of the Sun) were of ſuch peircing brightneſs, that no man was able with immoved and fixed Eye long to behold the ſame. Theſe Horſemen (the forerunners, as I ſaid, of Mahomets great Army) the Chriſtians much troubled, with often Sallies and Shot, out of the Town, and ſlew many of them with little or no loſs unto themſelves.

When Aly-Beg had thus lien before the City ten days, came Taut Gaiola the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople with five and twenty thouſand Souldiers, and above twelve thouſand Camels, for moſt part laden with Mettal in Maſs, for to make great Ordnance of, and other neceſſaries for the Camp. The Baſſaes great and ſtately Tent of purple colour, was pitched upon the top of an high Hill called the Baſſaes Hill, becauſe in that place Solyman Baſſa had lien in the former Siege about four years before: the Baſſaes Army lay encamped betwixt the ſame Hill and the Town. This Taut Gaiola was born in Epirus of baſe Parentage, and from thence by the Turks carryed away young to Conſtantinople; where for his ſharpneſs of Wit and rare Activity, he grew into ſuch favour, firſt with Mahomet, and afterward with Bajazet his Son, that he was by them promoted to the greateſt places of Honour, next unto themſelves; wherein he became ſo popular, and had ſo poſſeſſed the hearts of the People, that it was ſuſpected of ſome, he would have aſpired to the Turkiſh Empire himſelf. Preſently after the coming of this great Baſſa, workmen were ſet a work about the caſting of the great Ordnance, and making ready of other things for the Siege. The Chriſtians alſo were no leſs buſie about their Fortifications, the Governor appointing unto every man his charge, and which part of the Wall to defend; yet keeping continually in the Market place certain Companies (with the Enſigns of S. Mark, and S. Steven) to ſerve as freſh Supplies, as need or occaſion ſhould require. Whilſt the great Ordnance was in caſting, the Baſſa cauſed a great Bridge of Timber to be made over the River, that ſo he might at his pleaſure paſs over his men, and command both ſides of the River. The Chriſtians in the mean time with vigilant Eye ſo attending the Turks, that none of them could ſtir within ſhot, but he was forthwith fet off and ſlain.

The thirteenth of June, Muſtapha the Beglerbeg or Viceroy of Aſia (commonly called the great Baſſa of Natolia) came alſo in great pomp to the Siege with thirty thouſand Souldiers brought out of Aſia; perſonable men, but not accounted ſo good Souldiers as they of Europe; for it is a common ſaying among the Turks, That the Men of Europe, and the Horſes of Aſia do beſt ſervice. This great Baſſa was honorably met and welcomed by the other great Baſſa of Conſtantinople, and was quartered upon another ſide of the City, where his rich Pavillion (all of Green) was pitcht in a Vineyard about a mile from the Town. Muſtapha to prove the courage of his Souldiers, propounded a reward to which ſo ever of them, as durſt adventure but to go and touch the Walls of the City; upon which occaſion, Two of the Turks attempting to touch the walls of Scodra, are both ſlain, and one of their Heads ſet upon the Wall.

two of his Souldiers paſſing well mounted, attempted to have performed that enterpriſe. But making what haſt they could poſſibly, they were both ſlain from the Wall, and one of their bodies recovered by certain valiant Souldiers, which ſallied out of the Town, and his head being cut off, was upon a Launce ſet upon the Walls for the Turks to behold.

The fifteenth of June, five thouſand ſix hundred Janizaries came into the Camp, with four white Enſigns; at whoſe coming all the Souldiers of both the Baſſaes Camps gave a wonderful ſhout, and welcomed them with great joy. Theſe are the great Turks Guard and beſt Souldiers, in whom the greateſt Strength of his Kingdom conſiſteth, and are called the Sons of the great Sultan. After whoſe coming, Mahomt himſelf was dayly expected. Three days after, came two other great men, attended upon with a number of followers, who by their countenance, and the great reverence done unto them by the reſt of the Turks, ſeemed to be men of great place and authority; theſe men deſired, that they might with ſafety ſpeak with the Governor of the City, and the reſt of the Captains, to deliver unto them ſuch a Meſſage, as they had for their good (as they ſaid) brought unto them from Mahomet. Which their requeſt being granted, the elder of them, after he had with many glorious words ſet forth the power of his Maſter, and what he had done to other great Cities, with their Princes; and further ſhewed into what danger they were like to fall, if they ſhould long ſtand upon their defence; he began to perſwade them to yield up the City, aſſuring them of all kind uſage, with many rich rewards from the great Emperor; whereas otherwiſe, they were to expect nothing but extream miſery and moſt ſhameful death. Whereunto anſwer was in the name of them all given by the mouth of Petrus Pagnanus, a grave and worthy Citizen, That they were not afraid of the greatneſs of Mahomet, or of any thing he had done, or could do; and that he ſhould find it hard to inforce them, but impoſſible to perſwade them to deliver their City; and therefore that he might at his pleaſure uſe his Forces againſt men fully reſolved rather to yield unto nature her laſt due, than to hearken to any compoſition; and in concluſion told them, that if they ſhould at any time after make any ſuch motion, they ſhould not expect any other anſwer than from the mouth of the Canon. With which ſhort anſwer theſe great men departed, not a little diſcontented.

At this ſame time the ſtrong City of Croia (which the worthy Scanderbeg had living ſo honourably defended, and dying had left it with his Kingdom, in the protection and poſſeſſion of the Venetians) having holden out a years Siege, after that all the Kingdom of Epirus and moſt part of Albania was loſt, for lack of Victuals was yielded up unto the Turk, upon condition, That the hunger-ſtarved Defendants (who then ſeemed rather Ghoſts than Men) might at their pleaſure in ſafety depart; which agreement the faithleſs Turk brake and without mercy put them all to the Sword. This heavy news was delivered to them of Scodra by certain Chriſtians in the Turks Camp; wherewith they were much grieved, but nothing at all diſcouraged.

Whilſt the Turks thus lay at the Siege, the Watermen, of whom a great number lived upon the great Lake of Scodra (being in circuit about one hundred miles) came many times down the River by night, and did much harm in the Turks Camp; for remedy whereof, they were inforced to build certain ſmall Gallies to keep them in, who for all that, many times ſtole ſecretly upon them, and much troubled them.

The two and twentieth of June, the Turks mounted two great Pieces of Ordnance upon the top of the Hill whereon the Baſſa lay; whereof the one carried a Bullet, made of an hard kind of round Stone, of three hundred pound weight, and the other a Bullet of four hundred, wherewith they began to batter the Town four days; after that, they placed a third Piece of Artillery at the foot of the ſame Hill; which delivered a Bullet of four hundred pound weight; and the next day they planted a fourth Piece, greater than the reſt, about the middle of the ſame Hill; which carried a Shot of ſix hundred and fifty pound weight. In this while, eight thouſand of the Turks Souldiers, called Aſapi (which are known from the Janizaries by their red Caps, whereas the Janizaries wear white) came into the Camp. And ſhortly after came Mahomet himſelf with all his Army to the River of Drimon, whither the two great Baſſaes of Aſia and Conſtantinople went with great Pomp and Triumph to meet him.

Mahomet in perſon himſelf cometh unto the ſiege of Scodra. The order of Mahomets Camp.

The ſecond of July, Mahomet with all his Army before the riſing of the Sun came to the Camp before Scodra; where after he had well viewed the Situation thereof, he is reported to have ſaid, O what a fair and ſtately place hath the Eagle choſen out for her ſelf to build her neſt, and to hatch her young ones in. Divers rich Pavillions were ſet up for Mahomet himſelf, but one far greater than the reſt, diſtant from them about a Flight ſhoot, which was the place wherein he held his Counſel; the other were for his own private uſe. Round about theſe his Tents, lay the Janizaries incamped, a good diſtance off; yet ſo cloſe one to another, as if it had been a perpetual Rampire or ſtrong Trench, whereinto was but one entrance, continually guarded with a moſt ſtrong Guard. Round about the Janizaries lay all the reſt of the Army encamped; ſo that all the Country as far as a man could ſee was covered and white with Tents, much like as when the ground in Winter is covered over with a deep Snow; and ſtill more people reſorted to the Camp daily; ſo that it was deemed by men of great experience, that Mahomet had then in his Army of all ſorts of People, about 350000 Men, all gaping to devour that poor City; a ſight of it ſelf ſufficient to have daunted the Courage of right valiant men; but what can be terrible to them that fear not to dy? Againſt this terror of the Enemy, the Defendants were notably encouraged by the comfortable perſwaſions and exhortations of one Bartholomeus a Preacher, (ſometimes one of the worthy Scanderbegs Souldiers) who afterwards giving himſelf to the ſtudy of Divinity, became a zealous Preacher, and in this Siege did notably comfort the Chriſtian Defendants againſt the terror of ſo great an Army of Miſcreants. All this while the battery was ſtill maintained; and the fifth of July the Turks mounted two other great Pieces, whereof the one was like unto the former before mounted, but the other placed upon the middle of the Baſſaes Mount, was of an incredible greatneſs, diſcharging a Shot of twelve hundred pound weight, and was called the Princes Piece, in whoſe name it was with much cunning and induſtry made; with which huge Piece, the Turks even from the beginning of the Siege had threatned the beſieged, willing them to expect the coming of the Princes Piece. The next day they planted upon the ſame Mount a ſeventh Piece, which carried a Shot of five hundred and fifty pound weight; from which time they battered the City with the aforeſaid ſeven great Pieces, and ceaſed not oftentimes by night out of their great Mortar-Pieces, to caſt great Balls of Wild Fire into the City, ſo to have ſet it on Fire; whereby divers of the Citizens were inforced to uncover their Houſes covered with Shingle, and by men appointed for that purpoſe, to watch the fall of ſuch Fire works, and ſo to quench the ſame; which they ſo carefully looked to, as that the device of the Enemy took no effect at all. At the ſame time alſo the Turks out of their ſhort Mortar Pieces, caſt huge great Stones of incredible weight, which falling from high, did moſt terribly cruſh in pieces whatſoever thing they light upon, wherewith the Defendants were wonderfully troubled. In few days after, the Enemy mounted three other great Pieces, whereof one was greater than that was called the Princes, and carried a Bullet of thirteen hundred weight; from which time they dayly battered the City with ten ſuch Pieces, as the like hath ſeldomtimes been heard of; and the Arrows fell ſo thick into the City, as if it had been continual Showers of Hail, ſo that no man could go or well ſtir in the Streets without hurt. Yet in the midſt of all theſe dangers the Chriſtians valiantly defended the City, and with their deadly ſhot from the Walls and Mounts exceedingly annoyed the Enemy. The eleventh of July the Turks mounted another great Piece like unto the former, upon the Baſſaes Mount, and the ſame day battered the Walls with an hundred ſeventy eight Shot of this huge Artillery.

Mahomet having by the fury of his great Ordnance, beaten down a great part of the Wall, and that now nothing ſtood in his way but ſuch ſimple repairs as the Defendants had made of Timber and Planks, with Earth caſt in betwixt, was in good hope in ſhort time to become Maſter of the Town; and therefore ſent certain Companies of his Janizaries and other Souldiers (which he with continual Supplies of freſh men ſtill relieved) to aſſault the breaches, ſo if it were poſſible to enter the Town, or at leaſtwiſe to burn ſuch Fortifications of Timber as the Defendants had made. But that which ſeemed unto him at firſt ſo eaſie, he found in execution full of difficulty and danger; for the Turks approaching the breach, found there reſolute men, a ſurer defence than any Wall; whoſe valiant courage ſerved inſtead of a wrong Bulwark. So whilſt the Turks deſperately ſtrive in the face of the breach either to enter or to ſet fire upon the new Fortifications made for moſt part of Timber, and the Defendants with no leſs reſolution do what they may to the utmoſt to repulſe them, many were on both ſides ſlain, but eſpecially of the aſſailants. Which Mahomet well perceiving, and that by that manner of Aſſault he gained nothing but notable loſs and ſpoil of his beſt men, cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and his battery to be again forthwith renewed; every day ſhaking the Wall with an hundred and ſixty or an hundred and eighty moſt terrible great Shot, and one day with 194, the greateſt battery that he made in one day during that Siege.

After this great battery, the Tyrant cauſed a freſh Aſſault to be given, but with little or rather worſe ſucceſs than before; for though divers of the Defendants, and among them, ſome of good place, as Franciſcus Patavinus, Franciſcus Scorbaro, two Italian Captains, and ſome other of the better ſort of the Citizens were there ſlain with the great Shot, whereof the Enemy that day diſcharged into the breaches 193, yet were they with greater loſs enforced again to retire, and with ſhame to give over the Aſſault.

Notwithſtanding this repulſe, Mahomet continuing his Battery with no leſs fury than before, ſtill ſought by force of his Artillery to open a way into the City; and the third day after the former Aſſault, gave a more furious and deſperate attempt unto the City than before, inſomuch that the Turks were in the breaches come to handy ſtrokes with the Chriſtians, and there made a moſt cruel and deadly Fight; wherein many fell on both ſides, but of the Turks moſt; yet were there many of the Chriſtians alſo ſlain, eſpecially with the Turks great Ordnance. It was a right ruthful ſight to have ſeen the Rampiers at the great Gate of the City beaten down flat to the ground, and to lie full of the rent bodies of the Chriſtians; at which place the Enemy ſo prevailed, that he was even now ready to have entred; for the Turks ſo furiouſly aſſailed the Defendants, and the murthering Shot from the Baſſaes Mount fell ſo thick and ſo terribly into the breach, beſide the infinite number of Arrows, that there were ſcarce any of the Chriſtians which defended that place, but they were either ſlain or grievouſly wounded. But when all ſeemed now almoſt deſperate and forlorne, and the greedy Enemy even ready to devour his Prey, a new ſupply of luſty Souldiers well armed, came couragiouſly to the breach, and as Lyons encountring the Enemy, drave him down again, and ſo enforced him with great loſs to retire. Mahomet grieved with this repulſe, in his fury cauſed an hundred ſeventy three great Shot to be diſcharged into the City, and afterwards ſending for his great Baſſaes and other his principal Men of War, declared unto them his mind, as followeth;

Mahomet purpoſing to give a general Aſſault, incourageth his Captains and Souldiers thereunto.

I think none of you are ignorant (right worthy Souldiers) that now it is the third month ſince this City hath by us been moſt ſtraitly beſieged, and with all manner of Artillery and Engines of War impugned, aſſaulted and on every ſide aſſailed, the Walls thereof utterly ſubverted, and the Bulwarks laid flat with the ground, and (as you ſee) as good as raſed: beſides that, ſo oft as we have ſet fire upon their fortreſſes, ſo often we have provoked them of Scodra to fight, and have alſo much vexed them with aſſaults. Laſt of all, as you know, we have left nothing unproved, nothing unattempted, which could be deviſed, the eaſilier to overcome them, being wearied, worn out, and their ſtrength ſpent. Wherefore (in mine opinion) the matter is not longer to be put off or delayed, but even to morrow before the Enemy can recover his ſtrength to repair his Breaches, let us encloſe the City round, and give them a general and terrible Aſſault: and therefore every one of you make your ſelves ready, and exhort your Souldiers in the Camp, that they every one of them to morrow with the dawning of the day come forth armed and well appointed for the winning of the City. Now will I prove and know them that are worthy of my Pay. Thou the Baſſa of Conſtantinople, with thy Squadrons and certain Companies of the Janizaries our faithful Guard, give charge unto the breach: In the mean time, let the Baſſa of Aſia with his power aſſault the other parts of the City: let every Man make ready and bring with him what is needful for this general Aſſault; my mind giveth me, that to morrow before this time we ſhall win the City: for who is there can reſiſt us? The Town (as you ſee) is bared both of wall and of all other defence; the Bulwarks and Ditches are laied even, and an eaſie way for us to come unto it; the Citizens themſelves weary with ſo many fights and aſſaults faint and want Strength; whereas we are ſtill freſh and luſty; they in number few, we almoſt innumerable; beſides that, we far paſs them in the force of our Artillery, wherewith many of them ſhall periſh in the defending of the Breaches. Who then can gainſay, but that they of Scodra are already our Priſoners? Where, upon ſuch as remain alive, I will at my pleaſure uſe the Law of Arms and Captivity. On therefore couragious hearts without further delay. Is not the very name of Scodra hateful unto us? For which of you doth not with great diſdain call to remembrance the death of your Parents, or Bretheren, or Friends, or Companions, cruelly ſlain under theſe Walls? Can you diſgeſt your hatred againſt them of Scodra*? And ſo many ſlaughters of your Friends, by them made? But to forget elder times, and the harms received from them long ſince, let us but look upon our late ſlaughters and wounds as it were yet bleeding; it is not yet full four years ſince that we made War with theſe men of* Scodra*, wherein ſo many thouſands of our People fell, that their ſlaughter is yet almoſt objects to our Eyes, and their blood craving revenge. This very Hill whereon we ſtand, and the Stones yet ſeem beſprinkled and polluted with their blood. Wherefore haſt you as men of Courage; Take up Arms, valiantly mount the Hill, aſſault the Town, and revenge your old injuries. Glut your ſelves to the full in the effuſion of the Chriſtian blood, whereunto our Laws do ſo much exhort us, and do what you may with force and ſword, that not one of them of* Scodra may be left alive; which you may eaſily bring to paſs, having all things thereunto needful; for there is nothing to withſtand you, nothing wanting for the gaining of the Victory. All things are prepared, all things are ready; an eaſie matter it is for a ſtrong man to overcome the weak and feeble, that wanteth ſtrength as do they.

This Speech of the barbarous Tyrant was received with great applauſe and good liking of the hearers; and now was Scodra to be with all might and main aſſaulted, and not a man there left alive. Hereupon Proclamation was made throughout the Camp, That every man upon pain of death ſhould be ready againſt the appointed time; and the great Captains and Commanders of the Army departing from Mahomet, went up to the top of the Hill whereon the Baſſa lay, and from thence taking view of the City, and laying their heads together, conſulted how they might beſt give the Aſſault. The Defendants on the other ſide always expecting their Enemies hovering over their heads, left nothing undone that they could poſſibly deviſe, for the defence of themſelves and the City. Now upon the top of the Baſſaes Mount, was a royal Pavillion erected richly covered with Purple, from whence the proud Tyrant might plainly behold all the Aſſault, who with the dawning of the day (being the 22 of July) entring the ſame, the Turks who in the covert of the night had conveighed themſelves, as near unto the Walls as they could upon the ſignal of Battel given by a tire of Ordnance diſcharged from the Baſſaes Mount, ſuddainly ran to the Breaches as thick as Bees, in hope by their ſuddain approach to have taken the Chriſtians at ſome advantage, wherein they were much deceived. For they always doubting ſuch a matter, and carefully obſerving the leaſt motion of the Enemy, were always in readineſs to meet with their attempts; ſo that the Turks deſperately ſtriving to gain the Breaches, and the Chriſtians valiantly defending the ſame, there was in divers places begun a moſt cruel and mortal Fight; but eſpecially near unto the great Gate, where the fury of the Cannon had made the Walls moſt aſſaultable. There the Enemy was come to fight hand to hand, and prevailing upon the Defendants, had ſet up one of the Turks Enſigns upon the top of the Rampiers; which Mahomet beholding, rejoyced exceedingly; thinking the City now as good as taken. But the Chriſtians ſeeing the danger, ſpeedily repaired thither with new ſupplies, and by plain force drave the Enemy out again, and beat him from the Rampiers. Upon them alſo that were coming up, they caſt down pieces of Timber, great Stones, Wild-Fire, pots of Lime, and ſuch other things as might moſt anoy them; as for Shot, none fell in vain by reaſon of the wonderful multitude of the Turks, who ſtood ſo thick, that a man could hardly have caſt down a grain of Muſtard Seed from the Wall but it muſt needs have light upon ſome of them; by which means the Turks were notably repulſed, their Enſign pluckt down and they enforced to retire from the Walls. Which ſuddain alteration Mahomet perceiving, fell into a great rage, and forthwith commanded his great Ordnance, with greater fury than ever, to be diſcharged into the Breach; and with great words commanded the two chief Baſſaes which ſtood by him upon the Mount, to go preſently down and enforce the Souldiers which were already retired, to return again unto the Aſſault. Theſe great Commanders ſeeing the Tyrant in ſuch a fret, forthwith deſcended from the Hill, and where perſwaſion would not ſerve, with their drawn Swords enforced the Souldiers to return back again to the Aſſault. The Turks knowing that they were now in the Eye of their King, and in the preſence of their greateſt Commanders, ſtrive with might and main to win the Rampiers; for in that place, the Walls of the City were beaten down to the ground, ſhaken before this Aſſault with two thouſand five hundred thirty nine Shot of the Canon or other Pieces of no leſs force. The Chriſtians likewiſe in defence of themſelves and their City, with invincible Courage oppoſed themſelves againſt the Turks; ſo that a more deſperate Fight than there, was hardly ever to be ſeen; deſperate men with deſperate hand aſſailing one another; and the more to increaſe the terror of the day, the thundering Shot, with the clamour of Men, and noiſe of the inſtruments of War, was ſo great, as if Heaven and Earth ſhould have preſently fallen together; and Arrows falling into the City as if it had been ſhowers of Rain, oftentimes darkned the light of the day. In this dreadful Fight, many of the Defendants were ſlain; but of the Turks, twenty to one. Near unto that Gate where this terrible Aſſault was given, were certain Loops hewn out of the main Rock, which flanked the Ditch all alongſt that ſide of the City, out of which the Chriſtians with their murdering Shot made Lanes amongſt their Enemies and ſlew them without number. For all that, the mighty Baſſaes and great Captains, one while by perſwaſion, another while by threatning, forced them ſtill forward, and if any turned back, preſently ſlew him; ſo that the Turks ſeeing no leſs danger in retiring than in fighting againſt the Enemy, like deſperate men thruſt forward by heaps, and were ſlain without number. Yet ſtill preſſing on ſo long as life laſted, and others ſtepping forward inſtead of them that were ſlain, they began again to prevail upon the Defendants (who in that place were for moſt part either ſlain or hurt) and again recovered the top of the Rampiers, and there advanced the Turks Enſigns. Then began the Tyrant to lift up his Head, making ſure account that the City was now his own. But as the common ſaying is, He that reckoneth without his Hoſt, muſt reckon twice, ſo chanched it to Mahomet. For the Companies, from the beginning of the Siege left in the Market place ready for all events, and oftentimes wiſhing for for ſome occaſion wherein to ſhew themſelves; being now in good time advertiſed of the imminent danger, came with ſpeed to the place of the Aſſault before the Turks had taken good footing; and there valiantly encountring them, ſlew a great number of them, and forced the reſt from the Rampiers; and plucking down their Enſigns before ſet up, inſtead of them placed their own. With which repulſe the Turks were ſo diſmaied, that they quite forſook the Aſſault, and in deſpight of their imperious Commanders, not expecting any ſign of Retreat, in haſt retired to their Camp. Mahomet falling from ſo great an hope, and grieved above meaſure with this ſhameful repulſe, returned into his Pavillion fretting and fuming as a man half mad, where two days he tormented himſelf with his own paſſions, not admitting any man to his preſence. The Chriſtians afterwards took the ſpoil of the dead Turks, and cutting off divers of their Heads, ſet them up upon Poles round about the City, to the terror of their Fellows. In this Aſſault were twelve thouſand of the Turks ſlain, and many more wounded. Of the Chriſtians were loſt four hundred; and of them that came to the Breach eſcaped none, but he was wounded more or leſs.

Twelve thouſand Turks ſlain in the laſt Aſſault.

After that Mahomet had two days digeſted the laſt repulſe, the ſhame whereof grieved him more than the loſs it ſelf; he ſent for both the great Baſſaes of Conſtantinople and Aſia, and other two of his chief Counſellors, with whom he reſolved to give another Aſſault, and thereon to gage his whole Forces; for they were all of opinion with him, That the Defendants were ſo weakned and waſted with the former Aſſault, that they could not poſſibly hold out another. Whereupon ſtrait Commandment was given through the Camp, that every man without exception ſhould be ready to go to the Aſſault whenſoever they were called upon; and the more to incourage the Souldiers, great rewards and preferments were promiſed to them which in time of the Aſſault ſhould perform any eſpecial piece of ſervice. The firſt appearance of the new Moon (which the Turks worſhip with great Devotion) was the time that Mahomet had appointed for this general Aſſault; in the mean time he ſpared not to pour out his fury againſt the Walls and Rampiers of the Town, by the mouth of the Canon. The Chriſtian Defendants on the other ſide, firſt by hearty Prayer commended themſelves and their City to the Protection of the Almighty, and afterwards with reſtleſs labour and no ſmall peril, ſpeedily repaired and new fortified whatſoever the fury of the Artillery had overthrown or ſhaken; omitting nothing that could be done or deviſed for the defence of themſelves and their City. Now as ſoon as the new Moon began to ſhew her ſelf, the Mahometan Prieſts going about the Army, gave the Souldiers knowledg thereof (as their manner is) by ſinging of a Song in manner of a Proceſſion; whereunto the whole Army anſwered with a ſhort Reſpond, but with ſuch a terrible noiſe as was wonderful to hear; and at the ſame time bowing themſelves to the ground, ſaluted the Moon with great Superſtition. All their fond Ceremonies performed, they began to draw nigh the City ſo thick, and in number ſo many, that all the ground for the ſpace of a mile round about Scodra, was thick covered with men. The Chriſtians expecting every hour to be aſſailed, were ready upon the Walls and Rampiers of the City, to repulſe the Enemy; but eſpecially at the great Gate where moſt danger was feared, for that the Turks with their great Ordnance had made that place of all others moſt aſſaultable. Here Jacobus Moneta a Noble Captain, with his Brother Moncinus a valiant Gentleman, took upon them to receive the firſt Aſſault, which is commonly of all others moſt terrible; for the Turks uſe in their Aſſaults to give three attempts, whereof the firſt is moſt furious and dangerous, as performed by their beſt Souldiers; the other two are of leſs force; but if they fail in all three, they forſake the enterpriſe as men diſcouraged. Whilſt both the aſſailants and the Defendants ſtood thus in readineſs the one as it were facing the other a great part of the night, Mahomet before day went up to the top of the Baſſaes Mount, from whence he had before beholden the former Aſſault; at whoſe coming there were preſently eleven Canons diſcharged, and twelve ſmaller Pieces (the ſignal appointed for the Aſſault.) The Turks upon this ſign given, with exceeding tumult and moſt hideous outcry (as their manner is) began to aſſail the City round, and with ſuch wonderful agility of Body and Courage mounted the Rampiers at the great Gate, that they had there as it were in a trice ſet up one of their Enſigns, which was forthwith pluckt up by Moneta, and the Turks with great ſlaughter driven down, where many of them were ſlain with Stones, Timber, Fire and ſuch other things caſt down upon them; beſide a great number ſlain or wounded with Shot, Arrows, and Darts, whereof none fell to the ground in vain, by reaſon that the Turks ſtood ſo thick, that they violently preſſed one another forward, in ſuch ſort that the foremoſt could by no means ſhun any danger, were it never ſo great or terrible. In this ſort the Aſſault was with great ſlaughter of the Turks continued until it was day; they ſtriving to win the Breach, and the Chriſtians moſt valiantly defending the ſame. Moneta himſelf in this Fight received divers wounds, and was twice beaten down to the ground; yet ſtill recovering himſelf, incouraged his Souldiers, and worthily repulſed the Enemy. Mahomet ſeeing his Souldiers beaten from the Breach, cauſed a tire of his great Ordnance to be diſcharged upon the Chriſtians which ſtood therein thick for the defence thereof, by force whereof many of them were rent in pieces, and the reſt ſore diſmaied; which the Turks quickly perceiving, and therewith encouraged, came on again with a freſh charge, forcing themſelves to the uttermoſt to have entred. But the valiant Captain nothing diſcouraged either with the loſs of them that were ſlain, or the danger of himſelf, valiantly withſtood the furious Enemy, and maintained the place till new ſupplies came to relieve him, and departed not thence, nor ſuffered any man to depart, till the Aſſault was ended. Many were ſlain on both ſides; yet nothing troubled the Defendants ſo much as the great Ordnance, which being diſcharged from the Baſſaes Mount, into the breach, when as the Turks were driven back, ſlew many of the Chriſtians, leaving the breach almoſt clear; ſo giving occaſion for the Turks to have entred, had not other couragious Souldiers ſtept up in ſtead of them that were ſlain, who manfully repulſed the Enemy. The Tyrant from the Mount ſeeing the invincible Courage of the Defendants, was therewith exceedingly troubled; but fully reſolved now or never to have it, commanded all his Forces to be drawn from all parts of the City, to the great Gate, there to renew the Aſſault; ſtraightly charging his Captains, never to return thence until they had taken the City. Hereupon the greateſt part of that huge Army was forthwith in the ſight of himſelf brought to the the appointed place, and there gave a ſharp and cruel Aſſault at the breach, with ſuch deſperate fury, that in ſhort time they had ſlain moſt of the Defendants there preſent, and advanced divers of their Enſigns upon the top of the Rampiers. Which Mahomet beholding from the Mount, rejoiced exceedingly, making ſure account, that the City was now his own; but by that time he had well conceived this hope, new ſupplies of freſh and couragious men (of purpoſe reſerved for all events) came to the place of danger, and with great reſolution incountring the wearied Turks, drave them back, cleared the breach, and overthrew the Enſigns. Which ſo ſuddain an alteration in the breach, wrought no leſs alteration in the proud Tyrants mind, his hope was turned into deſpair, and his joy into choler; inſomuch that in his fury he commanded all his great Artillery to be at once diſcharged into the breach, whereby many of his forward and couragious Souldiers were ſlain together with the Defendants. At the ſame time, the great Commanders and Captains knowing themſelves to be in the Eye of their imperious Lord and Maſter, with their drawn Swords forced the poor Souldiers again forward to the breach; and the more to encourage them, adventured themſelves alſo among them; whereby the Fight became more fierce and terrible than before. Many of the Turks were there ſlain; yet ſuch was the force and multitude of them which ſtill ſtept up in their place, and Bullets and Arrows flew ſo thick, that the Defendants oppreſſed with multitude, and overwhelmed with Shot, were hardly able longer to maintain the place, being for moſt part either ſlain or wounded. Whereupon a great cry ran upon the ſuddain through the City, that every man without exception ſhould forthwith repair to the breach. Which was with ſuch chearfulneſs done, that in leſs time than was to have been thought, a wonderful multitude of all ſorts of people was there met together, encouraging one another againſt the preſent danger; who all as men reſolved to lay down their lives in defence of their Country, valiantly encountred the Turks upon the top of the Rampiers, and ſo hardly laid upon them, that notwithſtanding their great number, they began now again to waver and ſhrink back. Which thing the Tyrant perceiving from the Mount, in great rage commanded his Canoniers, as faſt as they could to diſcharge the great Ordnance into the breach, without regard of his own men, ſo that together with them he might alſo kill ſome of the Chriſtians, and withal imperiouſly commanded his Captains, with all their force and power to maintain the Aſſault, threatning them with moſt horrible death, if they returned, without Victory. Hereupon the Aſſault was again renewed, every man (in ſhew at leaſt) ſet down there to do his laſt Devoir. But the great Ordnance ſtill playing upon the breach, ſlew many of the Turks, as well as of the Chriſtians. Thrice the great Shot fell amongſt the Turks themſelves, and rent in ſunder a great number of them which were foremoſt, to the great diſcouragement of the reſt; whereof the Tyrant had ſmall regard, ſo that together with them he might alſo diminiſh the number of the Defendants. Neverthleſs, ſuch was the deſperate fury of the Enemy, that the City was in no ſmall danger to have been preſently taken, had not freſh ſupplies come from other parts of the City which they were appointed unto; who with great Courage reſiſted the Enemy. Yet the Turks far exceeding in number (and freſh men continually ſtepping up in ſtead of them which lay by heaps under their Feet, and ſerved them in ſtead of Steps to get up to the Rampiers) maintained a long and terrible fight; at which time the great Ordnance alſo ſore annoyed the Defendants, ſo that with one Shot (whereby the greatneſs of the harms done at other times may be gathered) eighteen of the Chriſtian Defendants were ſlain. As for Arrows, they flew as thick as Hail into the City, ſo that they obſcured the light of the day, and lay in moſt places of the Street a Span thick ſo that for the ſpace of a month after, the inhabitants uſed no other fuel to burn, but Turkiſh Arrows. It was a ruful ſight, to have ſeen the bodies of the valiant Chriſtians rent in ſunder with the great Shot, and pieces of them cleaving upon every Wall thereabout, every Street was ſtained with their Blood, the great Ordnance continually thundred, Churches and Houſes came ratling down, yea the heavy countenance of the Air it ſelf ſeemed to bewail the miſery of the poor Chriſtians; beſides, the noiſe of Trumpets, Drums, and other inſtruments of War, with the horrible cry of the helliſh Turks, was ſo great and hideous, that it ſeemed as if Heaven and Earth ſhould have gon together; nothing was to be heard but the very terror of the Ear; nothing to be ſeen but death, and the very inſtruments of death. And now in this extremity a fearful cry ran through the City, That without preſent help all would be loſt at the great Gate; whereupon not only they which were whole, (which were the feweſt in number) but they alſo which lay wounded or ſick in their beds, chearing up themſelves, with Weapons in their Hand ran with ſpeed to the place where the danger was; chuſing rather there to die, than to be ſlain in their beds. Thus whilſt the Chriſtians of all ſorts, and from all parts of the City, ran deſperately to the Gate, the Turks were on every ſide hardly preſſed, and in great number ſlain; yet freſh men ſtill coming up, as if they had ſprung out of the Earth, the deadly Fight was by them ſtill maintained; for the Turks on the one ſide, for fear of the Tyrant, laboured with might and main to win the City; and the Chriſtians on the other, knowing no hope left for them if they ſhould be overcome, with no leſs reſolution defended the ſame. In this obſtinacy of mind many fell on both ſides; ſometimes the Turks ſeemed to have the better, and were ſtraitway by the Chriſtians put to the worſe. Which manner of mortal Fight, with doubtful event, was continued moſt part of that day; until that at length many being on both parts ſlain, and the reſt for the moſt part ſore wounded and hurt, the fury of the Aſſault began to aſſwage; for the Turks now weary of that long and deadly Fight, and fainting with their wounds, had no great ſtomach to mount up the Rampiers, where they ſaw no hope to prevail, but all things threatning preſent death. Mahomet beholding the wonderful ſlaughter of his men, and that having done what was poſſible for men to do, they now fought as men diſcouraged, and in deſpair of Victory himſelf, cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded, which the Turks no ſooner heard, but that they left the Aſſault, and without order ran to their Tents, as men half ſcared out of their Wits.

The aſſault renewed again fiercely by the Turks.

A woful ſight.

A doubtful Fight.

Of this Victory, the Chriſtians (as they had good cauſe) rejoyced greatly; yet was this joy mingled with much ſorrow and heavineſs, for the loſs of ſuch worthy men as were ſlain in that Aſſault, many of whoſe bodies they were glad to gather up by piecemeal, ſome here, ſome there, ſome cleaving on this Wall and ſome on that; which they, as the time would give leave, honourably buried with the reſt of the ſlain. At which time alſo, they with all diligence and expedition repaired their breaches, and put all things in ſuch readineſs, as if they ſhould have preſently received a freſh Aſſault.

Mahomet wonderfully grieved with the ſhameful diſhonour and great loſs he had received at the laſt Aſſault, repented himſelf that ever he had taken the matter in hand, wiſhing that he had never heard of the name of Scodra; and in his choler and frantick rage moſt horribly blaſphemed againſt God, moſt wickedly ſaying, That it were enough for him to have care of Heavenly things, and not to croſs him in his Worldly Actions; in which fury he deſcended from the Mount, and got into his Tent, where he again tormented himſelf with his melancholy Paſſions by the ſpace of two days; wherein he would neither be ſpoke withal, or admit any man to his preſence. Upon the third day he called a general Counſel of his Commanders and beſt Souldiers, and thereupon openly before them all ſaid, That he was determined to give the Enemy a freſh Aſſault, for that being weakned with ſo many Aſſaults, he could not poſſibly be able to hold out another; and therefore hoped for an eaſie Victory. But he had no ſooner ſo ſaid, but that all they that heard him, cried out with one voice to the contrary; ſaying, That it was not by any means to be attempted, for as much as his beſt Souldiers were already ſlain, and the greater part of them that were left, either ſore wounded or brought to that weakneſs, that they were not able to do any more ſervice; and that therefore it were better for them to kill one another, or elſe himſelf to kill them one by one, than to expoſe them to be ſo ſhamefully butchered by the Chriſtians. In this diverſity of opinions, Achmetes Baſſa the great Champion of the Turks (a man reverend and of great authority, for his birth, years, and rare experience in Martial Affairs, and one by whom Mahomet had done great matters) ſtanding up, with pleaſing ſpeech calmed his furious mind, and with ſubſtantial reaſons perſwaded him to deſiſt from that his intended purpoſe, and to take another ſurer courſe, as followeth:

A notable Speech of the great Baſſa Achmetes.

YOUR great Valour and worthy Praiſes, invincible Emperor (ſaid he) who is able to expreſs? the greatneſs whereof the mind of man cannot conceive, and my dull Spirit but wonder at; my Tongue faltereth to ſpeak of them, neither would this time ſerve ſo much as to recount them. It is of all men deemed a thing of great honour (moſt dread Soveraign) when a Prince hath received a Kingdom from his Anceſtors, to be able in ſafety to keep and defend the ſame; greater than this is it, honourably to increaſe and augment it, ſo left; but of a ſmall thing, by worthy proweſs to bring it to the higheſt type of worldly honour, is of all other things the greateſt. Which moſt rare excellency, all men worthily aſcribe unto your perfection and felicity; and I, of all others, can thereof bring the moſt aſſured teſtimony, who have oftentimes heard it of mine Anceſtors (which following the Othoman Princes out of Aſia into Europe) that your worthy Predeceſſors at their firſt coming into Europe (without offence be it ſaid) poſſeſſed but a corner thereof; to whom you afterward by divine appointment ſucceeding, have adjoined ſo many Provinces, Kingdoms, and Empires, as were tedious to rehearſe them. For who can worthily expreſs, how you have in Europe ſubdued Conſtantinople, the Imperial City of the Eaſt Empire, with all Thracia, Achaia, Grecia, Peloponneſus, Bœotia, Thebes, and the noble City of Athens the Mother and Nurſe of all good Learning. The Empire of Trapezond, with the Emperor thereof is by you overthrown; The Kingdoms of Servia and Boſna, with the Princes of Peloponneſus, are by you gloriouſly vanquiſhed. You have at your command twelve Kingdoms in Aſia the leſſer; Pontus, Bithynia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Cilicia, Pamphilia, Lycia, Caria, Lydia, Phrygia, Nicomedia, and Nicea, with the famous City of Pruſa. Beſides theſe, Ionia, Doris, Smyrna, Colophon, Epheſus, Miletum, Halicarnaſſus, Pergamus, with the Country of Taurica, are under your Subjection. The great Country of Armenia hath felt your force; The Iſlands of Lesbos, Chios and Eubœa, are parts of your Empire. What ſhould I ſpeak of infinite People and Nations, by you moſt victoriouſly vanquiſhed? This may ſuffice for all, That you have gained from the Chriſtians twenty Provinces, and two hundred great Cities. For it were too long to rehearſe the Mahometan Kings and Princes by you alſo vanquiſhed: In all your expeditions all things have yet given place to your fortune. The ancient Monuments may now ceaſe to extol the praiſes of Cæſar, Scipio, Pyrrhus, Hannibal, and other Chieftains of Rome and forraign Nations; for why, they are all inferiour to you, both for Victories and Countries ſubdued. The Othoman Family is undoubtedly fatal for Soveraignty; all the World ſhall in ſhort time come under your government, and all Nations ſhall ſerve you. As for this Town of Scodra, let it not ſo much grieve you; worldly things (as you know) do ofentimes deceive our expectation; in them Fortune beareth great ſway. Yet for this matter quiet your ſelf; for I dare gage my Faith unto your Imperial Majeſty, that I will in ſhort time find means, that this City ſhall ſtand at your devotion. Did not I of late bring into your ſubjection the impregnable City of Croia, which you ſo long deſired? But whereas you would now again forthwith attempt to win it by Aſſault, I therein crave your pardon, in that I cannot be of that opinion, but muſt needs think far otherwiſe; for to attempt War, and to be overthrown, is an eaſie matter for every one to do; but to vanquiſh the Enemy, and to carry away the Triumph, that right few men know. He that conſulteth of ſuch great and weighty matters, ought to be free both from fury and deſire, both evil Counſellors. The Chriſtians of Scodra are not in my opinion to be again aſſaulted, for in ſo doing you ſhall but loſe your labour. For if you could not ſubdue them, your Army being then freſh and ſtrong, how ſhall you now overcome them with much fewer, and they wounded, weak, and feeble? I have viewed the whole Camp, and ſearched every Tent; and found no place, no tent, yea ſcarcely any cabin, without groaning, ſighing, weeping or wailing; in every place was heavineſs, ſorrow, mourning, and death it ſelf; for in the laſt Aſſault you loſt thirty thouſand and more, of your beſt Souldiers; many more are grievouſly wounded and maimed; none, but he carrieth about him ſome ſign that he was there; few or none there be that dare again mount the Hill to give a freſh Aſſault, they are all ſo affraid and diſcouraged. Whom when I demanded, how ſo great a fear was come upon them, and what was the cauſe they had ſo loſt their wonted Courage? they anſwered me, That it was the look, even the very look of them of Scodra, whoſe Eyes did ſeem unto them, to burn and ſparkle with fire; their ſtern and terrible countenance (ſaid they) have ſtruck this terror into us. Wherefore I think it not good to give a freſh Aſſault with men ſo diſmaied; but rather to uſe policy and delay, againſt ſuch reſolute Enemies. This City of Scodra is the Eye and Head of all this Province, which the Venetians have notably fortified, and planted with ſtore of Ordnance, and of all things elſe neceſſary for defence thereof; but eſpecially with moſt valiant Souldiers, of purpoſe choſen cut of many of their Garriſons, for defence of this City. You have not now to do with the weak and effeminate People of Aſia, but with the hard and rough People of Epirus. And you know (moſt mighty Emperor) the ſtrength and courage of this Nation; it is now thirty years that you made War againſt this People, and have not yet altogether ſubdued them; and how dangerous and chargeable this War hath been unto you, who knoweth not? It is now ſix months ſince we came firſt before this City; we have intrenched our ſelves round about it, we have day and night laid hard Siege unto it, we have battered it of long with eleven Canons; I ſpeak not of other ſmaller Pieces or Engines of War, with all kinds of Shot and Fire-works, and whatſoever elſe we could deviſe. We have many times to our coſt aſſaulted it; what could be done by force, ſtrength, or multitude of valiant men, is already done in the former Aſſaults; Nothing hath been left unattempted, no policy, no direction hath wanted in your Leaders, neither courage in your Souldiers. What ſhould I recount the innumerable great Shot, or ſpeak of cur Arrows and Darts, delivered into the City as ſhowers of Hail? Did all this, or any thing elſe we could do, any thing terrifie theſe Defendants? Were they not, nay are they not ſtill ready with great aſſurance and Courage at all aſſaies to encounter us? You take a wrong courſe, by force to conſtrain them; they have taken upon them the defence of this place, and are not thence to be removed, there ſhall you be ſure ſtill to find them either alive or dead; and what account they make of their lives, you ſee, they will ſell them unto us dear for their Country, and prefer an honourable death before a ſervile life. Wherefore againſt men ſo ſet down, policy is to be uſed; and them whom we cannot by force ſubdue, let us by delay and time overcome. If you will win Scodra, block it up, build ſtrong Forts in places convenient round about it, and furniſh them with good Souldiers; make a bridge over Boliana, with a ſtrong Caſtle on either ſide, to ſtop the paſſage; which done, beſiege the other weaker Cities of the Venetians, which are as it were the Limbs of Scodra; and ſubdue the Country round about, which will be no hard matter for you to do, being Maſter of the Field; ſo muſt Scodra at length of neceſſity yield unto you, as of late did Croia, inforced thereunto by Famine. Thus may you in ſafety without ſlaughter of your People, come to the full of your deſires.

The wholeſome Counſel of the Baſſa ſo well pleaſed Mahomet himſelf, and the reſt there preſent, that the Aſſault was laid aſide, and preſent order taken for the ſpeedy execution of that which was ſo well by him plotted. Whereupon the Baſſa of Conſtantinople with his Forces was ſent to Zabiache, a City in the borders of Dalmatia, ſtanding upon the Lake of Scutary, not far from Aſcrivium, which in few days was yielded unto him. The Baſſa poſſeſſed of the City, thruſt out all the Inhabitants, and leaving therein a Garriſon of Turks, returned again to the Camp at Scodra. At the ſame time the great Baſſa of Aſia was alſo ſent by Mahomet againſt Drivaſto a City alſo of the Venetians; which when he had beſieged and ſore battered by the ſpace of ſixteen days, the great Tyrant came thither in perſon himſelf, and the next day after his coming took the City without any great reſiſtance. Such as he found upon the Walls, he put to the Sword; of the reſt he took three hundred away with him to the Camp at Scodra, and there in the face of the City cauſed them all to be cruelly ſlain, of purpoſe ſo to terrifie the Defendants. The next day after, he ſent the great Baſſa of Conſtantinople to Lyſſa, called alſo Aleſſa, a City of the Venetians, ſituated upon the River Drinus, about thirty miles from Scodra. The Baſſa coming thither, found the City deſolate, (for the Citizens hearing of his coming, were for fear before fled) for which cauſe he ſet the City on fire. Here the Turks digged up the Bones of the worthy Prince Scanderbeg, for the ſuperſtitious opinion they had of the vertue of them; and happy was he that could get any little part thereof to ſet in Gold or other Jewel, as a thing of great price, (as is before declared.) All theſe things thus done, Mahomet committed the direction of all things concerning the Siege of Scodra, unto the diſcretion of Achmetes; by whoſe perſwaſion he leaving a great power for the continuing of the Siege, departed thence himſelf with forty thouſand Souldiers, for Conſtantinople, curſing and banning by the way all the Country of Epirus, all the Inhabitants therein, and every part thereof, their Corn, their Cattel, and whatſoever elſe was fruitful; but above all other things, the City of Scodra, with all that therein was, for that he had never received greater diſhonour or loſs, than there.

Lyſſa taken by the Turks, and the Bones of Scanderbeg digged up by them, and had in great reverence.

After his departure, which was about the ſeventh of September, the two great Baſſaes of Conſtantinople and Aſia, according to order before taken, built a great bridge over the River Boliana, and on either ſide a ſtrong Caſtle, to the intent that no relief ſhould that way be brought into the City. Which work when they had brought to perfection, and furniſhed both Caſtles with Garriſons, Ordnance, and all things neceſſary, they left Achmetes Baſſa with forty thouſand Souldiers to continue the Siege, and returned themſelves, the one to Conſtantinople, the other into Aſia. The wary and politique Baſſa mindful of the charge he had taken upon him, took ſuch order, that no relief could poſſibly be brought unto the City either by Land or by Water; and ſo lying ſtill before it a long time, he brought it at length into ſuch a diſtreſs and want of all things, that the poor Chriſtians were fain to eat all manner of unclean and loathſome things; Horſes were dainty meat, yea, they were glad to eat Dogs, Cats, Rats, and the Skins of Beaſts ſod; it exceedeth all credit, to tell at what exceeding great price a little Mouſe was ſold, or Puddings made of Dogs guts. All theſe bare ſhifts and extremities the poor Chriſtians were content to endure even unto the laſt gaſp, rather than to yield themſelves into the hands of their mercileſs Enemies.

Whilſt Scodra thus lay in the ſuds, the Venetians weary of the long and chargeable War they had to their great loſs now maintained againſt ſo mighty an Enemy by the ſpace of ſixteen years, and having no means to relieve their diſtreſſed Subjects in Scodra, thought it beſt to prove if they could procure a Peace from the Tyrant. For which purpoſe they ſent Benedictus Triviſanus, a great Senator, and a man of great experience, to Conſtantinople; who ſo well uſed the matter, that after long debating too and fro, at length a Peace was concluded; whereof the chief Capitulations were, That the Venetians ſhould deliver unto Mahomet the City of Scodra, the Iſland of Lemnos and the ſtrong Caſtle of Tenarus in Peloponneſus, and pay him yearly eight thouſand Ducats; that they might freely after their wonted manner traffique into the Euxine, by the Straits of Helleſpontus and Boſphorus Thracius, and other parts of his Dominions. Concerning the Citizens of Scodra, it was compriſed in the ſame Peace, That it ſhould be at their own choice, either to live there ſtill under the government of the Turkiſh Emperor, or elſe at their pleaſure to depart in ſafety with their Goods whither they would. Triviſanus having in this manner concluded a Peace, in his return homeward, the fourth of April found the Venetian Admiral riding at Anchor in the mouth of Boliana, from whence they both by Letters certified the Governor and Citizens of Scodra, in what manner the Peace was concluded with the Turk, and what proviſion was therein made for them. Upon receipt of which Letters the Governor calling together the Citizens, declared unto them how the caſe ſtood; and there with them entred into conſultation upon this hard queſtion, Whether they would remain there ſtill in their Native Country under the Turkiſh Tyranny; or forſaking the ſame, live amongſt other Chriſtians in perpetual exile? But after the matter had been throughly debated, and many reaſons on both parts alledged; at length it was by general conſent concluded, That they ſhould all forſake the City and the Houſe of Bondage, as dangerous both to their Souls and Bodies, and live as it ſhould pleaſe God amongſt other Chriſtians. So the Turks giving Pledges for the ſafe departure of the Chriſtians in Scodra, they all at an appointed day with bag and baggage came out of the City, and were by the Venetians carefully tranſported into other parts of their Territory in Italy, where they lived in peace. The Turks (who had now beſieged the City a whole year) after the departure of the Chriſtians entred the City with great joy and triumph; which, with many others thereabout, hath ever ſince, to the great ruth of all Chriſtendom, remained in the poſſeſſion of the faithleſs Infidels. Thus was the ſtrong City of Scodra loſt, and the long Wars ended betwixt Mahomet and the Venetians, which happened in the year 1478.

1480. Mahomet now at Peace with the Venetians, ſent the ſame Achmetes Baſſa (by whom he had but a little before taken in Scodra) with his Fleet of Gallies againſt one Leonard Prince of Neritus, Zacynthus, and Cephalania, Iſlands near unto Peloponneſus; where the Baſſa arriving, eaſily took the ſame Iſlands, the poor Prince for ſafeguard of his life being glad to fly into Italy with his Wife and Treaſure, to King Ferdinand, whoſe nigh Kinſwoman he had married.

About the ſame time Alis-Beg, ſirnamed Michael Ogli, Iſa-Beg the Son of Caſſanes, and Balis-Beg, ſirnamed Malcozogli (men of great account amongſt the Turks, and moſt honourably deſcended) entred into Tranſilvania with a great Army of an hundred thouſand men, and brought ſuch a general fear upon the Country, that Stephanus Batore, the Vayvod, was glad with all ſpeed to flie unto Matthias King of Hungary, to declare unto him the danger of his Country, and to crave his Aid. Matthias at the ſame time lay ſick of the Gout; nevertheleſs he took ſuch order by his Captains, Stephanus Cherepetrus, and Paulus Kiniſius Count of Temeſware, that the Turks were encountred not far from Alba Julia, and there in a great and bloody Battel overthrown; wherein Iſa one of their great Captains was ſlain, with thirty thouſand Turks more. Neither was this Victory gained by the Chriſtians without loſs, Bator the Vayvod himſelf being ſore wounded, and eight thouſand men ſlain.

Mahomet ngth af- r the hodes.

Mahomet in his ambitious humor, had long time deſired to have in his ſubjection the Iſland of the Rhodes. For why, it grieved him that ſo ſmall an Iſland ſhould lie ſo nigh his great Dominions in Aſia, holden by a few Chriſtians, to the great trouble of his Merchants trading in the Mediterranean, beſide many other harms dayly from thence received, and to have no feeling of his greatneſs. But for as much as the winning of that place was thought to be a matter of great difficulty, and in former times unfortunately attempted by ſome of the Mahometan Princes; he purpoſed now with good advice to take this enterpriſe in hand. Wherefore calling together his grave Counſellors and moſt expert Men of War, after he had declared unto them the manifold injuries received from them of the Rhodes, he propounded the matter; Whether it were beſt to attempt the winning of that Iſland or not? Some forward men perſwaded him to revenge the injuries done by thoſe Chriſtians, and to ſubdue that Iſland, which for the nearneſs unto Caria, might of right be accounted as part of his Dominion; and not to forbear that enterpriſe for fear of repulſe, foraſmuch as he was able to bring more Men to aſſail it than were Stones in the Wall about it. Others better adviſed, declared the Strength of the Iſland, with the Valor of the Defendants; Men alwaies brought up in Arms, as it were choſen out of all parts of Chriſtendom; ſo that it was (as they ſaid) like to prove a matter of more difficulty than was by ſome ſuppoſed; whereof ſome of the Mahometan Princes had to their no ſmall diſhonour, already made ſufficient trial; alledging farther, that that ſmall Iſland which ſcarcely appeared in the Sea, was not of that worth, as that he ſhould thereon engage his honour, with the lives of ſo many good men, and moſt valiant Souldiers as might ſerve for the conqueſt of a Kingdom. For all that, Mahomet prickt forward with the Spurs of Ambition, and continual ſolicitation of Anthonius Meligalus, a fugitive Knight of the Rhodes, reſolved to follow the counſel of them which perſwaded the War. This Meligalus was a Knight of the Order, which when he had prodigally conſumed his ſubſtance, which was great, with two others, Demetrius and Sophonius, men of his own quality and diſpoſition, fled unto the Turkiſh Emperor; preſenting unto him a perfect plot of the City, with all the ſtrength both of it, and the Iſle wherein it ſtood, and which way he might with moſt eaſe win it. In which ſervice they frankly offered to ſpend their lives; but hoping indeed, by ſuch foul Treachery to repair their broken Eſtate. All things being now in readineſs, Mahomet appointed Meſithes Paleologus, one of his chief Baſſas (the near Kinſman of Conſtantinus Paleologus the laſt Emperor of Conſtantinople) General for that expedition; committing to his charge the whole managing of that ſo great an action. Meſithes embarking his Army, in number eighty thouſand, and throughly furniſhed with all things neceſſary for the Siege, ſet forward from Conſtantinople, and with a pleaſant gale of Wind, ſailed along the coaſt of Aſia the leſs, towards the Rhodes; where by the way he called unto him Demetrius (one of the fugitive Knights) to learn of him the beſt means for the ſafe landing of his Army. As for the Arch Traitor Meligalus, and chief Author of this War, he was fallen ſick upon the way; and in the extremity of his ſickneſs, growing both troubleſome and loathſome unto the Turks that were with him in the ſame Gally, was by the Mariners thrown over board alive, crying out in vain for help, no man vouchſafing to have any compaſſion upon him; and ſo ſwallowed up of the Sea, received amidſt the Waves, the juſt guerdon of his Treachery.

A death right worthy ſuch a Traitor.

At this time Peter Damboiſe a Frenchman, an Avergnoies, a man of ſingular Government, was Great Maſter of the Rhodes; whoſe vigilancy was ſuch, that commonly once in eight days he had certain intelligence what great matters paſſed in the Turks Court; and therewith of ſuch deep judgment, that he was ſeldome or never overtaken or deceived with any falſe advertiſements. This careful Grand Maſter, was not ignorant of all theſe great preparations, neither of the coming of the Baſſa; and therefore had before ſtrongly fortified the City, and ſo ſtored the ſame with all things needful, as might well have ſerved for many years ſiege; eſpecially with ſuch Shot and Powder, that it was deemed (as indeed it was) an eſpecial means whereby the City was afterward preſerved. At the ſame time, many noble and valiant Gentlemen hearing of the Turks deſigns, repaired thither out of Italy, France, Spain, Germany, and other places of Chriſtendom, chearfully to adventure their lives, in defence both of the place, and of the Chriſtian Religion, againſt the common Enemy of Chriſtianity. The Great Maſter taking a general view of all the Forces he had, to oppoſe againſt ſo puiſſant an Enemy, found that he had in the City ſixteen thouſand able men; in which number were reckoned many Jews and other men of ſervile condition; who in the Siege following, did right good ſervice. The great Baſſa conducted by the falſe Traitor Demetrius, ſafely landed both his Army and Artillery in the Iſland the two and twentieth day of June, not far from the City. At which time the Great Maſter conſidering that the ſafety of the City conſiſted more in the lively valour of the Defendants, than in the Strength of the dead Walls, or other warlike proviſion; thought it requiſite, as a part of his duty, by chearful perſwaſions to encourage them valiantly to withſtand the force of their Enemies. And therefore calling them all together, ſpake unto them, as followeth:

The oration of the Great Maſter to the reſt of the Knights and Souldiers, to encourage them valiantly to withſtand the Turks.

At length valiant Souldiers and Fellows at Arms, we ſee the Turks our mortal Enemies (as we were before advertiſed, as well by Letters from our friends, as by common fame) breathing after our deſtruction; in readineſs to deſtroy our Churches, our Oratories, our Altars, our Religion, and whatſoever elſe we account ſacred or religious; ſeeking the ruin of this noble City, and the cruel death of us all; gaping at once, to devour our lives, our wealth, our hope, with all our former honour. And truly as I cannot deny but that the chance of War is doubtful, and the event thereof uncertain; So when I conſider your valiant Courage and Chearfulneſs of Mind, I preſently conceive a moſt aſſured hope of Victory. They have entred into Arms againſt us, not ſo much for any deſert of ours, or upon any other quarrel; as for the unſatiable deſire of Rule, and the great deſpight they bear againſt us and the Chriſtian Religion. But to withſtand their Fury, and to fruſtrate their Deſigns, we want neither Weapons nor Artillery, nor Proviſion for many years, we have a moſt ſtrong Garriſon of Frenchmen, Spaniards, Germans, Engliſh, and others, the very Chivalry of Chriſtendom; and that which more is, Chriſt Jeſus our Captain and General, by whoſe power, we ſhall no doubt eaſily repulſe the vain force of our moſt wicked and graceleſs Enemies. The care we have for the defence of the Chriſtian Faith, whereunto we are by ſpecial profeſſion bound, will animate and encourage us, againſt them which ſeek for nothing more than to extend their wicked and groſs ſuperſtition, to the great diſhonour of God, and of his Son Chriſt Jeſus. Beſides that, we are warlike Frenchmen, Italians, Germans, and other worthy Chriſtians; they are of Caria, Lydia, Capadocia, and the other delicate Countries of Aſia, effeminate perſons brought up to pleaſure. I ſay it not to draw you into any manifeſt or inevitable danger, neither to feed you with vain hope, or to fill your ears with windy words; but this I promiſe and aſſure you of, that if this Siege ſhall continue long, hither will come ſuch ſtrong Aid out of France, Italy, and Spain, as will ſerve not only to raiſe the Siege, but to recover again the Empires of Conſtantinople and Trapezond. Then ſhall our Enemy ſee no good end of their Counſels; but all their devices ſo confounded, as that they ſhall hardly be able by ſpeedy Flight to ſave themſelves. But ſuppoſe the hardeſt ſhould happen, which I fear not; would not any man account his life moſt happily and honourably ſpent, in defence of a good conſcience, and the quarrel of Chriſt Jeſus? Truly my great years and courſe of life now almoſt ſpent in defence of the Chriſtian Religion (as I ever deſired) doth call me forth, as one ſo aſſured of that good laid up for me in Heaven by Chriſt Jeſus (whoſe Battel we are to fight) that I no whit fear any Enemies force or future chance; which for all that, I have as far as I could, and to the uttermoſt of my power ſo provided for, as that we will not (I hope) be therewith overwhelmed. Be you therefore of good chear and comfort (as I know you are) and ſhew your ſelves valiant and couragious, which reſteth wholly in your ſelves; and as for all the reſt, time, and our diſcretion ſhall right well provide, I doubt not.

The valiant Men and worthy Souldiers, reſting upon the aſſurance of their aged Governor, departed every man to his charge, full of hope and courage. Now had the Baſſa landed his great Army, and ſent Demetrius the traiterous Knight, Meligalus his Companion, with certain Troops of Horſemen and ſome Foot, to view the ground, where he might beſt encamp with his Army. Demetrius in great pride riding about the City, was known by Anthony Damboyſe, the Great Maſters Brother; by whoſe leave he ſallied out with a Troop of gallant Horſemen, and skirmiſhed with them; but the Turks being more in number, caſt about to have incloſed them; which Anthony perceiving, turned upon them that were coming behind him, and that with ſuch force, that he ſlew or wounded moſt part of them. In this hot skirmiſh, Demetrius having his Horſe ſlain under him, and himſelf overthrown, was there trodden to death under the Horſes Feet; an end too good for ſo falſe a Traitor. Muratius a French Knight, unadviſedly diſpoiling his dead Body, was by the Turks ſlain, and his Head preſented to the Baſſa in ſtead of Demetrius.

The Baſſa approaching the City, at the firſt coming took a great Orchard, which the Great Maſter had ſtrongly intrenched, and therein placed certain Companies of Souldiers, with ſome ſmall Pieces of Ordnance; which place if it could have been kept, might fitly have ſerved the Defendants to have at their pleaſure ſallied out upon the Enemy. But they which were appointed to the keeping thereof, either terrified with the ſight of ſo great an Army, or elſe doubting to be able to hold it againſt ſo great a power, abandoned it by night, and retired into the City; leaving the great Ordnance behind them for haſt. In this place the Baſſa by the counſel of George Frapaine (a Chriſtian Fugitive of the Rhodes, and now Maſter of his Ordnance) began to plant his Battery, and from thence to batter the Tower called Nicholea, or S. Nicholas his Tower, diſtant from the City three hundred paces. But againſt this place, Damboyſe had ſo aptly mounted two great Baſilisks, that he made him glad quickly to forſake the ſame; yet finding no other place more convenient for his purpoſe, ſhortly after he near unto the ſame place planted again his battery, of far greater force than before. Wherein, beſide the Ordnance of greateſt charge, he had three hundred ſmaller Pieces for Battery; wherewith at the firſt he did ſmall harm, for that this George Frapaine repenting himſelf ſelf (as was thought) of his foul Treaſon, beſtowed the Shot to ſmall purpoſe; for which cauſe the Baſſa began to have him in diſtruſt; which Frapaine perceiving, fled by night again unto the Rhodes, and diſcovered unto the Great Maſter all the ſecrets of the Turks Camp. The Turks continuing the battery, had ſore ſhaken the aforeſaid Tower called S. Nicholas, and beaten down ſome part thereof; which the Chriſtians with great induſtry, ſpeedily repaired in beſt ſort they could; for all that the Turks gave thereunto a fierce Aſſault, by the ſpace of ſix hours, forcing themſelves to the uttermoſt to have taken it; but perceiving that it prevailed them nothing, they retired, having loſt eight hundred of their men, with many others drowned in the Sea, of whom the number was not known, and a thouſand others ſore wounded,

Eight hundred Turks ſlain.

Meſithes diſappointed of his former purpoſe, bent his Artillery againſt the Walls of the City, and with continual battery had made a fare breach. But Damboyſe foreſeeing the danger, had with great labour caſt up ſuch Rampiers with a Countermure before the breach, that the Baſſa durſt not in any caſe adventure to enter the breach he had made. For performance of this ſo neceſſary a work, the Captains themſelves refuſed not to put too their helping hands; by whoſe example, all the reſt of the People which were able to do any thing, being moved, willingly imployed their labour until the work was fully finiſhed.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Caly-Baſſa the younger (a great Courtier) was ſent from Mahomet to ſee with what ſucceſs the Siege went forward. Upon whoſe arrival, it was given out through all the Turks Camp, That Mahomet was in perſon himſelf coming to the Siege, with an hundred thouſand Men, and an hundred and fifty Pieces of great Ordnance. Theſe News (of purpoſe deviſed to the terror of the Defendants) being blown out of the Camp into the City, ſtruck an exceeding great fear into the minds of ſome of the Defendants, and ſo diſcouraged the Spaniards, with their nigh Neighbours that came from Navar, that they began openly to reaſon in their Conventicles, That it was not poſſible for the City to be defended againſt ſuch a power; and therefore after an inſolent manner, deſired leave to be gone, to the great diſcouragement of the reſt. The Great Maſter underſtanding of their doings, ſent for theſe mutinous Spaniards; and after he had ſharply reproved them of diſorder and cowardiſe, promiſed to ſhip them away forthwith out of the Iſle, ſaying, That he doubted not, right well to defend the City againſt the greateſt power of the Turk, without the help of ſuch baſe minded Cowards. In the mean time he commanded them to ſurceaſe from their mutinous talk, threatning otherwiſe to make them examples to others, what it is ſo much to forget themſelves. But theſe Spaniards ſhortly after, better conſidering of the matter, and what a diſhonour it would be both to themſelves and their Nation, if they ſhould ſo diſhonourably be ſent away, repenting themſelves of that they had done, came and craved pardon of the Great Maſter; and to redeem their former fault, in all ſallies and ſervices during that Siege, ſhewed themſelves moſt valiant and forward men; for all that, the Great Maſter would never afterwards truſt them in any ſervice alone. The Baſſa attempting much and prevailing little, thought it would much further his deſigns, if he could by any means take the Great Maſter out of the way, by whoſe careful policy he ſaw all his devices ſtill countermanded; wherefore to bring this his purpoſe to paſs, he practiſed by the means of one Janus a Dalmatian, to poyſon him. This Janus having conceived this Treaſon from the Baſſa, was received into the City of the Rhodes, as a Chriſtian Fugitive fled from the Turks; where he acquainted himſelf with one Pythius an Epirot, of great familiarity with Marius Philelphus (of late Secretary unto Damboyſe, but as then out of favour and in diſgrace, for that he was partaker with the Spaniards in the late mutiny.) Janus by the means of Pythius, whom he had now throughly corrupted, ſought after Philelphus, who then as he right well knew, lived diſcontented, as a fit inſtrument whereby to work this Treaſon; for that he was a man well acquainted with the Cooks and Butlers, and other Servitors in the Great Maſters Houſe, and himſelf (yet) there very converſant alſo. Pythius preſuming of his old acquaintance and familiarity with Philelphus, and waiting upon his melancholy humor, began to perſwade him to revenge the diſgrace he lived in, and withal to ſhew him the means how to do it, by poyſoning the Great Maſter; which might (as he ſaid) fall out to his greater good than he was yet aware of. Philelphus making ſemblance as if he had not diſliked of the motion, was deſirous to know of him what farther benefit might thereby ariſe to him, more than revenge. To whom Pythius forthwith ſhewed the Baſſaes Letters to Janus, whereby he aſſured him, that whatſoever he ſhould promiſe unto any man for the furtherance of the practice, he would to the full perform the ſame. Philelphus having got full underſtanding of the Treaſon, preſently diſcovered the ſame to Damboyſe. By whoſe commandment, Janus and Pythius were ſtraitwaies apprehended, and being examined, confeſſed the Treaſon; for which Janus loſt his Head, and Pythius (as he had well deſerved) was ſhamefully hanged. Philelphus for his Fidelity, was pardoned his former error, and again received into the Great Maſters favour.

Treaſon againſt the Great Maſter diſcovered, and the Traitors executed.

The Baſſa underſtanding that the Treaſon was diſcovered, and the Traitors executed, was much grieved therewith. Nevertheleſs, he ceaſed not with continual battery to ſhake the City, but eſpecially the Tower of S. Nicholas, for the aſſailing whereof, he made wonderful preparation. Amongſt other things, he had framed a great Bridge, ſtaied with ſtrong Ropes and Cables, over a ſhort fret of the Sea, betwixt the place of his Battery and the ſame Tower, whereon ſix men might march abreaſt; in which device he repoſed great hope. But as the Turks were making faſt this Bridge, and had (as they thought) brought the work to a good perfection; Gervaiſe Rogers an Engliſhman of great courage, and very skilful in Sea matters, found means by night to cut and break in ſunder all the Ropes and Cables wherewith the Bridge was ſtaid; which now looſe, was by the violence of the Sea quickly carried away, and the Turks diſappointed of their purpoſe. For which good ſervice he was by the Great Maſter honourably rewarded, and of him in publick audience highly commended.

Yet was the furious Battery by the Baſſa ſtill maintained, and a new Bridge framed upon ſmall Boats and Lighters, faſt moored with Cables and Anchors; and divers Pieces of great Ordnance placed in Fuſts and Gallies. So that the Tower was at one time battered both by Sea and Land, the Defendants aſſailed with ſmall Shot and Arrows innumerable, and the Tower at the ſame inſtant deſperately ſcaled. But Damboyſe had ſo placed his great Ordnance, that with the force thereof the Bridge was broken in ſunder, four of their great Fuſts ſunk, with great ſtore both of Men and Ordnance; the Defendants alſo in the Tower, with Shot, Timber, Stones, and other ſuch like things provided for that purpoſe, grievouſly overwhelmed the Turks that were ſcaling the Walls and beat them down with great ſlaughter. This hot Aſſault was deſperately maintained by the Turks from three a clock in the morning untill ten; when the Baſſa ſeeing no hope to prevail, gave over the Aſſault, having therein loſt above two thouſand five hundred men; whoſe dead bodies ſhortly after driven on ſhore, were ſpoiled by the Chriſtians. The ſame night two Mercenary Souldiers of Crete, going about to have fled unto the Enemy, were apprehended and put to death. And George Frapaine, who in the beginning of the Siege fled from the Turks, now again vehemently ſuſpected of Treaſon, was executed alſo.

Two thouſand five hundred Turks ſlain in the Aſſault.

Thus neither Force nor Treaſon prevailing, the Baſſa becauſe he would leave nothing unproved that might better his cauſe, ſent certain Meſſengers unto the Great Maſter, offering to him in the name of the Turkiſh Emperor, great Rewards, with many honourable Preferments, if he would yield up the City, which he could not (as they would have perſwaded him) long hold againſt ſo mighty an Enemy; wiſhing him now in his declining eſtate not to refuſe ſuch honourable and princely Offers, for fear he were afterwards conſtrained to accept of far worſe, or elſe through his deſperate wilfulneſs plunge himſelf and his People into ſuch extreme peril, as ſhould be impoſſible for him or them to find any way out of. Whereunto the Great Maſter in brief anſwered, That he would not willingly in his ſure eſtate uſe the counſel of his Enemy; neither in his greateſt diſtreſs refuſe chearfully to yield his Life unto Almighty God, to whom he did ow it; and that with far better Will than to yield up the City upon any conditions, bear they never ſo fair a ſhew of honour or profit. The Meſſengers perceiving his conſtant reſolution, rather to die than to yield his City, began (according to inſtructions before given them by the Baſſa) to temper with him another way, and to perſwade him to yield unto the mighty Emperor ſome ſmall yearly Tribute or other Homage, as an acknowledgment of his greatneſs, and ſo to live as his Friend in Peace. But the Great Maſter knowing by the woful example of others, that in that ſmall requeſt lay included the beginning of the Turkiſh Thraldom and Slavery; utterly refuſed to pay him the leaſt Tribute, or to do him the leaſt homage that could be deviſed. With which anſwer the Meſſengers returned, having obtained nothing of that they were ſent for.

The reſolute anſwer of the Great Maſter.

The reſolute anſwer of the Great Maſter, reported by the aforeſaid Meſſengers unto the Baſſa, troubled him exceedingly; for though he had ſmall hope by force to win the City, yet he was alwaies in hope until now, at his pleaſure, to forſake the Siege with ſome ſuch reaſonable compoſition as might ſtand with his honour. But ſith nothing remained now, but by plain force to conſtrain his Enemies, he reſolved for the ſafeguard of his honour, in that extremity to uſe that extream remedy; wherefore beſides the great Pieces of Battery he had already planted againſt the Walls, he mounted divers ſmaller Pieces much higher, thereby the more to annoy the Defendants, by beating down of their Churches and high built Houſes. His Ordnance thus placed, he battered the City day and night for the ſpace of four days together without intermiſſion; during which time, the Chriſtians out of the City ſpared not, liberally to beſtow their Shot among their Enemies alſo; ſo that the Air ſeemed to grow thick, and the light of the day to be darkned with the ſmoak of the great Ordnance; and the great Shot came ſo thick into the City, that the fearful Women and Children were glad to ſhroud themſelves from the danger thereof, in Cellars and Caves under ground. So long continued this great Battery, that at length the ſtrength of the Wall gave place to the fury of the Canon, and a fair breach was laid open for the Enemy to enter; which was no ſooner made, but that with the firſt ſhew thereof the Turks gave thereunto a deſperate Aſſault; and prevailing by reaſon of their multitude, had upon the ſuddain recovered the top of the Walls, and there ſet up ſome of their Enſigns; but the Chriſtians ſpeedily coming in on every ſide to the defence of the breach, they were again quickly repulſed and beaten down into the Ditches, out of which moſt of them never roſe more. At which time the Turks in another place with their ſcaling Ladders had gained the top of the Walls, and there advanced their Enſigns alſo, and were now five hundred of them entred the City and come into the Street called the Jew-Street, where they were encountred by the Great Maſter and his Followers, and all ſlain that were already entred, and their Enſigns that ſtood upon the Walls thrown down. The reſt yet ſcaling the Walls, and ignorant of the fortune of their Fellows, were likewiſe beaten from the Walls, and with wonderful ſlaughter rejected. So that the Baſſa not able any longer to indure the ſlaughter of his men, being in both places repulſed, cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded, and left the Aſſault; wherein he had loſt of his moſt forward men about five thouſand, with ſmall loſs of the Chriſtians. In this Aſſault, the Great Maſter himſelf received five wounds, whereof one under his right Pap was thought to have been deadly; which yet afterward was very well cured with the reſt.

A fair Breach made by force of the Turks battery.

After that the Baſſa had by the ſpace of three months to ſmall purpoſe ſpent all his Forces and Devices upon the City, he began to doubt whether it were better for him to raiſe his Siege and depart, or to tarry and expect ſome better fortune, which in all his former actions had ſeemed almoſt to have waited upon him; to forſake the Siege, was diſhonourable; and to continue it without hope, preſented no leſs danger. Beſides that, in the former Aſſaults he had already loſt nine thouſand of his beſt Souldiers, and all the reſt of his Army was filled with heavineſs and deſpair, to hear the woful ſighing and groaning of their Fellows, of whom fifteen thouſand lay diſperſed in the Camp ſore wounded, and ready many of them to give up the Ghoſt; and alſo but even a little before, two great Ships ſent from Ferdinand King of Naples with Men and Munition, were in deſpight of all the Turks Gallies ſafely arrived at the Rhodes, to the great joy and encouragment of the beſieged, and no leſs diſcontentment of the Turks. Whilſt the Baſſa was thus deliberating what courſe to take, a rumor was raiſed in the Camp, That the Chriſtian Princes were coming with great power to relieve the Town; with which news the whole Army was exceedingly troubled; whereupon he raiſed his Siege. Some others ſay, that Mahomet hearing of the evil ſucceſs of his Army in the Iſland of the Rhodes, with the difficulty of the Siege, and now ready to go in perſon himſelf againſt the Sultan of Egypt, ſent for the Baſſa, and that ſo the Siege was raiſed. Howſoever it was, the Baſſa before his departure cauſed all the Vines and Trees growing in that part of the Iſland, to be cut down and ſpoiled; and ſo after he had poured forth his fury fury upon the ſenſeleſs Creatures, which he could not according to his deſire exerciſe upon the people, again embarked his Army, and with ſhame departed, the ſeventeenth of Auguſt.

Achmetes landeth his Army in Apulia near to Otranto, and ſpoileth the Country.

Otranto taken by the Turks.

At the ſame time that the Rhodes was thus beſieged, Mahomet ſent his old and moſt expert Captain Achmetes Baſſa, with a great Fleet and a ſtrong Army to make an entrance into Italy (for no Kingdom was ſo ſtrong, which the ambitious Tyrant in the pride of his heart thought not he might now command) and having long before conquered Conſtantinople, otherwiſe called New Rome, was ſtill dreaming (I wot not what) of the conqueſt of Old Rome alſo. The miſchievous Baſſa according to his great Maſters deſigns, embarked his Army at Vallona (otherwiſe called Aulona) a Sea Town in the borders of Macedonia; and from thence paſſing directly over that narrow Sea, which is in breadth about ſixty miles, landed his men in that rich and fertile part of Italy, called in ancient time Apulia (now Puglia) near unto the old and famous City Hydruntum, at this day called Otranto; where as ſoon as this warlike Baſſa had landed his forces, he forraged all that rich Country alongſt the ſea coaſt, and took ſuch infinite ſpoil as might well have ſatisfied the greedy deſire both of himſelf and of his hungry Souldiers, all which rich booty he cauſed to be conveighed into his Gallies. So when he had at his pleaſure ranged up and down the Country by the ſpace of fourteen days, and ſaw that none made head againſt him, he laid ſiege to Otranto, the chief City of that Country, and as it were the Key of that part of Italy; and having with ſuch Ordnance as he took out of his Gallies, made a breach, eaſily entred the ſame, and ſo without any great loſs took the City. A thing not greatly to be marvelled at, foraſmuch as it was but weakly manned, and more weakly defended, by men altogether living in ſecurity in the midſt of their Wealth and Pleaſure. The Archbiſhop, with Zurlo the Governor, and the chief men of the City, for ſafeguard of their lives fled into the great Cathedral Church, as into a Sanctuary; where they were all together moſt miſerably ſlain. The reſt of the Citizens, whoſe hard fortune it was to eſcape the Sword (as people reſerved to more miſery) were afterward ſhipt over into Grecia, and there ſold for Slaves. The landing of the Turks in Apulia, with the taking of Otranto, brought a general fear upon all Italy, inſomuch that Sixtus Quartus, then the great Biſhop of Rome, forgetting all things ſave himſelf, was about to have forſaken the City for fear. Now after the Turks had at their pleaſure ranſackt Otranto, Achmetes cauſed the ſame to be ſtrongly fortified (as the ſure footing of the Turks in Italy) and victualled for eighteen months, and there leaving eight thouſand of his beſt Souldiers in Garriſon, returned himſelf with the reſt to Vallona, and ſo by Land to Conſtantinople to know his great Maſters further pleaſure, but purpoſing with himſelf, with the firſt of the next Spring to have returned with greater forces again to Italy for the proſecuting of his former Victory. Which if he had done, it was grealty to have been feared, that all that goodly Country, ſometime Miſtris of the World, but then and yet alſo rent in ſunder by the diſcord and ambition of the Chriſtian Princes, had in ſhort time become a prey unto the barbarous Turk for ever.

1481.

He is buried at Conſtantinople.

But whilſt the great Tyrant (in his life time the great ſcourge of Chriſtendom) thus proudly plotteth the ruin and deſtruction of fair Italy, God, in whoſe hands the hearts of Kings are, put an hook in the great Tyrants Noſe, and led him quite another way. For at the ſame time, the Caramanian King, aided by the Perſian and the Sultan of Egypt, had in a great Battel overthrown Bajazet (Mahomets eldeſt Son then living) and ſlain moſt part of his Army; in revenge whereof, Mahomet with great expedition raiſed a great and puiſſant Army, and taking Achmetes with him as his chief man of War, rejecting the Wars of Italy unto a more convenient time, paſſed over into Aſia; where upon the way, about a days journey ſhort of Nicomedia a City of Bithynia, at a place called Geiviſin he fell ſick, and there for the ſpace of three days grievouſly tormented with an extream pain in his Belly (which ſome ſuppoſed to be the Colick) died; but being indeed, as moſt men thought, poyſoned; when he had lived about 52 years, and thereof reigned 31, in the year of our Lord 1481. His Body was afterwards magnificently buried in a Chappel near unto the great Mahometan Temple, which he himſelf firſt built at Conſtantinople.

The deſcription of Mahomet.

The Sons of Mahomet, Muſtapha, Bajazet, and Zemes.

The death of this mighty man (who living troubled a great part of the World) was not much more lamented by thoſe that were neareſt unto him, (who ever living in fear of his Cruelty, hated him deadly) than of his Enemies, who ever in doubt of his greatneſs, were glad to hear of his end. He was of ſtature but low, and nothing anſwerable to the height of his mind, ſquare ſet, and ſtrong limmed, not inferior in ſtrength (when he was young) unto any in his Fathers Court, but to Scanderbeg only; his complexion was Tartarlike, ſallow, and melancholy, as were moſt of his Anceſtors the Othoman Kings; his look and countenance ſtern, with his Eyes piercing, hollow and a little ſunk as it were into his Head, and his Noſe ſo high and crooked, that it almoſt touched his upper Lip. To be brief, his countenance was altogether ſuch, as if Nature had with moſt cunning hand therein depainted and moſt curiouſly ſet forth to view the inward diſpoſition and qualities of his mind, which were on both parts notable: He was of a very ſharp and apprehenſive Wit, learned, as amongſt that Nation, eſpecially in Aſtronomy, and could ſpeak the Greek, Latine, Arabick, Chaldee and Perſian Tongues. He delighted much in regarding of Hiſtories, and the Lives of worthy Men, eſpecially the Lives of Alexander the Great, and of Julius Cæſar, whom he propoſed to himſelf as examples to follow. He was of an exceeding Courage, and thereto very fortunate; a ſevere puniſher of injuſtice, in them eſpecially to whom he had committed the adminiſtration of Juſtice. Men that excelled in any quality, he greatly favoured and honourably entertained; as he did Gentil Bellin a Painter of Venice, whom he purpoſely cauſed to come from thence, to Conſtantinople, to draw the lively counterfeit of himſelf, for which he moſt honourably rewarded him. He ſo ſeverely puniſhed theft, as that in his time all the ways were ſafe, and a Theef ſcarcely to be heard of. But theſe good parts were in him obſcured with moſt horrible and notorious Vices; for why, he was altogether irreligious, and of all others moſt perfideous, ambitious above meaſure, and in nothing more delighted, than in blood; inſomuch that it is probably gathered, that he was in his time the death of eight hundred thouſand men; Craft, Covetouſneſs, and Diſſimulation, were in him accounted for tollerable Faults, in compariſon of his greater Vices. In his love was no aſſurance, and his leaſt diſpleaſure was death; ſo that he lived feared of all men, and died lamented of none. He had iſſue three Sons, Muſtapha (dead before him, as is before declared) Bajazet, and Gemes, or rather Zemes, of ſome called Zizimus, Competitor of the Empire with his eldeſt Brother; whom he exceedingly troubled in the beginning of his Reign, ſo that he could not well attend any other thing but him; which opportunity (by God himſelf no doubt offered for the ſafeguard of Italy) Alphonſus Duke of Calabria (King Ferdinand his eldeſt Son) taking hold upon, with all the power he could make in Italy, beſieged the Turks in Otranto; with whom he had many ſharp skirmiſhes, wherein he loſt divers of his great Captains and Commanders, as the Count Julio de Aquaiva, Loys de Capua, and the Count Julio de Piſa, with others and was ſtill by the ſtrong Garriſon of the Turks put to the worſe; until ſuch time as being ſtrengthned with Aid out of Spain and Portugal, (but eſpecially with certain Companies of moſt valiant Souldiers ſent from Matthias Corvinus out of Hungary; whoſe Forces the Turks moſt feared) he began to cut them ſhort, and ſtraitly beſieged the City both by Sea and Land; until at length the beſieged Turks hearing of the death of their great Emperor, and now hardly preſſed with the dangers of a ſtrait Siege, no longer expecting the return of Achmetes their General, (then ready to have come to their reſcue with five and twenty thouſand Souldiers) yielded up the City unto the Duke, upon compoſition before made, That they might with bag and baggage in ſafety depart thence; which they did, after they had to the great terror of all Italy holden that ſtrong City by the ſpace of a year. And ſo was that rich Country rather by the mercy of God (in taking away the great Tyrant) preſerved, than by the ſtrength or policy of the Inhabitants, which was then in great danger to have for ever given place unto the power of the great Tyrant, had he longer lived; yea and after his death, to the power of Bajazet his Son, had he not by Domeſtical troubles been enforced to turn himſelf another way, and as it were to neglect in time to relieve his diſtreſſed Garriſon in Otranto, as ſhall hereafter be declared.

Otranto yielded by the Turks upon compoſition.

UPon the death of Mahomet the late Emperor, great Troubles began to ariſe about the Succeſſion in the Turkiſh Empire; ſome of the Baſſaes and great Captains ſeeking to place Bajazet, the eldeſt Son of Mahomet, in the Empire; and others with no leſs devotion labouring to prefer Zemes, or Gemes, otherwiſe called Zizimus, Bajazet his younger Brother. By occaſion whereof there aroſe two great and mighty Factions, which in few days grew to ſuch heat, that many great Tumults and hot Skirmiſhes were made in the Imperial City, betwixt the Favorites of both Factions, and great ſlaughter committed. In theſe Broils the proud Janizaries for an old grudge ſlew Mahometes one of the four great Baſſaes, a man by whoſe grave Counſel moſt of the weighty Affairs of the Turkiſh Empire had been managed during the Reign of the late Emperor; and proceeding further in their accuſtomed Inſolency, ſpoiled all the Chriſtians and Jews which dwelt amongſt them, of all their Wealth and Subſtance; at which time the rich Merchants and Citizens of Conſtantinople which were natural Turks themſelves, eſcaped not their ravenous Hands, but became unto them a Prey and Spoil alſo. The other three Baſſaes of the Court, Iſaac, Meſithes, and Achmetes, (lately returned from the winning of Hydruntum in Italy) although they ſecretly maligned and envied one at the greatneſs of another, yet to appeaſe theſe ſo dangerous Troubles, and to aſſure their own Eſtates, joyned hands together, and by their great Authority, and multitude of Followers and Favorites, found means that Corcutus (one of the younger Sons of Bajazet, a young Prince of eighteen years old) was as it were by general conſent of the Nobility and Souldiers, ſaluted Emperor, and with great Triumph and Solemnity placed in the Imperial Seat. In whoſe name, the aforeſaid Baſſaes at their pleaſure diſpoſed of all things, little or nothing regarding either Bajazet or Zemes, then both abſent, the one at Amaſia, and the other at Iconium in Lycaonia. For the jealous Turkiſh Kings never ſuffer their Sons to live in Court near unto them, after they be grown to years of diſcretion; but ſend them to Govern their Provinces far off; where they are alſo under the Command of the Emperors Lieutenants-General in Aſia or Europe, and may not depart from their Charge without great danger, not ſo much as to viſit their Father without expreſs leave and commandment. So jealous are thoſe Tyrants, yea even of their own Sons.

Bajazet cometh to Conſtantinople.

Bajazet and Zemes hearing of the death of their Father, and of the Troubles in the Imperial City, haſted thitherward with all ſpeed, where Bajazet being the nearer, firſt arrived; but finding the Empire already poſſeſſed by Corcutus his younger Son, and himſelf excluded, he in grief of his heart poured forth moſt grievous Complaints before God and man, calling Heaven and Earth to witneſs of the great wrong and injury done unto him by the proud Baſſaes. And what by Tears and humble Obteſtations, what by great Gifts and greater Promiſes, but moſt of all by the earneſt labour and ſolicitation of Cherſeogles Vice-Roy of Græcia, and the Aga or Captain of the Janizaries, both his Sons in law, prevailed ſo much with the great Baſſaes and Souldiers of the Court, that Corcutus being of a mild and courteous diſpoſition, overcome by their intreaty and the reverence of his Father, reſigned unto him the Imperial Government, which he preſently took upon him with the general good liking of the people, and made Corcutus Governor of Lycia, Caria, and Ionia, with the pleaſant and rich Countries thereabouts; allowing him a great yearly Penſion for the better maintenance of his Eſtate, with promiſe alſo of the Empire after his deceaſe, and ſo ſent him away to his Charge, where he moſt pleaſantly lived during the Reign of his Father Bajazet, giving himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, which made that he was afterwards leſs favoured of the Janizaries and other men of War.

Zemes riſeth againſt his Brother Bajazet.

Zemes thus prevented by his elder Brother, and underſtanding by his Friends how all things ſtood at Conſtantinople, and that Bajazet was already poſſeſſed of the Empire; returning with great ſpeed, raiſed a puiſſant Army in the Countries which were under his Command, and marching through the heart of Aſia the leſs, by the way as he went, took into his poſſeſſion ſuch Cities and ſtrong Places as he thought beſt; and ſo entring into Bithynia, took the great City of Pruſa, the ancient Seat of the Othoman Kings. Purpoſing in himſelf, that as Bajazet had ſhut him out of Europe, ſo he would alſo in requital thereof exclude him out of that part of the Turkiſh Empire which is beyond Helleſpontus in Aſia, and to make himſelf Lord thereof. Wherein Fortune at the firſt ſeemed unto him moſt favourable, all the people whereſoever he came yielding unto him Obedience as unto their Prince and Soveraign; ſo that in ſhort time he ſeemed both unto himſelf and to others, in ſtrong poſſeſſion of that part of the Empire.

Bajazet goeth againſt Zemes.

Of theſe his proceedings Bajazet having Intelligence, and perceiving the greater part of his Empire now in danger to be loſt, and doubting further, that Zemes his ambitious Mind would hardly reſt therewith long contented; for remedy of ſo great a Miſchief levied a ſtrong and puiſſant Army, wherewith he paſſed over into Aſia, and came to Neapolis a City of Anatolia, near whereunto Zemes lay with his Army ſtrongly incamped. As Bajazet was upon the way againſt his Brother, Achmetes the great Baſſa (in the confeſſion of all men the beſt man of War and moſt expert Captain amongſt the Turks, and of all others moſt entirely beloved of the Janizaries) came, and unarmed preſented himſelf upon his knees before Bajazet, his Sword hanging at his Saddle-bow; to the admiration of many, who could not but wonder to ſee ſo worthy a Chieftain of ſo great Place in time of Service, without any apparent cauſe, in ſuch humble manner to appear before his Soveraign, as if he had had nothing to do with Arms. It chanced many years before, in the mortal Wars betwixt Mahomet the late and great Emperor of the Turks, and Aſſymbeius Uſun-Caſſanes the King of Perſia, that Bajazet having the leading of the right Wing of his Fathers Army, had not martialled it in ſo good order as was to Mahomet his good liking; for which cauſe he commanded this Achmetes to go and ſet that part of the battel in better order. Which his Soveraigns Command whiles he moſt skilfully performed, Bajazet taking it in evil part, as tending to his own diſgrace, in great choler threatned the Baſſa, to find a time when he would be revenged upon him. But he being a man of great ſpirit, and one that durſt both do and ſay much, perceiving his meaning, bid him do what pleaſed him; and laying his hand upon his Sword, ſolemnly vowed, That whenſoever he came to Command as Emperor, he would never ware Sword in field; the remembrance whereof was the cauſe that he then came in manner aforeſaid, ready to ſerve if he were thereto commanded, or otherwiſe to endure what ſo his Princes Pleaſure was. Bajazet perceiving that the unkindneſs ſo long before conceived, was not yet diſgeſted, in token of Grace ſtretched out to him his Scepter, and taking him up, commanded him to girt his Sword unto his ſide, and not to remember that which he had long before both forgiven and forgotten.

Achmetes made General of Bajazet his Army.

And knowing right well that he was a moſt valiant and expert Captain, made him General of his Army, to the great contentment of the Janizaries and the reſt of the Army; who ſo ſoon as they ſaw him, gave out divers great ſhouts for joy, as if Victory had moſt aſſuredly attended upon him. Achmetes taking upon him the Charge, came and incamped ſo near as he could to Zemes, and ſo lay by the ſpace of ten days; during which time, many ſharp Skirmiſhes were made with divers Fortune; ſometime the one ſide prevailing, and ſometime the other. At length the matter was brought to a general battel; wherein after a long and cruel fight, and great ſlaughter on both ſides, the Fortune of Bajazet, conducted by the policy of Achmetes, prevailed againſt Zemes. Who ſeeing his Army overthrown, betook himſelf to flight, and came to Iconium; in which flight many of Zemes his Followers were taken Priſoners; whom Bajazet would have pardoned and enlarged, but that by the perſwaſion of Achmetes he changed his mind, and to the terror of others ſuffered them all to be put to the Sword.

Zemes flyeth into Syria.

Zemes doubting after this Overthrow to fall into his Brothers hands, and finding no means to make head again; when he had ſtaid three days at Iconium, cauſed his Treaſure, Plate, Jewels, and other things of great value and light carriage to be truſſed up, and taking with him his Mother and his two young Children, a Son and a Daughter, accompanied with a ſmall Retinue, fled into Syria; then part of the Dominion of Caytbeius, commonly called the great Sultan of Egypt and Syria. It was not long after the departure of Zemes from Iconium, but that Bajazet came thither with his Army, to have ſurpriſed him; but underſtanding of his flight, he took order for the peaceable Government of that part of his Empire. And ſo having ſuppreſſed that dangerous Rebellion, and again reduced that troubled part of his Empire to his Obeyſance, returned with Victory to Conſtantinople.

The diſtreſſed Prince Zemes travelling through Syria, came at length to Jeruſalem; where he ſtayed a good ſpace, devoutly viſiting the Monuments of that moſt ancient and famous City. From thence he travelled into Egypt; where at his firſt entrance into the Country, he was met by divers of the greateſt Nobility of that Kingdom, ſent from the great Sultan, by whom he was honourably conducted to Caire, and there preſented to Caytbeius, of whom he was graciouſly welcomed; unto whom after due Reverence done, he declared the cauſe of his coming, as followeth:

Zemes his Speech to Caytbeius Sultan of Egypt.

If it were not to me certainly known (moſt Victorious) that you are not ignorant either who I am, or from whence deſcended, or with what injury enforced, after long and painful travel I am here arrived; it would much concern me to uſe another manner of beginning of my Speech, and with greater proteſtation of words to ſeek your gracious Favour. But foraſmuch as all theſe things are unto your moſt Royal Majeſty ſufficiently known, as I do well perceive in this, that your infinite Clemency hath entertained me with far greater kindneſs, than I in ſuch my adverſe Fortune durſt wiſh for, much leſs requeſt: Now nothing remaineth for me to ſay, more than juſtly to complain unto your invincible Majeſty, of the Wrong and Injury done unto me by Bajazet, whom I may more juſtly term my cruel Enemy, than kind Brother. For he not contented to have taken unto himſelf my Fathers Empire by great tumult and ſlaughter, hath with all Hoſtility and Force of Arms perſecuted me his Brother, excluded out of the Imperial City, and then living in Bithynia, troubleſome neither to him, nor any of his people, and never reſted until he had chaſed me out of the bounds of my Fathers Empire.

Empire. Neither hath the jealous deſire of Soveraignty (whereof my Father whilſt he lived, had him always in diſtruſt) ſo much moved him unto this ſo cruel Fact, as a certain unnatural cruelty towards all his Kindred in general, and mortal hatred againſt me his Brother in particular; for he which is already poſſeſſed of the Empire, and doth with all Hoſtility perſecute a private perſon, ſubject and expoſed to his Injury, that man thirſteth not after Soveraignty, but after Blood; neither deſireth he to Conquer, but to Kill. And whereas after my Fathers death great Troubles aroſe in Conſtantinople, and many bloody Skirmiſhes were fought betwixt the Favorites of both of us, it cannot with any truth be laid to my charge, as done by mine advice or counſel, I being at the ſame time ſo far from thence. Neither am I juſtly to be blamed, if that after my Fathers departure I put my ſelf upon the way towards Conſtantinople; eſpecially being ſent for thither by many my good Friends, men of great Mark and Quality; but his Fortune prevailing, I gave place, and leſt my coming to the Imperial City might have been the occaſion of new Troubles, I returned aſide into Bithynia, and ſo to Pruſa, with purpoſe there to have reſted in quiet, if my Brother would have given me leave. But ſo far was he from that, to ſuffer me there to reſt, as that I was by him moſt cruelly aſſailed as an open Enemy; and had I not by ſpeedy flight withdrawn my ſelf from the imminent danger, and departed quite out of my Fathers Kingdom, I muſt have yielded my ſelf, my blood, and life, as a Sacrifice into his cruel hands. Neither is he to me ſo mortal an Enemy, or thirſteth after my life ſo much for fear, as for very hatred and malice; for what is there in me to fear? Verily nothing: Conſtantinople is his, the favour of the great Chieftains and Men of War is his, the Treaſure and Regal Riches are all his; wherefore he hateth his Brother, but feareth him not. He will ſway all things alone, he will have all that belongeth to the Othoman Family alone, and he, yea none but he, muſt live alone. Xerxes was a mighty King, and yet in that great and large Kingdom he not only preſerved his Brethren in ſafety, but had them alſo in great Honour and Eſtimation. What did Alexander the Great? Who not only took pleaſure in his Brother, but had him alſo as a Companion of his moſt glorious Expedition; and many other famous Kings of foreign Nations, and of our own Family, have ruled both more ſafely, and better ſtrengthned, with the counſel and aid of their moſt loving Brethren, rather than with others. But Bajazet is of a far other mind, reputing violence and haughtineſs of heart to be his greateſt and ſureſt defence; herein his fierce Nature delighteth, more than in the lawful courſe of Nature, Juſtice, and Equity; he had rather have his Brother his Enemy than his Friend, and to drive him into exile, than to make him partaker of his counſels. But I beſeech thee moſt puiſſant Monarch, the faithful Keeper and Maintainer of our Law and Religion, by the ſacred Reliques of our great Prophet Mahomet, which thou haſt at Jeruſalem and Mecha, ſuffer me not, a Kings Son, to live in baniſhment and exile, poor and miſerable, a ſcorn of his Brothers cruelty, far from home, far from his Country and Kingdom; but regarding the Law of the great Prophet, lift up the afflicted and oppreſſed, and by the great Authority which you have, bridle Domeſtical wrongs; or if that will not take place, revenge it with thy Sword, and ſuffer not our Empire, with ſo great travel founded, by the cruelty or folly of one wilful man to be overthrown; which ſhould be no more grievous and lamentable to us, than dangerous to your moſt high Eſtate, and all other Kings and Princes of our Religion. For you of your ſelf underſtand right well, what deadly Enemies the Chriſtian Princes are unto the Turks; and do you think, that if any great War (which I wiſh not) ſhould ariſe of this our Diſcord, that they would long reſt in quiet, and as idle Beholders ſtand looking on until it were of it ſelf appeaſed? Or rather having ſuch an opportunity preſented, would not with might and main ſuddenly invade our Kingdom, before ſhaken with Civil Wars, and ſeek the utter ruine and deſtruction of the ſame? Which their deſire, if that hateful people could bring to paſs (which thing Mahomet turn upon themſelve) my mind abhorreth to think how far that miſchief would run: For the Othoman Family once rooted out, there is none of our Religion (your Majeſty only excepted) which is able to withſtand their Power; wherefore you muſt then ſtand for your ſelf and all the reſt, you alone muſt withſtand the force of the Chriſtians, you muſt maintain that War with much loſs, and greater charge, and moſt uncertain ſucceſs. Wherefore, invincible Monarch, I moſt humbly beſeech thee, that pittying our Eſtate, whiles the matter is yet whole, and remedy is yet to be had, to deal with Bajazet by your Embaſſadors, That though he will not receive me his Brother as Partner of the Empire, yet at leaſt to admit me into ſome ſmall part of my Fathers Kingdom: Let him Reign and Rule, let all things be at his Command; let it be lawful for me poor man but to live in reſt and quiet ſomewhere, poſſeſſing but ſo much as may ſuffice me honeſtly to lead a private life. Which thing if he ſhall refuſe to grant, although he neither fear the Laws of God or man, yet as I have at Jeruſalem, ſo will I alſo ſhortly at Mecha (if by your leave I may) complain unto the great Prophet, of the Injuries done unto me by my cruel and unnatural Brother; and afterwards make proof of your compaſſion towards me, all which I hope ſhall much avail. But if (which I would not) I ſhall prove all theſe things in vain, ſith deſperation enforceth men to all Extremities, I will go with Fire, Sword, and Slaughter, by ſecret and open force, by right and wrong; and hated, will vex my hateful Brother by all manner of Miſchief, by all manner of Revenge. Neither will I make an end of confounding of all, until I be either received into part of the Empire, or elſe together with my life leave thoſe deſperate and loſt things for him alone to enjoy. For I deem it much better, quickly to die, than with diſgrace and infamy to protract a lingring loathed life.

The great Sultan in courteous manner comforted the diſtreſſed Prince, willing him to be of good chear, and patiently to bear his preſent hap; foraſmuch as it became a man born in ſo high Fortune, not to be diſcouraged with any miſchance, or diſmaid if things fell out otherwiſe than he looked for; commending him withall, for that he ſaw in him no leſs courage than might well have becomed his better Eſtate; and willing him to live ſtill in hope, promiſed to do what in him lay, to reconcile him to his Brother, and to perſwade him that he might be received into ſome part of the Kingdom; and to that purpoſe ſhortly after diſpatched away an honourable Embaſſage to Bajazet. Zemes in the mean while, by the ſame Sultans leave, upon a ſuperſtitious devotion travelled into Arabia, to viſit the Temple of Mahomet at Mecha, and his Sepulchre at Medina. Upon his return to Caire, the Embaſſadors before ſent, returned alſo, but not having obtained any thing they deſired; for Bajazet would not give ear to any Agreement, but ſeemed altogether to contemn and deſpiſe his Brother. Wherefore Zemes more upon ſtomach and deſire of Revenge, than for any hope he had of the Empire, determined with himſelf to make open War upon him; repoſing ſome good hope in his ſecret Friends, and in the revolt of ſome of the great Captains, who diſcontented with the Government of Bajazet, ſecretly wiſhed for his return.

Catbeius the Egyptian Sultan ſendeth Embaſſadors to Bajazet.

Whilſt

1483. The King of Caramania ſolliciteth Zemes to take up Arms againſt Bajazet.

Whilſt he was thus plotting theſe weighty Matters, a Meſſenger with Letters came fitly from the King of Caramania, offering with all the Power he could make, to joyn with him, if he would take up Arms againſt his Brother. This poor titular King then lived in Armenia, and being able by his Friends to make ſome good force, was in hope by joyning with Zemes, to recover ſome part of the Caramanian Kingdom, from whence his Father was not many years before driven by the force of the late Turkiſh Emperor Mahomet the Great, Bajazet his Father. It is hard to ſay, whither of theſe diſtreſſed and exiled Princes gave the greater encouragement to the other, to take this deſperate War in hand, being both together far unable by all the Friends they could make, to encounter with the great Power of Bajazet. But what is ſo dangerous or deſperate, which aſpiring Minds will not attempt in hope of a Kingdom? whoſe brightneſs ſo dazeleth their eyes, that they can ſee nothing but it.

Hereupon Zemes having received great Gifts of the Egyptian Sultan, with promiſe of Aid, departed from Caire (the Sultan earneſtly perſwading him to the contrary) and as it was before appointed, met with the Caramanian King upon the borders of Aſia the leſſer; where they concluded to joyn together ſuch Forces as they had, and to invade Bajazet. Which they accordingly did; for raiſing all the Power they could, they entred into Cilicia, (now called Caramania) and joyning their Armies together, incamped between Iconium and Larenda. Neither did Bajazet in time of ſo great a danger ſit ſtill; not ſo much fearing his Brothers Power, as the revolting of his Captains and Souldiers, whom he knew either to love, or at leaſt not to hate the young Prince his Brother. Wherefore he raiſed a great Army, and ſent Achmetes (the great Man of War) before with the one part thereof, himſelf following after with a far greater ſtrength; for at that time he had under his Enſigns two hundred thouſand men.

As he was marching with this great Army, a rumor was raiſed in the Camp, That ſome of his chief Captains had conſpired to betray him into the hands of his Brother, and that many of the Souldiers ſecretly favouring Zemes, would upon the joyning of the battel forſake him, and take part with his Brother. Which report ſo troubled Bajazet, that he ſtood in doubt what to do, or whom to truſt; but knowing that nothing winneth the heart of the common Souldier more, than the Generals bounty, he forthwith cauſed a wonderful maſs of Money to be divided amongſt the Captains and Souldiers, loading their minds with ample promiſes of far greater Rewards, for their fidelity and valour to be ſhewed in that preſent Service. Having thus aſſured himſelf of the wavering minds of his Souldiers, he began to draw near to Iconium, where his Enemies lay incamped; and by gloſing Letters and flattering Meſſengers made ſhew openly, as if he had been very deſirous to come to ſome good Agreement with them, but ſecretly went about to ſtop all the ſtraits and paſſages, in ſuch manner as that it ſhould not be poſſible for them again to retire back into Syria; for he doubted nothing more, but leſt they being few in number, and in ſtrength far unequal unto him, would not upon ſo great diſadvantage hazard the fortune of a battel, but retire themſelves into Syria, and ſo to his exceeding Trouble and infinite Charge protract the War.

Zemes flieth to Sea.

Zemes perceiving his Brothers ſubtil drift, and ſeeing no ſuch Revolt as he had hoped for, and as had before by Letters to him been promiſed; and weighing with reaſon his own weak Forces, retired in good time unto the ſtraits of the Mountain Amanus, which divideth Cilicia from Syria. Here, deſpairing of all good ſucceſs in the Enterpriſe he had taken in hand, he perſwaded the Caramanian King his Confederate to give place unto the time, and to reſerve himſelf unto his better Fortune; and ſo breaking up his Army, with a few of his Followers came down to the Sea coaſt of Cilicia; where he hired a tall Ship to attend in readineſs, that if any ſudden danger ſhould ariſe, he might go aboard, and ſo ſave himſelf by Sea. In the mean time he ſent a Meſſenger unto Damboys Great Maſter of the Rhodes, certifying him, That for as much as he had no place of ſafety left amongſt his own people, wherein he might ſhroud himſelf from the fury of his Brother, ſtill ſeeking after his life, he would upon his ſafe Conduct come to him into his Iſland of the Rhodes. Which his requeſt the Great Maſter eaſily granted, deeming the flight of ſo great a Prince from the Turk, to be a thing much profitable to the Chriſtian Commonweal; and thereupon he preſently ſent forth certain Gallies to fetch him from the troubleſome coaſt of Cicilia. But before theſe Gallies were come, Zemes was inforced by the ſudden acceſs of his Enemies, for the avoiding of preſent danger, to go aboard on that Ship which he had providently before prepared to be in readineſs for ſuch purpoſe. And having put a little from the ſhore, ſhot back again an Arrow with Letters made faſt unto it, directed unto his Brother Bajazet, containing as followeth:

Zemes his Letters to his Brother Bajazet.

Thou knoweſt (moſt unkind and cruel Brother) that I fly not unto the Chriſtians, the mortal Enemy of the Othoman Family, for hatred of my Religion or Nation; but enforced thereunto by thy injurious dealing, and dangerous practiſes which thou inceſſantly attempteſt againſt me, yea even in my extream miſery. But this aſſured hope I carry with me, that the time will come when as thou the author of ſo great wrong, or thy Children, ſhall receive their juſt guerdon of this thy preſent tyranny againſt thy Brother.

It is reported, that when Bajazet had read theſe Letters, he was ſo troubled in mind, that for certain days he gave himſelf wholly to mourning and heavineſs, and would in no wiſe be comforted; inſomuch, that he was brought into the Camp by the Baſſaes, as a man half diſtraught of his wits, ſhunning for a ſeaſon all mens ſpeech and company.

Zemes flieth to the Rhodes.

Zemes ſailing to the Rhodes, was there honourably received of the Great Maſter, and all the reſt of the Knights of the Order; to whom in their publick Aſſembly three days after, he openly declared the cauſes of the diſcord betwixt his Brother and him; alledging for the colour of his Rebellion, That although Bajazet were his elder Brother, yet that he was born whilſt his Father yet lived in private Eſtate, under ſubjection and command, long before he poſſeſſed the Kingdom, and ſo no Kings Son; whereas he himſelf was the firſt born of his Father, being an Emperor, and ſo not Heir of his Fathers private Fortune (as was Bajazet) but of his greateſt Honour and Empire; and yet not of ſuch an haughty mind, but that he could have been content to have given place unto his Brother, ſo that he could have been contented likewiſe to have granted him ſome ſmall portion of the Empire, wherein he might ſafely have lived as a poor Prince, and his Brother; but that ſuch was his pride, as that he would not vouchſafe to ſuffer him to live ſo much as a poor private life in any corner of ſo large an Empire, and was therefore by his unnatural and tyrannous dealing, enforced to crave Aid of the Chriſtian Princes. Of whom (forſomuch as he had always heard much honour) he was in good hope to find ſuccour and relief in that his diſtreſſed eſtate; proteſting unto God and the World, that if ever it ſhould be his good Fortune by their means and help to obtain the Empire, he would never be unmindful of ſo great a benefit; but to make with them a perpetual and inviolable Peace, and ſo to reſt their faſt Friend for ever. The Great Maſter on the other ſide comforting him with chearful Speeches, promiſed to keep him in ſafety from the fury of his Brother; and farther to commend his Cauſe to the other great Kings and Princes of Chriſtendom.

The deſcription of Zemes.

This exiled Prince Zemes, was about the age of eight and twenty years when he came to the Rhodes; of ſtature tall, ſomewhat corpulent and well limb'd, grey-eyed, but looking ſomething aſquint, hook-noſed, and in the middle riſing, in ſuch manner as the Perſians commend in their Kings; of colour brown, ſpare of ſpeech, and by nature cholerick; a great feeder, ſo that he ſeemed rather to devour his meat, than to eat it; much delighted in ſwimming, and to lie abroad in the night; penſive and melancholy, which men imputed to his great cares; never merry but in the company of the grand Maſter; a religious obſerver of the ſuperſtition, from which he could never be drawn during the long time he lived in exile; learned as among the Turks, ſo that he wrote the Hiſtory of his Fathers life. But leaving him in ſafe keeping with the grand Maſter of the Rhodes, let us again return to the courſe of our Hiſtory.

Bajazet having now the ſecond time chaſed away his Brother, after he had well quieted that part of his troubled Kingdom in Aſia, returned again to Conſtantinople, carefully attending when ſome new motion ſhould be made by his Brother, to his farther diſquiet. But after he underſtood that he was with the Great Maſter of the Rhodes, he ſent certain of his Baſſaes (amongſt whom Achmetes the great Souldier is reported to have been one) unto the Great Maſter, requeſting him to deliver up Zemes, offering for him a wonderful ſum of money. Which diſhonourable requeſt, when it could by no means be obtained, the ſame Embaſſadors in the name of their Maſter, concluded a Peace very commodious for the Rhodians; wherein among other things it was agreed, That the Great Maſter ſhould keep Zemes in ſafe cuſtody, ſo that he ſhould no more trouble the Turkiſh Empire; in conſideration whereof, and for his honourable uſage, Bajazet ſhould yearly pay unto the Great Maſter thirty thouſand Ducats the firſt of Auguſt, which was afterward accordingly payed.

1484. It fortuned that whilſt Achmetes the great Baſſa (employed in matters abroad) was abſent from the Court, Bajazet diſcourſing with the other Baſſaes his grave Counſellors, upon his late Expedition into Aſia againſt his Brother, ſeemed to be highly offended with the untruſtineſs and doubtful faith of ſome of his greateſt Captains and Souldiers; yet upon whom he might juſtly lay the blame, he well knew not, although it ſeemed by his talk, he ſhould ſomewhat diſtruſt the great Captain Achmetes. Hereupon Iſaac the moſt ancient Baſſa of the Court, and of greateſt authority next unto Bajazet himſelf (whoſe Daughter, a Lady of exceeding beauty, Achmetes had long before married, but doubting that ſhe had yielded her Honour to the wanton luſt of Muſtapha, the eldeſt Son of Mahomet the late Emperor, had put her from him, and would by no means be reconciled; for which cauſe there was a ſecret hatred ever after betwixt thoſe two great Baſſaes) perceiving the Emperors diſcontented and ſuſpitious humour, and deſiring nothing more than the deſtruction of Achmetes, took hold upon this opportunity, and by all means he could deviſe, encreaſed the ſuſpition of the Treaſon, which had already too much poſſeſſed the jealous Emperor; ſometimes craftily imagining Intelligence to have paſſed betwixt Zemes and Achmetes; and forthwith amplifying his Power and Authority, which (as he ſaid) was ſo great with the Janizaries and Souldiers of the Court, that they by reaſon of his often imployments, were wholly at his devotion; ſo that he might at his pleaſure do more in Zemes his quarrel, than ſhould ſtand with the ſafety of Bajazet; a matter well to be conſidered of, and alſo carefully prevented. For remedy of which dangers, it was thought neceſſary, that Achmetes at his return to Court, ſhould be taken away and ſlain.

Achmetes fearing nothing leſs than that which was contrived againſt him, came after his wonted manner to the Court; and was with the other great Baſſaes invited to a ſolemn Supper which Bajazet had commanded to be prepared, to ſolace himſelf after his travels (as it was given out) with his chief Baſſaes. To this Royal Supper came Achmetes with the reſt of the bidden Gueſts, miſtruſting nothing, and was there ſumptuouſly feaſted by Bajazet; who to make his Gueſts the merrier, drank Wine plentifully himſelf, cauſing them alſo to drink in like manner; ſo that they were full of Wine; a thing utterly forbidden by their Law; yet daily more and more uſed, eſpecially by their great Men in their Feaſts. Supper now ended, and the night far ſpent, Bajazet in token that they were welcome, and ſtood in his good Grace, cauſed certain rich Robes of pleaſing colours to be brought forth, and to be caſt upon every of his Gueſts one, giving beſide unto every one of them a fair gilt Bowl full of Gold. But upon Achmetes was caſt a Gown of black Velvet, which among the Turks may well be called the Mantle of death, being ſo ſure a Token of the Emperors heavy Indignation, as that it is death for any man once to open his mouth, or to intreat for him upon whom it is by the Emperors commandment ſo caſt. Achmetes ſeeing himſelf now under the ſhadow of death, and knowing it but vain to intreat for mercy, as he was a man of great ſpirit, brake forth and ſaid, Oh cachpogly (which is as much as to ſay, Thou Son of a Whore) ſith thou entendedſt ſo much cruelty againſt me, why didſt thou not put it in execution before thou hadſt inforced me to drink this impure and forbidden Wine? and ſo caſting his Eyes upon the ground ſate ſtill. The other Baſſaes having leave to depart, giving thanks to the Emperor, and craving pardon for their exceſs, kiſſed the ground at his Feet and ſo departed; with whom Achmetes offered to have gone out alſo, but was forthwith commanded to ſit ſtill, for that the Emperor had to talk with him in ſecret. The Baſſaes were no ſooner departed, but the terrible Executioners of Bajazet his wrath ſtept in, and laid hands upon Achmetes to have ſlain him; when one of the Eunuchs in greateſt favour with the Tyrant, ſtanding by, adviſed him not to be too haſty in executing of ſo great Man, ſo entirely beloved of his beſt Souldiers and Men of War, but rather to ſtay his Execution for a while, to ſee how the matter would be diſgeſted; and in the mean time by torture to wreſt it out from him what might be got, to make it in ſome ſort appear, that he died for his due deſert. Hereupon Bajazet deferred his Execution to a farther time, and cauſed him there preſently to be ſtript, and carried away to be tortured.

Achmetes his Son ſtirreth up the Janizaries to help his Father.

Amongſt other Gallants of the Court which attended the coming out of the great Baſſaes whom they followed, was one of Achmetes his Sons, a Gentleman of great hope; who miſſing his Father amongſt the reſt, began preſently to miſtruſt that all went not well; and ſpeedily running from one of the Baſſaes to another, with much ado learned the hard eſtate of his Father; whereof he was alſo at the ſame inſtant advertiſed by a ſecret Friend near about Bajazet. Hereupon this young Gentleman began forthwith piteouſly to lament his Fathers miſhap, and to exclaim againſt the cruelty of Bajazet; called on the Janizaries for aid, putting them in remembrance of his Fathers great and manifold Deſerts towards them, together with his imminent danger; and ſo running up and down the City in the dead time of the night, had in ſhort ſpace raiſed up all the Janizaries in Arms; who underſtanding of the danger of their ancient Commander, whom they generally loved and honoured as their Father, came running by heaps from all parts of the City unto the Court-Gate, there with terrible Exclamation doubling and redoubling their Bre, Bre, (which barbarous word they commonly uſe in expreſſing their greateſt diſcontentment and fury) and did indeed ſo furiouſly beat at the Court Gate, that Bajazet fearing leſt they ſhould break in by violence, cauſed the outer Gate to be ſet open, and ſhewing himſelf from above out at an Iron Window, demanded of them the cauſe of that Tumult and Uproar. To whom they inſolently anſwered, That they would by and by teach him as a Drunkard, a Beaſt, and a Raſcal, to uſe his great Place and Calling with more ſobriety and diſcretion; and among many other opprobrious words wherewith they ſhamefully loaded him, they called him oftentimes by the name of Bengi, Bengi (that is to ſay, Bachelor or Scholar) which amongſt thoſe Martial Men, Contemners of all Learning, is accounted a word of no ſmall reproach and diſgrace. And after they had in moſt deſpiteful manner thus reviled him, they proudly commanded him forthwith to deliver Achmetes unto them, or elſe to take that ſhould enſue thereof. Bajazet terrified with this Inſolency of the Janizaries, and fearing ſome ſudden violence to be offered, commanded Achmetes to be without delay delivered unto them; which was done in ſuch haſt, that he was brought forth unto them almoſt naked, bare legged, and bare headed, bearing in his body the manifeſt marks of his hard uſage. The Janizaries receiving him with great rejoycing, ſupplied his want of Apparel with ſuch habiliments, as they for that purpoſe upon the ſudden took from Bajazets Minions; and ſo taking him upon their ſhoulders, with great joy carried him out of the Court, ſtill crying unto him, How he did, and how he felt himſelf? And ſo guarded him home, ready no doubt to have ſlain Bajazet and rifled the Court, if he would have but ſaid the word. But he yet Loyal, laboured with good words to appeaſe that Tumult, and to pacifie their fury; excuſing that which Bajazet had done againſt him, to have been done only to correct him, for that happily he had forgotten ſome part of Obedience and Duty. Nevertheleſs, hereupon remained no ſmall heart-burning betwixt Bajazet and the Janizaries for a long time after; yet Bajazet for fear of them reconciled himſelf to Achmetes, and in open ſhew had him in greater Honour than before, promoting him even unto the higheſt degrees of Honour, howbeit he inwardly hated him to death. And the more by the continual inſtigation of the old Baſſa Iſaac; by whoſe perſwaſion, when it was thought that all had been forgotten, he was by Bajazets Commandment, as he ſate at Supper in the Court, thruſt through the body and ſlain. This was the miſerable end of Achmetes, the great Champion of the Turks, and one of the greateſt Enemies of Chriſtendom that ever lived in the Turkiſh Court; for by him, Mahomet ſubverted the Empire of Trapezond, took the great City of Caffa (called in ancient time Theodoſia) with all the Country of Taurica Cherſoneſus, the impregnable City of Croia, with all the Kingdom of Epirus, the ſtrong City of Scodra, and a great part of Dalmatia, and laſt of all Otranto, to the terrour of all Italy; by him alſo, Bajazet vanquiſhed and put to flight his Brother Zemes, as is before declared. In reward of which good Services, he was by the Tyrant (upon a meer ſuſpition) thus cruelly and ſhamefully murthered. About this time alſo, Caigubus (Zemes his Son, then but a Child) was by the commandment of Bajazet his Uncle, ſtrangled in the new Tower of Conſtantinople.

Achmetes ſlain.

Bajazet now grievouſly offended with the pride and late Inſolency of the Janizaries, cauſed ſecret inquiry to be made, of them which were the Authors of thoſe late Stirs; and finding them to be the Officers of their Companies, and ſpecially thoſe which had before ſlain Mahomet Baſſa the great Politician, immediately after the death of Mahomet the late Emperor, at which time they had alſo raiſed great Tumults, and done much harm in the City; he under colour of Preferment, ſent away thoſe Authors of Sedition into divers parts of his Empire, appointing unto them (as unto old Souldiers and Men of good deſert) certain Lands and Revenues for their Maintenance and Preferment. But as ſoon as they were departed, he by ſecret Letters commanded the Governors and Magiſtrates of thoſe places whereunto they were ſent, ſuddenly to apprehend them, and as Traytors to put them to death; which was accordingly done. The Janizaries of the Court and about Conſtantinople, hearing what had hapned unto their Fellows, became wonderful diſcontented, and began to mutine in divers places of the City, uttering Speeches againſt the Emperor full of Deſpight and Revenge. Which thing when Bajazet underſtood, and had well conſidered the late danger he was in, together with the intollerable Pride and Inſolency of thoſe his maſterful Slaves; he ſecretly purpoſed in himſelf for the curing of ſo dangerous a Diſeaſe, to uſe a moſt deſperate remedy; which was, ſuddenly to kill and deſtroy all the Janizaries, eſpecially thoſe which were belonging to the Court, or about Conſtantinople. This his purpoſe he imparted to divers of his greateſt Baſſaes, charging them upon pain of his heavy diſpleaſure not to diſcloſe it; and for the execution thereof, had ſent for great numbers of thoſe Souldiers which are called Acanzij, who are amongſt the Turks reputed for the beſt ſort of Common Souldiers. Moſt of all the Baſſaes to whom he had imparted this his cruel device, much diſliked thereof, as too full of peril and danger; yet ſeeing him fully reſolved for the performance thereof, would not, or durſt not ſay any thing to the contrary. Only Alis and Iſhender Baſſa (both deſcended of the 1487. Bajazet purpoſeth to deſtroy the Janizaries.

Honourable Family of Michael Ogli) diſſwaded him from attempting any ſuch thing; alledging firſt, That the Janizaries were in number many, Souldiers of great courage and experience, reſolute men, and ſuch as would ſell their lives dear: Then, admitting that he ſhould kill all them about the Court and in Conſtantinople; yet for as much as all his ſtrong Towns and Caſtles, eſpecially in the Frontiers and chief places of his Dominions, were poſſeſſed and holden by ſtrong Garriſons of other Janizaries, Fellows and Friends of theſe (who would undoubtedly take up Arms in defence of themſelves, and revenge of their dead Friends) it were a thing very like to endanger himſelf, together with the whole State of his Empire, beſide the great diſhonour which would grow unto himſelf thereby for ever.

This ſo dangerous an Exploit, wherein the hands of ſo many were to be uſed, was not kept ſo ſecret, but that the vigilant and wily Janizaries had got an inkling thereof; and thereupon began daily more and more to ſuſpect the matter, both by the often and ſecret repair of the great Men to the Court, more than they had before ſeen, and alſo by the unwonted multitude of thoſe Acanzij, which were daily brought unto the Imperial City by great Troops. Wherefore fearing to be ſuddenly ſurprized, they banded themſelves together, and openly ſtood upon their Guard; and by chance lighting upon Alis Beg as he came from the Court, (who was indeed their beſt friend) after their barbarous manner, with many opprobrious and contumelious words, demanded of him, if he were not one of them who had conſpired their deſtruction; and without more ado had preſently ſlain him, had he not (as a well ſpoken man) with great Proteſtations and Oaths perſwaded them, that he never conſented to any ſuch thing, or that they needed to fear any ſuch thing from him; and ſo with much ado rid himſelf out of their hands.

Bajazet ſeeing his purpoſe diſcovered, and that he could not without great bloodſhed, and danger both to his Eſtate and Perſon, work his will upon the Janizaries; by the counſel and advice of them that ſaw further into the matter, to colour his former intention, commanded by open Proclamation, That the Janizaries and other his Men of War (of whom he had a great Power now aſſembled at Conſtantinople) to be in readineſs againſt a certain prefixed day, to go with him into Moldavia; as if he had raiſed that Power for that purpoſe only. But when the time was come that he ſhould ſet forward, the Janizaries put themſelves in order of battel by themſelves, and would in no wiſe joyn themſelves with the reſt of the Army, or receive the Emperor into the midſt of their ranks, as they had always before accuſtomed; but furiouſly ſhaking their Weapons at him, told him plainly, that he had ſought their deſtruction; and bid him therefore if he thought it ſo good, to ſet his Executioners to work upon them, whom he ſhould find both ready and able to defend themſelves. To pacifie their fury, Bajazet was glad to give them good words, and to uſe all the means he could (by his great Baſſaes and other Captains which were able to do any thing with them) to perſwade them to be quiet; ſwearing unto them by the holy Soul of his Father (a ſolemn Oath amongſt the Turks) that he would not harm or wrong the meaneſt of them. So with much ado they were at length appeaſed, and received Bajazet into the midſt of them, as their wonted manner was.

This dangerous Tumult ſo quieted, Bajazet ſet forward, and paſſing over Danubius, entred into Moldavia, where he firſt laid ſiege to a ſtrong Town ſtanding upon the Euxine Sea, called of the Turks Kele, but in ancient time Achilleia, which was at length delivered unto him by compoſition. From thence he went to Ac-girmen, otherwiſe called Aſprocaſtron, which after a months ſiege was alſo delivered up by Compoſition; which two ſtrong places ſo won, he returned again to Conſtantinople.

Bajazet invadeth Moldavia.

Many great Princes deſirous of Zemes, laboured by their Embaſſadors to have obtained him of the Great Maſter of the Rhodes; firſt Bajazet his Brother, fearing leſt he ſhould at one time or other again break forth upon him, or elſe ſet up by the Chriſtian Princes, trouble his Eſtate, offered great Sums of Money to have had him delivered into his hands; and Charles the French King purpoſing the Conqueſt of Naples, (which he in few years after performed) and after that to have invaded Græcia, thought Zemes a moſt fit Inſtrument for the furtherance of thoſe his high Deſigns, and was therefore wonderful deſirous to have had him. Matthias alſo King of Hungary (a Fortunate Warrior againſt the Turk) perſwaded that the having of him might be unto him a great furtherance in the courſe of his Victories, ſought by all the means he could to have obtained him. At which time alſo Innocentius the eighth of that name, Biſhop of Rome, no leſs deſirous than the reſt, to have in his keeping ſo great a pledge of Peace and War (the bridle of the Turks fury, together with the large Penſion he was ſure to receive yearly from Bajazet for the ſafe cuſtody of him) ſo wrought the matter by Lyonel Biſhop of Concordia, his cunning Legate, that the Great Maſter, fearing on the one ſide to be conſtrained by the great Power of Bajazet, to grant that he had ſo often refuſed, and now ſo earneſtly ſolicited on the other ſide by the Biſhop, cauſed Zemes to be delivered to him at Rome, in the year 1488. for which doing he was by the Biſhop honoured with the honour and title of a Cardinal. So Zemes to the great profit of the Biſhop (who received from Bajazet a yearly Penſion of forty thouſand Ducats) remained in ſafe cuſtody at Rome all the time of Innocentius, and alſo of Alexander the Sixth his Succeſſor; until that the French King Charles the Eighth, paſſing through the heart of Italy with a ſtrong Army againſt Alphonſus King of Naples, in the year 1495. and making his way through the City of Rome, ſo terrified the great Biſhop (who altogether favoured and furthered the Title of Alphonſus) that he was glad to yield to ſuch Articles and Conditions as pleaſed the King; and amongſt the reſt, to give in Hoſtage unto the King his graceleſs Son Cæſar Borgia Valentinus, and alſo to deliver unto him Zemes his honourable Priſoner, as ſhall be afterwards in place convenient at large declared.

Many great Princes ſue to the Maſter of the Rhodes for Zemes

In the beginning of Bajazet his Reign, whilſt he was buſied againſt his Brother Zemes in Aſia, John Caſtriot the Son of Scanderbeg, aided by the Venetians, after he had fortunately overthrown the Turk in battel near unto Croia, recovered a great part of Epirus out of their poſſeſſion. At which time alſo John Chernovich, a Chriſtian Prince of Albania, caſting off the Turkiſh yoke impoſed upon him by the late Emperor Mahomet, ſuddenly took up Arms, and by the help of the Venetians valiantly repulſed the Enemies out of that part of Albania; and ſo troubled Bajazet, that he was glad to ſuffer him peaceably to enjoy all that he had by force recovered, and further to content himſelf with a ſmall Tribute for the reſt.

1486. Bajazet invadeth Caramania.

Bajazet highly offended with Abraham (whom ſome call Pyramet) the King of Caramania, for aiding his Brother Zemes againſt him; in revenge thereof raiſed a great Army both in Europe and Aſia, and marching alongſt Aſia the leſs, through the Countries of Phrygia, Myſia, Caria, Lydia, and Pamphilia, entred at length into Caramania. But the King of Caramania hearing before of his coming, and knowing himſelf too weak to meet him in the Field, fortified the ſtrong Cities and Places of his Kingdom, and retired with his Army into the Straits of the Mountain Taurus, where it parteth Cilicia from Syria; wherein he was in more ſafety than in any of his ſtrongeſt Holds. Bajazet finding no way to come to him, ſpent moſt part of the Summer in ſpoiling of the open Country; but perceiving his Enemies could not ſo be drawn into the Field, he laid Siege unto the famous City of Tarſus, being the chief City of the Champain part of Cilicia (the native place of Saint Paul the Apoſtle) and in ſhort time ſo battered the Walls of his City with his great Ordnance,that he had made them aſſaultable.The Citizens conſidering the danger they were in, offered to deliver up their City, their Liberty, Lives, and Goods reſerved. Of which their Offer Bajazet accepted, and moſt honourably performed his promiſe for their ſafety; not permitting any of his Souldiers to enter the City, more than ſuch as muſt needs for the guard of his Perſon, and ſafe keeping of the City. And for as much as Winter began now to grow faſt on, he diſperſed his Souldiers into the Country Villages round about, not ſuffering the Country people to till or ſow their Land, or to do any thing elſe which might turn to their profit or good; whereby they were inforced to yield themſelves wholly to his devotion. The Caramanian King ſeeing his people daily fall from him, and fearing to be at length forſaken of his Souldiers alſo; in this his diſtreſs obtain'd Aid both of men and money from Caytbeius the great Sultan of Egypt, and ſo with all the Power he could make, took the field with the firſt of the next Spring, fully reſolved to try the fortune of a battel, although in ſtrength and power he knew himſelf much inferior to his puiſſant Enemy.

Tarſus in Cilicia yieldeth to Bajazet.

A long and terrible battel betwixt Bajazet and the King of Caramania.

Bajazet glad to ſee his Enemy ſo forward, ſpeedily aſſembled his Army, and without delay offered him battel; which the Caramanian King refuſed not. So betwixt them was begun a fierce and terrible fight; which by the ſkilful Conduct of the Leaders, and exceeding Courage of the Souldiers, was maintained the whole day with doubtful Victory and great Slaughter on both ſides, new Supplies ſtill coming on in ſtead of them which were ſlain. The day declining, the Caramanian King (whoſe fatal deſtiny had now appointed him unto his laſt work) ſeeing his wearied Souldiers rather overlaid with multitude, than vanquiſhed by force, to begin to give ground unto their Enemies; couragiouſly thruſt forward with his Guard and other valiant Souldiers about him, with ſuch fury, that he brake into the midſt of his Enemies battail; where being known, he was forthwith environed by the Turks, and ſo hardly charged on every ſide, that having his Horſe ſlain under him, he was enforced to fight on foot; where after he had with his own hand ſlain divers of his Enemies, he fell down dead in the midſt of them. His Souldiers diſcouraged with his death, turned their backs and fled, and in flying were for the moſt part either ſlain or taken Priſoners. After this Victory, Bajazet ſpeedily overran all that large Country, and without reſiſtance in ſhort time brought under his Obeyſance all the Country of Cilicia.

There was at that time in that part Cilicia which is called Trachea, and lieth toward the Sea ſide; an ancient Mahometan Prince, who had under his Command moſt part of that Country, with the famous and populous City of Scandeloro, the chief place of his Reſiance. This Prince had of long time lived betwixt the Chriſtian Kings and the Kings of Caramania, as neuter, ſtill fearing the greater, but indeed loving neither; and had until then chiefly maintained his ſtate by the Alliance he and his Anceſtors continually held with the Kings of Cyprus and the grand Maſters of the Rhodes. Againſt this poor Prince, the only one now left in Aſia the leſs, not ſubject unto the Turkiſh Kings, began Bajazet now to turn his Forces; purpoſing before he proceeded any further, to make a full Conqueſt of the leſſer Aſia, and ſo to make all ſure behind him. Of which his purpoſe the Prince having knowledge, and wiſely weighing his own ſmall Power to withſtand ſo puiſſant an Enemy; offered by his Embaſſadors to deliver unto Bajazet his chief City of Scandeloro, with all the reſt of his Territory in Cilicia, upon condition, that Bajazet ſhould give unto him other Poſſeſſions for it, in ſome other part of Aſia the leſſer, to the like value. Which his Offer Bajazet accepted, and ſo became Lord of all the Sea coaſt, from the Straits of Boſphorus, unto the Confines of Syria.

After he had thus conquered Cilicia, with a great part of the Mountain Taurus, he deſcended into Armenia the leſs, and in ſhort time brought under his Subjection ſo much of that Country, as alſo of Cappadocia, as was ſometime belonging to the Caramanian Kings. When Bajazet had thus ſlain the Caramanian King, and ſubdued that moſt ancient Kingdom of the Turks, which had long and many times mightily contended with the Glory and Power of the Othoman Kings, he left Muſtapha, one of his great Baſſaes, at Iconium, with his Aſian Army, to keep in Obedience thoſe new won Countries; and as a Triumphant Conqueror returned himſelf to Conſtantinople, where he was of his Subjects joyfully received.

1487. After that Bajazet had thus inlarged his Empire with the Kingdom of Caramania, and was now become an unwelcome Neighbour unto the great Sultan of Egypt and Syria, he began to ſwell in diſdain againſt that mighty Prince, for that he had given Aid againſt him, firſt unto his Brother Zemes, and after that to the Caramanian King in theſe late Wars; of which wrong purpoſing to be revenged, he ſhortly after appointed one Caragoſa Baſſa his Lieutenant in Aſia, with Iſhender another of his great Captains, with a ſtrong Army to invade Syria, then part of the great Sultans Kingdom. Theſe two great Commanders well appointed for the purpoſe, when they were come to the uttermoſt parts of Cilicia, the new bounds of Bajazets Empire, were then to paſs by the Confines of Aladeules his Kingdom,before they could paſs the great Mountain Taurus to come into Syria. This Aladeules commanded as King over the rude and fierce people which dwelt alongſt that great and rough Mountain, and was then in League with the Sultan. He hearing of the approach of the Turks Army, with a great number of his Mountain-people, lay in Ambuſh in the Straits whereby the Turks muſt needs paſs, of purpoſe to intercept them. Iſhender marching in the Vantguard with a great number of the voluntary Souldiers called Acanzij, as the manner of the Turks is, and fearing nothing leſs, than to be ſet upon by the Mountain King, before he was aware was come into the midſt of his Enemies, and was by them ſo fiercely charged on every ſide for their places of advantage, that he there loſt moſt part of his men, and forſaken of the reſt, which ſought by flight to ſave themſelves, he with his two Sons and others were taken Priſoners; Michael-Beg the eldeſt of the two being faſt bound, was ſlain by one of Aladeules his Followers, whoſe Brother he had ſlain in that skirmiſh his Head being cut off, was by the commandment of Aladeules carried to his Father Iſhender, the more to grieve him; who diſdainfully willed the Meſſenger not to ſhew it unto him, but to bid his Maſter eat it if he would. With which anſwer Aladeules was exceedingly moved; nevertheleſs pitying the old mans miſery, he ſhortly after ſet Jaxis-Beg the younger Brother at liberty; but Iſhender himſelf he ſent Priſoner unto Caitbeius the great Sultan at Caire, where he remained in priſon five years after. Caragoſes the Baſſa diſcouraged with the loſs of ſo great a man, retired with his Army back again into Cilicia, and from thence advertiſed Bajazet what had happened, by whom he was commanded to return to Conſtantinople, as a man unfit for ſo great an enterpriſe.

1488. Achmetes being diſcomfited, is taken Priſoner and ſent to Caire.

The next Spring following, Bajazet conſtant in his former reſolution for the invaſion of Siria, ſent Achmetes another of his Baſſaes, with a far greater Army than had Caragoſes, againſt the Sultan; who was no ſooner come to the further part of Cilicia, but he was there at a place called of the Turks, Tzucur Ova, encountred by the Egyptians and Arabians, and there in a great Battel overthrown; wherein he himſelf fighting moſt valiantly, loſt two of his Fingers, and being taken Priſoner was ſent to Caire.

1489. Bajazet with this overthrow rather incenſed than diſcouraged, made great preparation the next year againſt the Sultan both by Sea and Land, ſuch as he had not before at any time made. And when all things were now in readineſs, ſent Alis-Baſſa (of ſome called Calibeus) and Cherſeogles his Son in Law, two notable Captains, with a great and puiſſant Army by Land, againſt the Egyptian Sultan; at which time he requeſted of the Venetians, with whom he was then in league, That he might by their good leave, as occaſion required, refreſh his Fleet (then ready to put to Sea for the invaſion of Syria, as he ſaid) in their Iſland of Cyprus. Which his requeſt was by the general conſent of the Senate denied, as a thing tending to the great danger of their State; yet wiſely doubting leſt Bajazet taking that denial in evil part, ſhould ſeek to have that by force, which he could not obtain by requeſt, they preſently ſent Franciſco Privolo their Admiral, to Sea with thirty Gallies for the defence of that Iſland. He hearing that one Fleet of the Turks Gallies, lately come out of Helleſpontus, lay hovering at the Iſland of Sciros, expecting a far greater from the Coaſt of Ionia; and carefully conſidering how ſecret and ſuddain the Turkiſh deſignments were, although it was given out, that all this great preparation was made againſt the Sultan; yet to provide that they ſhould not ſuddainly ſurpriſe the Iſle, he ſpeedily ſent ſundry Companies of Souldiers, eſpecially Archers, out of Crete into Cyprus, for the better defence thereof; but ſtaid himſelf with his Fleet at the Iſland of Naxos, that ſo at hand he might be the readier to withſtand whatſoever the Turks intended. But when he underſtood that all their Fleet was met, and now ſet forward, he hoiſed ſail, and held his courſe directly for Cyprus. In the mean time the Turkiſh Fleet ſailing alongſt the Coaſt of Lycia, Pamphilia, and Cilicia, kept on their courſe until they came upon the Coaſt of Syria, by which time Calibeus and Cherſeogles were come with a mighty Army into Cilicia, near unto the Mountain Taurus.

Caitbeius the Egyptian Sultan having before had certain intelligence of the great preparation that Bajazet had made againſt him, had before ſent Usbeg a moſt valiant and politique Captain, with a ſtrong Army of his Mamalukes and other his moſt expert Souldiers into Syria, to be ready at all times to withſtand the Turks. This worthy Chieftain underſtanding of the coming of the Turks Army, thought it greater policy, to carry the calamities which always wait upon great Armies, into the Enemies Country, than to receive it into his own Boſom. And therefore although he knew himſelf to be for number far inferior unto his Enemies, yet ſupplying that want with the Valour, Courage, and aſſured confidence he had repoſed in the approved and invincible force of his Mamalukes, he expected not the coming of the Enemy into Syria, but paſſing over the Mountain Amanus, and ſo deſcending into Cilicia, met him not far from Tarſus, in the ſame place (as it was thought) where Alexander the Great had long before in a great Battel vanquiſhed Darius.

A long and terrible Battel betwixt the Turks and the Mamalukes.

Theſe two puiſſant Armies come from far out of divers parts of the World, the one to find the other, were no ſooner come together, but that with like chearfulneſs they joyned Battel; and that with ſuch violence and fury, that the Earth ſeemed to tremble under their Feet, and a moſt preſent deſtruction threatned unto them all; which terrible and cruel Fight was maintained all that day with doubtful Victory, and exceeding Slaughter on both ſides, the politique Generals with new ſupplies of freſh Souldiers continually relieving the moſt diſtreſſed parts of their Battels; and they likewiſe as men prodigal of their lives, reſolutely offering themſelves to all dangers. When this moſt dreadful Fight had in this ſort endured the whole day, and many thouſands of valiant men of late alive, lay now dead upon the ground, the approaching night brake off the Battel, and both the Armies ſore wearied and weakned (but eſpecially the Turks) retired to their Camps, where they reſted that night.

But the Egyptians coming to their Camp, found all their Carriages with their proviſion of Victuals and other neceſſaries quite taken away and gone. Which thing (as ſome write) the bordering People of that Country (for moſt part living upon robbery) had done in time of the Battle, to pleaſe the Turks; or as ſome others report, they which had the charge thereof, terrified with the greatneſs of the Turks Army, and doubtleſs of the Battel, fled away; and taking their way along the Sea ſide, fell into the hands of the Turks which were put on ſhore out of the Gallies, and ſo were of them ſpoiled. Howſoever it was, (for in ſo great uncertainty I dare not affirm) certain it is, that the Egyptians were ſore troubled with the loſs of their proviſion, fearing that if they ſhould now ſtay longer in the Country, they ſhould forthwith be driven to great extremities for want of neceſſaries. Wherefore when they had evilly reſted that night, the next day early in the morning they preſented themſelves in order of battel before their Enemies, braving them into the Field, and daring them to Battel. The Turks diſdaining to ſee any prouder in field than themſelves, after they had in goodly order ranged their Battels, ſet forward with Enſigns diſplayed againſt their proud Enemies. There began a moſt terrible and bloody Battel, fought with ſuch deſperate reſolution, as if they had ſolemnly vowed, either to overcome or die in the place where they ſtood. A man would have ſaid, that the former days fury had been but a play in compariſon of this; many valiant Souldiers covered with their dead bodies the ſame ground whereon they living ſtood, when they received the firſt encounter of their Enemies. Of both thoſe great Armies none was ſeen to give ground, or once look back; the Turks Janizaries, and the Egyptians Mamalukes (the undoubted ſtrength of the greateſt Mahometan Monarchs, Souldiers for their Valour much feared, and through the World renowned) there buckled together, and ſtanding foot to foot ſpent the uttermoſt of their Forces one upon another; as if they would in that battel have made it known unto the World, which of them were to be accounted the better Souldiers. Whilſt Victory ſtood thus doubtful, and the day was now far ſpent, Usbeg the Egyptian General, with fifteen thouſand valiant Horſemen (whom he had received for that purpoſe) gave a freſh Aſſault upon the Turks Squadrons, with ſuch force that they had much ado to keep their order, and began now to give ground; which was by and by made good again by other freſh men ſpeedily brought on by the Baſſaes. Then became the Battel more fierce than before, every man ſtriving to the uttermoſt of his power, to ſell his life unto his Enemies as dear as he could. In which manner of Fight all the reſt of the day was ſpent, until that after the going down of the Sun, the darkneſs of the night coming faſt on, they were glad for lack of light to break off the Battel, and to retire themſelves into their Camps, not knowing as yet who had got the better.

The Turks Baſſaes taking view of the Army, and finding that of an hundred thouſand fighting men which they brought into the Field, there was ſcarce a third part left, and moſt of them alſo maimed or hurt; and doubting to be ſet upon again the next morning by their reſolute Enemies, fled away ſecretly the ſame night, leaving behind them for haſte their Tents well ſtored with Victuals and all other things needful. The Egyptians alſo having loſt one half of their Army (which was at the firſt ſeventy thouſand) and wanting their neceſſary proviſion, were reretired alſo the ſame night into the Mountain Taurus, not knowing any thing of the Flight of the Turks. And ſome of the Souldiers paſſing quite over the Mountain without ſtay, into Syria, raiſed a report all over the Country as they went, That the Sultans Army was overthrown, and that the Turks had got the Victory; ſo uncertain was the true knowledge of the event of that Battel, even unto them that were preſent therein. The Egyptian lying that night upon the ſide of the Mountain, had ſpeedy intelligence from Aladeules, of the flight of the Turks; which being alſo confirmed by his Eſpials to be true, he preſently came down from the Mountain, and entred into the Turks Camp, where he found plenty of Victuals and of all other things needful for the refreſhing of his Army.

The Turks flie away by night.

Aladeules the Mountain King, with the People called Varſacide, by whoſe confines the Turks muſt needs in their return paſs, robbed and ſlew many of them in their diſordered Flight; and had ſo ſtopped the paſſages, that they were in flying overtaken by the Mamalukes, and ſlain with ſo great a ſlaughter, that of all that great Army of the Turks few remained alive to carry news home. Calibeius and Cherſeogles the Baſſaes, were in that flight both taken Priſoners, and afterwards preſented to Caytbeius the Sultan, at Caire, with eighteen Enſigns of the Turks Sanzachs, which are great men amongſt them, having every one of them the regiment and command of ſome one Province or other, and are in degree next unto the Baſſaes.

Neither was the fortune of Bajazet his Navy at Sea, better than that of his Army at Land; for as it lay at rode upon the Coaſt of Syria at the mouth of the River Orontes, which runneth by the famous City of Antioch, his Gallies were by tempeſt and rage of the Sea put from their Anchors, and in the ſight of their Enemies ſwallowed up of the Sea, or elſe driven upon the Main, and there with the Surges of the Sea beaten in pieces. Bajazet not a little troubled with theſe loſſes both by Sea and Land, at length with much ado, by his Embaſſadors concluded a Peace with the Sultan, unto whom he reſtored all ſuch places as he had before taken from him; for which the Sultan delivered unto him Calibeius, Cherſeogles, Achmetes, and Iſhender, with all the reſt of the Turks Priſoners, which he had in great number in his keeping.

A Peace concluded betwixt Bajazet and Caytbeius.

Shortly after this Peace was concluded betwixt theſe two great and mighty Princes, Caytbeius the Sultan died; who of a Circaſſian Slave, by many degrees of Honour, and by the favour of the Mamalukes his Fellows, obtained the rich Kingdom of Egypt, which he right worthily governed to his immortal praiſe by the ſpace of two and twenty years; commanding at one time the great and rich Country of Egypt, with all Africk as far as Cyrene, Weſtward; and Judea with a great part of Arabia, and all Syria, unto the great and famous River Euphrates, Eaſtward. In the later end of his Reign he (overcome with the importunity of his Wife Dultibe, an Arabian born, a Woman of an haughty Spirit) joyned his Son Mahomethes, a young man of about four and twenty years old, with him in the Fellowſhip of his Kingdom; that ſo poſſeſſed of it his Father yet living, he might the better enjoy it after his death. Contrary to the cuſtom of the Mamalukes, who of long time had not uſed to have their King by ſucceſſion, but by their free election. Who grudging to be thus defrauded of their wonted choiſe, immediately after the death of Caytbeius ſlew Mahomethes his Son; and in few months after, four more, who one after another without their good liking had aſpired unto the Kingdom; neither could they be contented, until ſuch time as that they had according to their wonted cuſtom ſet up a Sultan of their own choice.

About the ſame time that the aforeſaid Peace was concluded betwixt the two great Mahometan Princes Bajazet and Caytbeius, Charles the French King was making great preparation againſt Alphonſus King of Naples; giving it out, That after he had recovered that Kingdom, he would forthwith from thence invade the Turks Dominions in Grecia. Which great attempt the haughty King was enduced to take in hand, by the perſwaſion of divers of his Nobility, but eſpecially the ſolicitation of Lodovicus Sfortia Duke of Millan; whereby the whole ſtate of Italy was in ſhort time after ſore ſhaken, and Sfortia himſelf, Author of thoſe troubles, at laſt carried away by the French, miſerably ended his days as a Priſoner in France. Alphonſus the Neapolitan King doubting the greatneſs of the French King his Enemy, entred into a confederation with certain of the States of Italy, againſt the French, but eſpecially with Alexander the Sixth then Biſhop of Rome; for the better aſſurance whereof, he gave his baſe Daughter in Marriage to Godfrey Borgia, the Biſhops Son, and made him Prince of Carinula; his other Son Francis he entertained alſo in great pay to ſerve him in his Wars. And by his Embaſſador Pandonius Camillus, lately returned out of France, gave Bajazet to underſtand, what the French King had purpoſed againſt them both, requeſting him to aid him with ſix thouſand Horſemen and as many Foot againſt their common Enemy, promiſing to give them honourable entertainment during thoſe Wars. And to futher the matter, Alexander the great Biſhop ſent George Bucciard, a Ligurian, ſkilful in the Turkiſh Language, Embaſſador to Bajazet, to declare unto him with what great preparation, both by Sea and Land, the young French King (deſirous of honour and the enlargement of his Kingdom) was about to invade Naples; and then, with what great power (after he had diſpatched his Wars in Italy) he purpoſed to paſs over into Grecia; and that he had to that end earneſtly travelled with him to have Zemes his Brother delivered into his hands, whom he deſired to uſe as a moſt fit inſtrument for the troubling of his State and Empire, by reaſon of his many Friends; yet that his Holineſs (having the French in diſtruſt as a proud and ambitious People, as alſo careful for the danger of the City of Rome, and of the State of Italy in general) had entred into a confederation with Alphonſus King of Naples, with their united Forces to withſtand that proud Nation, both by Sea and Land; wanting nothing more for the accompliſhment thereof, than Mony; by which means only, Bajazet might (as he ſaid) provide for the ſafety of his Kingdom in Grecia, if he would put to his helping hand, to furniſh them with Mony for the entertainment of Souldiers; foraſmuch as the City of Rome, and the Kingdom of Naples, were the ſureſt Walls of that ſide of the Othoman Empire; if he not altogether refuſing the charge, would not ſpare for a little coſt to maintain the War rather in that forreign Country, than to receive it, brought home to his own door, concluding, That it were much more commodious and eaſie with his Treaſures to repreſs his Enemies in a ſtrange Country afar off, than by dint of ſword and plain battel in his own. A thing by experience well known, That they which have neglected and ſet at nought remote dangers, for ſparing of charge, have afterwards been inforced with greater danger to receive the ſame into their own boſoms, when as they were become deſperate and paſt remedy. Bajazet, who both by his Eſpials and often Letters and Embaſſadors from Alphonſus, knew all this to be true, gave great thanks to the Biſhop by his Embaſſador, for that he ſitting in ſo high place, did ſo friendly and in ſo good time admoniſh him, both a Stanger and of a contrary Religion, of things of ſo great conſequence; yet for anſwer, he willed him to return again unto his Maſter with one Dautius his Embaſſador, who ſhould carry with him both Mony and other his ſecret reſolutions concerning thoſe matters. Among other things given him in charge, was an Epiſtle written in Greek, wherein the barbarous King with great cunning perſwaded the Biſhop to poiſon Zemes his Brother, as a man of a Religion altogether contrary to his; for indeed of him alone for his great Vertues Bajazet ſtood in fear and doubt, leſt he ſhould by ſome chance eſcape out of Priſon to the troubling of his State. For the performance of this his requeſt, he promiſed faithfully to pay unto the Biſhop, two hundred thouſand Ducats, and never after ſo long as he lived, to take up Arms againſt the Chriſtians. Otherwiſe than had his Father Mahomet, and his Grandfather Amurath done, who both as deadly Enemies unto the name of Chriſtians never ceaſed by continual Wars to work their woe.

But George the Biſhops Embaſſador, and Dautius, travelling towards Italy, and having now happily paſſed the Adriatick, as they were about to have landed at Ancona, were boarded by Jo. Rovereus, Brother to Julianus the Cardinal (a man of great account in thoſe quarters) and clean quit of their Treaſure and whatſoever elſe they had aboard. Rovereus pretending for the defence of the Fact, That the Biſhop did owe him a great ſum of Mony, due unto him for his good ſervice done in the time of Innocentius his Predeceſſor, for which he now paid himſelf. Neither could the Biſhop, much troubled with that injury, ever after recover one part thereof, although he threatned vengeance with Fire and Sword, and alſo ſought for recompence of the Venetians, whom it concerned to ſave the Turks harmleſs in thoſe Seas; for why, Rovereus bearing himſelf upon the French, which were now upon coming, whoſe faction he followed, kept the Mony, and ſet at nougt the Biſhops thundering Curſes and vain Threats. Dautius himſelf Bajazets Embaſſador being ſet on ſhore, was glad to go on foot to Ancona; and ſo from thence paſſing up the River Padus, came to Franciſcus Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, of whom for (the ancient Friendſhip betwixt him and Bajazet) he was courteouſly entertained and furniſhed both with Mony and Apparel, and ſo ſpoiled returned into Grecia, to carry news unto his Maſter how he had ſped.

When Bajazet underſtood by Dautius, the evil ſucceſs he had in his late journey, he forthwith ſent Muſtapha one of the Baſſaes of the Court, unto the great Biſhop Alexander, with like inſtructions as he had before given to Dautius; who with better hap arrived in Italy, and came to Rome in ſafety; where he forgot no part of that was given him in charge by his great Maſter. But amongſt many other things, the life of Zemes was that he moſt ſought for at the Biſhops hands.

At the ſame time, which was in the year 1495, the French King Charles the Eighth of that name, paſſing through the heart of Italy with a ſtrong Army againſt Alphonſus King of Naples; and taking his way without leave through the City of Rome, ſo terrified Alexander the Biſhop, who (as we have before ſaid) altogether favoured, and as much as in him lay, furthered the cauſe of Alphonſus; that he was glad to yield to all ſuch Articles and Conditions as it pleaſed him then to demand; not purpoſing in himſelf at all the performance of any of thoſe things, which for fear he had with great ſolemnity promiſed, as the ſequel of the matter afterwards declared. Amongſt other things, he was inforced to give unto the King his graceleſs Son Cæſar Borgia Valentinus (then one of the Cardinals) in hoſtage, for the performance of the other of his promiſes; Which diſgrace the crafty old Biſhop ſought to cover, by gracing his Son with the title of his Legate; and with him he was alſo enforced to deliver Zemes the Turk, Bajazets Brother, his honourable Priſoner; who to the great profit of the Biſhop and his Predeceſſor, had remained in ſafe cuſtody at Rome about the ſpace of ſeven years. But Zemes within three days after he was delivered to the French, died at Cajeta, being before his deliverance poiſoned (as it was thought) with a powder of wonderful whiteneſs and pleaſant taſte; whoſe power was not preſently to kill, but by little and little diſperſing the force thereof, did in ſhort time bring moſt aſſured death; which pleaſant poyſon, Alexander the Biſhop, ſkilful in that practice (corrupted by Bajazets Gold, and envying ſo great a good unto the French) had cauſed to be cunningly mingled with the Sugar wherewith Zemes uſed to temper the Water which he commonly drank. His dead Body was not long after ſent to Bajazet, by Muſtapha his Embaſſador, who to the great contentment of his Maſter, had thus contrived his death with the Biſhop. Not long after, this dead Body ſo far brought, was by the appointment of Bajazet, honourably interred among his Anceſtors at Pruſa. Cæſar Borgia alſo the Biſhops Son, a little before given in hoſtage unto the French King, deceiving his Keepers at Velitras, returned again to Rome before the French King was come to Naples. This wicked Imp come of an evil ſtrain, not worth the remembrance but by way of deteſtation (the very monſter of Nature, if a man ſhould well conſider the courſe of his whole life) ſhortly after his eſcape, envying at the honour of Candianus his Brother, who then was General over the Biſhop his Fathers Forces, which were at that time great; when he had one time merrily ſupped with his ſaid Brother, with their Mother Vannotia, traiterouſly cauſed him to be unawars murdred in the Streets as he was going home, and his dead Body to be caſt into the River of Tiber. Then caſting off his Prieſtly Habit with his Cardinals Robes, he took upon him the leading of his Fathers Army in his Brothers ſtead, and gave himſelf wholly to Martial Affairs; a vocation beſt fitting his fierce and bloody diſpoſition; and with exceeding Prodigality, wherewith he exhauſted his Fathers Coffers and the Treaſures of the Church, bound faſt unto him deſperate Ruffians and Souldiers (eſpecially Spaniards, his Fathers Country men) ſuch as he knew fitteſt to ſerve for the execution of his moſt horrible devices. Which manner of his proceedings, although they were ſuch as all good men deteſted, yet the old Hypocrite his Father winked thereat, fearing (as it was thought) to be murdred of the Viper, himſelf, when it ſhould ſerve for his purpoſe. Now when he had thus ſtrengthned himſelf, and that he was become a terror to all the Nobility of Rome and the Seigniories thereabout, he by the advice and help of his Father (who deſired nothing more than to make him great) firſt drave the moſt honourable Family of the Columnij out of the City, and afterwards out of Latium; and by moſt execrable Treachery, poiſoned or killed the honourable Perſonages of the great Houſes of the Urſini and Caetani, taking to himſelf their Lands and Poſſeſſions. With like cruelty he ſtrangled at one time four Noblemen of the Camertes; and drave Guido Feltrius out of Urbin. He took the City of Piſarum from Jo. Sfortia, who with much difficulty eſcaped his bloody hands; and drave the Malateſtaes out of Ariminum. The great Lady Katharine Sfortia he thruſt out of Forum Livij and Forum Corvelij, and ſhamefully led her in triumph through Rome. And never ſatisfied with blood, which he without meaſure ſhed, he took the City of Faventia from Aſtor Manfredus, a young Gentleman of rare perfection; whom after the beaſtly Tyrant had moſt horribly abuſed againſt Nature, he cauſed to be cruelly ſtrangled, and his dead body to be caſt into Tiber. Having thus filled the meaſure of his iniquity, and as a fretting Canker, having either devoured or driven into exile moſt part of the Roman Nobility, and purpoſing by the ſupportation of his Father, to make himſelf Lord and Soveraign both of the City, and of all Latium, in the pride of his thoughts he was by the hand of the moſt High attached and caſt down, and that by ſuch means as he leaſt feared; for being with his Father at a ſolemn Supper in the Vatican, of purpoſe prepared for the deſtruction of certain rich Cardinals and ſome other honourable Citizens, they were both poyſoned by the fatal error of one of the Waiters, who miſtaking of a Flaggon, gave the poiſoned Wine to the accurſed Biſhop and his Son, which was prepared for the Gueſts; whereof the old Biſhop in few days after died. But his Son who had drunk the ſame with Water, although he died not of long time after, yet preſently fell into ſuch an extream ſickneſs, that he was not able to help himſelf, or to command his deſperate Followers, whereof he had great ſtore; but lying ſick, in ſhort time ſaw himſelf of them forſaken, and two of his Enemies, Pius the Third, and Julius the Second, one after another ſitting in his Fathers place. Of which two, Pius enjoyed that Pontifical Dignity but ſixteen days; and Julius ſucceeding him, cauſed this Cæſar Borgia (who of right had deſerved a thouſand deaths) to be ſhut up in the Caſtle called Moles Adriani, from whence he ſet him at liberty upon the delivery of certain ſtrong Holds which were yet holden by his Garriſons. After he had thus rid himſelf out of Julius the Biſhops hands, he fled to Oſtia, and ſo by Sea to Naples; where he was by the commandment of Ferdinand King of Spain, apprehended by Gonſalvus the Great, and tranſported into Spain, for fear leſt he, being of a moſt troubleſome Nature, and much reſorted unto by his old Favourites, ſhould raiſe ſome new ſtirs in Italy. He was no ſooner arrived in Spain, but he was caſt into Priſon in the Caſtle of Medina, where after he had lien three years he deceived his Keepers, and with a Rope which he had gotten, let himſelf down from an high Tower of the Caſtle; and ſo eſcaping, fled to the King of Navar, whom he afterwards ſerved in his Wars, and was in an hot skirmiſh againſt the Kings Enemies (wherein he had obtained the Victory) ſlain with a ſmall Shot: Unworthy after ſo many horrible Villanies, to have ended his days ſo honourably. His dead Body was found ſtript, and ſo brought unto the King upon a bad Beaſt, as if it had been a dead Calf all naked; which was by his commandment honourably buried at Pamphilona.

The death of Cæſar Borgia.

The French King invadeth Naples.

But to return again from whence we have ſomething too long with this troubleſome Body gone aſtray. The French King having thus loſt both his great Hoſtages, Zemes the Turk by death, and the Cardinal Borgia by eſcape, held on his journey towards Naples; and with wonderful ſucceſs prevailed as he went, all places yielding unto him without any great reſiſtance. Alphonſus ſeeing himſelf deſtitute of ſuch aid as he had in vain requeſted both of the Turkiſh Emperor and of the Venetians, and now almoſt beſet with his mighty Enemy, to whom ſo many ſtrong places had in ſhorter time been delivered than any man had before imagined; and withal conſidering with himſelf, how that he had loſt the hearts of his Subjects (the ſtrongeſt defence of Princes) for that moſt of the Nobility, and eſpecially the Neapolitans, hated him for his too much ſeverity in puniſhing the Offenders in the late Rebellion, wherein the Princes of Sarne and Salerne were chief; and the common People were no leſs offended with the grievous and heavy exactions, required of them for the maintenance of theſe Wars, inſomuch that their murmuring Speeches came oftentimes to his own hearing; as oftentimes it falleth out, That the hatred of the Subjects againſt their Princes, which hath for fear of long time been diſſembled during their proſperity, more frankly and fiercely breaketh out in their declining eſtate; for theſe cauſes, Alphonſus fearing to be forſaken of his People, as a man in deſpair, with abundance of tears openly in the ſight of all the Neapolitans, reſigned his Kingdom of Naples to his Son Ferdinand, when as he had as yet ſcarcely reigned one whole year after the death of Ferdinand his Father; and with four Gallies paſſed over to Mazerea, a City of Cicilia. His Son Ferdinand a Prince of rare perfection and ſingularly graced with all the vertues of true Nobility, and thereto dearly beloved of all the People was to the wonderful contentment of the Neapolitans with great joy and acclamations ſaluted King; and ſo having performed all the Ceremonies belonging to his Coronation, returned preſently to his Army. By this time the French King with all his Forces was entred far into the Kingdom of Naples; and having taken by Aſſault certain Cities which truſted too much to their own ſtrength, ſtruck ſuch a general terror into the minds of the Neapolitans, that they thought no place now ſtrong enough to abide his batteries, or power ſufficient to abide his Forces. Ferdinand the young King with his Army had taken the Straits of the Forreſt of S. Germane, thereby to impeach the further paſſage of the French King. But whilſt he was there buſied, he was ſuddainly advertiſed, that Fabritius Columna with a great power of Frenchmen, had by the Appenines broken into Campania, and ſo was marching towards him; wherefore doubting to be ſhut up betwixt two ſtrong Armies of the Enemies, he retired ſpeedily to Capua, a ſtrong City ſituate upon the River Vulturnus; purpoſing there by means of that deep River, to ſtay the French from paſſing farther. But whilſt he lay there, news was brought unto him, That all the City of Naples was in an uprore, and that the Citizens were all up in Arms, as men in doubt which way to turn themſelves. Ferdinand not a little troubled with theſe bad news, commended the charge of his Army and the defence of the City of Capua to his chief Captains, and rid himſelf in poſt back again to Naples.

Ferdinand departeth from Capua to pacifie an uprore at Naples.

It is a ſtrange thing to tell, what a ſuddain alteration enſued upon his arrival there; for ſuddainly all the tumult was appeaſed, every man laid down his Arms, and welcomed him with a general gratulation; for he was a man of a great and invincible Courage, and of ſo comely a Perſonage, as might eaſily win the hearts of his Subjects; inſomuch, that when he earneſtly requeſted them, that they would not traiterouſly betray him to his barbarous and cruel Enemies, being their natural King, or rather their Brother born and brought up amongſt them; they all with one conſent anſwered, That they would ſpend their Lives and Goods in his quarrel, ſo long as he ſhould keep his Army whole, and defend the City of Capua; but if it ſhould ſo chance that the Aragonians ſhould be overthrown, or elſe for fear abandon that City, and the French King, as Victor, to approach the City of Naples, he ſhould do both againſt reaſon and equity, if by exacting Fidelity and Allegiance of his Subjects, apprehended with ſo juſt a fear, he ſhould ſo expoſe that noble City with the fruitful Country thereabout, to be ſpoiled and deſtroyed by a mercileſs and cruel Enemy. Whilſt Ferdinand was thus buſied in appeaſing and confirming his wavering Subjects at Naples, the French King had taken divers Cities, and was come before Capua. The Citizens of Capua although they were alwaies well affected to the Aragonian Kings, yet ſeeing the French King as a moſt violent Tempeſt to bear down all before him, began now to conſult amongſt themſelves of yielding up the City; whereunto they were the more prickt forward, by the ſuddain revolt of the great Captain Trivultius with his Followers; as alſo by the departure of Verginius and Petilianus, two great and famous Commanders, who ſeeing themſelves forſaken of Trivultius, fled with their Companies unto the City of Nola. In this diſcomfiture of King Ferdinands Army, the Frenchmen had entred into the Suburbs of the City; which thing Gothfredus and Gaſpar (two valiant German Captains) beholding, ſallied with their Companies out of the City, of purpoſe to abate the pride of the French, and to confirm the doubtful Citizens. Theſe worthy Captains, when they had with exceeding Valour repulſed the French, and thought to have again returned into the City, could not be ſuffered to enter, but were by the Citizens ſhut out of the Gate, in danger to have had their Throats cut by the Eenmy. In which perplexity they were glad upon their knees to intreat the cowardly Citizens ſtanding upon the Walls, not in ſuch traiterous manner to betray their Friends ready in their defence to beſtow their lives; and with much intreating, at length obtained of thoſe heartleſs men, that they they might by ten and ten in a Company be received in at one Gate of the City, and ſo put out at another, fartheſt from the danger of the Enemy; in which ſort when they had paſſed through the City, they took the way towards Naples; and upon the way met with the King at Averſa, unto whom they declared all that had hapned in his abſence at Capua; who although he ſaw his Army diſperſed, and all things now deſperate, yet went he on forward, and came to the very Gates of Capua, and there called upon divers of the chief men of the City, requiring to be let in. But when he ſaw there was none to give him anſwer, and an Enſign of the French King diſplaied upon the Wall, in token that the City was become French, he returned to Naples; where he found the Gates now ſhut againſt him, and all the Citizens up again in Arms, and not willing to receive any of the Souldiers which came from Capua, more than the King himſelf; for flying Fame preventing his return, had filled every corner of the City with report, That all the chief Captains of his Army were either gone over to the Enemy, or elſe for ſafeguard of their lives fled; That the whole Army was broken up, and Capua yielded to the French. Wherefore the Neapolitans framing their fancies according to the condition of the time, began now alſo to fawn upon the good fortune of the French, and to have King Ferdinand in contempt; which he well perceiving, and fetching a compaſs farther off from the City, came unto the Caſtle, whereinto he was received with his Followers by his faithful Captains therein before left. But providently foreſeeing that he could not there long ſtay, but that he ſhould be beſieged by his Enemies both by Sea and Land, he commended the keeping of that Piece unto Alphonſus D'avalus, a moſt valiant Captain, and departed himſelf with 20 Gallies well appointed unto Ænaria, an Iſland not far from Naples, having in it a commodious Harbour and a ſtrong Caſtle; where Fortune, never firm but in miſery, ſeemed again to deride the poor remainder of his Honour; for coming thither, the Captain of the Caſtle, unworthily named Juſtus, forgetting his duty towards his Soveraign, of whom he had before received many extraordinary favours, moſt traiterouſly now in his ſo hard diſtreſs ſhut the Gates of the Caſtle againſt him at his landing, and unkindly refuſed to receive him. With which unexpected ingratitude, the poor King was wonderfully perplexed and almoſt abaſhed; yet with earneſt intreaty and ample commemoration of the benefits and preferments which both his Father ther and himſelf had in times paſt beſtowed upon him, he prevailed ſo much with this unthankful man, that he was content to receive him into the Caſtle, ſo that he would come but himſelf alone; of which his offer, when no more could be got, the King ſeemed to accept. So the Captain having opened a Port to receive him in, was in the very entrance thereof ſuddainly ſtab'd to the heart with a Dagger by King Ferdinand and ſlain in the midſt of his armed Souldiers; which was done with ſuch a Countenance and Majeſty, that the Warders with their Weapons in their hands, diſmaid with his look, forthwith at his commandment opened the Gate, and received him in with all his Followers. Whereby it appeareth, That in the Countenances of Princes reſteth a certain Divine Majeſty, in all Fortunes above the common courſe of Nature; which is of power to daunt the Hearts of moſt diſloial Traitors in the performance of their unnatural Treaſons. The next day after the departure of King Ferdinand from the Caſtle of Naples, Charles the French King was received into the City, with ſuch Pomp, Triumph and Acclamation of the Neapolitans, as if they had even then by the benefit of that forraign King, been reſtored to perfect Liberty, and delivered out of ſome long and hard Bondage. Shortly after, the Caſtle of Naples, with all the ſtrong places thereabout were yielded unto the French, and Embaſſadors ſent from all the Princes and People of that Kingdom, yielding themſelves into the power of the French King. Then Ferdinand ſeeing all loſt and gone, departed from Ænaria, where he lay expecting the event of his hard fortune, and ſailed into Cicilia. Thus the Houſe of Aragon in leſs than five months, loſt the Kingdom of Naples, about ſixty three years after it was firſt taken from the French by Alphonſus the elder, this Ferdinand his great Grandfather.

The report of the great preparation made by the French for this War, had long before filled the Ears of them which dwelt in any part of the Turks Dominions in Europe; but when they ſaw the French Enſigns diſplaied upon the Walls of the Caſtles, and ſtrong Towns alongſt the coaſt of Calabria and Salerne, ſuch a ſuddain fear fell upon the Turks Garriſons alongſt the coaſt of Epirus and Macedonia on the other ſide of the Adriatick, over againſt that part of Italy, that many of them forſook their charge; the Chriſtians in thoſe places, as alſo in Grecia and Peloponneſus, beginning then to lift up their heads in hope of their deliverance, and to make the beſt preparation they could to joyn with the French againſt the Turks; but eſpecially the rough and wild People inhabiting the high Mountains called Acrocheraunij in the borders of Epirus, who preſently took up Arms, refuſing to be any longer tributary unto the Turkiſh Emperor.

This proſperous and ſpeedy ſucceſs of the French King in the conqueſt of Naples, filled the minds of moſt of the Chriſtian Princes, as alſo of the Turkiſh Emperor, with a doubtful expectation, whither his greatneſs would grow; many being of an opinion, that he covertly affected the Empire of Rome, and to make himſelf the ſole Monarch of Italy. Which conceit no little troubled both the great Biſhop Alexander, and Maximilian then Emperor. Bajazet alſo feared much leſt he ſhould upon the ſuddain turn his Forces into Epirus or Grecia, to his no ſmall diſquiet. And Ferdinand, the adviſed King of Spain, was no leſs careful for the ſafety of Silicia. Lodovicus Sfortia alſo (ſhortly after created Duke of Millan, the chief occaſion of the French Kings coming into Italy, and a great aider of him in thoſe Wars) began now to conſider better of the matter, and to ſtand in doubt of the King, whom he well perceived to make ſmall reckoning of his word or promiſe, ſo that he might thereby enlarge his Dominions. And the Venetians, who in all theſe Wars had ſtood looking on as neuters (in hope that when the Aragonians and French had with long Wars, which they vainly imagined, well weakned one another, that they might then at their pleaſure ſhare out ſomething for themſelves) were now in doubt with the reſt of the States of Italy to loſe ſome part of their own Territory; for now there was no Prince or State in Italy able to oppoſe themſelves againſt the French, but ſtood all as it were at his devotion.

A great League made by divers Chriſtian Princes againſt the French King.

Wherefore the aforeſaid Princes, namely, Maximilian the Emperor, Ferdinand King of Spain, Alexander Biſhop of Rome, the State of Venice, and Lodovicus Sfortia, Duke of Millan, for the more aſſurance of their Eſtates, by their Embaſſadors ſpeedily ſent from one to another, concluded a ſtrong League among themſelves; whereof the chief Capitulation was, That if any of theſe Confederates ſhould upon their own accord make War upon any other Prince, they ſhould do it upon their own charges; but if any of them ſhould chance to be invaded by any other, that then every one of theſe Confederates ſhould of their own charge ſend four thouſand Horſe and ten thouſand Foot in aid of their Confederates ſo invaded, until the Wars were ended; which League was to endure for twenty years. The fame of this League was welcome to many other Princes, but eſpecially to Bajazet, who now feared nothing more, than the Forces of the French, and had therefore offered unto the Venetians, to aid them both by Sea and Land againſt the French, if their Affairs ſhould ſo require. This League ſo much pleaſed not other Princes, but it troubled the French King more, as of purpoſe made againſt him; although it was by the Confederates pretended to be made only for their own ſafety. Wherefore he with all expedition placed his beſt Captains with ſtrong Garriſons in all the Cities and ſtrong Holds of the Kingdom of Naples, and left Mompenſer his Viceroy in the City of Naples, and with the reſt of his Army returned into France, purpoſing by the way as he went to terrifie the diſſembling Biſhop, ſo if it were poſſible to draw him from the League; and afterwards to deal with Sfortia and the reſt as he might. But when he was come near unto Rome, the Biſhop for fear fled out of the City to Peruſium, intending from thence to have fled to Venice, if the French King ſhould have farther purſued him. Charles deceived of his purpoſe, in peaceable manner entred the City, and there ſtaid three days, and ſo departed; uſing violence againſt none, but againſt ſuch as were well known to be of the Aragonian faction. From Rome he marched to Piſa; and ſo with much pain paſſing the Appenines, was at the River of Tarrus, not far from Parma, ſet upon by Franciſcus Gonzago Duke of Mantua, General of a great Army which the Venetians and Sfortia had raiſed upon the ſuddain to have ſtopped his paſſage; in which Battel he was in great danger to have been taken or ſlain, and there loſt his Tents, with all the rich Spoil gotten in the rich Kingdom of Naples; yet having at length with great ſlaughter valiantly repulſed his Enemies, he afterwards returned in ſafety home.

About the ſame time that this Battel was fought at Tarrus, the young King Ferdinand, lately driven out of his Kingdom by the French King, returned again out of Cicilia to Naples; where he was joyfully received of the Neapolitans, and by the help of his Friends (but eſpecially of the great Gonſalvus, ſent in his aid by Ferdinand King of Spain) in leſs than a years ſpace recovered the Kingdom of Naples again from the French; and then dying without iſſue left the ſame to his Uncle Fredericus. Wherein the uncertainty of worldly Honor, the chief felicity of ambitious minds, is well to be noted; when as in that one Kingdom the chief Government was ſix times changed in leſs than the ſpace of three years: for firſt Ferdinand the elder dying, left that Kingdom unto his Son Alphonſus, at ſuch time as the French King was making preparation for thoſe Wars: Alphonſus deſpairing of his own Forces, reſigned the Kingdom to his Son Ferdinand, when he had ſcarcely reigned fully a year: Ferdinand in leſs than three months was driven quite out of Italy by Charles the French King: Charles poſſeſſed of the Kingdom, in ſhort time after was again diſpoſſeſſed by the ſame Ferdinand: Ferdinand having with much trouble thruſt out the French, died within leſs than a year: After whom ſucceeded Fredericus his Uncle, no leſs unfortunate than the reſt: and Charles the French King himſelf lived not long after, but died ſuddenly as he came from playing at Tennis, being then but ſeven and twenty years old, leaving the flouriſhing Kingdom of France, with the troubleſome Title pretended to the Kingdom of Naples, unto Lewis his ſucceſſor, who lived with great trouble to Conquer the ſame, and with greater grief to loſe it again.

But to return again to the courſe of our Hiſtory, from whence the great Occurrents of that time (not altogether impertinent to our purpoſe) have a little too far led us. Bajazet delivered of two great fears, firſt by the death of his Brother Zemes, and after by the caſting out of the French out of Naples; began now to turn his Forces upon the Chriſtians, and by his Lieutenant Bali-beg Sanzack of Siliſtra, invaded the Countries of Podolia and Raſſia, being part of the Kingdom, where the Turks did great harm, and carried away many Priſoners. But coming again the ſecond time, and making ſuch like ſpoil as before, they ſtayed ſo long, that the cold of Winter (which in thoſe Countries is very extream) was now come on; and in their return as they were about to have paſſed through Moldavia, they were by Stephanus Prince of that Country, denied both paſſage and victuals, and forced to take the way alongſt the Sea coaſt; where many of them ſtragling from their Army, were by the way cut off and ſlain by the Moldavians; and the reſt, what by the extremity of the cold, what for want of food, and foulneſs of the way, periſhed; ſo that of that great Army very few returned home. The Turks Hiſtories report, That in this expedition were loſt forty thouſand Turks.

He ſent alſo Cadumes one of his Baſſaes into Illyria; who ſpoiling that Country, with a part of Croatia, was encountred by nine thouſand Croatians and Hungarians near unto the River Morava, under the leading of Count Bernard Francopaine; where after a cruel and bloody Fight, the Chriſtians were put to the worſe, and above ſeven thouſand of them ſlain; the reſt ſaved themſelves by flight through the Mountains and Woods. Of the Chriſtians that were loſt, many were drowned in Morava, chuſing rather ſo to end their days, than to fall into the hands of their cruel Enemies. This overthrow was imputed to the General, who would needs give the Turks Battel in plain Field, although he was earneſtly entreated by Count Jo. Torquatus to have kept the Straits of that Country, whereby he might have had great advantage of the Enemy. Torquatus himſelf having loſt all his Horſemen in that Battel, and his Horſe killed under him, fought valiantly on foot, until he was by the multitude of his Enemies oppreſſed and ſlain. The Baſſa to give Bajazet a ſure teſtimony of the Victory, cauſed all the Noſes of the ſlain Chriſtians to be cut off and put upon ſtrings, and ſo by Waggon ſent them as a barbarous Preſent to Conſtantinople. After the death of Charles the French King, Lewis the Twelfth of that name having obtained that Kingdom, wrote himſelf alſo Duke of Millan, as deſcended of one of the Daughters of Jo. Galeatius firſt Duke of Millan; in which his ſuppoſed right he was fully reſolved to make War upon Sfortia then Duke of Millan. And for his better ſucceſs in thoſe Wars, ſought by all means he could, to draw ſome other of the Princes and States of Italy into the Fellowſhip of that intended War; but above all others the Venetians, as moſt commodious for his purpoſe; with whom he made a firm League, and for the aid they were to give him, covenanted that they ſhould have for their ſhare the City of Cremona, with all the pleaſant Country about Abdua, then part of Sfortia his Dominion; which was afterwards accordingly performed.

Sfortia underſtanding of this compact made againſt him, and knowing himſelf far too weak of himſelf to ſtand againſt ſo puiſſant Enemies; attempted firſt to ſet Maximilian the Emperor, with the States of Germany, upon the French King. But that not ſorting to his deſire, he ſought to agree with the King, by offering to hold his Dukedom of him, by paying him a yearly Tribute. After he had thus in vain proved all the means he could deviſe, to have appeaſed the French King, and provided for his own ſafety; he by his Embaſſadors ſent of purpoſe, certified Bajazet of the confederation betwixt the French King and the Venetians, and that their purpoſe was after they had oppreſſed him, and ſome other of the States of Italy, then with their united Forces to invade his Dominions; and that therefore it were good for him in time to look unto it, and to give aid againſt thoſe which would in ſhort time become his moſt dangerous Enemies. By this means the Duke was in good hope, ſo to buſie the Venetians by bringing the Turk upon them, as that they ſhould ſtand the French in ſmall ſtead. At which time alſo the Embaſſadors of Florence did what they could to prick forward the Turk to make Wars upon the Venetians; for the malice they bare againſt them for protecting them of Piſa againſt the oppreſſion of the Florentines.

Bajazet perſwaded by the Embaſſadors, and calling to remembrance the injuries before done him by the Venetians; firſt by giving aid to John Caſtriot the Son of Scanderbeg, and John Chernovich another Prince of Epirus (whereby he loſt a great part of that Country, and was alſo further enforced to yield to ſuch conditions as altogether ſtood not with his honour) and again by denying to give his Fleet leave to put into their harbours of Cyprus, in the time of his Wars againſt the Sultan of Egypt; all which he was glad then to endure, for fear leſt that his Brother Zemes (then living) ſhould by their means be ſet up againſt him; promiſed now to do what the Embaſſadors had requeſted; glad in his mind that the diſcord of the Chriſtian Princes had preſented unto him ſo fit an opportunity of Revenge.

Hereupon he made great preparation both by Sea and Land againſt the Venetians, and upon the ſuddain cauſed Scander Baſſa his Lieutenant in Illyria, with twelve thouſand Horſe to break into the Country of Friuli, part of the Venetian Territory upon the frontiers of Italy. The Baſſa as he had in charge, paſſing over divers great Rivers, at length entred the Country, burning and deſtroying all before him as far as Liquentia, carrying away with him all the poor Country People Priſoners. But when he was come to the Banks of Tiliaventum, and underſtood that he came too late to pleaſure the Duke of Millan (for why, the French with the Venetians had before without reſiſtance driven him quite out of Italy and Germany) he there, with more than barbarous cruelty put four thouſand poor Priſoners to the Sword; and ſo having filled the Country with mourning and with blood, returned from whence he came, loaded with ſpoil of that rich Country.

At the ſame time alſo, Bajazet put to Sea ſuch a Fleet as none of his predeceſſors had before ſet forth; and with a great Army in perſon himſelf marched alongſt the Sea Coaſt of Morea, in ſuch ſort, as that his Army by Land, and his Fleet at Sea, as near as they could, kept even pace the one within ſight of the other. Neither were the Venetians unmindful of themſelves, but ſet forth a ſtrong Fleet under the charge of Anthony Grimani their Admiral; in number far inferior to the Turks, but for Equipage, Strength, ſkilful Mariners, and all other manner of warlike proviſion, much ſuperior. For which cauſe the Turks, although defied and braved by the Venetians, yet durſt not at the firſt joyn with them in battel, but ſtill kept alongſt the coaſt of Morea, not daring to put further off into the Sea. In this their courſe the Venetians troubled them exceedingly, ſometimes making ſhew as if they would have conſtrained them to fight, and otherwhiles giving them chaſe, never departing far from them, wiſely accounting it right good ſervice, if they could but keep that huge Fleet from landing in Italy, or other place of the Venetian Territory. Moſt men were in good hope, that if thoſe great Fleets ſhould have joyned in battel, the Venetians ſhould have had a notable Victory; for that the Enemy as afraid kept ſo dangerous a courſe, and ſo near the main. The longer they thus ſailed, the more was the State of Venice offended with their Admiral, that he contrary to all expectation, delayed to fight, and ſtill ſuffered the dangerous Enemy to approach nearer and nearer their Territories; and there were none which had not rather he ſhould have ſet all upon the hazard of one battel, than to protract by delay a long and doubtful War. Whilſt all mens minds were thus in expectation of ſome great exploit to be done upon the Enemy, news came to the City, that the Turks Fleet had put into the Haven Sapientia in the Iſland Sphraga, to water, and was there embaied by the Venetians. This report was of moſt men joyfully received, as if the Victory had been already aſſured; and ſo much the more, for that it was vainly ſuppoſed, that it would be gained without any great loſs. But others which better knew the place, deemed of the matter far otherwiſe, ſaying, That the place wherein the Enemy lay was ſuch, as that he might ſafely at his pleaſure depart thence. Yet forſomuch as the Turks Fleet was more ſubject unto danger in putting out of the Harbor, than in the wide Sea, there was no man but was of opinion, That the Venetian Admiral would ſet upon them as they ſhould come forth again. Whilſt men were thus divining too and fro, and the Venetians attending the coming forth of the Enemies Fleet, it fortuned that Andreas Lauredanus and Albanus Armerius (two valiant Gentlemen) but a little before come from Corcyra, of purpoſe to be preſent at the battel, were the firſt that began the fight; and with their two nimble Ships (after they had changed a few Bullets) boorded a tall Ship of the Turks, being of ſuch beauty and burthen, that ſhe ſeemed rather a Caſtle than a Ship, whereof one Baruch of Smyrna (a notable Pirat) was Captain; who after a long and cruel Fight, perceiving that he muſt either yield, or by force be taken, deſperately ſet fire on his own Ship, by the rage whereof both ſhe and the Venetian Ships faſt grapled unto her, were all three together burnt down to the Water. Many of the Men (to ſhun the violence of the Fire) leapt over boord into the Sea, where ſome of them were taken up by the other Ships, and ſome periſhed. Some few other of the Venetian Fleet couragiouſly aſſailed the Turks at their coming out, and doing great harm, put the Turks whole Fleet in no ſmall fear. But the moſt part of the Venetian Gallies lay looking on a far off, unto whom the other before in fight with the Turks, after they had done what they could, retired alſo. But by that they had done, it appeared plainly, that the Venetian Admiral that day let ſlip out of his hands a moſt notable Victory, if he as a reſolute Man had with his whole Fleet charged the Enemy.

A Fight at Sea betwixt the Turks and the Venetians.

After this Fight the Turks held on their courſe, ſtill keeping Morea on the right hand, whom the Venetians ſtill followed: at length the Turks Fleet was come to the entrance of the Gulf of Patras, where the Venetians again faintly ſetting upon them, ſuffered them to recover the Gulf; with no leſs diſhonour than they had before let them eſcape at the Port Sapientia: for the Venetians having the advantage of the place, and better appointed for Fight at Sea, might eaſily (as it was ſuppoſed) have gained the Victory, if the Commanders (but eſpecially the Admiral) had been ſo forward in the ſervice as became Men of their place. But many of them afraid to Fight lay aloof, ſo that Dauthes the Turks Admiral (who perceiving himſelf too weak, had purpoſed to run his Gallies on ſhoar, and ſo to have fled to the Army at Land, if he had felt himſelf overcharged by the Venetian Fleet) had now contrary to his expectation recovered the Gulf he deſired, though not without loſs of ſome of his Gallies. Within this Gulf ſtandeth the antient City of Naupactum (now called Lepanto) then ſubject to the Venetians, whether Bajazet was then come by Land with his Army; and now by the coming of his Fleet into the Gulf, laid hard Siege unto the City both by Sea and Land. They of the City ſeeing themſelves on every ſide beſet with their Enemies, without any great reſiſtance fell to compoſition with Bajazet, and ſo yielded unto him the City, which the Turks hold at this day.

Lepanto yielded to the Turks.

Grimanus the Venetian Admiral returning to Venice, was for all his evil ſervice (or rather for that he, according to his mild nature, had not uſed ſeverity againſt ſuch Captains as refuſed to Fight) caſt into Priſon; and although he was a Man mightily befriended, yet was he by a publick Decree Baniſhed into one of the Abſytides, Iſlands upon the Coaſt of Liburnia. From the firſt foundation of the City of Venice was never Man impugned with more ſpight, or defended by greater friends; but common hatred prevailing, he was nevertheleſs exiled. Thus Bajazet having made a Road into the Venetian Territory by Scander-Baſſa, and taken from them the City of Naupactum, with the Country thereabout, returned with Victory to Conſtantinople.

The next year following, which was the year 1500. 1500. Bajazet put to Sea a greater and ſtronger

Fleet

Methone beſieged both by Sea and Land by Bajazet.

Methone taken by the Turks.

Corone, Pilus, and Criſſeum yieldeth to the Turks.

Fleet than he had the year before; and himſelf in perſon with a puiſſant Army of an hundred and fifty thouſand men entred by the Strait of Corinth into Peloponneſus, and marching through the Country, came and incamped before the ſtrong City of Methone (now called Modon) then under the Government of the Venetians; at which time his great Fleet met him there alſo by Sea, as he had before appointed. When he thus had beſet the City both by Sea and Land, and with long and continual battery made three great and fair breaches in the Walls, he gave unto the ſame two terrible Aſſaults, and that with ſuch deſperate fury, that many of them which went firſt unto the breach, overthrown by the preſs of them which followed, were trodden to death. Yet nevertheleſs the City was both times valiantly defended by the Citizens and Garriſon Souldiers; ſo that when he had done what he could, he was glad to retire from the Walls, having filled the Town-Ditches with the Bodies of his ſlain Turks. The Venetian Admiral Triviſanus lying at the Iſle of Zacynthus (but far too weak to fight with the Enemy) in the beginning of the Siege ſent Valerius Marcellus and Baptiſta Polanus, with two Gallies full of Men and Munition in relief of the beſieged; and now doubting their further wants, ſent Jo. Maripetrus, Alex. Cothius of Corcyra, and Cachuris of Hydruntum, with three other great Gallies, with Men, Munition, and ſuch other things as he thought needful for the defence of the City. Theſe three reſolute Captains coming with a full wind, and packing on all their Sails, brake through the Turks Fleet lying in their way, and ran themſelves aground under the Walls of the Town; for they of the Town had ſo barred the Haven for fear of the Enemy, that they could not that way poſſibly get in. The Citizens and Souldiers joyful of the coming of this freſh Supply and withal fearing leſt the Gallies ſhould be ſet off again from them by the Enemy, came running by heaps from all parts of the City, towards the Sea, to receive this new come Aid; which was done with ſuch confuſed diſorder, that divers places of the City towards the Land were left without Defendants, as if there had been no Enemy near. Which the Janizaries quickly perceiving, preſently entred by thoſe forſaken places with little or no reſiſtance. Then the Citizens all too late began to make head; for the Janizaries already entred made way for the reſt of the Army; which ſwarming into the City, ſlew without pity all that came in the way, as well Grecians as Venetians, with all the Souldiers but even then newly landed out of the three Gallie. In this ſlaughter, Anthonius Fabrius and Bardella (Governors of the Town) with Andreas Falco Biſhop of Methone, in his Pontificalibus and his Mytre on his head, were ſlain; none eſcaped their fury, but ſuch as were for their ſtrength reſerved for ſervile labour, or for their beauty, to the Victors luſt; and of theſe a thouſand bound faſt together in long Ropes, were brought to Bajazets Pavilion, and there in his ſight by his commandment cruelly murthered. The Cities of Corone and Pilus (now called Navarrinum) ſometime the dwelling place of old Neſtor, terrified with the taking of Methone, yielded themſelves by compoſition to Bajazet. This City of Chriſſeum, now known by the name of Caput S. Galli, was taken alſo by Cherſeogles, Bajazet his Son in law. All theſe were Cities belonging to the Venetians. Nauplium was alſo beſieged by Haly Baſſa, but yet ſtill defended by the Venetians. Bajazet having new fortified the City of Methone, and ſtored it with new Inhabitants, left in it a ſtrong Garriſon, and ſo with Victory returned to Conſtantinople.

At this time Triviſanus the Venetian Admiral died of grief of mind, as ſome ſuppoſed; in whoſe place the Senate ſent Benedictus Piſaurius, a noble and valiant Gentleman, who with the Venetian Fleet followed the Enemy, then departing from the Siege of Nauplium, purſuing them even unto the Straits of Helleſpontus, ſtill cutting off ſuch as ſtraggled or tarried behind the reſt of the Fleet; by which means he took above twenty of their Gallies, and in his return took from the Turks the Iſland of Ægina, and landing in divers places of the Turks Dominions, left unto them the woful remembrance of his being there. Afterwards meeting with Gonſalvus, ſirnamed the Great (ſent by Ferdinand King of Spain, to aid him againſt the Turks) at Zacynthus, he invaded Cephalenia (which Triviſanus his Predeceſſor had in vain attempted the year before) and laid hard Siege to the City; which was for a ſpace valiantly defended by the Turks, yet at length by the good conduct of Gonſalvus it was by force taken, when as Giſdare the Governor thereof, with his Garriſon of Turks had before fought it out even to the laſt man. The City being taken, all the whole Iſland yielded forthwith to the Venetians.

Cephalenia taken by the Venetians

Piſaurius having taken Cephalenia, repaired the City, and leaving a ſtrong Garriſon for defence of the Iſle, departed to Corcyra; where he was advertiſed, that the Turks were rigging forth a great Fleet againſt the next Spring, whereof ſome part lay in the Bay of Ambracia, not far from Corcyra; ſome at Eante, and the reſt within the Straits of Helleſpontus. Wherefore purpoſing to do ſome exploit upon thoſe Gallies which lay in the Bay of Ambracia, to avert the mind of the Enemy from perceiving of that he had ſecretly with himſelf intended, he ſent the greateſt part of his Fleet unto the Iſland of Neritos, who ſuddainly landing ſhould put the Inhabitants in fear. The Captains ſent about the buſineſs, chearfully put in execution what the Amiral had commanded, and by their ſuddain landing raiſed ſuch a tumult, that all the Countries thereabout were filled with the expectation of that which ſhould enſue thereof. The Bay of Ambracia is ſo ſtraitned on either ſide with the Mountains of Epirus, that the entrance thereof is but half a mile over; but by and by opening it ſelf into a great wideneſs, and running up into the Land, maketh a moſt pleaſant and ſafe Harbour for Ships and Gallies to ride in. Piſaurius with a fair Wind coming thither with eight Gallies well appointed, when the Turks thought him to have been at Neritos, and entring the Strait, rowing farther into the Bay, burnt one of the Turks great Gallies, to the terror of all them that dwelt round about the Bay, and carried with him eleven more, laded with Munition and Victual, through the Strait; the Turks in vain fretting thereat, and doing what they could with their great Ordnance from Shore to have ſunk him in going out of the Bay. But having done what he came for, he returned with his Prey again to Corcyra. Not long after he alſo recovered the Caſtle of Pylos in Morea; which, as it was ſuddainly gotten, ſo was it as ſuddainly loſt; for Camalia, a notable Pirat of the Turks, who had been abroad ſeeking after purchaſe, putting into that Harbor by chance, took three Gallies there left by the Admiral for defence of the place, and ſo terrified the faint-hearted Captain, that he fell to compoſition with the Pyrat, to yield him the Caſtle, ſo that he and his Souldiers might in ſafety depart; which the Pyrat granting, had the Caſtle delivered unto him, which he could not with far greater ſtrength have poſſibly won. So was Pylos for fear twice in one year yielded up unto the Turks, and was both times the death of the cowardly Captains which gave it up, being both beheaded by the commandment of the Admiral. About the ſame time, Piſaurius attempted to have burnt other of the Turks Gallies lying in the River Eante, upon the coaſt of Macedonia; but not with ſo good ſucceſs as before; for the Turks, made more careful by the loſs they had but a little before received at Ambracia, did now more vigilantly look unto their Gallies; ſo that when Piſaurius had in certain ſmall Veſſels, made of purpoſe for that ſervice, embarked two hundred reſolute Souldiers to have gone up the River to have fired the Gallies, they were by the way after they had entred a good way into the River, encountred by the Turks, and enforced to return. But before they could get out of the River, the wind roſe ſo contrary, with ſuch a ſtiff gale full in the mouth of the River, that the Mariners overmaſtred with the violence of the Weather, when they had done what they could, and ſpent all their ſtrength, were driven aſhore, ſome on one ſide of the River, and ſome on the other, and ſo fell into the hands of their Enemies, of whom it booted not to crave mercy.

About this time Bajazet took alſo the ancient and famous City of Dyrrachium, now called Durazo, from the Venetians; before ruinous, and almoſt quite abandoned by the Inhabitants, as a place of danger, and not to be kept now that the Turk had got all the Country round about it. The Venetians ſore preſſed with theſe Wars ſo long maintained againſt the Turk, had many times prayed Aid of other Chriſtian Princes, and were well holpen by the Spaniard in the taking of Cephalenia; and now Lewis the French King, upon a good devotion to that War, ſent the Lord Raveſtin with ſeven tall Ships and fifteen Gallies well appointed out of Provence and Genoa, to aid the Venetians his Friends. This Fleet departing from Naples, where they had by the way put in, and paſſing about Italy, and ſo through the Ionian Sea, came to Melos one of the Cyclades; at which Iſland Piſaurius with his Fleet in ſhort time arrived alſo; from whence they by mutual conſent departed together to invade the Iſland of Lesbos; and being there ſafely arrived, landed their Forces, and laid ſiege to the ſtrong City of Mytilene, where by the fury of their Artillery they in ſhort time had made a fair breach in the Wall. In the time of this battery, whilſt the breach was in making, Piſaurius with part of his Fleet ſailed to Tenedos; for it was reported, that certain of the Turks Gallies were then coming for that place out of Helleſpontus. Which report, as ſome write, was of purpoſe given out by the French, thereby to draw the Venetian Admiral from the Siege, that ſo in the mean time they being in good hope to take the Town in his abſence, might themſelves carry away the honour thereof, together with the rich ſpoil. Others favouring the French, blame the Venetian Admiral, as if he had of purpoſe departed, envying at the honour of the French. Which is hardly to be believed in ſo honourable a Perſonage, and in an action ſo much concerning the good of his Common-Weal. Howſoever it was, the breach being made, in his abſence was by the French preſently aſſaulted; although that Palus Valateſius the Venetian Vice-Admiral, earneſtly requeſted the French Admiral to defer the Aſſault for a while, and to expect the return of Piſaurius. Which his Counſel the French Admiral gave him the hearing of, but yet went forward with the Aſſault. The Frenchmen after their manner furiouſly aſſailing the breach, were valiantly repulſed by the Turks; ſo that in the breach was made a deadly and moſt terrible Fight, many falling on both ſides. Yet for all that, the City was manfully defended by the Turks, and the Frenchmen were enforced to retire. The French Admiral having taken this repulſe, commanded all things to be carried aboard, pupoſing to have forſaken the Siege, and ſo to have departed; when in the mean time the Venetian Admiral returned, and with much ado perſwaded the French to ſtay. Whereupon the battery was again begun with greater fury than before, and now the Leaders were conſulting of a freſh Aſſault to be given, when ſuddainly news was brought, That the Turks Fleet was coming to relieve the City; and thereupon the Aſſault was for a time deferred and the battery continued. But thoſe Turks which came, being in number but few, were for the moſt part by them in the Gallies taken and caſt over board; ſome few that got to Land, ſaved themſelves in the Woods and deſart places of the Iſle. By this time the City was again made aſſaultable, and the Venetians with great Courage aſſailed the breach, and had twice gained the top of the Rampiers, from whence they were again both times beaten down by the Turks, the French all the while looking on. Many valiant men were there ſlain and hurt, and in the end the Venetians were glad with loſs to retire, as had the French done before. Whilſt this was in doing, a Pinnace came to the Fleet with news, That the Great Maſter of the Rhodes was coming with his Gallies, to the Siege; whereupon the Admirals determined to maintain the Siege until his coming. But the next day after, the French Admiral changing his purpoſe, ſhipped his men, and hoyſing ſail departed to Chios; and ſailing thence towards Italy, was overtaken with a moſt terrible Tempeſt, wherein the Admiral Gally with two others were loſt, with eight hundred good Souldiers, the Admiral himſelf with above forty others were by chance contrary to all hope ſaved, and with much danger with his Weatherbeaten Fleet recovered the Haven of Tarentum. The Venetian Admiral thus forſaken of the French, and ſeeing the time paſt wherein he expected the coming of the Great Maſter of the Rhodes, brake up the Siege and departed from Lesbos to Chios, and from thence to Paros, where he found the Maſter of the Rhodes with his Gallies; unto whom he complained greatly of the inconſtancy of the French, imputing it unto them, that the City of Mytilene was not won. Neither were they behind with him, but in every place where they came, laid the fault as much or more upon him. From Paros the Venetian Admiral took his courſe to the Iſland of Melos, where he found one Richius an Arch Pyrat of the Turks, who by force of Tempeſt was driven on Shore, and by the ſuddain coming down of the Iſland people, taken; him (for that he had exerciſed exceeding Cruelty upon certain Chriſtians that he had taken) Piſaurius cauſed to be faſt bound to a Spit, and with a ſmall fire to be roaſted to death. From Melos he returned to Corcyra, and there wintered.

The Siege of Mytilene broken up.

The next Spring, Piſaurius with certain Gallies which Alexander Biſhop of Rome had ſent unto him, under the command of Jacobus Piſaurius Biſhop of Paphia, ſailed to Neritos, now called S. Maura, which is an Iſland parted from the firm Land with a little fret of the Sea, long time before that way let in by the Corinthians. Here Piſaurius ſuddainly landing his men, ſurpriſed the Iſland, and with wonderful celerity and induſtry caſt up two great Trenches, in ſuch ſort, and to ſo good purpoſe, that three thouſand of the Turks Horſemen coming at a low water over that narrow Strait which parteth the Iſland from the Main, were with loſs repulſed and forced to retire. Whereupon S. Maura the chief City was forthwith delivered unto Piſaurius, with the reſt of the Iſland.

Neritos taken by the Venetians.

The Venetians weary of this long and chargeable War againſt ſo mighty an Enemy, ſent Lodovicus Manetius their Embaſſador to Bajazet, to treat with him for Peace; but Bajazet ſtood upon ſuch hard points, that nothing could at that time be concluded. Yet Manetius ſo diſcreetly uſed the matter, that Bajazet ſent with him at his return to Venice, his Embaſſador, to propound unto the Senate ſuch Conditions as it pleaſed him to grant them Peace upon. This Embaſſador had audience in the Senate twice, where he in the name of his Maſter propounded ſuch proud and unreaſonable Conditions, that they were by the Senate rejected, and ſo he himſelf diſmiſſed and ſent back again.

The year following, the Venetians ſent an Embaſſador to Bajazet, who moved with the pitiful complaints of his own Subjects, for the daily harms they received from the Venetians alongſt the Sea Coaſt, as alſo for want of Trade; and fearing alſo ſome troubles like to ariſe in his Kingdom in Aſia (as indeed there did, not long after) yielded himſelf more willingly to hear of Peace, than before. This Embaſſador called Zacharias Phriſcus, was well heard of Bajazet, and after long ſuit had brought the matter he came for unto ſome good terms: and being honourably rewarded by the Turkiſh Emperor, returned home, carrying with him unto the Senate far more reaſonable Conditions of Peace than had at any time before been by Bajazet propounded. Hereupon the Venetians ſhortly after ſent Andreas Gritti (an honourable Senator) a man well known to Bajazet both for his famous traffique in former time at Conſtantinople, and alſo for that in theſe late Wars he was taken Priſoner at the winning of Methone, and his life ſpared at the interceſſion of Cherſeogles (Bajazet his Son-in-Law) and afterward ranſomed; he in the name of the State from whence he came, concluded a Peace with Bajazet. The Capitulations whereof were, firſt, That the Venetians ſhould deliver up the Iſlands of Neritos and Leucadia, reſerving unto themſelves the Iſland of Cephalenia only; Then, That Bajazet ſhould reſtore all ſuch Goods as had been taken from the Venetian Merchants, in theſe late Wars; And that it ſhould be lawful for them (as they were wont) ſafely to traffique into the Euxine Sea, and to Conſtantinople; and there to have their Conſul or Governor as they had had in former time; And laſt of all, That the Venetian Territory ſhould be certainly known, and ſeparated from the Turks by certain Bounds and Limits. Theſe Conditions were ſolemnly agreed upon, and confirmed both by Bajazet and the State of Venice; and ſo a firm Peace concluded in the year 1503, after the Wars had continued betwixt them about the ſpace of five years.

A Peace concluded betwixt Bajazet and the Venetians

The ſame year Bajazet aſſembled a great and puiſſant Army of his beſt and moſt approved Souldiers, as well in Aſia as Europe, which met together at Sophia, purpoſing (as it was thought) to have invaded Hungary; but worthily doubting the ſucceſs of that War againſt ſo warlike a Nation, he changed his purpoſe, and leaving Achmetes Baſſa with his Aſian Souldiers at Sophia, turned himſelf with the reſt of his Amy into Albania (to reduce thoſe rebellious People again to his obeyſance) and had before ſent a Fleet of Gallies to ſtop the paſſages of that Country alongſt the Sea Coaſt. But the Country People underſtanding of his coming, fled into the high and rough Rocks and Mountains, from whence they did the Turks great harm; who nevertheleſs with incredible labour and adventure, mounted thoſe difficult places; and killing an exceeding number of thoſe mountain and ſavage People, carried all the Women and Children they could light upon, away with them Priſoners; and with Fire and Sword made all the Country deſolate. After which Spoil done, Bajazet returned with his Army to Manaſtirum; and departing thence, upon the way met with a Derviſlar (which is a phantaſtical and beggarly kind of Turkiſh Monks, uſing no other Apparel but two Sheep-Skins, the one hanging before and the other behind) a luſty ſtrong fat Fellow, attired after the manner of his order, with a great Ring in each Ear; who drawing near unto Bajazet, as if he would of him have received an Alms, deſperately aſſailed him with a ſhort Scimitar which he had cloſely conveied under his hypocritical habit. But Bajazet by the ſtarting of the Horſe whereon he rid (being afraid at the ſuddain approach of the Hobgoblin) partly avoided the deadly blow by the Traitor entended, yet not altogether unwounded; neither had he ſo eſcaped the danger, had not Iſhender Baſſa with his Horſemans Mace preſently ſtruck down the deſperate Villain as he was about to have doubled his ſtroak; but being now ſtruck down, he was forthwith rent in pieces by the Souldiers. This treacherous and deſperate fact ſo much moved Bajazet, that he proſcribed all them of that ſuperſtitious Order, and baniſhed them out of his Empire.

Bajazet in danger to have been ſlain by a Derviſlar or Turkiſh Monk.

Bajazet by nature peaceable.

After ſo many troubles, Bajazet gave himſelf unto a quiet courſe of life, ſpending moſt part of his time in ſtudy of Philoſophy, and conference with learned men; unto which peaceable kind of life, he was of his own natural diſpoſition more enclined than to Wars; albeit that the regard of his State, and the earneſt deſire of his Men of War, drew him oftentimes even againſt his Will into the Field. As for the Civil Government of his Kingdom, he referred it wholly unto his three principal Baſſaes, Alis, Achmetes and Jachia, who at their pleaſure diſpoſed of all things. After he had in this quiet and pleaſing kind of life to his great contentment paſſed over five years, of a little neglected Spark ſuddainly aroſe ſuch a Fire in Aſia, as was hardly after with much blood of his People and danger of that part of his Empire quenched; the reliques whereof yet trouble thoſe ſuperſtitious People at this day. Which thing was brought to paſs by the crafty device of Chaſan Chelife, and Schach Culi his Boy (whom ſome call Teckel Scachoculus, and others Techellis) two Hypocritical Perſians; who flying into thoſe Countries, and with the counterfeit ſhew of feigned Holineſs having procured to themſelves a great name amongſt thoſe rude People, with a number of windy headed Followers (filled with the novelty of their new Doctrine) raiſed firſt ſuch a diverſity of opinions about the true ſucceſſors of their untrue Prophet, and afterwards ſuch a Rebellion amongſt the People, as that the one yet remaineth, and the other was not in a good while after without great bloudſhed appeaſed.

But for the better underſtanding of the ground of theſe troubles, which hapned at this time in the Reign of Bajazet by occaſion of theſe two fugitive Perſians; as alſo for the mortal Wars which afterwards enſued betwixt Hyſmael (commonly called the great Sophi of Perſia) and Selymus, Bajazet his Succeſſor, it ſhall not be much from our purpoſe briefly to declare the great mutation which at this time happened to the Perſian Kingdom, as well in the State it ſelf, as in Matters of their Superſtition. At ſuch time as Aſymbeius Uſun-Caſſanes reigned in Perſia, there was one Haider Erdebil (whom Jovius calleth by the name of Harduelles) a man honourably deſcended amongſt the Perſians, who contemning worldly Honour, Riches, Pleaſure, and whatſoever elſe belonged unto delicacy of life (commonly accounted the greateſt part of Human Felicity) as meer Vanities and Trifles, led ſuch a ſtraight and auſtere kind of life, with ſuch continency and contempt of the World, as that the Vulgar People, for moſt part given to pleaſure, wondering at that in him which they could not or would not imitate, began to have the man in ſingular admiration for the opinion they had conceived of his upright Life and Vertues. The fame of this new Prophet (for ſo he was accounted) was grown ſo great in the Perſian Kingdom, that People without number reſorted out of all parts of Perſia and Armenia unto the great City of Tauris to ſee the man. And he the more to ſeduce the Multitude (delighted with Novelties) began to inveigh againſt the common received opinion of the Mahometans, concerning the true Succeſſors of their great Prophet; and to revive the opinion of Giuni, ſirnamed Sofi; perſwading the People (as if he had been inſpired with ſome divine Inſpiration) That none of the Profeſſors of the Mahometan Religion ſhould inherit the Kingdom of Heaven after they were dead, but ſuch as were the Followers of Haly, the true Succeſſor of the great Prophet Mahomet, and his Fellow in writing: Whom he taught them only to honour as privy to the mind of the great Prophet, and ſo to receive his Writings as of all others moſt authentical; rejecting Ebubekir, Omer, and Oſman, with their Writings, as moſt wicked and accurſed men; whom the Turks had ever, and yet do with the other Mahometans, honour and worſhip as the true ſucceſſors of their great Prophet Mahomet, and his ſincere Interpreters, together with the aforeſaid Haly, whom the Perſians do only acknowledge, and therefore in their Prayers do commonly ſay, Curſed be Ebubekir, Omer, and Oſman, and God be favourable to Haly, and well pleaſed with him. Which their difference about the true Succeſſor of their Prophet, in whom was no truth, hath been, and yet is, one of the greateſt cauſes of the mortal Wars between the Turks and Perſians; and not the divers interpretation of their Law (as many have written) which amongſt the Turks and Perſians is all one.

The Turks and Perſians differ not about the interpretation of their Law, but about the true Succeſſor of their great Prophet Mahomet.

Uſun-Caſſanes moved with the Fame and Vertues of this new Prophet, or rather (as ſome thought) deſirous to win the Hearts of the Multitude of them that had received this new phantaſie; gave him in marriage his Daughter Martha, begotten of the Chriſtian Lady Deſpina the Daughter of Calo Joannes, Emperor of Trapezond. Which marriage the Chriſtian Emperor made with the Mahometan Prince, and he alſo accepted thereof, thereby to ſtrengthen themſelves againſt the Turkiſh Emperor Mahomet the Great; whoſe power was then become a terror unto all his neighbour Princes; but to how ſmall purpoſe this policy ſerved them both, is before declared in the life of the ſame Mahomet. At the concluſion of this marriage, the Emperor had eſpecially covenanted with Uſun-Caſſanes, that his Daughter Deſpina might have the free exerciſe of the Chriſtian Religion. Whereby it came to paſs, that this Martha her Daughter, inſtructed by her Mother, became a Chriſtian alſo; who now married by her Father unto this preciſe Hypocrite Haider Erdebil, in ſhort time bare him a Son called Hyſmael, whom ſhe ſo much as ſhe could trained up in the Principles of the Chriſtian Religion. Whereby it came to paſs, that afterwards when he had by rare fortune obtained the Kingdom of Perſia, he always during his life had the Chriſtians in good regard, and never found fault with their Religion.

Haider marrieth Martha the daughter of the great King Uſun Caſſanes.

Haider thus graced with the marriage of the great Kings Daughter Martha, only for his rare Vertues and Purity of Life, as was commonly ſuppoſed, grew now into far greater Credit and Eſtimation of the People than before. So that his doctrine and opinions began to be generally received, and the number of his Followers ſo greatly augmented, that Jacup ſucceeding his Father Uſun-Caſſanes but lately dead, began to have the Power and Credit of Haider his Brother in law in ſuſpect; and to diſtruſt leſt the Perſians (who ſecretly favoured the remainder of the Poſterity of their ancient Kings) ſhould aſſemble together under the colour of this new Superſtition, and raiſe ſome dangerous Rebellion before he were well ſetled in his Seat. For he was not ignorant, that Aſembeius (Uſun-Caſſanes his Father) had but by Force and Policy uſurped the Kingdom, having killed Moloonchres the lawful King; whereof there aroſe two Factions, ſome favouring the Uſurper, and otherſome the poor remainder of the deſcent of their ancient Kings of the race of Tamerlane. For which cauſes Jacup (as he was of a ſuſpitious and troubleſome Nature, and above meaſure jealous of his State) nothing regarding the near Alliance or reputed holineſs of his godly Brother in law, cauſed him (ſuſpecting no ſuch matter) to be ſecretly murdred; and ſo having ſtruck off his Head, with Fire and Sword perſecuted all the Profeſſors of that new Doctrine; ſo to deliver himſelf for ever of that his vain and needleſs fear; Hyſmael the Son of Haider (who was afterwards called the great Sophi of Perſia) being then but a Child, as it were by fatal Deſtiny eſcaped the Fury of his cruel Uncle Jacup, and fled into Hyrcania, unto one Pyrchales his Fathers Friend, who then ruled in a ſmall Territory near unto the Caſpian Sea.

Haider Erdebil ſecretly murdred.

Amongſt many others of the Diſciples and Followers of Haider (which in that cruel Perſecution were glad to flie for ſafeguard of their lives) the two before named, Chaſan Shelife, and Schach Culi, afterwards ſirnamed Cuſelbas, in outward ſhew both of Vertue and Learning not inferior unto their Maſter, flying that dangerous Tempeſt, and paſſing over the River Euphrates, came into Armenia the leſſer, and there took up their dwelling at the great Mountain Antitaurus; at the foot whereof the broken Rocks have divers dark and obſcure Caves; made partly by Art, and partly by Nature; which place is of the Inhabitants called Teke-Ili; whereof divers Hiſtoriographers, I know not whether deceived by the name of the place, or elſe wittingly transferring the name of the place unto the man that lived therein, have called this Schach Culi (who of the two proved of greater fame) by the name of Techellis, by which name we will alſo from henceforth call him. A thing heretofore much uſed amongſt the religious, and alſo ſome of the Children of great Princes, who oftentimes bare the names of the places where they were born, or where they moſt lived. This place is both wholeſome and exceeding pleaſant, for the variety of Fruits and lively Springs, wherewith the Plains adjoyning are continually watered, and the Mountains at all times of the year garniſhed.

Here Shelife with his Companion Techellis, having ſeparated themſelves far from the Company of men, and given themſelves wholly to a contemplative life, for divers years lived moſt ſtraitly and auſterely, contenting themſelves with ſuch things as the Earth of it ſelf afforded them, without ſeeking for better. Theſe Hypocrites were firſt ſeen, and afterwards acquainted with the Shepheards and Heardſmen living upon the Mountains; and in proceſs of time with the rude Husbandmen and Country People, who wondring at their ſtrait and devout kind of life, relieved them with all things neceſſary. Yea Bajazet himſelf hearing of their auſtere and devout manner of living, ſent them yearly ſix or ſeven thouſand Aſpers, as his Alms given them upon Charity and Devotion. But afterwards when they began to tell Fortunes, and as it were by the way of divination to prognoſticate of things to come, the Rural People held them for more than men, and conceived of them a firm opinion, that they were ſome divine Prophets. And ſo were by the Country People firſt drawn into the Country Villages, and afterwards, as if it had been againſt their Wills, into the Cities; where they had in ſhort time filled all the Country far and near, with the admiration of their fame; But after they began to publiſh their new phantaſied Doctrine concerning the true ſucceſſor of their great Prophet Mahomet, they wanted not their new fangled followers (as had Haider their Maſter before amongſt the Perſians) who had them in ſingular Reverence; perſwaded now by them, that they ſhould be condemned for ever, if they did not (as they were by them taught) give the honour of the true ſucceſſion of their great Prophet, only to Haly, and him only to reverence and call upon next unto the great Prophet himſelf.

The beginning of the Cuſelbaſſas.

When they had thus with their often Sermons and blinded Prophecies ſeduced the People, and in ſhort time won great Credit amongſt the Vulgar ſort, of themſelves too much given to Novelty and Superſtition; they commanded their Diſciples and Followers to wear upon their Turkiſh Hats a red Band or Ribband, whereby to be known from others that were not of their profeſſion. Of which red Bands or Ribbands, they which profeſſed this new Superſtition, were, and yet are over all the Eaſt part of the World called by the name of Cuſelbaſſas, which is to ſay, Red Heads.

Hyſmael his behaviour in the time of his exile.

Hyſmael alſo living in exile, moſt earneſtly embraced that new Superſtition which Haider his Father had before taught in Perſia, but with far better Fortune and Succeſs. For as ſoon as he was grown to mans Eſtate, he following his Fathers manner of life, and being by nature wonderful eloquent, comely of perſon, exceeding wiſe, and of an invincible Courage, was of the rude Vulgar People accounted of more like a god than a man; ſo that he grew to be of great fame and power amongſt thoſe barbarous People with whom he lived. And not the baſe and vulgar ſort only, but divers Noblemen alſo, and others of good reputation, once allured with the Novelty of his Doctrine, the more to manifeſt their good Will towards the Author of their ſect; after they had forſaken their old Superſtition, ceaſed not (as the manner of men is) to commend him in the higheſt degree of Vertue and Honour. And he himſelf as yet but a youth, altogether bending his Wit to the ſetting forth of himſelf, making ſemblance of more than was indeed in him, obtained, as if it had been againſt his Will, Riches, Honour, Fame, and Authority; of all which things, he as a notable diſſembler ſeemed to make no account or reckoning; neither were there ſome wanting which would ſware, that Haider his Father (as he was an excellent Aſtronomer) calculating his Nativity, ſhould ſay, That he ſhould prove a great Prophet, and the Author of true Religion, who ſubduing the greateſt part of the Eaſt, ſhould become as glorious both in matters of Religion and Martial Affairs, as was Mahomet the Great Prophet himſelf. Which report being bruted abroad amongſt the Vulgar People, greatly increaſed his Authority, and gave them occaſion to talk of wonders. Not long after, Hyſmael was firſt by the admiration, or rather aſſentation of his Friends and Followers, and afterwards as if it had been by a general conſent, ſirnamed Sophos, which amongſt thoſe People ſignifieth a wiſe man, or the Interpreter of the gods. Theſe proſperous beginnings, with the troubled State of the Perſian Kingdom, encouraged him to take in hand great matters; for his Uncle Jacup the Perſian King was long before dead, being together with his Son poiſoned by his adulterous Wife; which thing he preſently perceiving, enforced her to drink of the ſame Cup; and becauſe he would be ſure that ſhe ſhould not eſcape, with his own hand ſtruck off her Head, and immediately after died, with his Son. After whoſe Death great Troubles aroſe about the Succeſſion; and divers great men one after another aſpired to the Kingdom, which they enjoyed not long. And amongſt the reſt Elvan-Beg (whom Jovius calleth Alvantes) at that time ſtood in no ſure poſſeſſion of the Kingdom, being mightily impugned by his Brother Moratchamus.

Hyſmael returneth into Armenia, and recovereth his Inheritance.

Hyſmael taking hold of this opportunity, armed divers of the moſt able men of his Followers, and receiving ſome ſmall Aid from his poor old Friend Pyrchales, entred into Armenia, and there partly by the Fame that ran of him, and partly by the good Will of the People, rather than by any force, recovered his Fathers Inheritance, whereunto the remembrance of his dead Father did not a little further him. He encouraged with this good beginning, daily grew ſtronger and ſtronger, by the continual repairing unto him of ſuch as having once received the Doctrine of Haider, were glad of long (for fear of Perſecution) to diſſemble the ſame; but now having got an Head and Chieftain to cleave unto, began openly to ſhew themſelves again, and in great number to reſort unto him, in hope of the good ſucceſs of their Religion, not ſo happily begun by his Father.

Sumachia taken by Hyſmael.

His power thus dayly increaſing beyond his expectation, he laid Siege unto Sumachia, a City in the Confines of Media, which he took by force and ſacked; and with the Spoil thereof both inriched and armed his Souldiers, which before were for moſt part naked men. The taking of this City wonderfully increaſed both his Fame and Courage, as oftentimes it falleth out, That haughty minds, couragiouſly attempting high exploits, by the good event of their firſt attempts make way unto the full of their ſtately deſires. So after this, Hyſmaels thoughts were not ſo low, as to think of the taking of this or that little City; but how he might now compaſs the great City of Tauris, the very Seat of the Perſian Kings, and afterwards the Kingdom it ſelf. Whereupon repoſing no leſs confidence in his own good Fortune, than the Valour of his Souldiers, he marched with his Army directly to the City of Tauris, and that with ſuch expedition, that he was come before it before any ſuch thing was feared, much leſs provided for. Elvan the Perſian King was then at Tauris, and had but a little before fought a great Battel with his Brother Moratchamus for the the Kingdom; and having vanquiſhed him, drave him out of Armenia and Perſia; and afterwards, as it commonly falleth out in the winding up of Civil Wars,had cauſed divers of the chief Citizens of Tauris, which had taken part with his Brother againſt him, to be ſeverely executed, filling the Eyes of their Friends with the horrible ſpectacle of their diſmembred Bodies, and the Hearts of moſt men with ſorrow and heavineſs; whereby he had ſo alienated the minds of the Citizens from him, that now upon the approach of Hyſmael, they were all ready to forſake him; of which diſpoſition Hyſmael was beforehand informed, and upon the good hope thereof had haſted his coming. Elvan the Perſian King thus overtaken on the ſuddain, had not time to raiſe ſuch Forces as might ſuffice either to encounter his Enemy, or defend the City; wherefore deſpairing of his own Strength, and juſtly fearing the revolt and fury of the diſcontented Citizens, as a man diſmaid, ſuddainly fled out of the City. After whoſe departure the Gates were preſently ſet open to Hyſmael. For the Citizens which in thoſe troubleſome times (wherein the two Brethren contended for the Kingdom) had ſuffered great calamity, choſe rather in that preſent danger to receive a Conqueror of ſo great fame as was then Hyſmael, than to their utter deſtruction to oppoſe themſelves againſt him in the quarrel of their cruel King; and the rather, for that they ſaw a general ſecurity and open way to Preferment, propoſed unto all ſuch as ſhould receive the reformed Religion of this new Conqueror.

Hyſmael taketh the City of Tauris, and defaced the Tomb of his Uncle Jacup.

Hyſmael entring the City, ſlew certain of the Kings Guard which were not yet departed, and then utterly raſed the ſtately Tomb wherein his Uncle Jacup was after the manner of the Perſian Kings royally buried. And to mitigate the ſorrow he had ſo long conceived of his Fathers death, and with revenge to appeaſe his angry Ghoſt, he cauſed the Tyrants bones to be digged up and ſcattered abroad, and the memorial of his name to be quite raſed out of all places of the City.

Although Hyſmael was thus poſſeſſed of the Regal City of Tauris, and had thereby made a way for the obtaining of the whole Kingdom, yet he knew that ſo long as Elvan lived, his Conqueſt was not unto him aſſured; and therefore to the uttermoſt of his power he augmented his Army with new ſupplies taken up in that populous City, whom he furniſhed with Armor and Weapons taken out of the Kings Armory. In the mean time news was brought unto him, that the Perſian King before fled into the fartheſt part of his Kingdom, was now coming from Scyras with a great Army againſt him; and that Moratchamus his Brother, forgetting in this common danger all former quarrels, had raiſed a great Army about Babylon in Aſſyria, in ſhort time to joyn with his Brother.

Hyſmael goeth againſt the Perſian King.

Hyſmael nevertheleſs nothing terrified with the report of the great preparation of the two Brethren againſt him, to the intent he might ſeem to undertake this War by the appointment of God, and upon a greater aſſurance than upon his own Strength, reſolved to go againſt them. And ſo after he had muſtered his Army, and in beſt manner he could provide all things neceſſary, he ſet forward from Tauris; uſing no other perſwaſion to encourage his Souldiers, but that they ſhould all as became reſolute men, make haſt and follow him whom God had given them for a Chieftain and Leader, unto a moſt aſſured Victory. The Perſian King was at the ſame time ten daies journy from Tauris, when Hyſmael with incredible celerity preventing the fame of his coming, was come to the Mountain Niphates, which parteth Armenia from Aſſyria; which Mountain, Elvan purpoſing ſhortly to paſs over with his populous Army, had ſent before his Scouts to diſcover the ſtrait paſſages, and a multitude of Pioneers to make the ways more commodious for his great Army to paſs. Which thing Hyſmael underſtanding, and politiquely conſidering that it would be much for his advantage, if he ſhould firſt himſelf paſs over thoſe great Mountains, and ſo upon the ſuddain ſet upon his Enemies then lying in ſecurity, and fearing nothing leſs than ſuch a deſperate attempt; upon that reſolution advanced his Enſigns upon the Mountains; and having with ſmall reſiſtance diſcomfited them which kept the paſſages, came down the ſame Mountains like a tempeſt, and furiouſly aſſailed the King, then lying in his Camp on the other ſide at the foot of the Mountain; upon the approach of whom, ſuch a hurly burly was raiſed in the Kings Camp, that what for the confuſed tumult of the Souldiers, and fearful outcries of the multitude of baſe People which followed the Camp, the King could ſcarcely give order unto his Captains what he would have done, or yet incourage his Souldiers, or put them in order of Battel. So that Hyſmael giving a fierce onſet with his Armenian Souldiers, there was ſuddainly begun a moſt terrible and bloody Battel. Neither did that day the fortune of Hyſmael fail him, whoſe courage and proweſs never failed; for aſſailing the Kings Battel of Footmen, with three Squadrons at once, he had overcome them and put them to flight before that the Horſemen could arm themſelves and mount their Horſes, which were for moſt part unſadled and unbridled at his coming. The King, who had nothing either feared or foreſeen this ſo ſuddain a miſchief, but had vainly perſwaded himſelf, That the very fame of his coming with ſo huge an Army, would ſo terrifie his Enemies, as that he ſhould find none either at Tauris, or in all Armenia, that durſt make reſiſtance; was glad now to run to and fro to encourage his Souldiers, to ſtay his diſcomfited Battels, yea and to come to handy-blows himſelf. But when neither his Captains nor Souldiers could put in execution his ſuddain directions which he was inforced to give in that imminent danger, being at once overcome with ſhame and deſperation, he reſolutely thruſt himſelf into the head of his Battel, and there valiantly fighting was ſlain. Whereupon the Perſian Horſemen, the greateſt Strength of the Kings Army, having now no King for whom they ſhould fight, betook themſelves to flight, after whom followed the Archers, and all the reſt of the Kings Army.

Elvan the Perſian King ſlain.

When as Hyſmael had with leſs loſs than a man would have thought ſo great a Victory could have been atchieved, poſſeſſed the Enemies Tents, he made no great purſuit after them, for that he thought it more requiſite to refreſh his Souldiers throughly wearied and almoſt ſpent with long travel and late fight; wherefore for certain days he repoſed himſelf with his Army in thoſe his Enemies forſaken Tents. Afterwards, when he had received Embaſſadors from divers places, yielding their Cities and Towns, and that the favour of the People generally inclined to him, together with the Victory; he marched with his Army to Scyras; where he was of the Citizens who had before heard of the Victory, joyfully received, and his Army relieved with all things he could deſire. Hyſmael there entertained with the greateſt honours that the fearful Citizens could poſſibly attribute to him,did oftentimes preach unto them of the truth and excellency of his Fathers Doctrine, and withal gave out ſtrait Proclamations, tions, That he would account all them for his Enemies, which did not within the ſpace of thirty days renounce their old Superſtition, and receive this new found verity (as he would have it.) Wherefore, foraſmuch as on the one ſide were propoſed moſt certain rewards, by the happy courſe of his Victories, and on the other, was threatned Exile and Torture to ſuch as ſhould obſtinately perſiſt in their opinion; in ſhort time he drew all the vulgar People to embrace his new Doctrine. And afterwards having paid his Souldiers with the riches of that great City, he gallantly furniſhed both his old and new Souldiers that wanted Armor, with moſt excellent Armor and Furniture; for in that City, one of the greateſt and moſt famous of the Eaſt, were many Shops full of all kind of Armor, which the Armorers with wonderful cunning uſed to make of Iron and Steel, and in the juice of certain Herbs, of much more notable temper and beauty than are theſe which are made with us in Europe; not only Head-pieces, Curiaſſes, and compleat Armors, but whole Capariſons for Horſes, curiouſly made of thin plates of Iron and Steel. Departing from Scyras, he took alſo the great City of Sapha ſuppoſed to have been the City in ancient time called Suſa, and Sultania, which for the wonderful ruines of the huge Buildings, is deemed to have been the ancient and famous City Tigranocreta. Theſe great matters quickly diſpatched, and having in every City placed Governors of his own Sect, he paſſed over the River Tygris in Meſopotamia of purpoſe to expulſe Moratchamus the late Kings Brother, out of Babylon, who was yet in Arms, and had intended (as is before ſaid) to have paſſed into Armenia, to have joyned his Forces with the King his Brother; but now terrified with his Brothers Calamity (who together with a moſt puiſſant Army, and the Strength of the Perſian Kingdom, was in one day fallen from the height of ſo great a Fortune) thought it not beſt to try his fortune in the Field againſt ſo fortunate an Enemy, but forthwith to withdraw himſelf into the remoteſt places of that large Kingdom, and from thence to expect ſome better Fortune. For he well knew that he was not able to withſtand his victorious Enemy, now leading after him a moſt puiſſant Army, who not long before had with a ſmall power vanquiſhed and ſlain his Brother in a great Battel. Hyſmael now by the greatneſs of his Fame and Forces, and as it were by the Favour of God himſelf, become a terror to all the Princes of the Eaſt, entred into Meſopotamia after the flight of Moratchamus, and received all that great Province into his Subjection, every man as it were ſtriving who ſhould firſt by his Speedy Submiſſion purchaſe the Favour of the victorious Conqueror. To be brief, Moratchamus already terrified, and repoſing no great hope in himſelf, or his own power, neither deeming it for his ſafety to ſhut up himſelf within the Walls of any ſtrong City, truſt up his things of greateſt price, and with his Wives and Children fled into Arabia.

Hyſmael goeth againſt Moratchamus.

This Moratchamus is he whom ſome Hiſtoriographers called Mara-Beg, and is in the Turks Hiſtories called Imirſa Beg, who (as they report) afterwards marrying the Daughter of Bajazet, and recovering part of the Perſian Kingdom, was ſuddainly murthred by ſome of his Nobility, whom he purpoſed ſecretly to have put to death, if they had not prevented the ſame by murthring of him firſt. Hyſmael having victoriouſly ſubdued a great part of the Perſian Kingdom, and filled all the Eaſt part of the World with the glory of his name, returned out of Aſſyria into Media, and took in ſuch Cities and ſtrong Holds as were yet holden by the Garriſons of the late Perſian King. And afterwards returning into Armenia, made Wars upon the Albanians, Iberians, and Scythians, which dwell upon the Borders of the Caſpian; for that thoſe Nations, in ancient times tributaries unto the Perſian Kings, taking the benefit of the long Civil Wars wherewith the Kingdom of Perſia, and all the Eaſt Countries, with the ruin of the Kings Houſe, had been of late turmoiled; had neither paid any Tribute by the ſpace of four years, nor ſent any honourable Embaſſage, as they were wont, and as was expected, eſpecially in ſo great a Victory and alteration of the State.

Hyſmael having thus obtained the Perſian Kingdom, in ſhort time became famous through the World, and was juſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt Monarchs of that Age. But nothing made him more to be ſpoken of, than the innovation he had made in the Mahometan Superſtition; for by his device and commandment a new form of Prayer was brought into their Mahometan Temples, far differing from that which had been of long time before uſed. By reaſon whereof, Ebubekir, Homer, and Oſman, the ſucceſſors of their great Prophet Mahomet, before had in great regard and reverence, began now to be contemned, and their writings nothing regarded; and the honour of Hali exalted, as the true and only Succeſſor of their great Prophet. And becauſe he would have his Subjects and the Followers of his Doctrine known from the Turks and other Mahometans, he commanded that they ſhould all wear ſome red Hatband, Lace, or Ribband upon their Heads; which they Religiouſly obſerve in Perſia until this day; whereof they are of the Turks called Cuſelba's, or Redheads. And in ſhort time he had ſo uſed the matter, that he was wonderfully both beloved and reverenced of his Subjects; inſomuch that his ſayings were accounted for divine Oracles, and his commandments for Laws: ſo that when they would confirm any thing by ſolemn Oath, they would ſwear by the Head of Hyſmael the King; and when they wiſhed well to any Man, they uſually ſaid, Hyſmael grant thee thy deſire. Upon his Coyn which he made both of Silver and Gold, on the one ſide was written theſe words, La illahe illalahu Muhame dum reſul allahe: which is to ſay, There is no Gods but one, and Mahomet is his Meſſenger. And on the other ſide, Iſmaill halife lullahe; which is to ſay, Hyſmael the Vicar of God.

Chaſan Chelife and Techellis invade the Turks Dominions.

Whilſt Hyſmael was thus wreſtling for the Perſian Kingdom, Chaſan Chelife and Techellis (whom we have a little before declared to have bin brought out of the Mountains and Deſarts, into the Country-Villages, and afterwards into the Cities; and to have filled the Countries of Armenia and a great part of the leſſer Aſia with the novelty of their new Doctrine and Opinions, firſt phantaſied by one Giunet Siech, and afterward revived by Haider Erdebil, Hyſmael his Father) having gathered a great Army of ſuch as had received their Doctrine, invaded the Turks Dominion. For after that Techellis (this cold Prophet) had with wonderful felicity in the preſence of many prognoſticated of things to come; and Hyſmael the Sophi (of late a poor exiled and baniſhed man) was thought to have grown unto the higheſt type of Worldly Honours, not by mans help, but by uprightneſs of life, and the fortunate paſſage of an undoubted Religion; ſuch a deſire of receiving that new Superſtition poſſeſſed the minds of the People in general, that the Cities and Towns thereabouts were now full of them which in token of their new profeſſion had taken upon them the wearing of the Red Hat, the known Cogniſance of the Cuſelba's. Firſt they met together at the City of Taſcia, at the Foot of the Mountain Antitaurus, or as the Turkiſh Hiſtory reports, at the City of Attalia, to the number of ten thouſand, upon a great Fair-day; where they laid hands upon the chief Magiſtrate of the City, and executed him, ſetting his quarters upon four of the higheſt Towers of the City; and further perſwaded by theſe new Maſters of this new Superſtition, to take up Arms in defence of themſelves and of their ſincere Religion (as they termed it) in caſe that any violence ſhould be offered them by the irreligious Turks; they all ſwore never to forſake their Captains for any diſtreſs, or yet refuſe any labour or adventure for the honour of their moſt holy Religion (as they would have it) in defence whereof they had already vowed their Souls and Bodies. Theſe Ringleaders of Rebellion, ſeeing the minds of their frantick Followers ſo well prepared for their purpoſe, and repoſing a great confidence in their valor and reſolution; and withal conſidering that the mony which was bountifully brought in unto them by the Country People, partly for Devotion, partly for Fear, was not ſufficient to maintain ſo great a multitude, gave leave by publique Proclamation to their unruly Followers, to forrage the Country round about them, and to live upon the Spoil of them which would not receive their new found Doctrine. Whereupon they dividing themſelves into divers Companies, and ranging up and down the Country, brought into the Camp abundance of Cattel, and other ſuch things as the Country yielded; and forthwith (their multitude ſtill increaſing) they entred into Lycaonia, a populous and fruitful Country, where they refreſhed themſelves many days, roaming up and down to the great grievance and terror of the People; and brought ſuch a fear upon the whole Country, that they which dwelt in open Durps and Villages, were glad to flie with their Wives, Children and Goods, into the ſtrong City of Iconium; for Proclamations were in many places ſet up in the names of Chaſan Cheliſe and Techellis, wherein many both Spiritual and Temporal Bleſſings were in moſt ample manner propoſed to all ſuch as ſhould forthwith take part with them, and follow that their new Doctrine already eſtabliſhed in Perſia; but unto ſuch as ſhould obſtinately perſevere in their old Superſtition, after they had once drawn their Sword, was threatned utter deſtruction without without hope of pardon of Life. So that all the Inhabitants thereabouts, terrified with the terror of this Proclamation, ſome for fear of Death, ſome upon Inconſtancy, ſome for ſafeguard of their Goods and Poſſeſſions (dearer unto them than any Religion) ſome other indebted, infamous, in danger of Law, beſides many fugitive Servants, daily reſorted to theſe new Maſters. Not long after, whilſt the Turks were making preparation for the ſuppreſſing of this dangerous Rebellion, certain Troops of Horſemen ſent from Hyſmael, came in good time to theſe new Prophets; for Hyſmael in favour and furtherance of that new Superſtition, had a little before by fit Meſſengers exhorted them to proceed couragiouſly in their ſo religious an enterpriſe, and to join Martial Force unto the Religion they profeſſed; promiſing further, not to be wanting unto them at their need, but to ſend them skilful Leaders, and from time to time to furniſh them with Coin for the maintenance of that War. All this Hyſmael did openly in deſpight of Bajazet, of ſmall beginnings to ſow the Seed of greater War. For he bearing an old grudg againſt Bajazet for the former Wars betwixt the Turks and the Perſians, as alſo for their diſagreement in matters concerning their Superſtition, and prickt forward with the heat of youth, deſired nothing more in the greatneſs of his power, and proſperous ſucceſs of his Affairs, than to have occaſion to make War with the Turkiſh King; for which purpoſe he ſent his Embaſſadors unto the State of Venice, to joyn with them in League and Amity, in ſuch form and ſort as they had long time before, by Catarinus Zemes, Barbarus, and Contarenus their Embaſſadors, concluded with Uſun-Caſſanes the great Perſian King his Grandfather. The chief things that he requeſted of the Venetians, was, That they would ſend him out of Italy by the way of Syria, men skilful in the caſting of great Ordnance, and with their Fleet to trouble Bajazet by Sea; promiſing in the mean time himſelf to fill Aſia the leſs with his Army by Land, and ſo to give a fair occaſion unto them, to recover by Sea all ſuch places as they had before in the late Wars loſt unto the Turks upon the Coaſt of Peloponneſus and Grecia.

Hyſmael ſends Embaſſadors unto the Venetians to joyn in League with them againſt Bajazet.

The Venetians having with all courteſie entertained the Embaſſadors, gave them anſwer, That they would never be forgetful of the ancient League and Amity they had made with the Perſian King; the remembrance whereof was unto their State a thing moſt pleaſant; and that they were wonderful glad, that the new King was an Enemy unto the Turk, and had them in ſuch regard, as to participate to them the cauſes of that War; and further to promiſe unto them thoſe things, which if his Grandfather Uſun-Caſſanes, or his Uncle Jacup would have performed, he ſhould not now have had need to make Wars with the Turkiſh Emperor. But ſuch was the alteration of things and times, that as the Perſian Kings then living at home in peace, thought it not good to ſtir whilſt Bajazet was buſie in Europe; ſo now their State ſtanding in far worſe condition and fortune, could not perform that which they heartily wiſhed, and moſt of all deſired; for that they thought it not good to break the League which they had not long before made with Bajazet the Turkiſh Emperor; eſpecially then, when ſundry warlike Nations of Europe conſpiring together, and divers mighty Kings provoked with no injury, but only envying at their happy eſtate, made Wars upon them; yet neverheleſs were in good hope, that God would ſtand in their juſt defence, and ſtill preſerve their State, which no Enemies power had for the ſpace of ſeven hundred years and more been able to overcome. Wherefore they ſhould ſhew unto their King, that they would as occaſion ſhould ſerve, and as it ſhould ſtand with the good of their State, do their uttermoſt devoir to make him underſtand, that nothing was dearer unto them than the Friendſhip of ſo great a King; nor any thing more honourable, than by mutual Counſel and combined Forces to aſſail the Turk their common Enemy.

Shortly after, the Embaſſadors (having obtained nothing more than the hope of a League to be in time concluded, and being honourably rewarded) returned with their Gallies to Cyprus, and ſo from thence to Syria, where they had ſecret conference with Petrus Zenus (the Son of Caterinus Zenus, a man famous for his Embaſſage unto Uſun-Caſſanes into Perſia) Governor of the Venetian Merchants at Damaſco. Which thing Bajazet having intelligence of, and of the paſſage of the Perſian Embaſſadors that way, complained grievouſly both by his Embaſſadors and Letters unto Campſon Gaurus Sultan of Egypt, That he dealt not as a Friend and Confederate with him, in ſuffring theſe Embaſſadors ſo to paſs throughout the midſt of Syria, unto the Chriſtians their common Enemies, to ſtir them up to War. Whereupon all the Venetian Merchants which were at Tripolis, Aleppo, Damaſco, Berytus, and Alexandria, and eſpecially Zenus himſelf, were forthwith apprehended by the commandment of the great Sultan, and carried in Bonds to Caire, where they were many times enforced in Chains to anſwer unto ſuch things as were laid to their Charge, and after they had by the ſpace of a year endured the manifold deſpights of the proud Mamalukes, hardly obtained to eſcape with Life and Liberty.

The two ſeditious Prophets, Chaſan and Techellis, well ſtrengthned with the aid of the Perſians, were now come unto Iconium, the moſt famous City of Lycaonia; and waſting all the Country before them, drew a great multitude of People to receive their new Doctrine. For the repreſſing of which outrages, Orchanes and Mahometes, two of Bajazet his Nephews (who in ſtead of their Fathers Alem Schach and Tzian Schach, the Sons of Bajazet before dead, governed thoſe Countries) gathered together their Forces, and diſdaining to ſuffer ſuch diſgrace by ſuch a Rabble of raſcal People, in the ſight of ſo famous a City, came into the Field to give them battel. But they in their youthful heat making too much haſt, and joyning battel in a place of diſadvantage, were by the Rebels overthrown and put to flight. Neither would theſe Ringleaders in that Victory have forborn to have aſſailed Iconium, but that they wanted Artillery and Engins of War requiſite for the beſieging of Cities.

Orchanes and Mahometes two of Bajazet his Nephews overthrown by Techellis.

Corcutus alſo, one of the Sons of Bajazet, having at the ſame time levied a convenient Army about Thiatyra, Sypilus, Magneſia and Phocea, durſt not further ſtir or ſet forward againſt the Rebels, although they lay diſperſed about the Country faſt by him. Theſe new Prophets with Enſigns diſplaied, marching from Country to Country through the heart of the leſſer Aſia, entred at length into Bithynia, where near unto the River Sangarius they met with Caragoſes Baſſa the Viceroy of Aſia, coming againſt them with a great Army well appointed, which he had a little before raiſed upon the Bruit of the coming of theſe Rebels; and had alſo commanded Achometes (whom the Turks call Achmetes) the eldeſt Son of Bajazet then living, Governor of the great Countries of Cappadocia and Pontus, to raiſe his power, and to follow at the Back of the Rebels; who if they ſhould hap to be put to the worſe, would neither be able to retire, neither to keep the Field, being ſo ſhut up betwixt two ſo great Armies. But Techellis by his ſpeedy coming fruſtrated theſe deſigns of the Viceroy; for marching with all ſpeed, he was upon Caragoſes before he was well aware of his coming, near unto the Mountain Hormynus, as he was then taking up of more Souldiers, and daily expected the coming of others, as if he had been going againſt ſome puiſſant Enemy. The Viceroy ſeeing the Rebels approach, although he had before not purpoſed to have encountred them before he had raiſed far greater Forces; thought it not now to ſtand with his honour, to refuſe to give them Battel, although his Army for the moſt part conſiſted of the rude Country Peſants, taken up upon the ſuddain out of Paphlagonia, Galatia, Pontus, and Bithynia, raw Souldiers, and for moſt part unarmed; as commonly they are which in thoſe Countries are preſſed againſt their Wills out of the Towns and Villages, and are of the Turks called Aſapi, who of the Janizaries are ſcarcely accounted for men. But his greateſt confidence he repoſed in the approved Valour of his ancient Horſemen, by whoſe means he doubted not, in ſafety to retire out of the Battel, and to ſave himſelf if any thing ſhould fall out otherwiſe than well; making no great account of the common Souldiers, more than by them if he could, to weaken the Force of the Rebels; who on the other ſide (their greateſt Force conſiſting of Footmen) had no hope to ſave themſelves by Flight, but only by plain Valor and dint of Sword. Which Techellis well conſidering, exhorted his Souldiers to remember into what Country they were come, and that there was no Cities of refuge, no new power, no other gods of defence to flie unto, if they ſhould not that day play the men; Wherefore let us couragiouſly (ſaid he) ſet forward againſt our Enemies, and by Victory defend our Lives, together with the Truth of our Religion, for which we have vowed both our Souls and Bodies. He had ſcarcely ſaid thus much, but that his whole Army, in token of chearfulneſs, gave a moſt terrible ſhout, and without further ſtay ſet upon their Enemies. The Viceroy had placed his Footmen in the main Battel in the middle, and his Horſemen in the Wings, thereby to have compaſſed his Enemies; but Techellis had ſet all his Footmen in one great ſquare Battel, and his Perſian Horſemen for a refuge. But the Viceroy his freſh-water Souldiers could ſcarcely abide the ſight of Techellis his Army; for in the front of the Battel ſtood Souldiers throughly armed, and all the reſt of his Army with red Hats upon their Heads, as if they had been imbrued with Blood, which wonderfully terrified the Baſſaes cowardly and unskilful Souldiers; ſo that having indured the Fight ſcarcely half an hour, they all turned their Backs and fled. The Turkiſh Horſemen which had valiantly aſſailed the Rebels Army on both ſides, although they had ſlain many with their Arrows and Lances, and ſomewhat diſordered the Battel, for that the Footmen were inforced to leave their places, and to preſs ſtill on forward againſt them; yet when Techellis his Souldiers (having overcome the Footmen, and dividing themſelves into divers Squadrons) began with their long Pikes to kill their Horſes, and to lay hardly unto them, they likewiſe betook themſelves to Flight alſo. Then the Perſian Horſemen (which all this while had ſtood ſtill as lookers on) left their ſtandings and following the chaſe ſlew many of the Turks in their diſordered Flight; and following faſt on, incloſed the Viceroy as he was ſtaying of his Horſemen, and could not for the thickneſs of the duſt well diſcern his Enemies; ſo that he had been there taken, if he had not been ſpeedily reſcued by his Guard, and ſo delivered from that danger. The reſt of the Turks Horſemen ſaved themſelves by flight. In this Battel ſeven thouſand of the Turks Footmen were ſlain, and all their Enſigns taken, with great ſtore of Proviſion.

The battel between Caragoſes and Techellis.

Techellis beſiegeth Caragoſes the Viceroy, in the City of Cutaie.

After which Victory, Chaſan and Techellis reſting their Army one day, marched to the City of Cutaie, near unto the mountain Horminius: This City is ſituated as it were in the midſt of Aſia the leſs, and is the Seat of the Turkiſh Emperors Viceroy in Aſia; as Sophia in Mœſia is for his other Vceroy in Europe; for it was reported, that the Country People had for fear of the preſent War conveied thither the greateſt part of their Wealth; and the Rebels well knew, that the Viceroy himſelf with his chief Horſemen were fled thither alſo; neither doubted they, but that all the Army might be greatly inriched by the Wealth of that City, if they ſhould without delay imploy their whole Forces for the gaining thereof, their Enemies now altogether diſcouraged with their late overthrow. Techellis alſo deeming that enterpriſe of ſo much worth as whereon to gage his whole Forces, coming before the City, placed ſuch Field Pieces as he had before taken in the Battel, and his Archers in ſuch fit places as might moſt annoy the Defendants; afterward he cauſed ſcaling Ladders to be ſet up, and Proclamation made through all his Camp, That the whole Spoil of the City ſhould be the Souldiers if they could take it; with promiſe of greater rewards to them that ſhould firſt recover the top of the Walls. Filled with this hope, the rebellious multitude approached the Wall, fearing neither Enemies Force, multitude of Shot, or danger of Death; ſtriving who ſhould firſt mount the Ladders, and ſome climbing one in the neck of another, ſo to get up by the ruins of the Wall. The Defendants in the mean time from above caſting down upon them great Stones, Timber, Fire, ſcalding Water, Lime, Sand, and ſuch like without meaſure; wherewith although many were overthrown and cruſht to death or ſpoiled, yet others preſently ſtept up in their place; neither was any of them ſeen, for fear of the preſent danger to ſhrink back or be diſcouraged; for the Viceroy on the one ſide, and Techellis on the other, were both Eye-witneſſes of every mans Valor in that hot ſervice; the one prickt forward with doubtful hope, for fear to be enforced to give over the Aſſault ſo begun; and the other with the due regard of his Honour, Life and State, all ſubject to that danger, and therefore in perſon himſelf performed all the parts of a worthy Chieftain and couragious Souldier. But at length the Defendants wearied with the fierce Aſſault of the Enemy, and for moſt part wounded, Techellis continually ſending in freſh men, and withdrawing ſuch as were hurt, by plain force brake into the City in two places over the heaps of the dead bodies; and having repulſed the Defendants, burſt open one of the Gates, and thereby brought in his whole Army. Then began a miſerable Slaughter of the Souldiers and poor Citizens in every Houſe and Corner of the City. At which inſtant the Palace (whither the Viceroy had retired himſelf with his Family) was alſo taken; the Viceroy himſelf with his Wives and Children were there alſo taken Priſoners, and the ſtately Palace built with Marble, in a trice conſumed with fire.

Caragoſes the Viceroy with his Wives and Children taken by Techellis in the City of Cutaie.

The rich City of Cutaie, the Seat of the great Commander of the Turkiſh Empire in Aſia, thus taken by Techellis, and his whole Army both beautified and inriched with the ſpoil thereof; he perſwaded himſelf, that it was now no hard matter for him to take the City of Pruſa alſo, the ancient Seat of the Turkiſh Kings in Bithynia, and ſo to endanger the whole State of the Turks Empire in Aſia, if he ſhould now without delay carry the terror of himſelf thither, before the Turks could in that Country make head againſt him, or the Citizens be able in ſo ſuddain a fear to make any ſufficient proviſion for the defence of themſelves and their City; and ſo in the courſe of his good fortune to uſe the courage and chearfulneſs of his Souldiers. Wherefore appointing a day when he would ſet forward, he commanded all things neceſſary to be made ready for the taking of that rich City, being neither ſtrongly walled, neither furniſhed with any good Garriſon for the defence thereof.

But whilſt he was making this preparation, a new Army, lately ſhipt over the Helleſpont from Callipolis into Aſia, inforced him to change his former determination. For Bajazet awaked at the name of Techellis, and the fame of the new Superſtition now generally received in Perſia, had long before given commandment to his Sons, Nephews, and the Viceroy of Aſia, That they ſhould with all carefulneſs provide, that that part of his Kingdom took no harm thereby. But after he ſaw Techellis of a poor Hermit become a great Captain, and backt alſo with the Perſian King, and all his Dominions in Aſia in danger of ſome great alteration; he ſent Alis Baſſa with his Europeian Army. This Alis an Eunuch, born in Macedonia (yet for his courage comparable with the greateſt Captains) had for his many and worthy deſerts, in the time of the great Emperor Mahomet, Bajazet his Father, got unto himſelf both the honour and name of a moſt famous Chieftain. He having made choice of the principal Horſemen of Epirus, Macedonia, Servia, Illyria, and Thracia, and joyning unto them ſeven thouſand Janizaries (the moſt aſſured hope of the Turks in all their expeditions) paſſed over from Callipolis into Phrigia, and upon the way directed his Letters unto Achomates and Corcutus, Bajazet his Sons, and to all the other Sanzacks and Governors of the Turks Provinces in Aſia, That they ſhould with as much ſpeed as they could, raiſe their Forces and meet him in Galatia. But Techellis advertiſed of his coming, thought it beſt for him to depart out of Pontus, and to retire to ſome place of more ſafety, leſt by longer ſtaying he ſhould be incloſed by his Enemies, repairing thitherwards on every ſide; or elſe upon ſome great diſadvantage to join Battel; for he ſaw, that if he ſtaid never ſo little, he ſhould find no ſafe paſſage or place of refuge to retire unto, having left ſuch large and ſpacious Countries, ſo many Enemies Cities, ſo many great Rivers, ſo many diſcontented People behind him; all which the firſt favour of the Vulgar Sort, and ſpeedy courſe of his Victory, had a little before laid open unto him. Wherefore calling together his Captains and moſt expert Men of War to conſult upon the matter, it was generally thought to be a point of meer madneſs, or elſe of extream neceſſity, with ſo ſmall a power of unskilful Souldiers, without any ſufficient ſtrength of Horſemen, to joyn Battel with ſuch an Enemy as better knew the Country than he, and far exceeded him both for number and expertneſs of his Souldiers. Wherefore Techellis truſſing up his rich Prey he had before gotten, began now with ſpeed to retire back again with his Followers through Galatia. But the Baſſa having intelligence almoſt every hour by Letters and Eſpials, both of the retiring of Techellis, and the way he held, paſſed over the River Sangarius, and coaſting the Country, came and encamped betwixt the Cities of Cutaie and Ancyra, which way it was ſuppoſed the Enemy would paſs. Where when he had there a while reſted his wearied Souldiers, and was certainly advertiſed, that the Rebels had taken another way, he ſet forward again, and after five days march in the Plains of Galatia, overtook the ſtraglers of the Enemies, who wearied or wounded, were not able to hold way with the Army; all whom the Baſſa commanded to be cruelly put to the Sword. And Techellis to terrifie the great Baſſa, or at leaſtwiſe with a moſt horrible ſpectacle to ſtay his purſuit, cauſed Caragoſes the Viceroy, whom he had carried along with him in Chains, to be cruelly impailed by the highway ſide, upon a ſharp ſtake ſet faſt in the ground, and ſo left him ſticking for the Turks to wonder at. But Alis Baſſa nothing diſmaied with the horrible death of ſo great a perſonage, held on his way with more haſt than good ſpeed, exhorting his Souldiers patiently to endure the painfulneſs of the long march, and to ſtrain themſelves to take revenge of thoſe rebellious Theeves and Robbers, who deſtroying the Country before them, ſpared not ſo much as the Turks Children, and the Temples of their Religion; and ſo the day following came into the Plains of Ancyra. The ſame day alſo Achomates came unto the Baſſa with ten thouſand Souldiers. Alis Baſſa perceiving that he could not poſſibly with his whole Army overtake his Enemies, marching with greater ſpeed before him, and grieved at the heart to ſee them eſcape out of his hand, reſolved to prove if he could with his Horſemen overtake them; whereupon leaving his Footmen with Achomates, he himſelf with eight thouſand Horſe following the Enemy upon the ſpur, overtook the Rearward of their Army at the Mountain Olyga, a little from the City of Ancyra, unto whom he gave an hot skirmiſh.

The battel betwixt Alis Baſſa and Techellis.

Techellis which a little before had taken a fit place for his Camp, upon the riſing of the Hill, although he ſaw his men faint with long travel and the ſcorching heat of the Sun, yet quickly perceiving that he ſhould have to do only with Horſemen, and that in a place of advantage; turning his Army, and orderly placing his Souldiers, as the ground and the ſhortneſs of the time would give leave, valiantly received the impreſſion of the Turks, and with their long Pikes and Arrows at the firſt repulſed them; ſo that it ſeemed they would neither have given ground unto the bragging Horſemen, neither have done any thing not beſeeming their former Victories, had not Alis Baſſa ſent a thouſand Carbines, who in Troops orderly following one another, delivered their Shot as thick as Hail upon the Enemy; with which ſtorm many of them being ſlain, and more wounded, their ranks began to be ſomewhat diſordered; whereupon the other Horſemen breaking in, with great ſlaughter overthrew the Vantguard of Techellis Battel; in which conflict Chaſan Chelife himſelf was ſlain. Techellis always at hand where moſt need was, even in the midſt of the Slaughter of his men ſet in order a new Battel of his moſt ready and beſt armed Souldiers, the only remedy in ſo great a diſtreſs; and bringing them on into the front of the Battel, oppoſed them againſt the Horſemen, now (as they thought) in poſſeſſion of the Victory; commanding them by little and little to retire unto the Mountain, to the intent that they might ſeem to do that by commandment of the General, which they were like enough to have done of themſelves for fear; hoping that it would ſo come to paſs, That the Turks finding the diſadvantage of the place, would leave ſo hardly to aſſail them. But the Baſſa encouraged with the firſt ſucceſs of the battel, exhorted his Souldiers to urge the Victory, now almoſt as good as gotten, and not to give the Enemy ſpace to recover the ſtrength of the Mountain, but valiantly to charge them, and with a little ſhort pains that day to end all that War, to the honour of Bajazet their Soveraign, and worthy commendation of themſelves in general. In this ſort encouraging them, he with a Troop of his beſt Horſemen (to animate the reſt, and to ſhew his own Valour) brake through the Enemies Battel; which thing he in the ſame heat, with more courage than diſcretion, attempting to perform the ſecond time, was incloſed by his Enemies and ſlain; upon whoſe fall the fortune of the Battel was in a moment changed; for the Turks, which erſt fought couragiouſly, having beaten back and almoſt overthrown their Enemies, now diſmaied with their Generals death, began to fight but faintly, and by little and little to give ground, and at laſt turning their Horſes about, fled. On the other ſide Techellis his Souldiers, who but a little before had repoſed greater hope in the ſtrength of the place and the Mountain, than in their Weapons and Valour, now incouraged with new hope, and taking heart in the faint Charge of their Enemies, began to thruſt forward, and with a moſt terrible noiſe crying Victory, put to flight the Turks Horſemen, before wearied with long travel, when as they had by the Generals raſhneſs loſt a notable Victory almoſt already gained. Techellis although he knew that the Enemy could neither refreſh his Horſes, nor yet with any aſſurance keep the Field, if he ſhould have purſued him; yet having loſt many of his beſt Souldiers, and the reſt of his Army ſore weakned with Travel, Faſting, and Fighting, determined to refreſh his wearied Followers upon the Mountain Olyga. From whence after a few days he marched over the River Halys unto the City of Taſcia, his old dwelling place, and ſo to the City of Celenis, which the River Marſia (much ſpoken of by the Poets) runneth through, and is now called by the name of Maras, but as then the Regal Seat of the Mountain King Aladeules. The Turks Horſemen having thus in ſome ſmall ſort rather revenged the injuries done by the Rebels, than obtained any Victory, returned to Achomates, who was then coming on with the Footmen.

Jonuſes Baſſa ſent by Bajazet, General of his Army againſt Techellis.

Not long after, Bajazet underſtanding of the death of Alis Baſſa his General, ſent Jonuſes Baſſa, a warlike Captain, and of great experience (born in Epirus) in his ſtead. Who as ſoon as he had received the Charge of the Army from Achomates, marching forthwith into Cappadocia, and keeping the way on the right hand towards the Mountain Antitaurus, came in few daies unto the City of Taſcia, the place of Techellis his abode; where burning and deſtroying the Country all about, he came and encamped with his Army at the foot of the Mountain; The Baſſa had in his Army about forty thouſand Horſe and Foot, well appointed, with many Field Pieces, and plenty of Victuals which he brought with him, for fear of want in that bare Country. Techellis terrified with his coming, having of late received no Aid from Hyſmael the Perſian King, and wanting alſo great Artillery, and beſides that ſeeing his Souldiers greatly both diminiſhed and diſcouraged with the late Battel at Olyga; determined not upon ſo great diſadvantage to meet his Enemy in the plain Field, but to keep the rough Mountains and thick Woods, hoping that if he could be able any time to keep thoſe ſtrong places, he ſhould either receive ſome Aid from Hyſmael, or by the heat of the Turks Leaders take them at ſome notable advantage. In the mean time many notable skirmiſhes paſſed betwixt the Souldiers on both ſides; for the Turks fetching a compaſs oftentimes about the Mountains, and ſeeking for the beſt paſſages, by the eaſie riſing of the Hills, came to skirmiſh with their Enemies; and Techellis his Souldiers on the other ſide ſallying many times out of the Woods and abrupt places of the Mountains, valiantly aſſailed the Turks. After they had a long time in this ſort, as if it had been in diſport, rather proved their Forces one upon another, than done any great matter; the Turks prying into every corner, at length perceived two ways whereby their whole Army with Enſigns diſplayed might without any great difficulty be brought unto the top of the Mountain, and ſo into their Enemies ſtrength. The Baſſa having well viewed and conſidered the places, cauſed the Janizaries at one inſtant to march up to the Mountain by one of the aforeſaid ways, and the reſt of his Army by the other;

who with ſoft pace climing up the ſteep Mountains, with their Targuets defended themſelves as well as they could againſt their Enemies Darts and Shot. For Techellis his Souldiers having before taken the high Mountains and places of advantage, caſt down upon the Turks great Stones and Shot without number, as if it had been out of ſome ſtrong Forts. But the Turks bending certain ſmall Field Pieces againſt the places which moſt annoied them, eaſily drave them from their ſtandings; the Harquebuſiers ſtill following their Enſigns, ſhrouded cloſe under the Targuetiers, and delivered their deadly Shot as ſhowers of Rain upon their Enemies. Whoſe deſperate approach Techellis perceiving, cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded, and with all his Army retired farther off into the higer Mountains and rougher Woods. The night following, perceiving that by the evil ſucceſs of the former skirmiſh he had loſt a great part of his credit and ſtrength, he with great ſilence forſook the Woods, and paſſing quite over the Mountains fled into Armenia, then part of the Perſian Kingdom. Neither did the Turks perceive their departure until it was light day, and that their Scouts entring the thick Woods, and finding the Enemies baggage, with ſome wounded Souldiers not able to flie, brought news unto the Baſſa of the Enemies departure and of his ſpeedy flight into Armenia. Which thing, when he by them that were taken, underſtood to be certainly true, fretting and chafing like a mad man, that he had not preſently upon the Enemies Retreat beſet the Wood round, he ſent his Horſemen forthwith to purſue them; but all in vain, for Techellis was by direct and known ways gone into Armenia. Some few ſtraglers not able to make ſo much haſt as the reſt, were overtaken by the Turks Horſemen, and brought back to the Baſſa.

Techellis thus put to flight, Jovuſes cauſed ſtrait inquiſition to be made through all the Cities of the leſſer Aſia, for all ſuch as had profeſſed the Perſian Religion; and them whom he found to have born Arms in the late Rebellion, he cauſed to be put to death with moſt exquiſit Torments, and the reſt to be burnt in their Foreheads with an hot Iron, thereby for ever to be known; whom together with the Kinsfolks and Friends of them that were executed, or fled with Techellis, he cauſed to be tranſported into Europe, and to be diſperſed through Macedonia, Epirus, and Peloponneſus; for fear leſt if Techellis now fled into the Perſian Kingdom, ſhould from thence return with new Forces, they ſhould alſo again repair unto him, and raiſe a new Rebellion. This was the beginning, courſe, and ending, of one of the moſt dangerous Rebellions that ever troubled the Turkiſh Empire; wherein all, or at leaſtwiſe the greateſt part of their Dominions in Aſia, might have been eaſily ſurpriſed by the Perſian King, if he would throughly have proſecuted the occaſion and opportunity then offered.

The remainder of Techellis his Followers, flying into Perſia, by the way lightning upon a Caravan of Merchants laden with Silks, and other rich Merchandize, took the Spoil thereof; for which outrage coming to Tauris, the Captains were all by the commandment of Hyſmael executed, and Techellis himſelf to the terror of others burnt alive.

A great Earthquake at Conſtantinople.

The next year (which was the year 1509. the fourteenth day of September) chanced a great and terrible Earthquake in the City of Conſtantinople and the Countries thereabouts; by the violence whereof, a great part of the Walls of that imperial City, with many ſtately Buildings both publick and private, were quite overthrown, and thirteen thouſand People overwhelmed and ſlain. The terror whereof was ſo great, that the People generally forſook their Houſes and lay abroad in the Fields; yea Bajazet himſelf, then very aged and ſore troubled with the Gout, for fear thereof removed from Conſtantinople to Hadrianople; but finding himſelf in no more ſafety than before, he left the City and lay abroad in the Fields in his Tent. This Earthquake indured by the ſpace of eighteen days, or (as the Turks Hiſtories report) a month, with very little intermiſſion; which was then accounted ominous, as portending the miſerable calamities which ſhortly after hapned in the Othoman Family. After this Earthquake enſued a great Plague, wherewith the City was grievouſly viſited, and for the moſt part unpeopled. But after that the Earthquake was ceaſed, and the Mortality aſſwaged; Bajazet cauſed the imperial City to be with all ſpeed repaired, and to that purpoſe gave out commiſſions into all parts of his Dominions for the taking up of Workmen; ſo that there were at once in work eighty thouſand Workmen, who in moſt beautiful manner in the ſpace of four months again repaired the ruins of that great City.

The Children of Bajazet.

Bajazet had by his many Wives, eight Sons and ſix Daughters, which lived to be Men and Women grown; and the Sons all Governors in divers Provinces of his large Empire; whom the Turkiſh Hiſtories reckon up in this order, Abdullah Zelebi, Alem Scach, Tzihan Scach, Achmet, Machmut, Corcut, Selim, and Muhamet. Yet Antonius Utrius a Genoway, who long time lived in Bajazet his Court, and (as he of himſelf writeth) waited in his Chamber at the time of his death, reckoning up the Sons of Bajazet, maketh mention but of theſe ſix, Sciemſcia, Alemſcia, Achomates, Mahometes, Selymus, and Corcutus; naming the forenamed by names ſomething differing from the other. Sciemſcia the eldeſt, Governor of Caramania, for his towardlineſs moſt dearly beloved of his Father, died a natural death before him, and was of him and his Subjects greatly lamented. Alemſcia died in like manner, of whoſe death as ſoon as he was advertiſed, by mourning Letters written in black paper with white Characters (as their manner of writing is, in certifying of heavy news) he caſt from him his Scepter with all other tokens of Honour, and cauſed general mourning to be made for him in the Court, and through all the City of Conſtantinople, by the ſpace of three days; during which time all Shops were ſhut up, all trading forbidden, and no ſign of mirth to be ſeen: and for a certain ſpace after the manner of their Superſtition, cauſed ſolemn Sacrifices to be made for the health of his Soul, and ſeven thouſand Aſpers to be given weekly unto the Poor. His dead body was afterward with all Princely Pomp conveyed to Pruſa, and there with great ſolemnity buried. Tzihan Governor of Caria and Muhamet Governor of Capha, upon their Fathers heavy diſpleaſure, were by his commandment both ſtrangled.

Of his other four Sons, Achmet, otherwiſe called Achomates, Machmut or Mahometes, Corcut or Corcutus, and Selymus; the ſecond (namely Mahometes) was of greateſt hope and expectation, not given to ſenſuality or voluptuous pleaſure, as Achomates his eldeſt Brother, neither altogether bookiſh as was Corcutus, nor yet of ſo fierce and cruel a Diſpoſition as Selymus; but of ſuch a lively Spirit, ſharp Wit, bountiful Diſpoſition, and Princely Carriage of himſelf, that in the judgment of moſt men, he ſeemed already worthy of a Kingdom. Which immoderate favour of the People, cauſed his elder Brother Achomates, yea and Bajazet alſo himſelf, to have him in no ſmall jealouſie, as if he had affected the Empire; and was in ſhort time the cauſe of his untimely death; which thing he nothing doubting, haſtened (as fatal things are) by ſuch means as he leſt feared might have procured any ſuch mortal diſtruſt or danger.

Moſt of Bajazet his Children were by divers Women, yet Achomates and this Mahometes were by one and the ſame Mother; for which cauſe Mahometes took greater pleaſure in him than in any his other Brethren, although it were not anſwered with like love again. Achomates was Lord and Governor of Amaſia; and this Mahometes, of Magneſia; who deſirous to ſee the manner of his Brothers Life and Government, diſguiſed himſelf with two of his familiar and faithful Friends, as if they had been religious men, of that Order which the Turks call Imalier. [Theſe men are for the moſt part comely Perſonages, born of good Houſes, who in cleanly Attire made after an homely faſhion, do at their pleaſure wander up and down from Town to Town, and Country to Country, noting the diſpoſition and manners of the People; whereof as fitteth beſt their purpoſe, they make large Diſcourſes afterwards to others; they commonly carry about with them Silver Cymbals, whereon they play moſt cunningly, and thereunto ſing pleaſant and wanton Ditties; for which idle delight, they receive Mony of the People, as an Alms given them of Devotion. Theſe are the common corrupters of youth, and defilers of other mens beds; men altogether given to eaſe and pleaſure, and are of the Turks called, The religious Brethren of Love; but might of right better be termed, Epicurus his Hogs, than any profeſſors of any Religion at all] Mahometes and his two Conſorts, as men of this profeſſion, travelled up and down the Countries of Pontus and Cappadocia (where Achomates commanded) and ſo to the City of Amaſia; receiving for their merry glee by the way as they went, the Alms and Devotion of the fooliſh Country People: And being at the length come to Amaſia upon a ſolemn Holyday, they awaited the coming of Achomates to the Church; who paſſing by, ſtaid a while liſtening attentively unto their pleaſant and alluring Harmony; which was for that purpoſe moſt curiouſly and skilfully before deviſed, and by them both with their inſtruments and voices performed. When they had ended their Muſick, and according to the manner of their idle profeſſion expected his devotion; Achomates being a man of a ſpare hand, commanded five Aſpers to be given them in reward [which is about ſix pence of our Mony.] Mahometes diſdaining his Brothers baſe reward, as a ſign of his miſerable diſpoſition, would in no wiſe diſcover himſelf, as he had before determined; but taking horſe, returned with ſpeed to Magneſia; from whence he wrote taunting Letters unto his Brother Achomates, ſcoffing at his good Husbandry (no praiſe to a Prince) and in contempt ſent him back again his five Aſpers; which thing Achomates took in ſo evil part, as that he was never afterwards friends with him. The report of this Fact was in ſhort time diſperſed throughout all parts of the Turkiſh Empire, divers men diverſly deeming of his purpoſe therein.

Mahometes diſguiſed as a ſeafaring man, cometh to Conſtantinople, and ſo to the Court.

Not long after Mahometes had in this ſort plaid with his Brother Achomates, he attired himſelf with certain of his truſty Followers as if they had been Seafaring men, and with a ſmall Bark came to Conſtantinople, and there landing as Adventurers from Sea, took diligent view both of the imperial City, and of the City of Pera ſtanding oppoſite againſt it, curiouſly noting how all things were by his Fathers appointment ordered and governed. It hapned whilſt he was thus ſtaying at Conſtantinople, that Bajazet had appointed a ſolemn aſſembly of all his chief Baſſaes at the Court; which Mahometes was deſirous to have the ſight of, as alſo of the faſhion of his Fathers Court; but as he with his Companions preſſed to have entred in at the Court Gate, they were by their baſe Apparel taken of the Porters to have been rude Mariners, and ſo by them kept out. Wherefore conſulting what to do in that caſe, he went and preſently bought a moſt beautiful Chriſtian Captive Boy, and the next day coming again to the Court with two of his Companions (as if they had been Adventurers at Sea) requeſted to be let in, for that they had brought a Preſent for the Emperor. So finding means to be admitted to the preſence of Bajazet, one of his Conſorts (as if he had been a Sea Captain) boldly ſtept forth, and with due reverence offered the Peſent unto the Emperor; which he thankfully took, and in token thereof gave him his hand to kiſs, and commanded a rich Garment wrought with Gold to be given unto him, with two others of leſs value unto Mahometes and his Fellow, ſuppoſed to be the ſaid Captains Followers; who all this while ſtood a far off, as if it had been for reverence of the Emperor, but indeed for fear to be diſcovered. As theſe counterfeit Gueſts were returning from the Court in their Garments of Favour, they hapned to meet with three Courtiers which knew Mahometes; who diſmounting from their Horſes, had done him Honour and due Reverence, as to the Son of the great Emperor, had he not by ſecret ſigns forbidden them, as one unwilling to be known. When he had thus ſeen his Father, the Court, and the Imperial City, he went again aboard, and ſo with ſpeed returned to Magneſia.

The report of this his doing, had in ſhort time filled both the City and the Court, and was at laſt brought to Bajazets Ears; which raiſed in his ſuſpitious Head many a troubleſome thought, greatly fearing, that in theſe ſlie practices lay hidden ſome ſecret and deſperate Conſpiracy, dangerous to himſelf and his other Children. Wherefore after long diſcourſe had with the three great Baſſaes then of his ſecret Counſel, concerning the matter, to rid himſelf of all fear, he reſolved in any caſe to take him away. And therefore cauſed them in his name to write unto Aſmehemedi, a gallant Courtier, and alwais near unto Mahometes, to poiſon him with a ſecret Poyſon, for that purpoſe incloſed in thoſe Letters ſent unto him; with promiſe of great rewards and preferments for that his ſervice, to be afterwards received from the Emperor; charging him withal, that if he could not effect the matter, he ſhould ſo conceal it, as that Mahometes ſhould have no diſtruſt thereof; the leaſt ſuſpition whereof, would tend to his utter deſtruction. This Aſmehemedi for ſome unkindneſs bare a ſecret grudge againſt Mahometes, which Bajazet knowing of, made choiſe of him the rather; and he on the other ſide, partly to perform the old Tyrants command, and partly to revenge his own private wrong, vigilantly awaited all opportunities to bring to effect that he had in charge. At length it fortuned, that Mahometes having diſported himſelf in his Gardens of Pleaſure, and being thirſty after his exerciſe, called for drink; Aſmehemedi alwaies at hand, in a gilt Boul fetcht him ſuch drink as he deſired, whereinto he had ſecretly conveied the deadly Poyſon ſent from Bajazet. Mahometes having drunk thereof, thereof, in ſhort time began to feel himſelf evil at eaſe, and preſently ſent for his Phyſicians; who thinking that he had but ſomething diſtempered himſelf with drinking too much cold drink in his heat, perceived not that he was poiſoned, until that within ſix dais after, he died. Of whoſe death Bajazet advertiſed, could not abſtain from mourning, although he himſelf had been the only Author thereof; and the more to manifeſt his heavineſs, commanded all the Court to mourn with him, and Prayers to be made in their Temples after their ſuperſtitious manner, and Alms to be given to the Poor for the health of his Soul. His dead body was afterwards carried to Pruſa, and there honourably buried with his Anceſtors. Aſmehemedi the Traitor in reward of his unfaithfulneſs towards his Maſter, was by the commandment of Bajazet caſt into Priſon, and never afterwards ſeen, being there (as it was thought) ſecretly made away.

Now had Bajazet but three Sons left, Achomates, Selymus, and Corcutus. Achomates Governor of Amaſia, was a man both politick and valiant; but much given to pleaſure and delight; him Bajazet and moſt part of the great men of the Court favoured above the reſt of his Brethren; except ſuch as were before corrupted by Selymus. Corcutus for his mild and quiet nature, was of moſt men beloved, but not thought ſo fit for the Government of ſo great an Empire; eſpecially by the Janizaries and Souldiers of the Court, for that he was (as they thought) altogether drowned in the ſtudy of Philoſophy, a thing nothing agreeing with their humor. Yet might Bajazet ſeem to do him wrong, if he ſhould not according to his promiſe again reſtore him unto the poſſeſſion of the Empire, which he had almoſt thirty years before received at his hands; as is before in the beginning of his life declared. But Selymus being of a more haughty diſpoſition than to brook the life of a Subject under the command of either of his Brethren, and altogether given to martial Affairs, ſought by infinite Bounty, feigned Courteſie, ſubtil Policy, and by all other means good and bad, to aſpire unto the Empire. Him therefore the Janizaries with all the great Souldiers of the Court, yea and ſome of the chief Baſſaes alſo (corrupted with Gifts) wiſhed above the reſt, for their Lord and Sovereign; deſiring rather to live under him which was like to ſet all the World on a hurly burly (whereby they might increaſe their Honour and Wealth, the certain rewards of their Adventures) than to lead an idle and unprofitable Life (as they termed it) under a quiet and peaceable Prince.

Whilſt men ſtood thus diverſly affected towards theſe Princes of ſo great hope, Bajazet now far worn with years, and ſo grievouſly tormented with the Gout that he was not able to help himſelf; for the quietneſs of his Subjects and preventing of ſuch troubles as might ariſe by the aſpiring of his Children after his death, determined whilſt he yet lived (for the avoiding of theſe and other ſuch like miſchiefs) to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion in ſome one of his Sons; who wholly poſſeſſed of the Kingdom, might eaſily repreſs the pride of the other. And although he had ſet down with himſelf, that Achomates ſhould be the man, as well in reſpect of his Birth-right, as of the eſpecial affection he bare unto him; yet to diſcover the diſpoſition of his Subjects, and how they ſtood affected, it was given out in general terms, That he meant before his death to make it known to the World, who ſhould ſucceed in the Empire, without naming any one of his Sons; leaving that for every man to divine of according as they were affected; which was not the leaſt cauſe that every one of his Sons with like ambition began now to make ſmall account of their former Preferments, as thinking only upon the Empire it ſelf.

Firſt of all Selymus, whom Bajazet had made Governor of the Kingdom of Trapezond, rigging up all the Ships he could in Pontus, ſailed from Trapezond over the Euxine (now called the Black Sea) to the City of Capha, called in ancient time Theodoſia, and from thence by Land came to Mahometes King of the Tartars called Præcopenſes, a mighty Prince, whoſe Daughter he had without the good liking of his Father before married; and diſcovering unto him his intended purpoſe, beſought him by the ſacred Bonds of the Affinity betwixt them, not to ſhrink from him his loving Son-in-law in ſo fit an opportunity for his advancement. And withal ſhewed unto him, what great hope of obtaining the Empire was propoſed unto him by his moſt faithful Friends and the Souldiers of the Court, if he would but come nearer unto his Father (then about to transfer the Empire to ſome one of his Sons) and either by fair means to procure his favour, or by entring with his Army into Thracia, to terrifie him from appointing either of his other Brethren for the Succeſſor. The Tartar King commending his high device, as a kind Father-in-law with wonderful celerity cauſed great ſtore of ſhipping to be made ready in the Pontick Sea, and Mæotis, but eſpecially at the Ports of Copa and Tana, upon the great River of Tanais, which boundeth Europe from Aſia; and arming fifteen thouſand Tartarian Horſemen, delivered them all to Selymus, promiſing forthwith to ſend him greater Aid if he ſhould have occaſion to uſe the ſame. Theſe things being quickly diſpatched, Selymus paſſing over the River Borryſthenes, and ſo through Valachia, came at length to Danubius, and with his Horſemen paſſed that famous River at the City of Chelia; his Fleet he commanded to meet him at the Port of the City of Varna, called in ancient time Dionyſiopolis, in the Confines of Bulgaria and Thracia; he himſelf ſtill levying more men by the way as he went, pretending in ſhew quite another thing than he had indeed intended; which the better to cover, he gave it out as if he had purpoſed to have invaded Hungary.

But Bajazet a good while before advertiſed, that Selymus was departed from Trapezond, and come over into Europe, marvelling that he had left his charge in Aſia (the Rebellion of Techellis and the Perſian War yet ſcarce quieted) and that upon his own head he had entertained forreign Aid to make War againſt the moſt warlike Nation of the Hungarians; and farther, that with his Army by Land, he had ſeiſed upon the places neareſt unto Thracia, and with a ſtrong Navy kept the Euxine Sea; he began to ſuſpect, as the truth was, That all this preparation was made and intended againſt himſelf; for the crafty old Sire had good proof of the unquiet and troubleſome nature of his Son, eſpecially in that without his knowledge he durſt preſume to take a Wife from amongſt the Tartars, and afterwards with no leſs preſumption of himſelf raiſe an Army both by Sea and Land: whereby he eaſily perceived, that he would never hold himſelf contented with a ſmall Kingdom, ſo long as he was in hope by a deſperat adventure to gain a greater. Yet thinking it better with like diſſimulation to appeaſe his violent and fierce Nature, than by ſharp reproof to move him to farther Choler, he ſent unto him Embaſſadors to declare to him with what danger the Turkiſh Kings had in former times taken upon them thoſe Hungarian Wars;

Bajazet ſendeth Embaſſadors to Selymus.

Wars; for example whereof he needed not to go no further than to his Grandfather Mahomet the Great, who many times to his exceeding loſs had made proof of the Hungarian Forces; wherefore he ſhould do well to expect ſome fit opportunity, when as he might with better advice, greater power, and more ſure hope of Victory, take thoſe Wars in hand. Whereunto Selymus anſwered, That he had left Aſia, inforced thereunto by the injuries of his Brother Achomates, and was therefore come over into Europe, by dint of Sword and the help of his Friends,to win from the Enemies of the Mahometan Religion a larger and better Province for that little barren and peaceable one which his Father had given him, bordering upon Hiberia and Cholchos, bare and needy People, living as Connies amongſt the Rocks and Mountains. As for the Hungarians, whom they thought to be a People invincible, and therefore not to be dealt withal, he was not of that baſe mind to be daunted with any danger, were it never ſo great; and yet that in his opinion the War was neither ſo difficult or dangerous, as was by them prentended; foraſmuch as the ancient prowess of that warlike Nation was now much changed, together with the change of their Kings; and their Diſcipline of War not only much decaied, but almoſt quite loſt, after that Uladiſlaus, far unlike in Policy and Proweſs, had ſucceeded the renowned Matthias in that Kingdom. Neither had he (as he ſaid) from his cradle learned to be afraid of death, or of the common chances of War, as knowing that neither God nor Man would be wanting unto him, who with an honourable reſolution did adventure upon vertuous and worthy attempts; and that therefore he was fully reſolved for his own honour (which his Father had in ſome ſort blemiſhed by the immoderate advancement of his Brethren) either to die honourably in the Field in battel againſt the Enemies of the Mahometan Religion, or elſe glorioſly to extend the bounds of the Turkiſh Empire: and that he would not (though one of the youngeſt in the Othoman Family) be accounted inferior to any of his Brethren in Vertue and Proweſs. Thus was the Hungarian War never by Selymus entended, notably by him pretended; and with no leſs diſſimulation by Bajazet diſſwaded. The Embaſſadors, although Selymus in all his Speeches ſhewed no token of Peace; yet in his Fathers name preſented unto him divers Gifts, thereby if it might be to appeaſe his fierce and cruel mind. Unto his old Government they adjoyned Scamandria, which the Hungarians call Schenderovia, a ſtrong City of Servia upon the borders of Hungary, with many other ſtrong Towns in the ſame Country; they gave him alſo threeſcore thouſand Ducats, beſide a thouſand Garments of Cloath and Silk; with good Store of Proviſion wherewith to relieve and content the Souldiers by him entertained; leſt that they drawn far from home in hope of Spoil, ſhould take it in evil part if they ſhould be ſent away empty handed. Selymus in a happy time having received theſe Gifts, returned the Embaſſadors unto his Father, with more doubtful anſwer and uncertain hope than before; yet changing nothing in himſelf of his former reſolution, ſecret Meſſengers and Letters from his Friends in the Court ſtill whetting him forward (too much already inflamed with deſire of Sovereignty) perſwading him to make haſt and to repoſe his greateſt hope in his quick ſpeed; for that they underſtood, that about the time of his ſetting forward, his Brother Achomates was coming with a great power, being ſent for out of Cappadocia by his Father.

In the mean time Bajazet, moved the rather with the fear of Selymus, reſolved upon that, whereof he had long before in his mind deeply conſidered, and now ſaid openly, That he would appoint his Succeſſor, who inſtead of himſelf, ſpent with years and ſickneſs, ſhould bring with him the flower of Youth and ſtrength of Body, fit to govern ſo great an Empire. But when thoſe things were propounded unto the Souldiers of the Court by the four great Baſſaes (who in all things both of Peace and War had next place unto the Emperor himſelf) it was forthwith gainſaid by thoſe Martial Men, crying aloud with one voice, That they would know no other Emperor but Bajazet, under whoſe conduct and good fortune they had now ſerved above thirty years; and therefore would not ſuffer him to live a private life in obſcurity, who with ſo many Victories and ſtrong Cities taken, had brought the Othoman Empire unto that height of Renown and Glory. They ſaid moreover, that there was in him yet ſtrength enough, if he would but with the reverend honour of his Age retain the Majeſty of his place, and the Glory he had gotten with his long and happy Reign, and moſt famous Victories; and that of his Children, ſuch an one ſhould undoubtedly in his due time ſucceed in the Empire, as of right ought; only they wiſht, that the old Emperor might in the mean time live in health with a long and happy Reign; neither needed he (as they ſaid) to fear that after his death any controverſie ſhould ariſe among his Sons about the Succeſſion; for that the Othoman Progeny uſed to attain the imperial ſeat, according to the old cuſtom of their Anceſtors the Othoman Kings, by Right and Order only, and not by Corruption or Faction. But if he would needs upon his own private good liking, or as it were by new adoption, proceed to make choice of ſuch an one as the People and the Men of War (his moſt loyal and faithful Subjects) could not ſo well like of, it would be an occaſion of much more trouble, and happily the means to bring in that confuſion of the State, which he thought thereby to eſchew. For then, beſide the diſlike of the People, the other Brethren would never endure ſo notable an injury, or ever be at quiet, until they had (as men wrongfully caſt off and diſinherited) by ſtrong hand and endangering of all, recovered their honor loſt by the headſtrong Will of their aged Father.

The Souldiers thus before inſtructed by the Friends and Favourites of Selymus, (who with Mony and large Promiſes had corrupted their Captains and chief Officers) ſpake theſe things frankly, to have deterred the old Emperor from his purpoſe. But he thinking that they had (as he himſelf did) eſpecially affected Achomates his eldeſt Son, (for that they had generally proteſted, That they would againſt all injuries defend his honour, unto whom the Empire ſhould of right appertain) ſaid he would make choice of Achomates, if it ſhould ſtand with their good liking. But the chief of the Souldiers (who corrupted by Selymus, had together ſold both their Faith and themſelves) cunningly commended Achomates, and ſeemed wonderfully to like of him; yet to accept of him for their Sovereign, Bajazet yet living, they ſaid was not agreeing with the ancient cuſtom of the Othoman Kings, neither for the behoof of the men of War, neither yet good for the State of the Empire; foraſmuch as neither his Brethren Corcutus and Selymus, neither the Souldiers of the Court, could patiently endure the leaſt touch of the ſuſpition of Infidelity; which they muſt needs do, if he as a ſuſpitious Father ſhould doubt either of the Love or Loyalty alty of his moſt dutiful Sons, or of the Faith and Conſtancy of his moſt faithful Servants, whereof he had made ſo many trials. Beſides that, it ſeemed unto them all unreaſonable, that by the odious prejudice of that Fact, the Souldiers ſhould be left defrauded of the rewards uſually granted unto them during the time of the vacancy of the Empire, ariſing of the Spoil taken from them which are of Religion different from the Turks. For it is a cuſtom, that immediately upon the death of the Turkiſh Emperor, all the Jews and Chriſtians which dwell at Conſtantinople, Pera, Hadrianople, Theſſalonica, and Pruſa, eſpecially Merchants, expoſed unto the injuries of the Turks, are by the Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court, ſpoiled of all their Wares and Goods, and become unto them a Prey; neither will they give their Oath of Allegeance unto the new Emperor, until he have granted unto them all that Prey, as a Bounty, and have ſolemnly ſworn by his own Head (the greateſt aſſurance that can by Oath be given amongſt the Turks) freely to pardon all the Offenders, and for ever to forget all the outrages before committed. When Bajazet ſaw his Men of War thus generally to oppoſe themſelves againſt the tranſlation of the Empire to Achomates, he of purpoſe to corrupt the minds of them which were before already corrupted, promiſed to give them five hundred thouſand Ducats if they would ſtand favourable to Achomates, and accept him for their Sovereign; which Maſs of Mony his Cuſtomers and Receivers undertook to levy of the ſame Merchants Strangers and Jews, and to pay it as Bajazet had promiſed. Yet the overthwart forwardneſs of theſe Men of War overcame the good Fortune of Achomates, although the reward promiſed were great; for why, they had in their Martial Minds conceived far greater Rewards and Preferments, if inſtead of a peaceable and quiet Prince, a monſtrous Tyrant of reſtleſs nature (as was Selymus) might by their help and means aſpire to the Empire. Thus Bajazet, driven from his hope, thought it beſt for the preſent to diſſemble the matter; and concealing his grief, with patience to put up that diſhonour, until a fitter opportunity were offered for the effecting of that he ſo much deſired.

Selymus overtaketh his Father.

Selymus advertiſed from his Friends, with what affection and faſtneſs the Souldiers of the Court had in the ſecret favour of him openly withſtood the earneſt deſire of Bajazet for the preferment of Achomates; becauſe he would no longer fruſtrate the expectation of his Favourites by lingring and delay, or ſeem to diſtruſt the ready good Wills of the Men of War towards him, left the borders of Hungary, and with his Army marching through Thracia, incamped at length upon the riſing of an Hill not far from Hadrianople, from whence the neighing of his Horſes might eaſily be heard, and his Tents from the high places of the City diſcovered. From thence he ſent a Meſſenger to his Father then lying in the City, to certifie him, That foraſmuch as he had not of many years before ſeen him, he was now therefore deſirous to come unto his preſence to viſit him, before he croſſed the Seas back again by his appointment to Trapezond; and the rather, becauſe it might chance that he ſhould never ſee him again, being now become both aged and diſeaſed; beſides that, it much concerned (as he would have had him to believe) the quietneſs of his Kingdom in Aſia, and the unity of his Children, if the controverſies betwixt him and his Brother Achomates, which could not ſafely be committed to Meſſengers, might by themſelves be diſcovered to him their Father, as an indifferent hearer and decider thereof. Wherefore he humbly beſought him to appoint him a time and place to give him audience in, and not to denie him leave to come and kiſs his Hands; which thing his Anceſtors never refuſed to grant to their poor Friends, much leſs to their Children. Bajazet who a few days before underſtanding of the coming of Selymus, and throughly ſeeing into his devices, had called unto him certain of his Sanzacks or chief Captains, with their ſelect Companies out of the neareſt parts of Grecia, and had alſo ſet ſtrong Watch and Ward through the City; fearing leſt under the colour of parle, his Souldiers attending about his perſon, corrupted by Selymus and his Friends (who even then loaded with Gifts and Promiſes, were ſecretly upon the point of revolt) ſhould be quite drawn away from him, and ſo he himſelf at length be either by open force oppreſſed, or ſecret Treachery circumvented, thought it beſt to cut him off at once from all hope of conference or acceſs unto his preſence. Wherefore ſeriouſly blaming him, that he had upon his own head brought his Army into another mans Province, that he in Arms required audience, and laſt of all, ſo inſolently abuſed his Fathers lenity and patience; he by the ſame Meſſenger ſent him farther word, That he ſhould not preſume to approach any nearer unto him, or expect any thing appertaining to peace, who guarded with forreign power had without his Fathers leave entred into Arms, and ſpoiled the Countries of his Friends; and that therefore he ſhould do well, with all ſpeed to retire out of Thracia, yea and out of Europe alſo, and disbanding his Forces, again to retire himſelf unto his own charge in Pontus; in which doing he ſhould find greater favour and kindneſs with him his Father, than ever he had before: but if he would needs proceed in the courſe by him begun, that then he would no more take him for his Son, but for his Enemy, and before it were long, ſharply chaſtiſe for his malapert Inſolency, little differing from unnatural Treachery. The Meſſenger with his anſwer diſmiſſed, it was not long after, but that Bajazet was by his eſpials advertiſed, that Selymus the night following was riſen with his Army, and marched directly towards Conſtantinople; whether he was ſent for by his Friends, in hope that upon his approach with his Army, ſome ſuddain tumult and uprore would to his avail ariſe in that ſo great and populous City. Whereupon Bajazet fearing leſt in ſtaying at Hadrianople, he might loſe the Imperial City of Conſtantinople, early in the morning by break of the day departed from Hadrianople towards Conſtantinople. Upon his departure Selymus peaceably entred the City of Hadrianople, the Citizens fearing, that if they ſhould have made any reſiſtance, their unſeaſonable faithfulneſs towards Bajazet might have turned to their utter deſtruction. Selymus after he had a while refreſhed his Army with the plenty of that City, according to his former determination ſet forward again, of purpoſe by long and ſpeedy Marches to have prevented his Fathers coming to Conſtantinople. Bajazet was yet ſcarcely come to Chiurlus, or rather Tzurulum, an ancient ruinous City almoſt upon the mid way betwixt Hadrianople and Conſtantinople, when warning was given him of them that followed his Army, that the forerunners of Selymus were at hand, cutting off the ſtraglers of his Army, and with hot skirmiſhing ſtayed and troubled his Rearward. The aged Emperor more moved than terrified with the ſtrangeneſs of the matter, becauſe his marching ſhould not ſeem as if it were a Flight or Chaſe, commanded his Standard to be ſet up, and all his Army to make a ſtand, of purpoſe that if Selymus ſhould come on to give him Battel, he might find him in readineſs. The great Captains and Noblemen then preſent with Bajazet, whether it were for old acquaintance, or upon ſome new inclination of their affection, or elſe upon hope of new Allyance and Preferment, wiſhing well unto Selymus, and therefore indirectly and cunningly favouring him, ſeemed not to like of Bajazet his reſolution, to be ſo far moved (as they ſaid) with the youthful heat and lightneſs of his Son, as to ſeek revenge by battel, whereas the Victory it ſelf could yield him nothing but ſorrow; but the overthrow threatned deſtruction both to himſelf and all them that were with him; the imminent event thereof ſeemed to be ſo much the more dangerous and fearful, by how much he was at that time inferior unto his Son both in warlike Proviſion and number of men. Wherefore it were good for him (they ſaid) to moderate his anger, and not now in the winding up of his life to make too much haſt by a miſerable death in a woful Battel to ſtain the whole glory of his former life. There was (as they would have perſwaded him) but one only courſe to be taken, full of wholeſome Policy and Safety; and that was, That he ſhould with ſuch ſpeed as he had begun, march on forward to Conſtantinople, that ſo Selymus excluded ont of the City, (his chiefeſt hope) and then not knowing which way to turn himſelf, ſhould either of his own accord, or for fear of his Fathers greater Forces, think of return; and ſo with his raſcal Followers more honeſtly periſh by the hands of them whoſe Countries he had ſpoiled, and upon whom he muſt of neceſſity live in his return, than by the ſword of his Father. The Author of this Counſel was Muſtapha, the moſt ancient Baſſa of thoſe, which being in greateſt Authority about the Emperor, are only of his Privy Council, and ſway all matters of importance concerning either Peace or War; he then upon an unthankful and malicious mind loathing Bajazet, as one that had too long reigned, hated him alſo for certain private diſpleaſures conceived of the emulation of the other younger Baſſa's by him promoted; and ſecretly bare great affection to Selymus, both in condition and favour reſembling his Grandfather the Great Mahomet, by whom he was brought up himſelf, and him of all the Sons of Bajazet he thought moſt worthy of the Empire. This Muſtapha was born in the Town of Seres (near unto Amphipolis) the Son of a Greek Prieſt, a man of a ſly, crafty, and ſubtil Wit, always ſubject to corruption; which diſeaſes of mind were in him well to have been diſcovered by his froward look and ſquint Eyes, the certain notes of a nature to be ſuſpected. Next unto this Muſtapha was Boſtanges Baſſa, born of the honourable Houſe of the Ducagina in Ætholia, and therefore called Ducaginoli; a man for his Covetouſnes, Ambition, and Treachery, infamous; as the foul and miſerable end of his life afterwards declared. Unto this man, Selymus had by ſecret promiſe betrothed one of his Daughters, now marriageable, as a reward of his corrupt Faith. By which ſleight he had alſo allured Ajax (Aga or Captain of the Janizaries, and great Maſter of the Houſhold) to promiſe his Aid for the obtaining of the Empire; whereunto he ſaid he was by Deſtiny called; and by his means drew other inferior Captains ſecretly to favour his quarrel; unto whom he ſpared not to promiſe whatſoever might pleaſe their humors. Yea the Captains almoſt generally either corrupted with reward, or for fear following the inclination of the greater Commanders, of themſelves leaned that way.

Cherſeogles Baſſa the only great man faithful to Bajazet, perſwadeth him to give Battel to Selymus.

Of all the reſt, only Cherſeogles Baſſa (whom the Turks Hiſtories call alſo Achmet Hertezec-Ogli) a faithful, conſtant, and upright man, free from all double dealing and deceit, a faſt and aſſured Friend unto Bajazet his Father in Law, was of opinion, That the immoderate Pride and Inſolency of Selymus, was even there by force of Arms and ſtrong Hand forthwith to be oppreſſed, before he ſhould approach any nearer unto the Imperial City, for fear of raiſing ſome further trouble or tumult there, than were well to be appeaſed; which was the thing that Selymus his Friends moſt of all deſired. Neither was it to be thought (as Cherſeogles ſaid) that the naked Tartarion Horſemen, although they were in number more, would ever be able to abide the firſt charge of Bajazet his well armed Penſioners. As for the Janizaries, of whoſe approved Faith and Valour tried in many dangers, he had before had good experience; there was no doubt but that they would now to the uttermoſt of their power defend the Perſon and Honour of their aged and victorious Emperor, who had of long time ſo well of them deſerved; and alſo to revenge his quarrel upon diſobedient Selymus, who neither fearing God the juſt Revenger of ſuch ungracious dealing, neither the infamy of men, had moſt unnaturally lift up his Sword againſt his Father, wickedly to deprive him of life, of whom he had received life. Wherefore he perſwaded him, in his own juſt quarrel to go forth unto his Souldiers with chearful countenance, and putting them in remembrance of the benefits they had from time to time moſt bountifully received at his hands, as alſo of their Allegiance and Duty; to make them to underſtand, that repoſing his truſt in their Fidelity and Valour, he had reſolutely ſet down with himſelf, in that place before he went any further, by their faithful hands to chaſtiſe the preſumptuous inſolency of his unnatural Son, together with his rebellious Followers.

But now that we are fallen into the remembrance of this Cherſeogles, it ſhall not be amiſs, both for the honour of the man, and the great love he always bare unto the Chriſtians, to ſtep a little out of the way, to ſee the cauſe why he being a Chriſtian born, turned Turk. For he was not (as almoſt all the reſt of the great men about Bajazet were) of a Child taken from his Chriſtian Parents, and ſo brought up in the Mahometan Religion; but now being a man grown, turned Turk; yet ſo, as that he never in heart forgot either the Chriſtian Religion or love towards the Chriſtians; a thing not common among ſuch Renegates. He being the Son of one Cherſeogles, a ſmall Prince of Illyria near unto the black Mountain; and going to be married unto a Lady whom he moſt entirely loved, and unto whom he was already betrothed, honourably deſcended of the Houſe of the Deſpot of Servia; his intemperate Father with luſtful Eye beholding the young Lady of rare Feature and incomparable Beauty, deſired to have her for himſelf; and regarding more the ſatisfying of his own inordinate deſire, than his own honour, or the Fatherly Love of his Son, took her in marriage himſelf; all his Friends labouring in vain to diſſwade him, and with open mouth crying ſhame of ſo foul a Fact. Wherefore the young man, moved with the indignity of ſo great an injury, and driven headlong with deſpair, fled firſt to the Turks Garriſons which lay not far off, and from thence to Conſtantinople; where the fortune of the man was to be wondred at; For being brought before Bajazet, who with chearful countenance entertained him, for that he was honourably deſcended, and well liked both of the man, and of the cauſe of his revolt; ſmiling upon him, ſaid, Be of good chear Noble Youth, for thy great courage is worthy of far greater fortune than thy Fathers Houſe can afford thee; now in ſtead of thy Love wrongfully taken from thee by thy Father, (the Kinſwoman of a poor exiled Prince) thou ſhalt have given thee in marriage the Daughter of a great Emperor, of rare and ſingular perfection. And not long after abjuring his Religion, and changing his Name of Stephen to Achomates and Cherſeogles, he married one of Bajazet his Daughters, a Princeſs of great Beauty; and deſerved to have a place amongſt the Baſſaes of greateſt honour in the Court. Yet ſtill retaining the remembrance of his former Profeſſion, with a deſire to return thereto again; inſomuch that he kept in his ſecret cloſet the image of the Crucifix, which he ſhewed to Jo. Laſcaris, as to his truſty Friend, as he himſelf reported. This man at ſuch time as the City of Modon was taken by the Turks, and a multitude of poor Chriſtian Captives cruelly put to death in the ſight of Bajazet, by earneſt intreaty ſaved the Venetian Senators there taken; and afterward by earneſt ſute delivered Andreas Gritti, being Priſoner at Conſtantinople, and condemned to die; who not many years after was choſen Duke of Venice. He was the chief means whereby the Venetians to their great good obtained Peace of Bajazet. He alſo by his great Authority, and of his own charge redeemed innumerable Chriſtians from the ſervitude of the Turks, and ſet them at liberty. Neither is his kindneſs towards the furtherance of good learning to be forgotten; for at ſuch time as the foreſaid Jo. Laſcaris the notable and learned Grecian, by the appointment of Leo the Tenth, ſought ancient works of famous Writers, he procured the Turkiſh Emperors Letters Patents, that he might freely at his pleaſure ſearch all the Libraries in Grecia, to the great benefit of good Letters. Now Bajazet encouraged by this mans perſwaſion (as is aforeſaid) and hearing as he lay in his Pavilion, the Alarm of the Enemy, with the tumult and clamor of his own Souldiers as if they had been men afraid; and ſundry Meſſengers alſo at the ſame time coming unto him with news, That Selymus with his Tartarian Horſemen had almoſt incloſed the Rearward of his Army, and already taken ſome of his Baggage; grinding his Teeth for very madneſs and grief of mind, with Tears trickling down his hoary Cheeks, got him out of his Pavilion in his Horſe-litter, (for he was at the ſame time ſo troubled with the Gout, that he was not able to ſit on Horſeback) and turning himſelf unto the Penſioners and Janizaries ſtanding about him, as their manner is, ſaid unto them, Bajazet's Speech to the Souldiers and Janizaries of the Court.

Will you, Foſter-Children, valiant Souldiers, and faithful keepers of my Perſon, who with great fortune have ſerved me in Field above the ſpace of thirty years; and for your faithful and good ſervice have both in time of Peace and War, of me received ſuch rewards, as by your own confeſſion and thankſgiving far exceeded your own expectation, and the meaſure of our Treaſures; Will you, I ſay, ſuffer the innocent Father to be butchered by his graceleſs Son? And your old Emperor, tormented with age and diſeaſes, to be cruelly murthered by a company of wild Tartars, little better than arrant Rogues and Theeves? Shall I be now forſaken in this my heavy old age and laſt act of Life? And ſhall I be delivered unto mine Enemies, by them, by them, I ſay, who many years ago with great faithfulneſs and invincible Courage defended mine Honour and Right againſt my Brother Zemes? And have many times ſince, not only valiantly defended this Empire againſt moſt warlike Nations, but alſo moſt victoriouſly augmented the ſame? But I will not ſo lightly believe that which to my no ſmall grief is brought unto mine ears, concerning the revolting of mine Army; neither if I did believe it, am I ſo fearful as to be therewith diſcouraged, or to ſeek to make ſhift for my ſelf. For to what purpoſe ſhould I think of Flight; as though I could in any other place find more faithfulneſs or ſurer defence than with you? And concerning your ſelves, what ſhould be your hope by this ſo infamous Treachery? If any of you (for I cannot believe that you are all ſo mad) without regard of faith, of worldly ſhame, or the fear of God, have polluted your minds with the pernicious conceit of ſo foul a Treaſon; do you think to gain greater Rewards and preferments by your Treachery and Villany, than by your Fidelity and Conſtancy? There be many, which careful of my Perſon, perſwade me to reſerve this my ſick and feeble Body unto my better fortune, and to commit my ſelf to flight, ſo rather to ſave my life with ſhame and infamy, than to end my days with honour and glory; Which is ſo far from my thought for the apprehenſion of any fear to do, that I will to the contrary forthwith give the fierce Enemy battel; and in this my laſt danger make proof of all your Fidelity and Valour, and of every one of your good Wills in particular; and ſo by conduct of the Higheſt, either defeat the power and break the ſtrength of this graceleſs man, or elſe having reigned above thirty years an Emperor, end my days together with them which ſhall unto the end continue with me in their Faithfulneſs and Loyalty, although I ſhould be moſt ſhamefully and diſhonourably betraied and forſaken of ſome of mine own Guard; which thing though lying Fame would make me believe, yet will I not fear it until I ſee the proof thereof.

The common ſort of the Janizaries faithful to Bajazet, deſire battel.

The common ſort of Janizaries, unto whom the great Commanders and Captains corrupted by Selymus, had not for their levity and multitude communicated their purpoſe of transferring the Empire to Selymus, began to cry out as if it had been with general conſent, That he ſhould not doubt to joyn battel with his Enemies, and ſo to make proof of their conſtant Fidelity and wonted Valor. Which was done with ſuch a cheerfulneſs and deſire expreſſed by great Shouts, clapping of Hands, and clattering of Armor, that it ſeemed they would play the parts of reſolute Souldiers, and that as guiltleſs men they took it grievouſly to be once ſuſpected of Treaſon or Infidelity. Others alſo who ſecretly and in heart were well affected to Selymus, for faſhion ſake followed them with like cry; but eſpecially the great Commanders both of the Army and of the Emperors Court, now changed their affection, whether it were for ſhame of the Fact, or for fear of diſcovering themſelves out of ſeaſon, is uncertain. Wherefore according to the manner of ſuch men, which through their mutability and miſchievous diſpoſition, fearing to be convinced and diſcovered, add unto the preſent a ſecond and new Treaſon or Treachery, to cover the former; ſo Muſtapha and Boſtanges (not daring now to ſhew themſelves for Selymus) to make a great ſhew of their feigned Loyalty towards Bajazet, departed themſelves out of his Pavilion, to encourage the Souldiers, and to martial the Battel.

The battel betwixt Bajazet and Selymus.

Bajazet ſick in his Chariot, by the advice of Cherſeogles the faithful Baſſa, placed his Battel in this order: The Sanzacks (which are the Governors of Provinces) with their Horſemen, in number about ſix thouſand he ſet in the Front of the Battel; the Spachi-oglans and Siliphtars, which are the chief Horſemen of the Court, and as it were the Emperors Penſioners, were placed as two Wings on each ſide the great ſquadron of the Janizaries; in the midſt whereof was old Bajazet himſelf. Other forty thouſand Horſemen (Servants to the great men of the Court) were left in the Rearward, and to guard the Baggage. Theſe Slaves (for ſo indeed they are) for their Apparel and Furniture, yea and Valor alſo, are little inferior to their Maſters, by whom they are ſo ſumptuouſly maintained both for ſtrength and oſtentation. The Battel thus ordered, Bajazet commanded the Trumpets to ſound, and a red Enſign in token of battel to be diſplaied. On the other ſide, Selymus placing his Tartarian Horſemen in both Wings, and his Turks in the midſt, in manner of a half Moon, for that he in number of Horſemen far exceeded his Father, did almoſt on every ſide incloſe him, and ſo charge him. The Tartars when they were come within an hundred paces of their Enemies, caſting themſelves (after the manner of their fight) into great Rings, empty within in manner of a Crown, and ſo running round, that they might both backward and forward deliver their Arrows, caſt upon their Enemies whole ſhowers of Shot, as if it had been Hail, to the great annoyance of the Turks; when as in the mean time the other Tartarian Archers further off, ſhooting their Arrows not right forth, but more upright towards Heaven, which falling directly down, ſore gauled the Turks Horſes alſo. But the old Souldiers (taught by the example of their Captains) ſerred cloſe together, and caſting their Targets over their Heads, as if it had been one whole Roof or Penthouſe, received their Arrows with leſs harm, and haſted with as much ſpeed as they could to come to handy blows. The Penſioners alſo at the ſame inſtant bravely charged the middle of Selymus his Battel, where his Turkiſh Horſemen ſtood; and Ajax Captain of the Janizaries, drawing out ſeven hundred ready Harquebuſiers out of the Squadron of the Janizaries, with them aſſailed the hindmoſt of one of the Wings of the Tartars; and the four thouſand Servants left in the Rearward, as deſirous as the reſt to ſhew their forwardneſs, with great Slaughter repulſed the other Wing of the Tartars, which came to have ſpoiled the Turks Carriages. This fierce battel betwixt the Father and the Son, with doubtful event endured from Noon until the going down of the Sun; Selymus in many places ſtill reſtoring his declining Battel, and fighting himſelf, as for an Empire. But after that the Tartars, hardly charged by the Harquebuſiers, were not able to abide the Shot, eſpecially their Horſes, being with the unwonted noiſe thereof wonderfully terrified, and ſo carrying back their Riders whether they would or no, began to fly; the reſt of the Horſemen could neither by commandment, threatning, or wounds, be inforced to ſtay, but turned their Backs and fled. The Footmen alſo whom Selymus had attired and armed after the manner of the Janizaries, being forſaken of their own Horſemen, were now by Bajazet his Horſemen compaſſed about and almoſt all ſlain.

Selymus his Army diſcomfited.

Selymus his Army thus overthrown, and himſelf hardly beſet, was by certain Troops of his Turkiſh Horſemen which yet ſtaied with him, delivered from the preſent danger; and being wounded, was mounted upon a freſh Horſe, and ſo with all the ſpeed he could fled after the Tartars. But doubting to be purſued and overtaken by his Fathers ſpeedy Horſemen, he changed his Horſe, and took another of a wonderful ſwiftneſs; and ſo reſerving himſelf to his future fortune, with a few of his Followers fled to Varna, and from thence by Sea to Capha.

The Horſe whereon Selymus fled was all cole black, called Carabulo (that is to ſay, a black Cloud) whom Selymus as a good Servitor ever after exempted from all ſervice; and had him in ſuch eſtimation, that covered with Cloth of Gold, he was as a ſpare Horſe without a Rider led after him in all his great Expeditions, firſt into Perſia, and afterwards into Egypt, where he died at Caire, and there to the imitation of Bucephalus, Great Alexanders Horſe, had a Monument erected for him: wherein Selymus ſhewed himſelf more kind than to his own Brethren, whom he cruelly Murthered, and hardly afforded to ſome of them ſo honourable a Sepulture.

In this Battel, of forty thouſand which Selymus brought into the Field, eſcaped not above eight thouſand, but they were either ſlain or taken priſoners. Of Bajazet his Army were loſt about ſeven hundred, and three thouſand hurt with Tartarian Arrows: which loſs he preſently revenged with extream cruelty, cauſing all ſuch as were taken Priſoners to be without mercy put to the Sword in his ſight; whoſe heads were laid together by heaps, and their dead bodies, as if they had been Towers. Of this notable Battel betwixt the Father and the Son in the year 1511, Chiurlus called in ancient time Tzurulum, before an obſcure old ruinous City, (or as Jovius calleth it, a Village) became famous; but much more afterwards by the fatal deſtiny of Selymus; who not many years after, ſtrucken with a moſt loathſome and incurable diſeaſe, ended his days in the ſame place with an untimely and tormenting death; God (as it is to be thought) with revenging hand in the ſame place taking juſt puniſhment for his former diſloyalty towards his Father, as ſhall hereafter in due time and place be declared.

Three days Bajazet lay ſtill in the ſame place where he had obtained the Victory, till ſuch time as all his Souldiers were again returned from the chaſe of the Enemy; after that, he held on his way to Conſtantinople, and there bountifully rewarded his Souldiers. In the mean time Achomates hearing of all the trouble which had happened betwixt his Father and his Brother Selymus, with the event thereof, came with an Army of twenty thouſand from Amaſia, through the Countries of Galatia and Bithynia, unto the City of Scutari, called in ancient time Chriſopolis, (though ſome ſuppoſe it to have been the famous City of Chalcedon) which City is ſituated upon the Strait of Boſphorus, directly againſt the City of Conſtantinople. In this place Achomates encamped his Army, near unto the Sea ſide, expecting what courſe his Father would take after ſo great a Victory. For beſide the Prerogative of his Age, and the eſpecial love of his Father towards him, the general affection of the Vulgar People, with the good opinion he had of himſelf, had already filled his mind with the hope of the Empire. Wherefore he ceaſed not night and day to ſend Meſſengers over that narrow Strait, to Conſtantinople; and moſt earneſtly to ſolicite Bajazet his Father, in ſo fit an occaſion to make haſt to diſpatch what he had ſo long before determined, concerning the reſignation of the Empire. He alſo importuned his Friends and Familiars in beſt manner he could to commend him to his Father, and in moſt ample ſort to extol his grave purpoſe for tranſlation of the Empire; and to do the uttermoſt of their devoir, that ſeeing God and good Fortune had juſtly overthrown the raſh attempt and force of his Brother Selymus, he by their good means might the ſooner obtain the Empire, whereof he was the undoubted Heir.

Bajazet, who of himſelf and according to his old good liking was altogether deſirous of the Preferment of Achomates, was by their perſwaſions eaſily intreated to haſten the performance of that he had before determined for the transferring of the Empire. And making no great ſecret of the matter, commanded certain Gallies to be made ready for the tranſporting of Achomates from Scutari to Conſtantinople. But the great Baſſaes with the Souldiers of the Court (the ſecret Favourites of Selymus) underſtanding the matter, began again openly to reſiſt and impugn his purpoſed determination, and to alledge the ſame reaſons they had before at Hadrianople alledged; in fine they ſaid plainly, That they would by no means ſuffer him ſo far to diſable himſelf as an inſufficient man to reſign the Empire, who of late had with ſo valiant and couragious an heart fought for the honour of his Crown and Dignity; and that therefore ſo long as he lived, they would acknowledge no other Sovereign but Bajazet: yet for all that as they meant not thereby to cut off Achomates his hope, ſo neither ought he to diſtruſt the good will of the Men of War; but that he being a Man of moſt approved and known Valour, might in due time with their general good liking enjoy his right, which ſhould then without all queſtion be due unto him as the eldeſt Son of their Emperor. They ſaid moreover, that they had in the late Battel againſt Selymus ſufficiently declared what minds they were of, both towards their Emperor and Achcmates, and what confidence they were to repoſe in the fidelity of their Souldiers, who to maniſeſt their Faithfulneſs and Loyalty, had not refuſed to offer themſelves unto the hazard of a moſt unequal Battel, yea their lives unto death it ſelf. O foul diſſimulation, the covert Mask of all Miſchief, under which, meer Treachery is here pretended for great Loyalty, the aged Emperor too too much flattered, Achomates ſhamefully deluded, and (the Man that might not as then without ſome addition of diſgrace be named) Selymus, even Bloody Selymus, ſecretly ſought for above all Men to be preferred.

Bajazet by this offwardneſs and inſolency of the Souldiers again diſappointed of his purpoſe, or elſe (as ſome thought) delighted with the ſweetneſs of Sovereignty; for that after the late Victory he ſeemed (as one grown young again) neither to feel himſelf old or unable ſtill to govern ſo great an Empire; ſent word to Achomates, how the matter ſtood, and that he ſhould forthwith depart from Scutari to his old charge at Amaſia, from whence he would again call him at ſuch time as he had with new bounty won the minds of the Souldiers, and procured the good liking of other the great men in Court, whereby ſo great a matter and not uſual, might the better and with more ſecurity be effected.

Achomates thus deceived of his hope and expectation, grievouſly complaining that he was ſo mocked of his Father, and contemned of the Souldiers of the Court, began to mix his new requeſt with words of heat and diſcontentment, and to inveigh againſt his Father, for making him a byword (as he termed it) and a laughing ſtock unto the World, after he had taken the pains to come ſo far, and that by his ſpecial appointment. But if he proceeded ſo to doat, and to make ſo great reckoning of the Souldiers of the Court, that in reſpect thereof he neither regarded his promiſe, nor that was right and juſt; he would himſelf by force of Arms take upon him the defence of his own honour and right, ſo lightly eſteemed by his Father, and revenge the diſgrace offered unto him by others.

Whereunto Bajazet anſwered by the Cadeleſcher (which is a man of greateſt place and authority amongſt the Turks in matters concerning their Superſtition, and therefore of them honoured above others, as the ſacred interpreter of their Law) that he did neither well nor wiſely without juſt cauſe to fall into ſo great rage and choler, as by his ſpeech and force to think to extort that good which was only by love and loialty to be gained; whereas all things ſhould be ſurely kept for him, and the Empire undoubtedly deſcend unto him, if by untimely haſte he did not marr that hope which he ought by ſufferance and patient expectation to cheriſh; he might (as the Cadeleſcher told him) learn by that late example and fortune of his Brother Selymus, what might be for his own good and welfare; and that it was a thing of far more danger, deſperately to thruſt himſelf headlong into ſuch an action as he could not poſſibly ſee the end of, than moderating by reaſon his hot paſſions, to expect with patience the opportunity of time, and fitneſs of occaſion, with the alteration of matters, all tending to his good.

Achomates inflamed with anger and grief of the repulſe, all the while the Cadeleſcher was delivering his Fathers Meſſage, gave him many ſharp taunts, and had much ado to ſtay himſelf from offering of him violence, oftentimes threatning him, that in ſhort time both his Father ſhould dearly buy the changing of his purpoſe, and the Souldiers of the Court their treacherous dealing; and ſo ſending him away with this ſhort anſwer, he preſently roſe with his Army, and paſſing through Bithynia, cruelly ſpoiled the Country in his return to Amaſia. There daily more and more enflamed with the grief and the indignity of the repulſe before received, he determined to invade the leſſer Aſia; that if it ſhould ſo fall out, that he muſt needs by force of Arms trie his right againſt either of his Brethren, he might therein uſe the Wealth of that rich Province. Whereby if it ſhould chance that he ſhould by the practice of any, fail of the whole Empire, yet he ſhould at the leaſt wiſe be poſſeſſed of the one half thereof, and be the readier for all events, having all theſe great and rich Provinces in his power. Wherefore calling unto him his two Sons, Amurathes and Aladin, young Princes of great hope, after he had grievouſly complained of the unkindneſs of his Father Bajazet, and of the injuries done againſt him by his Enemies in the Court, he declared unto them, that there was now no hope left for him to obtain the Empire, except they would forthwith enter into Arms with him, and ſo together with him defend both his and their own right and honour, againſt the malice and injuries of their Enemies; which he ſaid, would be an eaſie matter to do by ſurpriſing the leſſer Aſia, if they would couragiouſly adventure upon it; foraſmuch as all Piſidia, Lycaonia, Pamphilia, with the Sea-coaſt of Ionia, were not as then kept with any Army or Navy. And as for his Brother Corcutus, there was no great doubt to be made of him, who according to his quiet diſpoſition would be content either to ſit ſtill, or elſe in regard of his juſt quarrel take part with him; or if he would needs intermeddle his quiet eſtate with the troubled, and ſo enter into Arms, might eaſily be thruſt out of whatſoever he poſſeſſed: As for the Governors of the reſt of the Provinces, he doubted not, but that they would alſo yield either to his command, or fortune. Wherefore he willed them, to pluck up their hearts as men of Courage, and to go into the Countries thereabouts to take up men, and whatſoever elſe were needful for the Wars. Theſe Gallants, of their own youthful diſpoſition ready enough for ſuch a matter, and now encouraged with their Fathers perſwaſion, did what they were by him commanded, and had in ſhort time raiſed a notable Army of voluntary Souldiers, of whom the greateſt part were of ſervile condition. But Achomates himſelf, beſides his old Army which he had in former time lead againſt the Perſian Rebels, levied new Forces alſo, and called forth into the Field all the able men that were to be found in the Cities round about; and ſo running through the Provinces proclaimed himſelf King of Aſia, and ſuch as would not forthwith yield unto him, thoſe he and his two Sons in divers places proſecuted with all hoſtility; by which means many Cities, eſpecially ſuch as were but weakly fortified, partly for fear, partly by conſtraint, were delivered over unto him.

After that, he entred with his Army into Lycaonia, and the borders of Cilicia, where by Embaſſadors and often Letters he requeſted Mahometes his Brothers Son (who then governed thoſe Countries) to aid him in his juſt quarrel againſt them, who by crafty and ſiniſter perſwaſions had to his diſhonour and diſgrace withdrawn his Fathers good will from him, and ſo far ſeduced him, as that he was determined to appoint another Succeſſor in the Empire, than him his eldeſt and firſt begotten Son; which their malice he would (as he ſaid) prevent, and by force of Arms recover his right, which his Father knowing to be due unto him, was about to have put him in poſſeſſion of whilſt he yet lived, had he not by the ſiniſter practice of others been hindred; for the recovery whereof, if Mahometes would out of his Province aid him with men and victual, and ſo further his juſt cauſe, he promiſed that he ſhould find a far better Uncle than he had found a Father; and that his preſent Friendſhip ſhould in time be moſt amply and bountifully requited.

Whereunto Mahometes anſwered, that he could not do what his Uncle had required, except he were ſo commanded by his Grandfather Bajazet, whom alone he acknowledged for his dread Soveraign; and that it was not for him to judge, whether he did right, or otherwiſe: That he would not in his life time reſign the Empire to his Son. But this (he ſaid) he was not ignorant of, that he was not to yield his obedience to any other, ſo long as he lived poſſeſſed of the Empire; to whom both his Father Tzihan Scach whilſt he lived, and himſelf alſo had given their Oath of Obedience and Loyalty. Wherefore it were good for him to pacifie himſelf, leſt in ſeeking untimely revenge of his Enemies, he ſhould to the offence of all men wrong his Father; and by too much heat and haſt overthrow both his hope and honour; which of right ſhould be moſt great, if he could but in the mean time have patience, and ſtay himſelf a while. Achomates, who expected nothing leſs than ſuch an anſwer, but thought that Mahometes would either for love or fear have preſently come unto him, and now finding his requeſts to be with greater gravity and conſideration denied by his Nephew, than they were by reaſon of him demanded, entred with his Army into the borders of his Province, and with fire and ſword began to deſtroy the Country before him. Which Mahometes with ſuch power as he had thinking to remedy, was by the way encountred by his Uncle not far from Laverda, and there overthrown; and taking that City for refuge, was there certain days beſieged by Achomates; and at laſt together with his Brother (then but a Child) delivered into his hands, at ſuch time as the City was by the fearful Citizens by compoſition yielded unto him. Achomates having taken the City with his two Nephews, cauſed Mahometes his Counſellors, with his Foſter Brother, by whoſe perſwaſion it was ſuppoſed that he had ſo anſwered his Uncle and endangered himſelf, to be put to death.

1512. Baiazet ſendeth Embaſſadors to Achomates.

Theſe proceedings of Achomates filled Bajazet with grief and indignation, that he ſhould in ſo great years be ſet upon by two of his own Sons, one after the other. Yet to prove if thoſe troubles might without more bloodſhed be pacified, he ſent his Embaſſadors unto him to reprove him for his diſloyalty; and to command him forthwith to ſet a liberty his two Nephews, Mahometes and his Brother, and ſo without more ſtir to get him again to Amaſia; which if he ſhould refuſe to do, then to denounce unto him open War. But he, which by how much the more he had after his repulſe ambitiouſly affected the Empire, had reſolved with himſelf to deal ſo much the more cruelly in his proceedings; having received this Meſſage from his Father, cauſed the chief Embaſſador (for that he had in frank ſpeech delivered his Meſſage and denounced unto him Wars) to be in his own preſence put to death; and threatned the reſt with the like, if before the going down of the Sun they avoided not his Camp.

This outrage highly offended Bajazet, and alienated the minds of many before well affected to Achomates; for that without any reverence of his Father, and contrary to the Law of Nations, he had violated the Embaſſadors ſent to him for Peace. Upon the firſt bruit hereof, the Souldiers which then waited at the Court Gate, in the hearing of Bajazet exclaimed, that the inſolency of Achomates was not longer to be ſuffered, but forthwith by force to be repreſſed; that by ſufferance and delay he would grow from evil to worſe; and that if Bajazet ſhould prolong the time, and in fatherly ſort ſeek by fair means to reclaim him, he ſhould afterwards in vain crave the aid of his beſt Souldiers againſt his rebellious Son ſtrengthned by his own long ſufferance. Muſtapha alſo the chief Baſſa, with Boſtanges and others of great place (who ſecretly favoured Selymus, and had cunningly cauſed theſe things by fit men to be diſperſed amongſt the Souldiers) began at the firſt to mutter, and as it were to wonder at the ſtrangeneſs and hainouſneſs of the Fact, in ſuch ſlie ſort, as if they had condemned the Deed done, but not the Doer. But afterward, when they ſaw that Bajazet was throughly heated, both by his own angry diſpoſition and the ſpeech of the Souldiers, and upon the confidence of his former Victory againſt Selymus, now ready to ſeek revenge; they began then to heap freſh coles upon the fire, and bitterly to inveigh againſt Achomates, as a Traitor to his aged Father and the Sate; and withal highly commended the Fidelity and Courage of the Janizaries and Souldiers of the Court, who for the ſafety and honour of their aged Emperor, were moſt preſt and ready to expoſe themſelves, their lives, and whatſoever elſe they had, unto new dangers.

Achomates proclaimed Traitor.

So was Achomates by the craft and ſubtilty of theſe great men, by the anger of his Father, and the judgment of the Souldiers, proclaimed Traitor; and order taken, that the Souldiers of the Court with the Europeian Horſemen, ſhould with all poſſible ſpeed be ſent againſt him into Aſia. But when choice was to be made of ſome valiant and worthy General that might take upon him ſo great a Charge, which ſeemed eſpecially to appertain unto ſome one of the great Baſſaes; it was ſtrange to ſee, how they all began to ſtrain courteſie at the preferment, and every one to refuſe the place and diſable himſelf, ſaying, That it were a great indignity, that the Emperors Army ſhould be led againſt his Son by any of his Servants; and the Souldiers (having their leſſon beforehand) ſaid plainly, That they durſt not, nor would not draw their Swords or lift up their hands againſt the Son of the Emperor, and Heir Apparent of the Empire, except they were conducted and commanded by ſome of the Othoman Blood in perſon preſent with them; for ſo had his Brother, long before when he rebelled in Cilicia, and now of late, Selymus his rebellious Son, been both overthrown and vanquiſhed, even by the conduct of Bajazet himſelf, and not by any of his Servants. Theſe things all tended to this purpoſe, that Selymus might by indirect means be reconciled to his Father (whom they ſecretly favoured, although for fear of diſpleaſure they durſt not ſo much as name him but by way of diſgrace) and by this very means to make way for his return to Conſtantinople, and ſo conſequently give him power to ſeiſe upon the Empire. For it was probably ſuppoſed, that neither Bajazet himſelf, being very aged and diſeaſed; neither Corcutus, altogether buried in his ſtudy, would undertake the mannaging of thoſe Wars; ſo that of the Othoman Family only Selymus was left, to whom that charge might be committed, all the Nephews of Bajazet by reaſon of their tender years, as yet unfit for the ſame. At theſe ſpeeches of the Baſſaes and the Souldiers, Bajazet as a man perplexed and in a chafe, flung away into his Palace, excuſing himſelf by his great years and diſeaſed Body; but complaining deeply, that Corcutus in following the vain title of Learning, with a quiet contented kind of life, had in the mean time neglected other ſtudies and honourable qualities, better beſeeming his Princely Birth and Calling. As he was thus reaſoning with himſelf, and deviſing what courſe to take, Muſtapha the old Baſſa, who all the time of his Reign had uſed to diſburden him of his Cares, having by way of talk drawn him into a full diſcourſe concerning the proceeding to the intended War, ſet upon him with this crafty and premeditated Speech, framed of purpoſe for his deſtruction.

The crafty oration of the great Baſſa Muſtapha to Bajazet, for the bringing home of Selymus.

Your Majeſty may not (moſt dread Sovereign) although by years and ſtrength of Body you were never ſo well able, you may not I ſay, either tranſport your Army, or your ſelf paſs over in perſon into Aſia; leſt whilſt you are there, from place to place chaſing Achomates, you leave a far more dangerous Enemy behind you in Europe, who may in your abſence ſeiſe upon Thracia, Græcia, yea and the imperial City it ſelf, deſtitute of ſufficient defendants. Do we not hear, that Selymus is raiſing of new Forces above Varna? and expects a new ſupply of Horſemen from the Tartar King his Father in law? And already as it were hovering over our heads? Is not he of greater Spirit and Courage, than to be daunted or diſmayed with the misfortune of one battel? Or if you ſhall ſend over your old beaten Souldiers into Aſia, and call Corcutus into Europe with the Forces he levied the laſt year, who in time of your ſickneſs may withſtand the attempts of Selymus? will he fear theſe freſh-water Souldiers of Aſia, or their philoſophical General, which feared not the Souldiers of your Court, the pickt and choſen men of the World, and your ſelf a moſt worthy and victorious Emperor? You are deceived, and (if I may be ſo bold ſo to ſay) you throughly ſee not into the doubtful Event of things, if you think not, that you muſt at one time wage War againſt two dangerous Enemies, even in the remoteſt parts of your Empire, in Aſia and Europe; For whilſt you ſhall go to expulſe Achomates out of Cappadocia. Selymus nearer at hand, and awaiting all opportunities, will by and by at your back, raiſe a moſt dangerous War in the very heart and chief ſtrength of your Empire. But if you, moved with the greatneſs and due conſideration of the danger, ſhall go about to defend Thracia, and for that purpoſe retain with you the moſt approved and faithful Souldiers of the Court, you ſhall ſee all Aſia on a fire before your face; neither will Achomates make an end of Waſt and War, until ſuch time as he hath drawn the Empire of Aſia unto himſelf. Wherefore if it be not to be imputed to your fault, but to your fate or fortune, that two begotten of your ſelf, ſhould by your ſelf and the conſent of all men be judged Traitors unto your Crown and dignity; whereof the one through raſhneſs, the other upon pride and vain diſcontentment, hath riſen up in Arms againſt you; Why do you not in ſo doubtful and perplexed a matter prefer ſafe and ſound advice before that which masketh under the ſhew of Majeſty and Honour? and whom you cannot both at one time correct and be revenged upon, to ſet upon them as occaſion ſhall ſerve when they are together by the ears betwixt themſelves? This is the only hope of your ſafety, this is the only way, if you ſhall reſolve (as the common Proverb ſaith) to drive out one nail with another, and ſo to overcome your Enemies. Moderate a while your hot deſire of revenge, and for the preſent diſſemble your grief; grant unto one of them pardon, and in ſhew take him into your grace and favour, imploy him againſt the other; ſo ſhall you without danger, howſoever it ſhall fall out, perſecute the one whom you love not, with the hazard of the other whom you truſt not; and at your pleaſure oppreſs him to whom you ſhall commit your Enſigns and Army, the hands of your faithful and truſty Souldiers being ever at your appointment ready to take revenge. So ſhall you with ſecurity make an end of this war, expoſing unto the danger him whom you had rather to overcome (as your Enemy) by him whom you wiſh alſo to periſh.

Muſtapha had ſcarce made an end of ſpeaking, but the other Baſſaes (as they had before agreed amongſt themſelves) began where he left, and with all their cunning laboured to perſwade Bajazet to call home his Son Selymus, and to make him General of his Army againſt his Brother; ſaying, That he had already indured ſufficient puniſhment for his former diſloyalty, and that therefore it was like that he as a well corrected Child would from thenceforth contain himſelf within the compaſs of his moſt dutiful obedience; whereas Achomates proud of his Birthright, having of late violated his Fathers Embaſſadors, and filled all Aſia with Rebellion, was not like to be brought to any reaſonable conformity, until he were by force of Arms pluckt down, and ſo made to know himſelf, in like manner as was his Brother Selymus of late. Bajazet ſeeing that in reſolving of a matter of ſo great conſequence, Cherſeogles Baſſa (his Son-in-law, and the only faithful Counſellor then about him) ſat ſilent, hanging the head, as a man not of the ſame opinion with the reſt, ſtood a great while in doubt what to reſolve upon; he could not ſo eaſily forget the late injuries done againſt him by Selymus, it was yet freſh in memory, how that he had out of Aſia invaded Europe, ſurpriſed Hadrianople, given him Battel, indangered his perſon with his Tartarian Horſemen, and that only by the goodneſs of God he had obtained the Victory; on the other ſide, his Majeſty contemned, his Nephews impriſoned, his Embaſſadors violated, the Cities of Aſia ranſacked, and all thoſe goodly Countries preſently ſmoking with the fire of Rebellion, ſo filled his old heart with anger and indignation, as that he deſired nothing more than to be revenged. Whilſt he was thus ſtrugling with his own thoughts, and doubtful what to do, the unfaithful Baſſaes by deep deceit and treachery (Cherſeogles moſt inſtantly perſwading the contrary) overcame him ſo far, as with his own hand to write Letters to Selymus, promiſing him, that forgetting all injuries paſt, he would upon the hope of his Loyalty , receive him into his former grace and favour, and make him General of his Army, if he would without delay repair to Conſtantinople, and ſo paſs over into Aſia againſt his rebellious Brother Achomates.

Whilſt theſe things are in doing at Conſtantinople, Corcutus advertiſed by Letters from his Friends of the weak eſtate of his aged Father, and by what perſwaſions he had been induced (after Achomates was proclaimed Traitor) to call unto him Selymus, and to make him General of his Army; came down out of Magneſia to Phocis, and there imbarking himſelf in his Gallies, ſailed to Conſtantinople ; where being arrived, he went preſently to the Court, attended upon with a great number of his Friends and Favourites; and entring into the Privy Chamber, humbled himſelf before his Father, and kiſſed his hand ; and after much talk had betwixt them of divers weighty matters, is reported to have ſpoken unto him as followeth :

Corcutus cometh to Conſtantinople.

Corcutus his oration to his Father Bajazet.

It is now above thirty years paſt (moſt reverend Father, and dread Sovereign) ſince that I (being choſen and proclaimed Emperor by the Prerogative of the Souldiers of the Court, by general conſent of the Citizens of this imperial City, and by the grave judgement of the wiſe and grave Baſſaes of the Court) have chearfully and willingly, and as I may truly ſay, with mine own hand delivered from my ſelf unto your Majeſty the poſſeſſion of this moſt glorious Kingdom and Empire ; Which thing what worldly wight would have done? but either a mad man, or elſe a moſt kind and loving Son ? Unto which ſo rare an example of a religious and loving heart, I was not by any fear or conſtraint enforced, but only by regard and contemplation of your own ſacred perſon, and the due conſideration of my duty. Neither did it in the courſe of ſo many years, ever repent me of that my ſingular kindneſs and duty done, when as I contenting my ſelf with ſuch things as you had unto me aſſigned, and with the general commendation of my well doing, as well as with a Kingdom, thought this your great eſtate and higheſt type of worldly honour, not to be compared with the quiet contentment of my pleaſing ſtudies ; when as I accounted it a vain thing, and not beſeeming the reſolution of a ſetled and quiet mind, to long after theſe worldly things, which being had and enjoyed to the full, work no full contentment in the inſatiable deſire of man ; and that ſurmounting vertue, and the ſweet, O moſt ſweet meditation of Heavenly things promiſed unto my contemplative and raviſhed mind, things of far more worth and Majeſty than all the Kingdoms and Monarchies of the World. But whilſt I was tracing this path, little regarding worldly honour, or the glory of an Empire, and was for pure Devotion and deſire of knowledge travelling into the furtheſt part of Arabia, unto the Altar of our moſt ſacred Prophet Mahomet, and ſo to the Indians, as to men of a more exact Knowledge and ſincere Profeſſion ; you in the midſt of my travel drew me out of Egypt by the long hands of the Egyptian Sultan, back again into Phrygia ; commanding me, that eſchewing the manifold dangers (which in my long travel I muſt needs have fallen into) I ſhould from thenceforth have more regard of my life and health, and to expect the fruit both of my Loyalty towards you, and of your Fatherly Love towards me ; as if you had been then of opinion, that the time would come, when for the evil diſpoſition of ſome, an innocent man, devoted unto the ſtudy of Wiſdom and Learning, might be a ſtay both unto your ſelf and the whole Othoman Family. Since which time I have ever both dutifully obeyed your command, and with as much care and integrity as I poſſibly could, diſcharged my charge ; and in the late Perſian War, raiſed and brought into the Field mine Army, wherewith I defended the Frontiers of my Province from the incurſions of the Barbarians. But after that they were vanquiſhed, and by your Forces driven out of the leſſer Aſia, and that my unnatural and graceleſs Brethren, the one of them in Europe, as a moſt deſperate Recreant, had in plain Battel aſſailed the perſon of your moſt ſacred Majeſty (his reverend Father, far ſpent with age, and then grievouſly tormented with the Gout) of purpoſe to have at once deprived you both of your Life and Empire : and the other in Aſia ſeeking by like Diſloyalty and moſt horrible Treaſon there to poſſeſs himſelf of a Kingdom, had beſieged and taken Priſoners his Brothers Sons your Nephews, young Princes of great expectation, your faithful and loving Subjects ; and proceeding further, had ſet all that part of your Empire on a broil ; I thought my ſelf in duty bound to repair hither unto your Imperial Majeſty, for that I ſaw it came to paſs, not without the providence of the moſt Mighty, that I might at ſuch time eſpecially requeſt the juſt reward of my due deſert of you my moſt reverend and loving Father, the moſt religious obſerver of Equity and Juſtice ; when as you having had too great proof of the Infidelily of my unnatural Brethren, might moſt fitly and moſt commodiouſly perform that which you upon great reaſon might now grant unto me your dutiful and obedient Son, although my former deſerts had merited no ſuch thing. Wherefore moſt gracious Sir, I humbly pray and beſeech you by all your Fatherly Love and Affection towards me, and known Loyalty towards you, to vouchafe before the coming of Selymus, to have regard of mine Honour, with the ſtate of your Empire ; for when he ſhall once in Arms break in, he will at a trice cut off all hope of pacification ; and ſupported by the Men of War, confound all things at his pleaſure ; for I hear, that the very Garders of your Perſon, and chief Commanders of your Armies, altered in diſpoſition towards you, do but expect the good offer of time, when they may willingly ſalute for their Emperor and Sovereign, him, whom your good fortune of late full ſore againſt their Wills, overthrew in open Field. Wherefore that Empire whereof I was ſometime poſſeſſed, and for the rare deſert of mine ancient Loyalty towards you, is of good right due unto me, reſtore to me again whilſt you may, and whilſt it is yet in your power, in this ſuddain and momentary occaſion now preſented. For your Majeſty ſhall in vain favour my moſt juſt and upright claim, after that you (having at once received into the Imperial City a moſt deſperate and ambitious man) have for ever loſt your liberty, together with your ſelf.

Bajazet comforteth Corcutus, and promiſeth to reſign to him the Empire, after that Selymus was paſſed over into Aſia.

Corcutus with tears ſtanding in his Eyes having ended his Speech, the aged Emperor moved with a Fatherly Affection, and the reaſonable perſwaſion of him, his only loyal and moſt kind Son, comforted him up with good words, and willed him to be of good chear ; and withal diſcovered to him the very ground of his reſolution, in calling home of Selymus ; telling him farther, That he could be well content to reſign to him again the Empire, but that it was not in his power ſo preſently to do, for fear of the Souldiers of the Court ; who had (as he ſaid) of late withſtood him in the like motion, and would again with tooth and nail gainſay it, if he ſhould but give the leaſt occaſion for them to ſuſpect any ſuch matter; but that by the plot now laid, Selymus ſhould under the title of honour be drawn out of Europe, together with the Souldiers of the Court, into Aſia againſt Achomates, both bars unto his preſent deſire for transferring of the Empire, in whoſe abſence it ſhould be in his power freely to diſpoſe therof at his pleaſure; which he promiſed preſently to reſign unto him, ſo ſoon as they were once paſſed over into Aſia. Which thing once done, although it were not altogether to their liking, yet feared he not, that either the Captains or Souldiers, who had of late ſo honourably and faithfully defended him againſt Selymus, ſhould now for his ſake diſlike of Corcutus, or attempt any thing not beſeeming the glory of their late deſert; but rather hoped, that if his two unnatural and rebellious Sons, Achomates and Selymus, ſhould once joyn battel (as it was moſt like they ſhould) that either the one or both ſhould by the juſt Judgment of God periſh for their ſo great diſobedience, murdred by the hands one of another. Corcutus not much diſliking of his Fathers purpoſe, and reſting himſelf wholly upon his Favour, thought it not good further to argue the matter his Father had ſo well conſidered of; but taking his leave, returned to his lodging, not without hope of obtaining the Empire, and ſo remained many days after at Conſtantinople; during which time he ſought neither by Gifts nor golden Promiſes to procure the love and good liking of the great Baſſaes or Souldiers of the Court; for that he as a plain upright man, thought it not good by ſuit and corruption (the great Promoters of the unworthy) to ſeek for that at their hands which was of right due unto him by his Fathers Favour and Promiſe.

In the mean time Selymus his faſt Friends advertiſing him of the coming of Corcutus to the Court, adviſed him to make haſt, and with all ſpeed poſſible to come to Conſtantinople; for that it was to be feared, leſt Bajazet being very aged, and withal eaſily to be drawn away, might by the perſwaſion of Corcutus be induced to alter, yea and perhaps quite break off the courſe before well ſet for his moſt ready preferment. Upon which news, Selymus attentively waiting upon nothing more than to have acceſs unto his Friends in Court, and before reſolved, at his firſt coming thither not to ſpare for any coſt in corrupting the Men of War, and ſo to poſſeſs himſelf of the Empire; made now no ſtay, but with certain Troops of Horſemen, commanding the reſt to follow after, came with wonderful celerity to Conſtantinople. Corcutus with the great Baſſaes and Courtiers, and moſt part of the Souldiers of the Court, going to meet him at the Gates of the City, at his entrance received him with a kiſs (as is the manner of the Turks) and brought him through the midſt of the City, all the People running out by heaps to have a ſight of the man, of late in every mans mouth for his deſperate Rebellion, but now welcomed with much thundering Shot in token of triumph, and the joyful Acclamation of Men, Women, and Children, and People of all ſorts. So that it eaſily appeared, that all the hatred before conceived againſt him for his late outrage againſt his Father, was now quite forgotten; and that he would in ſhort time before his other Brethren aſpire unto the Empire.

The next day after, Selymus came to the Court, and having acceſs to his Father, fell proſtrate before him and kiſſed his Feet, and with the greateſt ſhew of humility poſſible, craved of him pardon for his Diſloyalty. O deep Diſſembler, and Traitor of all other moſt treacherous! of late in Field with Sword drawn to have ſlain his aged Father, but now proſtrate at his Feet; and within an hour mounted perforce into his Imperial Seat.

The old Emperor ſmiling upon this Crocodile, in moſt kind manner, took him up, and courteouſly ſaid unto him:

Thy Faults, Son Selymus, are ſo much the leſs, for that they have found ſpeedy repentance; wherefore I do the more willingly grant thee pardon; but from henceforth endeavour thy ſelf, that God who hath given thee a notable Spirit and Courage, may alſo be thought to have indued thee with a good and well diſpoſed Mind. There is a Martial matter ready, worthy thy hardneſs, wherein thou maiſt ſufficiently manifeſt unto the World thy forwardneſs and courage; there when time ſerveth let it appear.

Bajazet his crafty Speech unto his Son Selymus.

Shortly after was called a Counſel for the Wars, but eſpecially for the chuſing of a General to go againſt Achomates; the honour of which place when many would have given to Selymus, he began with great diſſimulation to refuſe, making as though he would not in any caſe be preferred before his Brother Corcutus, to whom he would (as he ſaid) willingly give place, both in reſpect of his years and learned diſcretion, who could no doubt with greater Authority and Wiſdom mannage that War: As for himſelf, now he had obtained his Fathers gracious Pardon and Favour, he could well content himſelf with any corner of the Empire, were it never ſo little.

*The crafty diſſimulation of Se*lymus.

But Corcutus and his Friends, who had repoſed all their hope and all their devices in the departure of Selymus with the Souldiers of the Court; as if they had with great modeſty contended on both ſides, again perſwaded him, yea and inſtantly requeſted him not to refuſe that honour by general conſent without any diſgrace to his Brother, given to him as to a worthy Chieftain of great experience in Martial Affairs. So Selymus with wonderful cunning deluding Corcutus and his Favourites, whilſt he ſeemeth craftily to refuſe the thing he moſt deſireth, is by the general conſent of all parts choſen General of the Army to go againſt his Brother Achomates. which was no ſooner made known unto the Souldiers, eſpecially the Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court; but they before inſtructed, with loud Acclamations ſaluted him not for their General only, but for their Sovereign Lord and Emperor alſo; and ſo without further delay put themſelves in Arms to defend and make good that they had done, if any better diſpoſed ſhould ſeem to withſtand them or diſſent from them.

Selymus by the Souldiers thus ſaluted Emperor, at firſt made ſhew as if he had been half unwilling to take upon him the Empire; and ſo began faintly to refuſe it, as moved ſo to do by the due reverence and regard of his Father, yet living. But after a while he ſuffered himſelf to be intreated; and then commending himſelf and his cauſe wholly to the Men of War, to bind them unto him the faſter, promiſed beſide the particular favours he ought them, to beſtow a right great and general Largeſs amongſt them; which he afterward accordingly performed.

After that, he requeſted the chief Baſſaes and Commanders of the Army there preſent, to go forthwith unto his Father, and to take ſuch order (ſeeing it was the mind of the whole Army it ſhould be ſo) that the Empire might by his good Will, without further trouble or tumult be forthwith transferred unto him.

Muſtapha the great Baſſa, in whoſe wily head all this matter was (to his own worthy deſtruction) firſt hammered; whether it were upon a new fineneſs of his own, or that Selymus, (as it was given out) had threatned to kill him, except he would go and ſhew all the whole proceſs of the matter to his Father; coming as a man diſmaied to Bajazet, (who awaked with clamour and tumult of the Souldiers, was come out of his Chamber, into the open rooms of his Palace) in few words delivered unto him this moſt unwelcome Meſſage, as followeth:

The blunt Speech of Muſtapha to Bajazet perſuading him to reſign the Empire to Selymus.

Emperor (ſaid he) the Men of War have in their Counſel ſaluted Selymus both their General and Emperor, which their choice they require thee to ratiſie, being ready preſently to break into the Court to kill us both, if thou ſhalt refuſe forthwith to reſign the Empire. They all with one conſent requeſt that of thee, which they have already put into the hand of another. Wherefore it is a thing of far more danger, to ſeek to recover that thou haſt already loſt, than willingly to yield that which is already taken from thee, ſeeing it is not by any force or policy to be regained. They in Arms, in fury, and now entred into Rebellion, think upon ſome greater miſchief.

Bajazet troubled with fear and choler, and then too late perceiving the treachery of the Baſſaes, and how he had been by them betrayed; pauſing a while at the ſtrangeneſs of the matter, afterwards in fury brake out into theſe Words:

The reſolute anſwer of old Bajazet to Muſtapha and the other Baſſas.

Falſe and Forſworn, do you thus betray me? and with ſuch monſtrous villany requite mine infinite Bounty? Why do you not alſo as Murderers take away my life, which could not endure for a while to expect the diſſolution of this my weak and aged body; but depoſing your juſt and lawful Sovereign, muſt needs in poſt haſt ſet up a moſt wicked and graceleſs man to reign over you? But much good do it you with your deſired Emperor, the Contemner of God, and Murtherer of his Father; to whom ere it be long, you ſhall full dearly pay the price of this your perfideous dealing and treachery againſt me. And he himſelf beginning his Empire by moſt unnatural treaſon, murder, and bloodſhed, ſhall not (I hope) eſcape the heavy hand of God, the undoubted and ſevere Revenger of ſo great Impiety and Treaſon.

Muſtapha, with Boſtanges and Ajax as falſe as himſelf, returning back again to the Souldiers, ſpeaking not a word of the ſorrow and indignation of Bajazet, told them how that he was well content to reſign the Empire, and ſo had appointed Selymus (to whom both God and the general conſent of the Men of War had already delivered the Empire) to ſucceed him in the Empire. When this their Speech was generally reported, they whom Selymus had before corrupted, began now to hold up their heads and look big on the matter; and others who before ſtood doubtful what to do, ſeeing now no other remedy, in haſt joyned themſelves unto the ſame Faction. Whilſt all things were thus diſorderly carried by the unruly Souldiers, Selymus was by them mounted upon a couragious Horſe, and ſo with all Pomp conducted up and down moſt of the fair Streets of the imperial City; and with the general voice and clamor of the People (howſoever their minds were for moſt part otherwiſe affected) ſaluted Emperor. And the ſame day both the great Baſſaes and the Souldiers in general, were all ſolemnly ſworn unto Selymus, as their only Lord and Emperor.

Corcutus, whether it were for grief of his hope now loſt, or fear of his life, although Selymus had promiſed to give him the City of Mytilene, with the Iſland of Lesbos, ſecretly embarked himſelf, and ſo returned to Magneſia.

Bajazet of late one of the greateſt Monarchs of the World, but now thus thruſt out of his Empire by his Son, deteſting both him and the treachery of his Subjects, and overcome with ſorrow and Melancholy, determined of himſelf, before he were thereto enforced by Selymus to forſake Conſtantinople, and to retire himſelf to Dymotica (a ſmall City wholeſomely ſituated in Thracia, not far from Hadrianople, where in former time he had for his pleaſure beſtowed great coſt, and now as he thought beſt fitted his preſent eſtate.) Wherefore cauſing great ſtore of Treaſure, Plate, Jewels, and rich Furniture to be truſſed up, he with five hundred of his Houſhold Servants, full of Heavineſs and Sorrow, with Tears trickling down his aged cheeks, departed out of the Imperial City, towards Hadrianople, with purpoſe from thence to have gone to Dymotica. Selymus brought him about two miles upon his way, and ſo returning again to Conſtantinople, took poſſeſſion of the Palace.

Bajazet being then about ſeventy ſix years old, or as ſome report full fourſcore; and beſide his old diſeaſe of the Gout, ſore weakned with heavineſs and grief of mind, was not able to travel above five or ſix miles a day, but was conſtrained by the extremity of his pain and weakneſs, to ſtay ſometimes two or three days in a place. Whilſt he was thus travelling, Selymus no leſs careful of the keeping of his Eſtate, than he had before been for the obtaining of the ſame, began now to doubt, That if he ſhould depart from Conſtantinople, and with all his Forces paſs over into Aſia againſt his Brother Achomates, Bajazet in the mean time might in his abſence return to Conſtantinople, and ſo again poſſeſs himſelf both of the City and Empire. Wherefore to rid himſelf of that fear, he reſolved moſt Viper like, before his going to kill his Father, and ſo moſt unnaturally to deprive him of life, of whom he had received life; ſuch is the cruel and accurſed Nature of Ambition, that it knoweth neither Father, Mother, Brother, Wife, Kindred, or Friend, no ſometimes not her own Children; the fury whereof was never in any one more pregnant, than in this moſt monſtrous and cruel Tyrant Selymus.

Selymus practiſeth with Haman a Jew, Bajazet his Phyſitian to poyſon him.

The readieſt and moſt ſecret way he could deviſe for the effecting of this his damnable device, (which without great impiety could not be ſo much as once by him thought upon) was to work it by poyſon; upon which reſolution he ſecretly compacted with Haman a Jew, his Fathers chief Phyſitian, to poyſon him; promiſing him for his reward a Penſion of ten Ducats a day during his life. And for that men are oftentimes with terror and fear, as well as with reward, enforced to be the miniſters of miſchief; he to be the more ſure of this Jew, (prone enough for gain to do evil) threatned him with moſt cruel death, if he did not both ſecretly and ſpeedily work this feat, commanding him ſo ſoon as he had done it, to return unto him to Conſtantinople.

The deceitful Jew moved both with the fear of death and hope of reward, (two great motives) coming ſhortly after to Bajazet, and finding him very weak, ſeeming to be very careful of him, told him, That he would prepare for him a portion, which ſhould both reſtore to him his health, and alſo ſtrengthen his weak body, if it would pleaſe him to take it the next morning early lying in his bed. Bajazet nothing diſtruſting his old Phyſitian whom he had ſo often and ſo long truſted, ſaid he would gladly take it. Early the next morning cometh the Jew with the deadly poyſon in a Cup of Gold, Bajazet yet ſleeping, which he ſet down in the Chair of State, and ſo ſtood waiting untill the aged Prince ſhould of himſelf awake. But Bajazet ſleeping ſoundly (as oftentimes it chanceth when men ſleep their laſt) and withal ſomewhat longer than ſtood with the Jews purpoſe, he preſuming of his wonted practice, awaked him and told him, That the time to take the portion was almoſt paſt, and asked him if it were his pleaſure then to take it. Bajazet doubting no Treaſon, willed him to bring it; whereof when the Jew had taken the eſſay, (having before himſelf taken a preſervative againſt that poyſon) he gave it to Bajazet to drink, who chearfully drank it up; the Phyſitian commanding them that waited in his Bed-Chamber, and attended on his perſon, to keep him well covered with warm clothes, and not to give him any thing to drink until he had well ſweat. This curſed Jew having thus poyſoned the aged Prince, to avoid the danger of the Fact, and to carry the firſt news thereof to Selymus, ſecretly conveyed himſelf away, and in haſt fled to Conſtantinople. But Bajazet attainted with the force of the Poyſon, began firſt to feel moſt grievous gripings in his Stomach, the ſtrong pain whereof appeared by his miſerable complaining and heavy groaning; in the midſt of which torments he gave up the Ghoſt in the year 1512, when he had reigned thirty years. The Turks report that he died a natural death, but Antonius Utrius a Genoway, who at that time ſerved in Bajazet his Chamber, and was preſent at his death, reporteth, That upon his dead Body the evident tokens of Poyſon were to be ſeen. His dead Body with all his Treaſures were preſently brought back again to Conſtantinople, and delivered to Selymus, who cauſed the Body of his Father to be with the greateſt ſolemnity that might be, buried in a moſt ſumptuous Tomb, in a Chappel near unto the great Mahometan Temple, which he had before built for himſelf at Conſtantinople: which Monument there remaineth this day to be ſeen. His Servants were all by Selymus reſtored to their places which they before held in the Court in the time of their old Maſter, excepting five of the Pages of his Chamber, who lamenting the death of their Maſter above the reſt, had attired themſelves all in mourning Apparel; for which cauſe they were by the commandment of Selymus caſt into priſon, where two of them were put to death; the other three at the ſuit of Solyman, Selymus his Son, and of other two Baſſaes, were ſaved; but being ſtript of their rich Apparel, and whatſoever elſe they had gotten under Bajazet, they were inrolled for Common Souldiers under Sulluſtares Baſſa. Of theſe three, Antonius Utrius (the Genoway before ſpoken of) was one, who after ten years miſerable Captivity amongſt the Turks, at laſt eſcaped at ſuch time as Selymus was by the Perſian diſcomfited; and with much ado returning again into Italy, wrote the Hiſtory of all ſuch things as he himſelf had there ſeen, with the calamities of Bajazet his Houſe, and a great part of the tyrannous Reign of Selymus.

The death of Bajazet.

Selymus cauſeth two of his Fathers Pages to be put to death for mourning for their Maſter.

Haman the Jew juſtly rewarded for his treachery.

Haman the falſe Jew (as the ſame Author reporteth) coming to Conſtantinople, and expecting ſome great reward for his foul Treaſon, by the commandment of Selymus had his head preſently ſtruck off; with this exprobation of his Treachery, That opportunity ſerving, he would not ſtick for reward to do the like againſt Selymus himſelf. Of this Bajazet, Janus Vitalis writeth this Elogium:

Paulus Jovius Illuſt. virorum Elog. lib. 4.

Dum rerum exquiris cauſas, & dum procul Hunnes
Carmannos, Cilices, Sauromataſque domas:
Bajazethe, domi proles tua te petit armis,
Et te per fraudes amovet imperio.
Adjicit inde novum ſceleri ſcelus, & tibi miſcet
Pocula lethiferis illita graminibus.
Intempeſtivos crudelis vipera fœtus,
Per ſua ſic tandem funera, rupta, parit.
Quid tutum eſt, cui ſint ingentia regna Tyranno,
Si timeat natos, progeniemque ſuam?

In Engliſh thus:

Whilſt that thou Bajazethes ſeekſt of things the hidden cauſe,
And fain wouldſt bring the Hunne and Ruſs under thy Turkiſh Laws:
Thy Son at home ſteps up in Arms againſt thy Royal Crown,
And by falſe Treaſon and Deceit finds means to pluck thee down.
Whereto he addeth miſchief more, and ſtraight without delay,
By Poyſon ſtrong in glittering Bowl doth take thy life away:
The cruel Viper ſo brings forth her foul untimely Brood,
Who eat and gnaw her Belly out, their firſt and poiſoned Food.
Which things may Princes hold for ſafe, that do great Kingdoms ſway,
If of their Children they muſt ſtand in dread and fear alway?

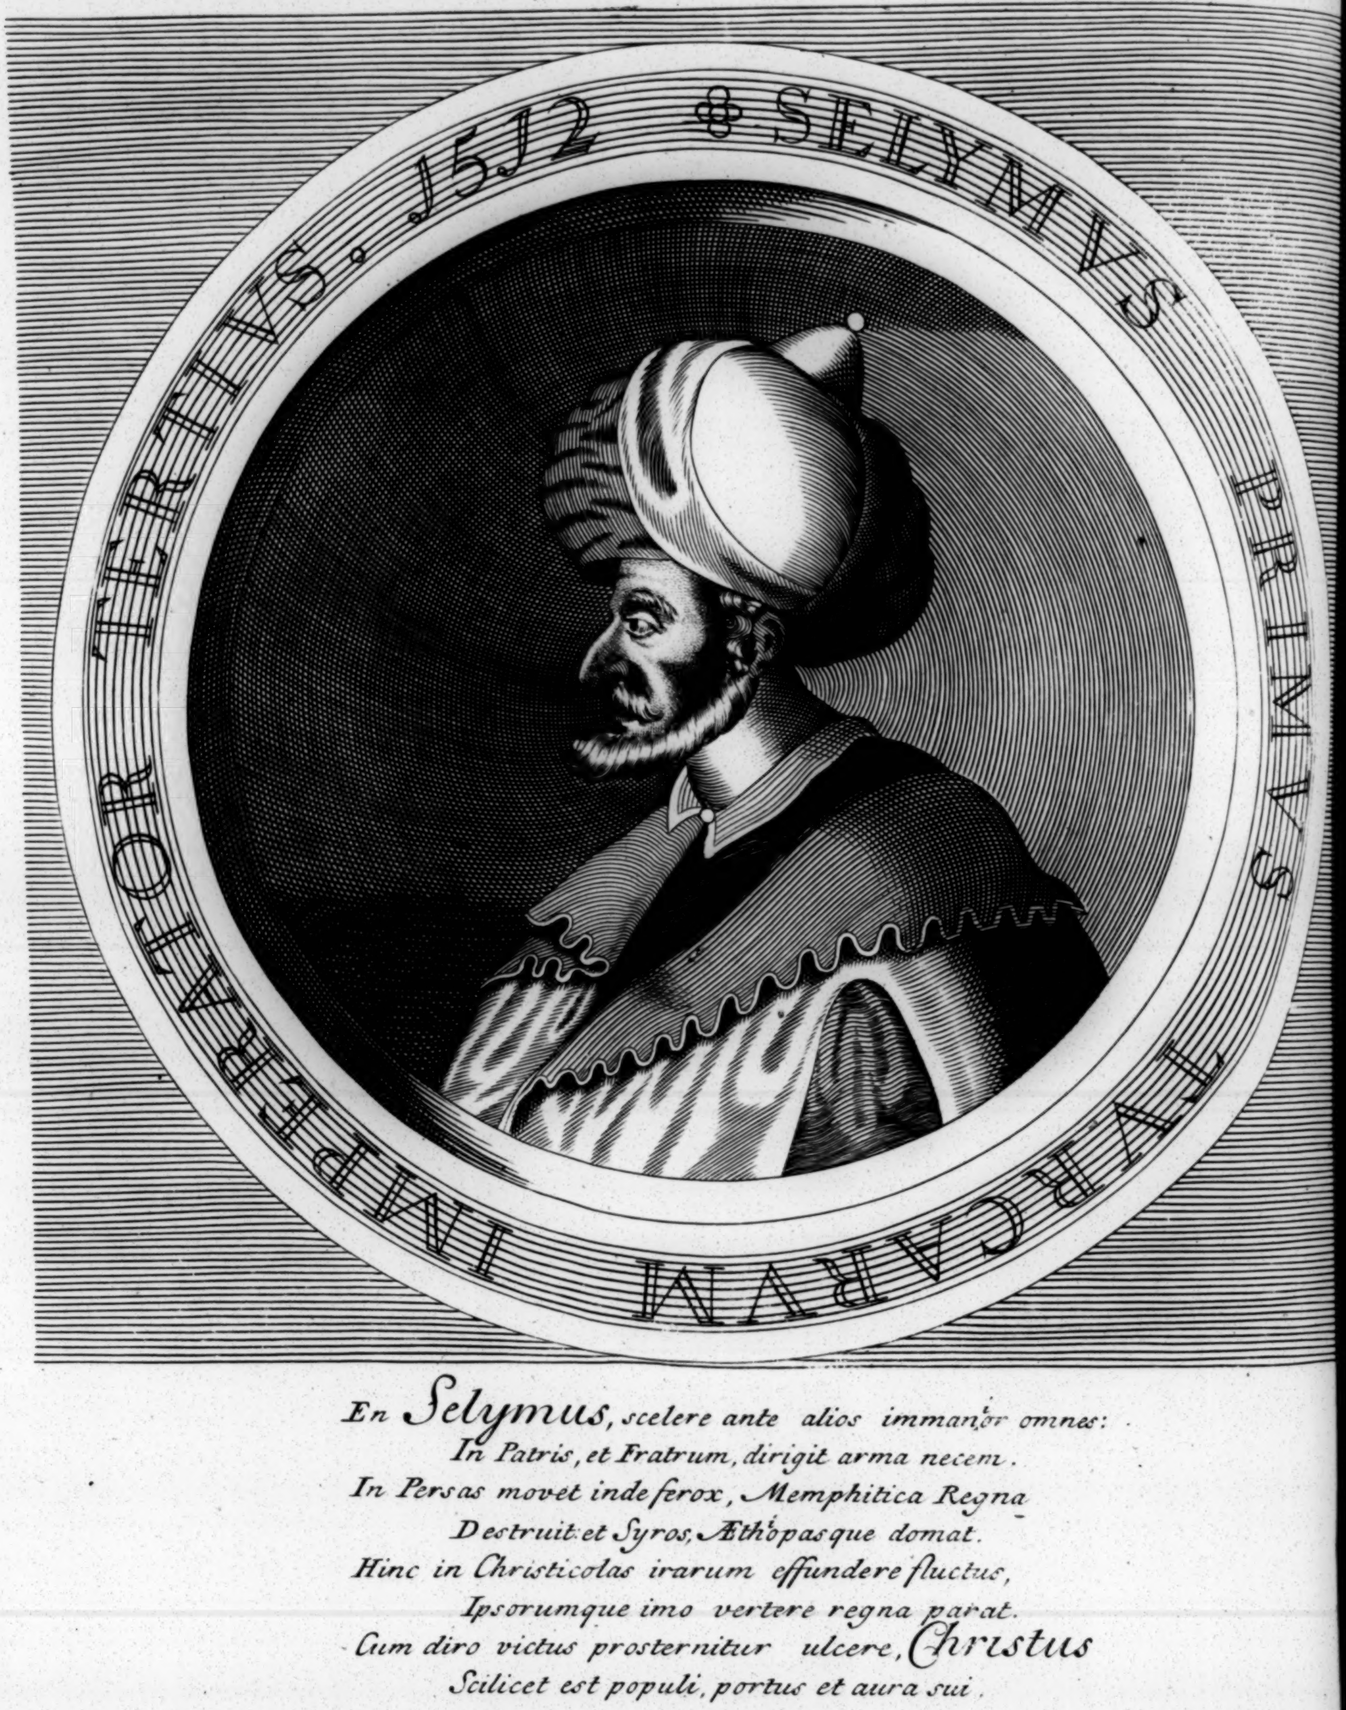
The



1512 SELYMVS PRIMVS TVRCARVM IMPERATOR TERTIVS.

En Selymus, scelere ante alios immanior omnes:
In Patris, et Fratrum, dirigit arma necem.
In Persas movet inde ferox, Memphitica Regna Destruit: et Syros, Æthiopasque domat.
Hinc in Christicolas irarum effundere fluctus,
Ipsorumque imo vertere regna parat.
Cum diro victus prosternitur ulcere, Christus
Scilicet est populi, portus et aura sui.

Lo Selymus, the vilest of the Othoman brood, Embru'd his hands in Father's, Brothers bloud.
Persian, Egyptian, Syrian, and Moore
Submit their Scepters to his insolent pow'r;
But when the Christians Realms he vainly thought,
To speedy desolation to have brought,
A mortall ulcer seizd him, to make knowne
The great Messiah can protect his owne.

The LIFE of

SELYMUS,

Firſt of that NAME,

The THIRD and moſt WARLIKE

Emperor of the Turks.

1512. THIS Selymus, by favour of the great Baſſaes and Men of War whom he had before corrupted, having deprived his Father Bajazet firſt of the Empire, and ſhortly after of his Life alſo, and now fully poſſeſſed of the Empire himſelf; firſt took view of the Treaſures which the Turkiſh Kings and Emperors his Anceſtors had before of long time heaped up in great abundance; out of which he gave unto the Souldiers of the Court two millions of Ducats; and for a perpetual remembrance of his thankfulneſs towards them augmented their daily wages, allowing unto every Horſeman four Aſpers a day, and to every Footman two, above their wonted allowance. By which exceeding bounty, he greatly aſſured unto himſelf the minds of the Men of War.

Selymus going into Aſia againſt his Brother Achomates.

Shortly after he paſſed over with a great Army into Aſia, leaving the government of the Imperial City of Conſtantinople unto his only Son Solyman; and marching into Galatia came to the City of Ancyra, in hope there to have oppreſſed his elder Brother Achomates. But he underſtanding before of his coming, withal wiſely conſidering how unable he was to withſtand his Forces, fled before into the Mountains of Cappadocia upon the Confines of Armenia, taking up men by the way as he went, and praying aid of all ſorts of People, yea even of ſuch as were but of ſmall ability themſelves, and unto him meer Strangers; that ſo he might in beſt manner he could, provide ſuch ſtrength as might ſerve him to make head againſt his Brother, and for the recovery of Aſia.

Selymus having ſpent that Summer without doing any thing worth the ſpeaking of, and conſidering that he could not well winter in that cold Country near unto the great Mountain Taurus, by reaſon of the deep Snows and extream cold there uſually falling, and that to go farther was to no purpoſe, foraſmuch as Achomates flying from place to place, and Mountain to Mountain was not to be ſurpriſed, he retired back again into Bithynia, and ſending his Europeian Horſemen down to the Sea-coaſt, and the Janizaries to Conſtantinople; reſolved to winter with the reſt of his Army at Pruſa. At which time being wholly bent againſt Achomates his Competitor of the Empire, he for certain years continued the League which his Father Bajazet had before concluded with Uladiſlaus King of Hungary, Sigiſmundus King of Polonia, and the Venetians. And thinking no care (no not of Children) ſuperfluous which might concern the eſtabliſhing of his Empire, he called unto him five of his Brothers Sons, Orchanes the Son of Alem Scach; Mahometes the Son of Tzian Scach; Orchanes, Emirſa, and Muſa the Sons of his Brother Mahometes; all young Princes of great hope, of years betwixt ſixteen and twenty, excepting Muſa who was not paſt ſeven years old; Of all theſe, Mahometes (whom his Uncle Achomates had a little before taken Priſoner at Larenda, as is before declared, and upon the death of Bajazet had again ſet him at liberty) being about twenty years old, was for rare Feature and Princely Courage accounted the Paragon and Beauty of the Othoman Family; which great perfection, as it won unto him the love and favour of the Men of War, and alſo of all the People in general; ſo did it haſten his ſpeedy death, only Selymus his cruel Uncle envying at his life. After he had got theſe poor innocents into his hands, he ſent for divers of his great Doctors and Lawyers, demanding of them, Whether it were not better that ſome five, eight, or ten perſons ſhould be taken away, than that the State of the whole Empire ſhould with great effuſion of Blood be rent in ſunder, and ſo by civil Wars be brought in danger of utter ruin and deſtruction? Who although they well perceived whereunto that bloody queſtion tended, yet for fear of diſpleaſure they all anſwered, That it were better ſuch a ſmall number ſhould periſh, than that the whole State of the Empire ſhould by Civil War and Diſcord be brought to confuſion; in which general calamity, thoſe few muſt alſo of neceſſity periſh with the reſt. Upon colour of this anſwer, and the neceſſity pretented, he commanded theſe his Nephews before named, to be led by five of his great Captains into the Caſtle of Pruſa, where they were all the night following moſt cruelly ſtrangled. It is reported, that Mahometes with a Pen-knife ſlew one of the bloody Executioners ſent into his Chamber to kill him; and ſo wounded the other, as that he fell down for dead; and that Selymus being in a Chamber faſt by, and almoſt an Eye-witneſs of that was done, preſently ſent in others, who firſt bound the poor Prince, and afterward ſtrangled him with the reſt; whoſe dead bodies were buried at Pruſa amongſt their Anceſtors. The cruelty of this Fact wonderfully offended the minds of moſt men, inſomuch that many even of his Martial men filled with ſecret indignation, for certain days abſented themſelves from his preſence, ſhunning his ſight as if he had been ſome fierce or raging Lion.

1513. Selymus ſeeketh after the lives of Amurat and Aladin, the Sons of Achomates his Brother.

Of all the Nephews of old Bajazet, only Amurat and Aladin (the Sons of Achomates) yet remained, whom he purpoſed to ſurpriſe upon the ſuddain, and ſo to rid himſelf of all fear of his Brothers Children; having then left none of the Othoman Family, but them and his two Brethren upon whom to exerciſe his further Cruelty. Theſe two young Princes had a little before recovered the City of Amaſia, from whence they were the Summer before expulſed by their Uncle Selymus, at ſuch time as Achomates their Father was glad to flie into the Mountains of Cappadocia. Selymus fully reſolved upon their deſtruction, ſent Uſegi one of his Baſſaes with five thouſand Horſemen, who by great journies travelling to Amaſia, might upon the ſuddain come upon theſe two young Princes, and take them altogether unprovided, and as then fearing no ſuch danger, which was thought no great matter for the Baſſa to do, foraſmuch as he might with his light Horſemen eaſily prevent the fame of his coming; and the City of Amaſia where they lay, was neither well walled, nor as then furniſhed with any ſufficient Garriſon for defence thereof; beſides that, Achomates himſelf was at that time abſent, buſied in taking up of Souldiers upon the Frontiers of Caramania. But Muſthapha the old Baſſa, by whoſe ſpecial means Selymus had obtained the Empire (as is afore declared in the life of Bajazet) being privy unto his wicked purpoſe, and now in mind altogether alienated from him, deteſting his moſt execreable Tyranny, both for the unworthy death of Bajazet, his Father, and the guiltleſs blood of ſo many young Princes his Nephews by him ſhed without all pity; and having compaſſion of the imminent danger whereinto theſe two Brethren were now like alſo to fall; by ſecret and ſpeedy Meſſengers gave them warning of the coming of the Baſſa, and all that was intended againſt them. Who upon ſuch knowledge given, preſently advertiſed Achomates their Father thereof, and laid ſecret ambuſh themſelves for the intercepting of their Enemies. So that within few days after, the Baſſa coming with his Horſemen towards Amaſia, fell before he was awar into the midſt of his Enemies; at which time alſo, Achomates following him at the heels, ſo ſhut him in with his Army on every ſide, that moſt of his men being ſlain, he himſelf with divers other Captains were taken Priſoners and brought to Achomates, and by his commandment committed to ſafe cuſtody.

Uſegi Baſſa taken Priſoner.

Now it fortuned, that ſome of Achomates Souldiers ſcoffing at the Priſoners whom they had taken, told them how they had been deceived, and how all the matter had been carried (ſo hard a thing it is to have even the greateſt Counſels in Court kept ſecret) boaſting that they wanted not their Friends, even of ſuch as were moſt inward with Selymus, who ſecretly favored the better cauſe, and would not long ſuffer the cruel Beaſt to rage further; all which things Selymus his Souldiers reported again after they were ranſomed and retuned home. But Uſegi the Baſſa lying ſtill in Priſon, and getting certain knowledge of the whole matter, by ſecret Letters gave Selymus to underſtand, that Muſtapha the great Baſſa whom he moſt of all truſted, had ſecret intelligence with Achomates, and had been the only cauſe of the loſs of his Army.

Muſtapha Baſſa ſhamefully murthered.

Selymus of late envying at the great Honour and Authority of Muſtapha, and wiſhing him dead, (whoſe deſert he was not able, or at leaſtwiſe unwilling to requite) cauſed him upon this accuſation without further trial to be ſecretly ſtrangled in his ſight, and his dead body (as it were in ſcorn of his former felicity) to be caſt out into the Street for every man to gaze upon. This was the ſhameful end of this traiterous Baſſa, who had of long time at his pleaſure commanded all things in the Turkiſh Empire, and was for Riches, Power and Authority, next unto the Emperors themſelves; but now lieth as a dead Dog in the Street, no man daring for fear to caſt earth upon him. A rare ſpectacle of the uncertainty of worldly Felicity, and a worthy example of Diſloyalty. But Achomates hearing what had happened to Muſtapha, in revenge thereof in like manner executed Uſegi Baſſa his Priſoner, and according to his courteous nature ſet all the reſt of the Priſoners at liberty.

Uſegi Baſſa put to death.

Selymus thirſting after nothing more than the guiltleſs blood of his Brethren and Nephews, upon whom he had againſt all right uſurped the Kingdom, whereof he never thought himſelf ſufficiently aſſured ſo long as any of them breathed; began with the firſt of the Spring to deviſe with himſelf, how he might firſt take away his Brother Corcutus, who then lived at Magneſia, and having caſt off all hope of the Empire, gave himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of Philoſophy, which he (ſeduced with Ambition) had in evil time a little before forſaken; but now retiring himſelf thereto again, as to his greateſt contentment, ſpent his time in quiet contemplation, not attempting any thing againſt his cruel Brother uſurping the Empire. Selymus reſolved upon the deſtruction of this harmleſs Prince, ſuddainly commanded his Captains to make choice of ten thouſand Horſemen to be in readineſs within three days, giving it out that he would make an inroad upon the ſuddain into Cappadocia. In the number of theſe Horſemen, Antonius Mœnavinus a Genoway, Author of this Hiſtory (as he himſelf reporteth) was one.

All things being in readineſs againſt the appointed time, Selymus in perſon himſelf ſet forward with his Army from Pruſa, ſtill keeping the way on the right hand; ſo that the Souldiers, who thought they ſhould have marched directly into Cappadocia, and ſo to Amaſia, as it was before commonly reported; began now to perceive by the contrary courſe they held, that they were to go for Lydia and Ionia. When a valiant Souldier among the reſt, who had ſometime ſerved one of the Baſſaes in Corcutus his Court, by divers circumſtances gathering the intention of Selymus, ſecretly conveied himſelf out of the Army, and being excellently well mounted, taking the neareſt way, came to Magneſia, and gave Corcutus warning of the coming of his Brother. Corcutus conſidering the great danger he was in, richly rewarded the Meſſenger, and leaving his Houſe in ſuch order as it was wont to be, fled with two of his Servants to the Sea ſide, in hope to have found paſſage either into Crete or elſe Rhodes.

The next day after Corcutus was departed, early in the Morning came Selymus to the Caſtle of Magneſia before the riſing of the Sun, in hope to have found Corcutus yet in his bed; but being deceived of his expectation, he fell into a great rage, and with cruel torments examined all his Brothers Servants and Eunuchs, What was become of him, and where he had hid himſelf? and with much ado got it out of them, That he had warning of his coming by a fugitive Souldier, and was thereupon fled, but whither they knew not. Wherefore Selymus ſtaied there fifteen days, during which time he cauſed diligent ſearch to be made all over the Country, and along the Sea Coaſt, for to have apprehended him. But when after much ſearch he could hear no tydings of him, he cauſed all his Brothers Treaſure and rich Furniture to be truſſed up, and to be ſent by Sea to Conſtantinople. So leaving one of his Captains with a thouſand Horſemen in Garriſon at Magneſia, he returned again to Pruſa with as much ſpeed as he came from thence; verily ſuppoſing, that his Brother was for ſafeguard of his life, by Sea fled into Italy. All this while Boſtanges, Selymus his Son in Law, lying with a Fleet of Gallies upon the Coaſt of Ionia, had taken from Corcutus all hope of eſcaping by Sea: ſo that he was fain to hide himſelf in a Cave near unto the Sea ſide, not far from Smyrna; living in hope, that after a few days the Fleet would depart, and ſo he ſhould find ſome opportunity to eſcape.

Selymus taketh the ſpoil of his Brother Corcutus.

After he had thus a great while in fear moſt miſerably lived with Country Crabs and other like wild Fruit (a poor Diet for a man of State) and was with extream neceſſity inforced to ſend his man for relief to a poor Shephards Cottage thereby, he was by a Country Peſant diſcovered to Caſſumes, who with too much diligence ſought after his life; and being by him apprehended, was carried towards the Tyrant his Brother at Pruſa.

Corcutus taken.

Right welcome to Selymus was the report of his taking; who as ſoon as he underſtood that he was within a days journey of Pruſa, ſent one Kirengen-Ogli (who of his ſquint look was called Chior Zeinal) to ſtrangle him upon the way, and to bring his dead Body to Pruſa.

This Captain coming to Corcutus in the dead time of the night, and awaking him out of his ſleep, told him his heavy Meſſage; how that he was ſent from his Brother Selymus to ſee him executed, which muſt as he ſaid preſently be done. Corcutus exceedingly troubled with theſe heavy news, and fetching a deep ſigh, deſired the Captain ſo long to ſpare his life, until he might write a few ſhort lines unto his Brother Selymus. Which poor requeſt being granted, he called for Pen and Paper, and readily in Turkiſh Verſe (for he had ſpent all his time in ſtudy) reproved his Brother of moſt horrible Cruelty; upbraiding him, that he had not only moſt diſloyally thruſt his Father out of his Empire, but alſo moſt unnaturally deprived him of Life, of whom he had before received the ſame; and not ſo content, had moſt tyrannouſly ſlain his Brothers Children; and now like an unmerciful wretch thirſted after the guiltleſs blood of himſelf, and Achomates his Brethren. At laſt concluding his Letters with many a bitter curſe, he beſought God to take of him juſt revenge for ſo much innocent blood by him moſt unnaturally ſpilt. And when he had thus much written, he requeſted the Captain, that it might together with his dead body be delivered unto Selymus. So without any further delay he was according to the Tyrants command preſently ſtrangled. The next day after, when the dead body was preſented unto Selymus, he uncovered the face thereof, to be ſure that it was he, and ſeeing a Paper in his hand, took it from him; but when he had read it (for all his cruel nature and ſtony heart) he burſt out into tears; proteſting, that he was never ſo much grieved or troubled with any mans death as with his; for which cauſe, he commanded general mourning to be made for him in the Court, and with Princely ſolemnity buried his body. Three days after, he cauſed fifteen of thoſe diligent ſearchers who firſt found Corcutus, to have their Heads ſtruck off, and their bodies to be flung into the Sea, ſaying, That if he were by any extremity driven to fly and hide his Head, they would not ſtick to ſerve him in like manner as they had done his Brother.

Now of all the Poſterity of Bajazet remained none alive to trouble the cruel Tyrants thoughts but only Achomates and his two Sons; who upon the approach of the Spring, ſet forward with his Army from Amaſia, excited by the often Letters of his Friends, who aſſured him, that Selymus might upon the ſuddain be eaſily oppreſſed, if he would with all expedition come to Pruſa; foraſmuch as the Janizaries and Europeian Horſemen, the undoubted ſtrength of his Army, were at that time abſent, and he himſelf as one hated both of God and Man, could not in ſo ſuddain and unexpected danger tell what he were beſt to do, or which way to turn himſelf; wherefore they willed him without delay to haſten his coming, and not to expect the milder Weather of the Spring, leſt in the mean time Selymus ſhould call together his diſperſed Forces; God (they ſaid) did oftentimes offer unto men, both the opportunity and means to do great matters if they had the power to lay hold thereon, and therefore he ſhould do well now by celerity and courage to ſeek to better his evil Fortune, which but a little before had bereft him of his Fathers Kingdom; for if Summer were once come on, he muſt either gain the Victory by plain Battel, which would be a hard matter, or elſe get him packing out of Cappadocia and all Aſia the leſs.

Achomates, who before had promiſed unto himſelf better ſucceſs, as well for the great Strength he had of his own, as for the new ſupply of Horſemen he had procured from Hyſmael the Perſian King, but eſpecially for the hope he had, that Selymus generally hated for his late Cruelty, ſhould in the time of the Battel be forſaken of his own Souldiers; yielded to the perſwaſions of his Friends, who with many pleaſing words ſet before his Eyes glorious things, eaſie to be ſpoken, but hard to be effected. Wherefore, when he was come into Galatia with ſomewhat more than fifteen thouſand Horſemen, having for haſt left his Footmen by eaſie marches to come after him; Selymus advertiſed of his coming, by ſpeedy Meſſengers ſent for his Horſemen to Pruſa. In the mean time whiles he is levying other common Souldiers, and expecting the reſt of his Forces, Fortune which always favoured his attempts, did then alſo avert the danger prepared for him by the unfaithfulneſs of his Followers, and ſhewed to him the open way to Victory. For Achomates ſecret Friends which were in Selymus his Camp, continuing firm in their good will toward him, did earneſtly by Letters perſwade him (being already ſet forward, and now come as far as Paphlagonia) to make haſt, and to come before Selymus his Forces were come together; for that he had ſent for the Janizaries, and Europeian Horſemen, and did with all ſpeed and diligence make all the preparation he could poſſibly; which for all that would all come too late, if he ſhould upon the ſuddain come upon him before he were provided. Which Letters being by chance intercepted, gave Selymus certain knowledge both of his Brothers purpoſe and coming, together with the Treaſon intended againſt him by his own Servants; wherefore executing them who had writ thoſe Letters, he in their names cauſed others to the ſame effect to be written to Achomates, perſwading him with all ſpeed poſſible to come ſtill on, and not to ſtay for his Footmen, for that Selymus might eaſily be oppreſſed with a few Troops of Horſemen, if Achomates would with ſpeed but come and ſhew himſelf unto his Friends and Favourites; who upon the firſt ſignal of Battel would raiſe a tumult in the Army, and upon the ſuddain kill Selymus, unadviſedly going to and fro in the Battel. Which Letters ſo written, Selymus cauſed to be ſigned with the Seals of them whom he had before executed, and found means to have them cunningly delivered to Achomates, as if they had been ſent from his Friends; who giving credit to the ſame, and preſuming much upon his own Strength, doubted not to leave his Footmen, who followed eaſily after him, under the conduct of Amurat his Son; and came and encamped with his Horſemen near unto the Mountain Horminius, upon the Bank of the River Parthemius. Selymus alſo departed from Pruſa, and having received into his Army ten thouſand Janizaries (but a little before come over the Strait) ſent before Sinan Baſſa, General of his Aſian Horſemen, to know and make proof of the Strength of his Enemies. The Baſſa not knowing as yet where Achomates lay, neither of what force he was, being deceived by the darkneſs of the Morning, fell into a place of diſadvantage, where he was ſet upon by Achomates, and having loſt ſeven thouſand of his men, was glad with other eight thouſand which were left, to fly back to Selymus.

Sinan Baſſa diſcomfited by Achomates.

For all this loſs, was not Selymus diſcomforted, or doubtful of the Victory, but forthwith marched on forward to the River Elata, which runneth directly out of the Mountain Horminius into Pontus, watering moſt large Fields upon the right hand, which at this day are called the Plains of the new Land. So did Achomates alſo, who although he knew his Brother to be every way too ſtrong for him, yet being incouraged with the late Victory, and in hope that his Friends in Selymus his Army (whom he vainly ſuppoſed to have been yet living) would in the very Battel do ſome notable matter for him, and that Victory would follow his juſt quarrel; reſolved neither to retire back, neither to expect the coming of the reſt of his Army. The River was betwixt the two Camps, and the number of both Armies certainly diſcovered, yet could not Achomates (to whom the open Fields offered a ſafe retreat unto the reſt of his Army) poſſeſſed with a fatal madneſs, be perſwaded (conſidering the greatneſs of the danger) in time to provide for the ſafety of himſelf and his Army, carried headlong (as it ſeemed) by inevitable deſtiny to his fatal deſtruction, which preſently after enſued.

Selymus with his Army paſſeth over the River.

Selymus a little before the going down of the Sun, with his Army paſſed over the River Elata, and gave general commandment through all his Camp, that every man againſt the next day ſhould be ready for battel; and in a Wood not far off placed a thouſand Horſemen in ambuſh, under the leading of Canoglis, his Wives Brother, a valiant young Gentleman, whom his Father had a little before ſent from Taurica unto his Son in law with a choſen Company of Tartarian Horſemen; unt him Selymus gave in charge, that when the Battel was joyned, he ſhould ſhew himſelf with his Horſemen upon the back of his Enemies, and there to charge them.

As ſoon as it was day, Selymus in a great open Field put his Army in order of Battel, placing his Horſemen in two Wings, ſo that all his Spearmen were in the right Wing, and the Archers and Carbines in the left; in the main Battel ſtood the Janizaries with the reſt of the Footmen. On the other ſide Achomates having no Footmen, divided his Horſemen into two Wings alſo.

Whilſt both Armies ſtood thus ranged, expecting but the ſignal of Battel, a Meſſenger came from Achomates to Selymus, offering in his Maſters name, to trie the equity of their quarrel in plain Combat hand to hand; which if he ſhould refuſe, he then took both God and the World to witneſs, that Selymus was the only cauſe of all the guiltleſs blood to be ſhed in the Battel, and not he; whereunto Selymus anſwered, that he was not to trie his quarrel at the appointment of Achomates; and though he could be content ſo to do, yet would not his Souldiers ſuffer him ſo to adventure his perſon and their own ſafety; and ſo with that anſwer returned the Meſſenger back again to his Maſter, giving him for his reward a thouſand Aſpers.

Achomates having received this anſwer, without further delay charged the right Wing of his Brothers Army, who valiantly received the firſt charge; but when they were come to the ſword, and that the matter was to be tried by handy blows, they were not able longer to endure the force of the Perſian Horſemen; who being well armed both Horſe and Man, had before requeſted to be placed in the foremoſt ranks, by whoſe Valor the right Wing of Selymus his Army was diſordered, and not without great loſs enforced to retire back upon their Fellows. Which thing Selymus beholding, did what he might by all means to encourage them again; and preſently brought on the left Wing with their Arrows and Piſtols, inſtead of them that were fled; and at the ſame time came on with the Janizaries alſo, who with their Shot enforced Achomates his Horſemen to retire. Achomates himſelf carefully attending every danger, with greater Courage than Fortune came in with freſh Troops of Horſemen, by whoſe Valour the Battel before declining was again renewed, and the Victory made doubtful; but in the fury of this Battel whilſt he was bearing all down before him, and now in great hope of the Victory, Canoglis with his Tartarian Horſemen riſing out of ambuſh, came behind him, and with great outcries cauſed their Enemies (then in the greateſt heat of their Fight) to turn upon them; at which time alſo the Footmen ſtanding cloſe together aſſailed them afront, and the Horſemen whom the Perſians had at firſt put to flight, now moved with ſhame, were again returned into the Battel; ſo that Achomates his ſmall Army was beſet, and hardly aſſailed on every ſide. In fine his Enſigns being overthrown, and many of his Men ſlain, the reſt were fain to betake themſelves to flight. Where Achomates having loſt the Field, and now too late ſeeking to ſave himſelf by flight, fell with his Horſe into a Ditch, which the rain falling the day before, had filled with water and mire; and being there known and taken by his Enemies, could not obtain ſo much favour at their hands as to be preſently ſlain, but was reſerved to the farther pleaſure of his cruel Brother. Selymus underſtanding of his taking, ſent Kirengen (the ſame ſquint-eyed Captain which had before ſtrangled Corcutus) who with a Bowſtring ſtrangled him alſo. His dead Body was forthwith brought to Selymus, and was afterwards by his commandment in royal manner buried with his Anceſtors at Pruſa.

Amurat and Aladin the Sons of Achomates, fly, the one into Perſia, and the other to Egypt.

Now Amurat, Achomates his Son, underſtanding upon the way by the Perſian Horſemen (who ſerred together, had again made themſelves way through the Turks Army) of the loſs of the Field and the taking of his Father, returned back again to Amaſia; and there after good deliberation, reſolved with his Brother to betake themſelves both to flight; he with the Perſian Horſemen paſſing over the River Euphrates, fled unto Hyſmael the Perſian King; but Aladin the younger Brother paſſing over the Mountain Amanus in Cilicia, fled into Syria, and ſo to Campſon Gaurus the great Sultan of Egypt.

After this Victory, Selymus having in ſhort time and with little trouble brought all the leſſer Aſia under his obeiſance, and there at his pleaſure diſpoſed of all things, determined to have returned to Conſtantinople; but underſtanding that the Plague was hot there, he changed his purpoſe, and paſſing over at Callipolis and ſo travelling through Grecia, came to Hadrianople, where he ſpent all the reſt of the Summer, and all the Winter following; and afterward when the Mortality was ceaſed, returned to Conſtantinople; where it was found that an hundred and threeſcore thouſand had there died of the late Plague.

Hyſmael the Perſian King, whoſe Fame had then filled the World, hearing of the arrival of Amurat, ſent for him, and demanded of him the cauſe of his coming. The diſtreſſed young Prince, who but of late had loſt his Father, together with the hope of ſo great an Empire, and now glad for ſafegard of his life to fly into ſtrange Countries, oppreſſed with ſorrow, by his heavy Countenance and abundance of Tears, more than by Words, expreſſed the cauſe of his coming; yet in a ſhort ſtrained Speech, declared unto him, how that his Father, his Uncle, with the reſt of his Couſins, all Princes of great Honour, had of late been cruelly murthred by the unmerciful Tyrant Selymus, who with like fury ſought alſo after the life of himſelf and his Brother, the poor remainders of the Othoman Family, who to ſave their lives, were both glad to fly, his Brother into Egypt, and himſelf to the Feet of his Imperial Majeſty.

Hyſmael moved with compaſſion, and deeming it a thing well beſeeming the greatneſs of his Fame, to take the poor exiled Prince into his protection and to give him relief, willed him to be of good comfort, and promiſed him Aid. And the more to aſſure him thereof, ſhortly after gave him one of his own Daughters in marriage. For it was thought, that if Selymus (for his Tyranny become odious to the World) ſhould by any means miſcarry (as with Tyrants commonly falleth out) that then in the Othoman Family, ſore ſhaken with his unnatural Cruelty, none was to be preferred before this poor Prince Amurat; beſides that, it was ſuppoſed, that if he ſhould invade him with an Army out of Perſia, that upon the firſt ſtir, all the leſſer Aſia mourning for the unworthy death of Achomates, would at once revolt from him, who for his Cruelty and ſhameful Murthers had worthily deſerved to be hated together both of God and Man.

Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring Hyſmael furniſhed Amurat his new Son in Law with ten thouſand Horſemen, willing him to paſs over the River Euphrates at Arſenga, and to enter into Cappadocia, as well to make proof how the People of that Country were affected towards him, as of the ſtrength of the Enemy; after whom he ſent Vaſta-Ogli, the moſt famous Chieftain amongſt the Perſians, with twenty thouſand Horſemen more, with charge, That he ſhould ſtill follow Amurat within one days journy; and he himſelf with a far greater power ſtaid behind in Armenia, doubting to want Victual, if he ſhould have led ſo great an Army through thoſe vaſt, barren and deſolate places, whereby he muſt of neceſſity paſs.

1514. Amurat ſpoileth Cappadocia.

Amurat marching through the leſſer Armenia, and entring into the Borders of Cappadocia, had divers Towns yielded unto him by his Friends; ſome others he took by force, which he either ſacked or elſe quite raſed; and brought ſuch a general fear upon the Inhabitants of that Province, that the People ſubmitting themſeves unto him all the way as he went, it was thought he would have gone directly to Amaſia, had not Chendemus (an old Warlike Captain whom Selymus had left for his Lieutenant in Aſia) with a great Army come to meet him at Sebaſtia, which at this day is called Sivas. This Chendemus had alſo long before advertiſed Selymus both of the preparation and coming of the Perſians, as ſoon as he had learned by his Eſpials, That they were paſſed the River Euphrates. Upon which news Selymus came preſently over into Aſia, and commanding all his Forces to meet together at Pruſa, had with wonderful celerity levied thereabout forty thouſand common Souldiers. Which ſo ſoon as Amurat underſtood, as well by ſuch Priſoners as he had taken, as by advertiſement from his Friends; although he was very deſirous to have fought with Chendemus, yet doubting that if Selymus ſhould with his wonted celerity come againſt him, he ſhould be intangled in the Straits of the Mountain Antitaurus, he retired back again to Vaſta-Ogli. But Selymus, who all that year had in his haughty thoughts been plotting ſome ſuch notable exploit as were worthy his greatneſs, ſtanding in doubt whether he ſhould by Sea and Land invade Hungary, the Rhodes, or Italy, at that time ſore ſhaken with Civil Wars; having now ſo fit an occaſion given him by the Perſian, to the great joy of all Chriſtendom, converted himſelf wholly unto the Eaſt, and in thirty days march came to Arſenga. Where joining his Army with Chendemus, when he underſtood that his Enemies having harried the Country, were again retired, prickt forward with the grief of the injury and deſire of revenge, with hope of Victory he reſolved to follow after them foot by foot, and forthwith to enter into Armenia the greater, the principal Province of the Perſian Kingdom.

Selymus reſolveth to invade the Perſian.

But the difficulties of this notable expedition, which were in Counſel propounded by them which had beſt knowledg of thoſe Countries, were great and many, all which by his own good hap and invincible courage, he himſelf afterwards overcame; for the Souldiers which had in ſhort time already marched by Land out of Illyria, Epirus, and Macedonia, into Cappadocia, muſt of neceſſity in this long expedition take upon them new labors; they were to endure the ſharp and pinching cold of the huge Mountain Taurus, and by and by after the moſt vehement and ſcortching heat in the Plains of Armenia the leſſer, with extream Thirſt, Hunger, and moſt deſperate want of all things; and well the more, for that the Perſians in their Retreat ſpoiling the Country as they went, had utterly deſtroyed all that might ſerve for the uſe of man, of purpoſe to leave nothing to their Enemies but want of all things, if they ſhould purſue them; beſides that, his moſt expert Captains ſtood in no ſmall doubt of the petty Princes of Armenia the leſs, and the Mountain King Aladeules, whom they were to leave behind them at their backs, without any great aſſurance of their Frindſhip, who they well knew would leave them, if any thing ſhould happen otherwiſe than well to Selymus, either in the Battel, or for want of Victuals, or in the ſtrait paſſages. For they were to be relieved with Victuals from the Armenians: and Aladeules Forces then in readineſs, were neither for number nor power to be contemned; who alſo with Caſtles commodiouſly placed, and ſtrong Garriſons, at his pleaſure commanded all the ſtraits, paſſages, and entrances which led out of Cappadocia into Armenia and the Perſian Kingdom: for all the Mountain Countries were under his command, and his Kingdom ſtretched from the Mountains called Scodriſci near unto Pontus, all alongſt the great Mountain Taurus unto Amanus, which divideth Cilicia from Syria.

Amongſt the reſt, old Chendemus Viceroy of Natolia, a Man of great experience, and of all others in greateſt credit, favour, and authority with Selymus, perſwaded him to ſtay a while in Cappadocia, and there to refreſh his Europeian Souldiers already weary of their long Travel, and ſo to expect the coming of his Enemies. And to perſwade him from the dangerous expedition into Perſia, ſpake unto him as followeth:

Chendemus Baſſa diſſwades Selymus from going any further againſt the Perſians.

It is not to be thought (moſt mighty and invincible Emperor,) that the Perſians are fled for fear, becauſe they retired before they ſet eye upon us their Enemies: it is a fineneſs, and they plainly go about to entrap us, whiles they by flight make a falſe ſemblance of fear. Know we not what cunning Heads and able Bodies Perſia breedeth? Will they fear the naked Turkiſh light Horſemen or Archers, which with their couragious barbed Horſes and themſelves ſtrongly Armed, feared not the Scythian ſhot? or (if they be too little) which by their Valour have vanquiſhed ſo many Nations, and gained unto their King ſo great and large an Empire? Think you, that you have either greater or better Forces than had long ago, Caſſumes your Uncle, or Great Mahomet your Grandfather; who divers times proving their Forces againſt this Enemy, were more than once put to the worſt, I my ſelf then ſerving in their Camps near unto Trapezond and the Mountains of Nicopolis. I will not deny, but that the great Ordinance which you carry with you may ſtand you in great ſtead, ſo that fit place may be found to beſtow ſo many field Pieces in: but this ſcortched Ground, the frozen and abrupt Mountains, with the vaſt and ſolitary Plains beyond them, terrifie me, whom all the armed Forces of our Enemies in places of great advantage could not diſmay. You muſt fight not only with your valiant Enemies, but with the difficulties of Nature alſo. Neither may your Majeſty give any credit to the Armenians or Aladeules, Princes of moſt doubtful Faith: although at your firſt ſetting forward they ſhew a fair Face, and ſeem never ſo friendly: for they will but expect and await ſome fit occaſion to take you at an advantage, and ſo to ſet upon you when you leaſt fear them. But admit you were aſſured of Victory, O with how much warm Blood of your beſt Souldiers ſhall you buy the ſame? with what other Souldiers, with what other Forces will you defend Grecia, if the Chriſtian Kings hearing that you for enlarging your Empire, or deſire of Fame being gone into the furtheſt part of Armenia, ſhall in the mean time Invade you? Wherefore if it be better and more wiſdom, with ſafety to defend your own, than with danger to ſeek for that is other Mens; if Princes of greateſt Policy have repoſed the glory of their Victory, not in the greatneſs of the ſlaughter of their Enemies, but in the ſafety and preſervation of their own Souldiers: ſpare to object your ſelf and your Army to moſt manifeſt danger, and unadviſedly to commit all at once to the hazard of good Fortune: which being a moſt fickle and unconſtant Miſtreſs, if ſhe ſhall but once dally with your dangerous attempts, you ſhall through your raſhneſs in far ſhorter ſpace tumble down head-long from the top of ſo great Majeſty, than you have thereunto a while ago by your rare Vertues worthily aſpired.

Selymus as he was of a rough and fierce Nature, ſo would he have all things done according to his own device and direction: and though he were not a little moved with this Speech of ſo grave a Counſellor and moſt expert Commander, and ſaw many of his Captains troubled with the imagination of the future danger; yet in a fume refuting ſome little of that which Chendemus had ſaid, he diſmiſſed the Counſel, proteſting openly, that he would proceed in his intended purpoſe, hap what hap ſhould, from Friend or Foe: although that old Fellow were (as he ſaid) ſo careful of his life, that he feared to die a noble Death. Which Selymus had no ſooner ſaid, but preſently others about him, accuſtomed to ſerve his Humor, which envied at the glory and wealth of old Chendemus, took hold upon theſe words, and beginning with the greatneſs of his Forces, the valour of his Souldiers, the ſtore of his Artillery, with his own invincible Fortune; made eaſie matters of all the former difficulties, and with great words laboured to extenuate all that the grave Baſſa had before ſaid concerning the proweſs and power of the Enemy. After that, they began to diſcredit Chendemus, ſaying, That he (being a martial Man, and of known reſolution in all his moſt warlike Actions) had not ſaid as before, for want of courage, of any diſtruſt he had of the Victory, but of purpoſe to hinder that moſt honourable Expedition, and to cut off all hope of Victory, which was (as they ſaid) as good as already gotten; being before loaded with Amurat his great Promiſes, and the Gold of Perſia. Wherefore they wiſhed him to beware of the ſlie old Fox his wiles and treaſon, and to proceed on in his Expedition ſo much the more boldly: and not to think that his Souldiers would refuſe any danger or labour, ſo long as they ſaw courage in himſelf, but would be ready (as they ſaid) to undertake the moſt deſperate difficulties of War, and deſired nothing more, than to be conducted into thoſe far Countries, where by their martial Proweſs and valiant Acts they might make their Emperor Selymus equal with the Great Alexander, and themſelves comparable to his Macedonians. And to work the utter deſtruction of this moſt faithful Counſellor without all recovery, theſe falſe Flatterers ſuborned bold-faced Accuſers, who falſly and ſhamefully affirmed, that he had received great ſums of Mony from Amurat, and did not therefore in time go againſt the Perſian Robbers, whereby all the former Calamities happed (as they ſaid) to that Province. For which pretended Cauſes, Selymus commanded Chendemus without further hearing to be ſlain: but indeed to terrifie others from like liberty of Speech; and withal to teach them, to deem thoſe devices and counſels as moſt excellent, which their Sovereign ſhould as it were by divine Inſpiration find out himſelf, and ſo to accept of them without contradiction. The ſudden death of this moſt faithful Counſellor Chendemus, ſtruck an exceeding fear into the minds of all Men, for that ſo honourable a Perſonage, of late in ſo great credit and favour with his Sovereign, was without hearing Executed; who they had known as a Man of great account, both for his proweſs and policy, to have ſtood faſt on Selymus his ſide, firſt in his Wars againſt his Father, and of late againſt his Brother: not doubting but that Selymus by nature cruel and ſuſpitious even of trifles, would with like Tyranny not ſpare Men of meaner calling, which ſpared not his deareſt and moſt ancient Friends.

Selymus marching from Arſenga, came to the Confines of the leſſer Armenian Kings, and of Aladeules; where by his Embaſſadors he requeſted the Kings of thoſe Nations (who were then in Arms) that they would joyn their Forces with his againſt the Perſian, and to go with him into Armenia the great; promiſing that when the Wars were happily ended, he would give unto them all ſuch Territories as ſhould chance in thoſe Wars to be taken from the Enemy, as a reward of their Aid. But theſe poor Kings, which hated both Hyſmael and Selymus for their manifold injuries they daily received in the Frontiers of their Dominions, lying in the midſt between them, (as commonly it falleth out, that the weakeſt go to the walls) craftily expecting the Event of this War, would not openly ſhew themſelves; but anſwered, that they had taken up Arms for no other purpoſe, but for the defence of themſelves and their Kingdoms. Not meaning in that doubtful War to bear themſelves as Enemies unto either of thoſe great Princes their Friends and Neighbors, of whoſe juſt grievances they were not able or worthy to determine; yet if he would without Hoſtility in peaceable manner paſs through their Dominions, they promiſed to give free paſſage unto him and his Army; and after he was entred into Armenia the greater, to relieve him with ſuch Proviſion of Victual as their bare Countries could afford.

Selymus thus deceived of this his firſt Hope, (for why, he thought thoſe poor Kings would at the firſt, either for love or fear have been ready to have done him all the ſervice they could) diſſembled his grief for the preſent, as wholly bent againſt Hyſmael; fearing that if he ſhould by word or deed defend thoſe neuter Princes, he ſhould have them at his back his moſt aſſured and undoubted Enemies. Wherefore paſſing the Mountains called Scodriſci, he came in eight days unto the great Mountain called Moſchij, which the famous River Euphrates, with his mighty ſtream and huge broken banks, ſeparateth from the great Mountain Antitaurus, and with perpetual ſteep ridges runneth into Iberia and Colchis, and on the Eaſt diſcovereth Armenia the greater; here Selymus with Enſigns diſplayed marching alongſt the bank of the River, departed not from the ſame, for fear to lack Water in that hot and dry Country; and ſo held on his way directly Eaſtward, leaving the Country of Armenia the leſs upon his left Hand, and the Frontiers of the Kingdom of Aladeules on the right, until he came unto the Mountain Periardo. This great Mountain, famous by the riſing of two great and notable Rivers out of it, is for the wonderful fertility of all things, of the barbarous People called Leprus, which is to ſay, fruitful; for Euphrates and Araxis there running out of two divers and contrary Marſhes, with many arms, water and enrich that champion and dry Country. Selymus having made ſo great a Journy, and yet not able ſo much as by report, to underſtand what was become of Hyſmael his ſo great and populous Army, which he knew was but a little before departed out of Cappadocia; as a Man in doubt and half afraid, ſtayed and incamped his Army at the head of the River Euphrates, and from thence ſent out his Scouts every way, if happily they could intercept ſome which might give him knowledge of his Enemies. But the Armenians, whether it were for fear of the coming of the Turks, or that Hyſmael their King had ſo commanded, were all before fled out of that part of the Country, whereby Selymus was to paſs with his Army; and having forſaken their Houſes, and carried away with them, or elſe by Fire deſtroyed whatſoever might ſerve for the uſe of Man.

The Turkiſh Scouts after they had by the ſpace of two days ſcoured up and down the Country, returned back again to Selymus, not having taken ſo much as any one Man; ſhewing unto him, That all things were deſtroyed before him, and nothing left but wild Fields and a moſt deſolate Country, without any appearance of Man or Beaſt; and that they were of opinion, that either the Armenian Guids were deceived in the way, or elſe had of purpoſe brought them into ſuch deſert places, whereas wanting Paſture for their Horſes, and Food for Men, they muſt needs together periſh with Hunger. Which their preſent fear was greatly increaſed by the weak Kings whom they had left behind them at their backs; but eſpecially Aladeules, who either for ſhame or fear had a few days at the firſt holpen the Turks with Victual, but after they were farther entred into Armenia, performed nothing of that he had before moſt faithfully promiſed; ſeeking therein the favor of Hyſmael, who he thought would with the ſame good fortune vanquiſh the Turks; that he had not long before the greateſt part of the Eaſt. Selymus perplexed in mind, began now to ſuſpect Treaſon, to fear Famine, to dread the Deſerts and forſaken places, and with grief of mind to call to remembrance all that old Chendemus his faithful Counſellor had before moſt truly told him; for all that, he ſhewed himſelf unto his Souldiers with cheerful Countenance, as a Man nothing diſmaied; which his firm conſtancy ſeemed to promiſe unto their diſcouraged minds good ſucceſs, with ſpeedy Victory. Wherefore calling unto him his Guids, and ſuch as beſt knew the Country, and underſtanding by them, that on the right Hand beyond the Mountain Periardo lay the moſt fruitful Country of all Armenia, he roſe with his Army, and compaſſing the Hill toward the North, turned down toward the River Araxes, and above the City of Coy paſſed his Army over the River, his Footmen by little Bridges, and his Horſemen by Foords; for Araxes, until it have received ſuch Rivers as fall into it out of the Marſhes of Periardo, runneth but with a ſmall ſtream, and is in ſome places eaſie to be paſſed over.

Selymus paſſeth over Araxes.

Selymus had ſcarcely well got over the River, and incamped his great Army, when Vaſta Ogli (who having joyned his Forces with Amurat, lying incamped not far off, and fearing leſt the City of Coy and the unprovided Citizens ſhould by the ſudden, coming of the Enemy be oppreſſed) quickly roſe with his Army, and ſet forwards to meet the Turks; for that City of all others in that Country, for freſh Fountains and Rivers, moſt pleaſant (wherein the Perſian Kings for the great plenty of all manner of Fruit, and wholſomeneſs of the Air, leaving Tauris, were wont to ſpend moſt part of the Summer) had then in it many rich Citizens, and ſumptuous Buildings; which Vaſta Ogli thought good betimes to reſcue, and not with diſhonour to loſe that rich City, looking as it were upon it; and leaving it unto the Enemy, to ſuffer him there to refreſh his hunger-ſtarved Souldiers with plenty of all things. Caſſianus an Armenian Born, and preſent in thoſe Wars, did by many probabilities (as Jovius writeth) ſhew unto him, That this City of Coy was in ancient time that moſt famous City which was called Artaxata, which Domitius Corbulo deſtroyed. Neither did Hyſmael himſelf (although he had but a little before ſent the greateſt part of his Forces againſt the Coraxeni, who were then riſen up againſt him in Rebellion; as he that made no great reckoning of the Turks, or ever thought that they durſt have come ſo far into Armenia) make any delay, but forthwith as ſoon as he had heard of the coming of Selymus, came alſo in perſon himſelf unto his Army.

By chance Vaſta Ogli (who contrary to all Mens expectation had until then ſhunned to fight, or come in ſight of his Enemies, of purpoſe with leſs danger and loſs of Men to overthrow them afterwards, being ſore weakned and almoſt ſpent with long Travel and want of Victuals) lay then incamped near the City, when as the Turks Scouts, upon the coming of Hyſmael, perceived by the great riſing of the duſt, and by the neighing of the Perſian Horſes, that ſome greater power was at hand. Which ſo ſoon as it was noiſed in the Turkiſh Camp, they began to rejoyce exceedingly, and to conceive the firſt hope both of their ſafety and victory; glad, that now meeting with their Enemies, they ſhould either by Victory turn their labour, toil, famine, and extremities wherewith they had of long time ſtriven, into eaſe and plenty of all things, or elſe by honourable death end all their miſeries at once: for many of the Horſemen, eſpecially of them that came out of Europe, whoſe Horſes were ſtarved for want of Forrage, and the common Footmen ſpent with long Travel, and grievouſly troubled with the Flux, (who travelling in the extream heat of the Sun, had for moſt part lived upon Crabs and other wild Fruits, with a bad ſupping made of Meal and Vineger, and almoſt deſparing to get the ſight of their Enemies) began now to die in every corner.

Hyſmael ſends an Herald to Selymus.

Hyſmael as ſoon as he was come within ſight of his Enemies, repoſing great confidence as well in the valour of his Souldiers, as in his own rare Fortune, the more to terrifie them, thought it good forthwith to give them Battel: Whereupon he ſent an Herald unto Selymus, accompanied with certain skilful Souldiers, which ſhould in beſt ſort they could take view of the number and force of their Enemies, of their Artillery, and in what ſort they lay incamped; and to tell him, That foraſmuch as he had no Title unto Armenia, nor that the Turks had at any time claimed any intereſt therein, he could not but marvel, why he had againſt all right entred with his Army into his Dominion: but if he happly upon a vain preſumption, to the imitation of Alexander of Macedon, ſhould think ſo much of the World his own, as he could by the Sword and his own good Fortune win, he ſhould then make himſelf ready againſt the next day to make proof of his Fortune, and the Forces of others not inferior to his own.

Selymus his anſwer unto Hyſmael.

Whereunto Selymus anſwered, That the freſh remembrance of the manifold Injuries done to the Turks by the Perſians, was ſuch, as might give him juſt cauſe to take up Arms; for as much as long ago both his Grandfather Mahomet the Great, and his Uncle Caſſumes, and even of late his Father Bajazet, and he himſelf alſo in his Wars againſt his Brother Achomates, had received great wrong and diſhonour from the Perſians. All which things, although they were of themſelves important, yet he eſteemed not of them as ſufficient cauſes of War, but only ſought after his Enemy Amurat, his Brothers Son, who had of late ſpoiled Cappadocia; whom if he would quietly and friendly deliver unto him, as the mutual Laws of amity and friendſhip amongſt Princes for the maintenance and preſervation of their Eſtates and Kingdoms required, then he would withdraw his Forces, and peacebly return into his Kingdom; otherwiſe, he threatned with Fire and Sword to deſtroy, not the Frontiers of Armenia, but even the heart of Perſia. And ſo diſmiſſing the Herald, both the Armies for that day lay ſtill in their Trenches, expecting the dreadful event of Battel.

The order of Selymus his Battel.

The next day Selymus by perſwaſion of his Captains brought his Army into the open Field, and in order of Battel ſet forward againſt his Enemies, which lay about two Miles off, thinking that Hyſmael, a Prince of ſo great name, would without delay accept of Battel; yet what ſtrength the Perſian King was of, what number of Men he had, what manner of Horſemen, how Armed, and with what Weapons, he could not certainly learn: for beſide that the Perſians are by nature ingenious and ſubtil, the Souldiers generally ſo reverenced and loved Hyſmael their King, that not one was found to have gone from him to the Turk; whereas many revolted from Selymus to him, as it was afterwards learned of the Perſian Captains.

Selymus, who had at that time eighty thouſand Horſemen under his Enſigns, placed Chaſan Baſſa his Lieutenant General of Europe, with his European Horſemen in the right Wing; and Sinan Baſſa with his Aſian Horſemen in the left; and before them both the Acanzij, which were voluntary Horſemen, the forerunners of the Turks Army, who in hope of ſpoil follow the Turks Wars out of all Countries: In the middle Battel he placed the Aſapi or Common Souldiers, which baſe and half naked People, as Men of little worth or eſtimation, are commonly thruſt into the Front of the Turks Battels, to receive the firſt fury of the Enemy, and to blunt their Swords, more than for any other good ſervice; directly behind them he beſtowed his great Artillery, guarded with four thouſand Horſemen: Laſt of all followed himſelf with his choſen Penſioners and Janizaries, compaſſed about with ſmall field-Pieces, and his Carriages, as with a double Trench; for he had (as their manner is) ſo environed himſelf round with his ſadled Camels made faſt one to another with long Chains, that they ſtood him in ſtead of a ſtrong Trench, from whence he might ſpeedily relieve any part of his diſtreſſed Army; and in caſe of extremity being in the midſt of his ſtrength, might as out of a ſure Fort repreſs the furious Aſſault of his Enemies. He alſo commanded his Footmen in the vauward of his Battel, that upon the approach of the Enemies Horſe, they ſhould ſpeedily withdraw themſelves aſide into two parts, leaving ſpace for the great Ordnance which was placed behind them, to play in the middle between them. On the contrary part Hyſmael, who by the Turks Fugitives underſtood all the devices of his Enemies, calling unto him the chief Commanders of his Army, ſhewed unto them, That there was no doubt of the Victory, ſo that they could ſhun the fury of the great Artillery; which he aſſured them would eaſily be done, if when they ſaw the Turkiſh Footmen divide themſelves, they would alſo in like manner withdraw themſelves into two parts, and give place to the fury of the great Ordnance; for which purpoſe he cauſed two great Enſigns to be diſplaied, whereunto they ſhould at the time appointed retire, the one for himſelf and thoſe whom he conducted, the other for Vaſta Ogli and the reſt of his Army.

Hyſmael with thirty thouſand Perſians giveth Battel to Selymus with three hundred thouſand Turks.

Hyſmael (as Jovius reporteth) had in his Army about thirty thouſand Horſemen, without any Footmen, amongſt whom were ten thouſand Men at Arms, reſolute Gentlemen, of great experience, all gallantly mounted upon couragious barbed Horſes, and themſelves bravely Armed, both for the ſhew and terror of the Enemy; their Weapons were a good Lance, a ſure Scimitar, and a Horſemans Mace; the reſt were Armed with ſtrong Curiaſſes and Head-pieces, and were either Archers on Horſeback, or elſe uſed light Horſemens Staves made of Aſh after the Spaniſh Faſhion, wherewith they ſerved at the half Staff. As for Guns they had none, in which thing only and number of Men, they were inferior to the Turks. But ſuch was the invincible courage and noble minds of the Perſians, that contemning the huge multitude of their Enemies (who were in number about three hundred thouſand) and making no great reckoning of their great Artillery, they doubted not with ſo few to give them Battel.

Hyſmael having given the ſignal of Battel, came on with his Army, exhorting his Soulders then to remember the Honour they had long before gotten in many Battels, and couragiouſly to follow him their Sovereign, whom they by their worthy ſervice and many victories had made the greateſt Monarch of the Eaſt; telling them, that they ſhould have now to do but with naked Men, whoſe Weapons were but weak Staves and light Targets, and their Horſes little poor Jades almoſt dead with hunger, never able to abide the firſt charge of his valiant Men at Arms.

On the other ſide, Selymus perceiving the coming of his Enemies by the riſing of the duſt, cauſed knowledge to be given through his Army by his Captains and Officers, that the time of Battel which they had ſo long wiſhed for, was now come; wherein if they would worthily acquit themſelves againſt thoſe their proud Enemies, they ſhould to their immortal Fame extend the Turkiſh Empire from the Perſian Sea to the Mountain Caucaſus: but if they cowardly forgetting their ancient Proweſs, ſhould faint in time of Battel, they were not then to think by any means to eſcape by flight back again through thoſe great Plains and deſolate Countries; where they ſhould by the way either ſhamefully periſh, or elſe to their perpetual infamy be taken Priſoners, and as baſe Slaves, during their lives be enforced to ſerve the Perſian Women; foraſmuch as beſide the great diſtance of the place, both the great River Euphrates, and the huge Mountain Taurus, and the faithleſs King Aladeules, who had ſhut up all the paſſages, did cut off all hope from them, if they ſhould be overcome, by any means poſſible to eſcape back again into Cappadocia.

The great and mortal Battel between Hyſmael and Selymus.

Vaſta Ogli ſlain.

When Hyſmael was come near with his Army, and the Aſapi upon ſign given dividing themſelves, made place for the great Artillery to play, as was before appointed; he alſo preſently dividing his Horſemen, charged the right Wing of the Turks Army, whith ſuch force, that after a moſt terrible fight betwixt the half armed Turks, and the valiant Perſian Men at Arms, Chaſan Baſſa the great Commander of the Europeian Horſemen, with the formoſt of that Wing being ſlain, and many more after them, he inforced all that Wing to retire unto that place where Selymus himſelf with the Janizaries ſtood. On the other ſide, Vaſta Ogli having received no little harm by the Turks great Ordnance, becauſe he had not ſo ſpeedily cleared himſelf and his followers of that danger, as had Hyſmael, charged the Aſian Horſemen in the left Wing, and there in bloody Battel made great ſlaughter of the Enemy, but not with like good hap as did Hyſmael; for whiles he moſt couragiouſly in the formoſt Ranks, aſſailed his Enemies, he was ſtruck with a ſmall ſhot and ſlain. With whoſe fall the Turks were greatly encouraged, inſomuch as that they which but now were glad to give ground, and had loſt the third part of that Wing, began afreſh to renew the Battel, and valiantly to withſtand the Perſians; and with their Harquebuſiers (wherewith the Perſian Horſemen were wonderfully terrified) drave them head-long upon the Turks common Footmen. The Perſians whether it were forced by neceſſity for that they had loſt ſo great a Commander, and not well able to govern their Horſes, terrified with the thundring ſhot, or elſe for that the open ſide of the Footmen preſented unto them greater place of advantage, ſetting themſelves together brake through the middle of the Battel of thoſe Turkiſh Footmen, and bearing them down before them with a mighty ſlaughter, came to the great Ordnance, and there ſhew the Canoniers, who diſcharging their Field-Pieces at all adventures, in that great medly made a foul ſlaughter, as well of their own Men as of their Enemies. And ſo without ſtop (as victorious Conquerors) made way through the midſt of their Enemies, until they came to the right Wing, where Hyſmael was ſtill hardly charging the Europeian Horſemen, who having before loſt Chaſan their General, and being many of them ſlain or wounded, were already enforced to retire; but now charged afreſh upon the ſide, had much ado to endure the fury of their Enemies, but as Men in extream danger, were glad to cry to Selymus for help.

In this hard diſtreſs, Selymus in two places opened his Carriages, wherewith he ſtood as it were entrenched, and preſently ſent out part of his Horſemen. And by and by turning himſelf unto his Janizaries, ſaid, This days Victory is reſerved (moſt worthy Souldiers) unto your valour and labour, wherefore now valiantly ſet forward, and as freſh and couragious Men, aſſail your wearied Enemies; their Horſes are all on a water with Sweat, and the Men themſelves faint under the weight of their Armor. But yet for all that Selymus could ſay, the Janizaries were not very forward, but ſtood ſtill, as Men willing in ſo great a danger to keep themſelves within the ſafegard for their Munition. Wherefore whilſt they at their leiſure ſet forward, the Perſians in the midſt of the heat of this Victory, compaſſing in the Europeian Horſemen, ſlew them downright, Selymus looking on and wiſhing in vain to help them. Fabritius Carrectus great Maſter of the Rhodes, who of all theſe things had certain intelligence, writ to Leo the Tenth then Biſhop of Rome, that the Janizaries refuſed to be commanded by Selymus, and were not by any perſwaſion or intreaty to be induced to relieve the diſtreſſed Europeian Horſemen; but as Men diſtruſting the event of the Battel, choſe rather in their ſtrength to expect the ſucceſs thereof, than with moſt manifeſt danger to expoſe themſelves unto the violence of the Perſian Horſemen, which had as a Tempeſt overborn the vantgard of the Turkiſh Footmen.

The Perſians were now ready on every ſide to have aſſailed Selymus in his greateſt ſtrength; when Sinan Baſſa, although the Wing he led was ſore rent and weakned, yet following the Perſians through the midſt of the heaps of the ſlain Footmen, came in, in good time for Selymus, and with certain freſh Troops which had eſcaped the fury of Vaſta Ogli, reſtored the Battel before almoſt loſt; but eſpecially by the invincible courage of Alu Beg and Mahomet his Brother deſcended of the honourable Family of the Malcozzij, which for Nobility amongſt the Turks is accounted next unto the Othomans; both of them for courage reſembling their Warlike Father Malcozzius, famous for that woful expedition he made into Friuli againſt the Venetians in the Reign of Bajazet. Selymus alſo not yet diſcouraged but ſtill in hope, commanded all the great Ordnance wherewith he was environed, which he had reſerved as his laſt refuge, to be diſcharged; by the violence whereof, ſuch ſlaughter was made, as well of his own Men as of his Enemies, mingled together, that what for duſt, what for ſmoak, and thundring of the Artillery, having on both ſides almoſt loſt the uſe of ſight and hearing, and their Horſes being ſo terrified with the thundring report of the great Ordnance, that they were not now to be ruled, the Battel was broken off, the Victory yet doubtful. The Turkiſh Hiſtories to expreſs the terror of this day, number it amongſt their diſmal days, terming it The only day of Doom.

Hyſmael in this furious Battel, having received a Wound under his left Shoulder with a ſmall ſhot, by perſwaſion of his friends withdrew himſelf to have his Wound ſearched; which thing undoubtedly was the ſafegard both of Selymus and his Army: for the Perſians by and by following their King, left the Victory, now in all Mens opinion almoſt gotten. But after that Hyſmael perceived the Wound was not deep, for that the ſtrength of his Armor had ſo broken the force of the ſhot, that it pierced not far into his Body, he was about to have charged the Turks afreſh: but underſtanding of the death of Vaſta Ogli, in whom for his ſingular experience in martial Affairs, he had repoſed his greateſt confidence; and his Captains alſo perſwading him not to make ſo light reckoning of his Wound, the grief whereof he yet felt not, being warm, but to have regard to his own Health: He in ſeemly order ſoftly marched away in ſuch ſort, that his departure had no reſemblance of flight. And paſſing by the City of Tauris, willed the chief of the Citizens to open the Gates of the City to Selymus (if he ſhould come thither) and to receive his Garriſons, rather than by vain conſtancy to fall into utter deſtruction; and ſo marched himſelf into the Confines of Media.

The Perſian Tents taken by the Turks.

But the Turks intangled with many difficulties, having no hearts for fear, nor ſtrength for wearineſs to purſue their Enemies, yet coming to the Perſian Tents, took them without reſiſtance: where beſide the rich Pavillions wrought with Needle-work of Silk and Gold, and much other precious Furniture, many noble Ladies and Gentlewomen were found, which after the manner of the Perſians had followed their Husbands in thoſe Wars, whom Selymus cauſed to be all freely ſet at liberty untouched, excepting one of the Wives of Hyſmael, whom he detained and gave her in Marriage to one of his Baſſaes. Some which were preſent at this Battel, reported that amongſt the heaps of them that were ſlain, were found the dead bodies of divers Perſian Women, which being Armed, and following their Husbands, died with them in the Battel; whom Selymus cauſed to be honeſtly buried.

Thus was that notable Battel fought in the Galderan Fields near unto the City of Coy, betwixt theſe two great Princes, the ſeventh day of Auguſt in the year of our Lord, 1514. In which Battel Selymus loſt above thirty thouſand Men, amongſt whom was Chaſan Baſſa his great Lieutenant in Europe; ſeven Sanzaks, in which were the two Malcozzian Brethren, who labouring the one to reſcue the other, were both together ſlain. Bſide his common Footmen of whom he made leaſt reckoning, he loſt moſt part of his Illyrian, Macedonian, Servian, Epirot, Theſſalian, and Thracian Horſemen, the undoubted flower and ſtrength of his Army, which were in that mortal Battel almoſt all ſlain, or grievouſly wounded.

Selymus for all this great loſs, by the confeſſion of his Enemies having gotten the Victory, and receiving Embaſſadors from Coy and the Cities thereabouts, and the great City of Tauris, promiſing to relieve him with whatſoever he needed, and to do what elſe he ſhould command; marched directly to Tauris, deſiring both to ſee and poſſeſs himſelf of that City, as one of the chief Palaces of the Perſian Kings. This City is two days journey diſtant from Coy where the Battel was fought, and is verily thought to be the famous City called in ancient time Ecbathana, about an hundred and fifty Miles diſtant from the Caſpian Sea. The Citizens were ready at the coming of the Turks, and brought them great ſtore of Victuals out of the Gates of the City, where Selymus had lodged his Army in the Suburbs, thinking it no ſafety to lodge within that great and populous City, contenting himſelf to have the Gates thereof delivered unto him, which he kept with ſtrong Guard. Some report that Selymus durſt not truſt the Perſians, and therefore never went into the City but diſguiſed in the Habit of a common Souldier. Yet ſome others ſay, that he did with great magnificence Banquet in the ſtately Palace of the Perſian King, and there had great diſcourſe with them of Tauris concerning his late Victory. But whilſt he thus ſtaied at Tauris, and with himſelf purpoſed to ſpend that Winter in Armenia, he called together his great Captains and Commanders of his Army, to know how they liked thereof; who fearing his diſpleaſure, wholly referred themſelves to his own reſolution. Only Muſtapha his chief Baſſa chanced to ſay, That it were good that the minds of the Janizaries and the other Souldiers of the Court ſhould therein be known. Which his Speech Selymus took in ſuch evil part, that he preſently commanded him out of his ſight, and deprived him of his greateſt Honour; and the more to diſgrace him, ſent one of his Jeſters after him, who in great ſcorn and deriſion coming behind him, cut off part of his Tulipant that hung down, as the Faſhion was. But the Janizaries underſtanding the matter, and much offended with the indignity offered unto the great Baſſa whom they dearly loved, roſe up all together in Arms, and told Selymus flatly, That they would not in any caſe Winter ſo far from home in the Enemies Country; and therefore that it were beſt for him betime to conſider of the matter, for that they were reſolutely ſet down to forſake him if he would needs ſtay, and not with ſpeed return. Selymus much troubled with this inſolency of the Janizaries, and hearing daily, that Hyſmael with new ſupplies out of Iberia, Albania, and Parthia, was coming upon him with greater power than before, and conſidering withal with what difficulty and danger he had eſcaped in the late Battel, preſerved rather by his good fortune and force of his great Artillery, than the valour andloweſs of his Souldiers, and withal ſuſpecting the multitude and ſtrength of the Tauriſians, of whoſe fidelity he could make no reckoning, he changed his former determination, and reſolved again to return into Cappadocia; whereupon having contrary to his promiſe exacted a great Maſs of Mony from them of Tauris, he departed thence, carrying away with him three thouſand Families, the beſt Artificers in that City, eſpecially ſuch as were ſkilful in making of Armor and Weapons, and ſo with ſpeed retired towards the River Euphrates, a longer way than that whereby he came; fearing to return again by the head of Araxis and the Mountains Periardes, for meeting the Iberian and Albanian Horſemen, who were reported to be then coming againſt him.

The Janizaries in mutiny against Selymus.

Hyſmael underſtanding of his departure, followed after with as much ſpeed as he could, leaving behind him for haſt his Carriages and ſuch of his Souldiers as were not able to endure ſo long and ſpeedy a march: yet for all his haſt (foraſmuch as Selymus was gone a great way before him) he could not overtake any part of his Army, until he was come to the great River

Euphrates, where Selymus ſtaying two days, and having made divers little Boats, was paſſing over his Footmen; which becauſe they were not ſufficient for the ſpeedy tranſportation of ſo great a multitude, many for haſt ſwam over the River with Bladders, and ſome adventured to get over upon the broken pieces of their Carriages, which they had for that purpoſe burſt in ſunder. Selymus himſelf got over to the farther Bank in a little Boat, having before cauſed his Horſemen with their Horſes at once to take the River, of purpoſe to break the violence of the ſtream, whereby his Footmen and Camels with their burdens got over with leſs danger, and ſome of his Field-pieces were alſo with leſs difficulty tranſported; yet for all the ſpeed he could make, the Georgian Horſemen, the forerunners of Hyſmael his Army, being come within ſight before the Turks were all got over, raiſed ſuch a fear and a ſtir all alongſt that ſide of the River, that two thouſand of the Turks were in their haſty paſſage there drowned, divers Field-pieces left ſticking in the Mud, and much of their Baggage carried away with the force of the River. The Georgians contenting themſelves with ſuch things as were left, purſued them no further: for the wheels of the Turks Carriages entangled together with the violence of the ſtream, had ſtayed a great part of the Turkiſh Traſh, floating in the River; and much more was in divers places driven upon the ſhore, all which the Georgian Horſemen eaſily drew out. Hyſmael in the mean time rejoycing at nothing more, than that having chaſed away his Enemies, he had alſo recovered much of the great Ordnance whereby he had before received ſo great hurt.

Selymus cometh to Amaſia.

Selymus by ſpeedy flight thus got out of the hands of the Perſians, found his paſſing much more dangerous at the Mountain Antitaurus, than he had before thought of: for Aladeules, the Mountain King having now his fortune in contempt, and diligently waiting for his prey, had with his ſavage People before taken all the ſtrait paſſages of the Mountain Country; who every night in thieviſh manner aſſailed the Turks, as they with their weak and weary Companies paſſed through thoſe rough and broken ways; and robbing their Carriages, preſently fled into their haunts and places of refuge in the thick Woods and rocky Mountains. Aladeules himſelf in the mean time (by whoſe fraud all this was done) every day excuſing himſelf, as if it had been done againſt his will, by the rude mountain People, enured to ſuch deſperate Robberies, whom nevertheleſs he ſaid he would in ſhort time ſeverely chaſtiſe ſo ſoon as he could find the Authors thereof. In the mean while, for faſhion ſake ſending a little ſpare Proviſion for certain days, did every night rob and ſpoil the Turks by his Souldiers, as they could take them in places of advantage. Againſt which miſchiefs Selymus could neither by Policy, neither his Souldiers by induſtry provide any ſufficient remedy. Wherefore diſſembling the injuries he daily received, purpoſing to be thereof in time revenged, together with the foul and treacherous dealing of the faithleſs King; holding on his way, he with much ado came at length to Trapezond, and from thence to Amaſia, where he ſpent that Winter in repairing his ſore weakned Army, purpoſing with the firſt of the Spring to make War upon Aladeules and the mountain People, who in his return had done him ſo great harm and injury.

In this ſort Jovius, one of the great Hiſtoriographers of that time, reporteth the aforeſaid Wars betwixt Hyſmael and Selymus, whoſe credit in that matter other Writers have ſince for moſt part followed. Howbeit, Jo. Ant. Mænavinus, a Genoway, who ſerved in thoſe Wars, doth in his Book concerning Turkiſh Affairs, dedicated to the French King, much otherwiſe report the ſame: which to ſatisfie the deſirous Reader, I have thought good here in few words to ſet down, as it is by himſelf reported.

The former Hiſtory as it is reported by Jo Ant. Menavinus a Genowey preſent at doing thereof.

Selymus (ſaith he) with his Army, in number about three hundred thouſand Men, being come to the River Euphrates, found the Bridge broken down by his Nephew Amurat, and his Enemies encamped in convenient place on the farther ſide of the River, with their Forces greatly increaſed by new ſupplies lately ſent from the Perſian King; ſo that there was then in the Perſian Army about ninety thouſand Men Horſe and Foot, the Horſemen for moſt part furniſhed with two Horſes apiece for ſervice: And though Selymus did what he might, to know whether the Perſian King were in perſon himſelf in the Camp, or elſe (which he moſt feared) was raiſing of greater Forces in Perſia, yet could he by no means learn the truth of that he deſired. Wherefore repairing again the broken Bridge, he firſt ſent over his two great Lieutenants of Grecia and Natolia, who paſſing over the River, encamped themſelves as they thought convenient. The next morning, about two hours before the riſing of the Sun, Amurat ſuddenly aſſailed the great Commander of Grecia, Chaſan Baſſa, in his Trenches, and by plain force diſcomfited the Turks, and by good Fortune took from them their Tents: Whereupon ſuch a terror and fear came upon the other great Commander of Natolia, that his Souldiers thruſting themſelves for fear into the River, ſwam over with great danger, and again joyned themſelves with the reſt of the Army. Selymus troubled with the great loſs thus received, cauſed all his great Artillery to be placed all alongſt the hithermoſt Bank of the River Euphrates; and becauſe the Enemy ſhould not perceive the ſame, ranged certain Companies of his Souldiers before the Ordinance, as if they ſhould preſently have paſſed the River: who upon ſignal given, ſhould forthwith withdraw themſelves and give place to the great Ordnance bent upon the Enemy. But when Fire was given to theſe great Pieces, many of them being overcharged, burſt in ſunder, and ſlew divers of the Turks: Many alſo of their rich Horſes and Mules being near unto the River ſide, and terrified with the thundring Shot, leapt into the River, and were there drowned together with their riders. The Perſians alſo receiving great loſs, retired farther off for fear of the great Artillery. So Selymus without reſiſtance paſſing over the River, marched forthwith toward the Enemy, whom the Perſians as Men nothing diſmayed, notably encountred. The Battel was of long time doubtful, and much Blood ſhed on both ſides; and if the approach of the night had not broke off that mortal Fight, the Perſian Army rather overcharged with the multitude of the Enemy, than vanquiſhed by valour, had undoubtedly received a great overthrow; but through the benefit of the night, they without further loſs eſcaped the purſute of the Turks. Upon this Victory, Selymus left his Carriages and Baggage with his Footmen; and taking with him only his Horſemen, ſet forward with intention to have upon the ſudden ſurpriſed the regal City of Tauris, before the fame of the late fought Battel could be carried thither; the Perſians in the mean time being no leſs careful of their affairs. The day before, ten thouſand freſh Horſemen well appointed, which had not yet been in the Battel, where coming to Hyſmael; theſe he craftily laid in the Turks way, commanding them upon the approach of the Enemy to fly as if it had been for fear. Selymus in the morning having deſcried theſe Horſemen at hand, ſuppoſing them to be ſuch of his Enemies as being overtaken with the night, were not able to follow the reſt of his Army, exhorted his Souldiers couragiouſly to purſue their diſcouraged Enemies.

The Perſians ſeeing the Turks, of purpoſe betook themſelves to flight; and they ſuſpecting no deceit, followed faſt after them, until that about mid-day being weary of the purſuit, and coming to a little River which was in their way, they there ſtaied to refreſh themſelves; and after they had taken a ſhort repaſt, again purſued the Perſians, ſtill leaving behind them ſuch as were not able ſo faſt to follow, prickt forward with hope, that before night they ſhould ſurpriſe and ranſack the rich City of Tauris. The Turkiſh Horſemen thus drawn far from the Footmen, the Perſian Horſemen left in ambuſh, in the mean time ſet upon the Turks Footmen, lying (as they ſuppoſed) in great ſecurity, and with a great ſlaughter overthrew them; at which time they alſo took all Selymus his Treaſure and great Artillery. Which overthrow was by ſpeedy Poſts, about two a Clock in the night made known to Selymus (who now in his mind already conceived the ſacking of Tauris) and withal that the fierce Enemy was following him at the heels. Selymus wonderfully abaſhed with this unexpected news, and the loſs of his Footmen, forthwith began to retire; which the ten thouſand Perſians which had before of purpoſe fled, perceiving, now turning themſelves upon the retiring Turks, charged them hardly; ſo Selymus encloſed both before and behind by his Enemies, received a great overthrow; and the Turks thus hardly beſet, and almoſt deſpairing of their lives, and having loſt their Enſigns, brake out ſideways betwixt their Enemies and fled. Selymus ſeeing all deſperate and forlorn, betook himſelf to flight alſo with the reſt; and paſſing the River Euphrates, brake down the Bridge, which he had but a little before repaired, for fear the Perſians ſhould further purſue him, and with much trouble and no leſs danger coming at length to Amaſia, aſſembled thither the relicks of his diſcomfited Army. Such of the Turks as remained behind, and were not able in flight to keep way with the reſt, were all ſlain be the Perſians.

The Genoway Author thus concludeth his Hiſtory, That the Perſian King did not more rejoyce at this Victory, than did he himſelf for the overthrow of the Turks, hoping in that their ſo great a confuſion, to free himſelf of his long and miſerable thraldom, and to find a way unto his native Country Parents; as afterwards he did; for flying firſt to Trapezond, and there taking paſſage into Europe, he came to Hadrianople, from whence he travelled by Land on foot to Salonica, and there chancing upon certain Ships of Chriſtian Merchants which had brought Corn thither, he was by them tranſported into the Iſland of Chios; from whence he joyfully returned to Genoa his native Country, after he had amongſt the Turks endured ten years Captivity; moſt part whereof he lived as a Page in old Bajazets Privy-Chamber, and the reſt as a Souldier of the Court in the Reign of Selymus; and therefore well acquainted with the faſhion of the Turks Court, and manners of that barbarous Nation.

Now ſhall it not (as I hope) be much from our purpoſe, here with Jovius a little to digreſs in comparing theſe two great Princes Hyſmael and Selymus together, who in that time had filled the World with the glory of their Fame; that wearied with bloody Broils, and the wonderful chances of War, we may a little repoſe our ſelves with matter of a milder Vain, neither unpleaſant nor unprofitable.

Theſe two mighty Princes, as they were for royal deſcent, ſtrength of body, courage of mind, riches, and power, equal, and had thereby obtained like fame and renown; ſo in conditions and qualities of mind, and martial Diſcipline, they much differed. Firſt of all (beſide the mutual hatred of the one Nation againſt the other, delivered as it were by Succeſſion from their Grandfathers and Fathers) theſe two Princes, and ſo likewiſe their Subjects alſo, were at great ods about an idle Queſtion of their vain Superſtition, the one preferring and honouring Ebubekir, Homaris, and Ottoman, as the moſt true and rightful Succeſſors of their great Prophet Mahomet; the other with no leſs devotion honouring Haly, and deteſting the three former; differing otherwiſe in few or no points of their moſt fond Superſtition; yet did they under the colour and zeal of their Religion (as they would have it) both pretend juſt cauſes of War, although their evil diſſembled ambitious deſires, plainly declared unto the World, that they both ſhot at one and the ſame Mark, viz. By confirming their power and ſtrength, to extend the bounds of their great Empires. For Hyſmael of purpoſe affected the fame and glory of Darius and Xerxes the ancient Perſian Kings; who having ſubdued Aſia, with great boldneſs paſſed over into Europe; and Selymus the greatneſs of Alexander of Macedon, who ſubverted the Perſian Empire. Which their aſpiring thoughts, masking under the vail of zeal towards their Religion, ſeemed not altogether vain; Fortune with like indifference immoderately favouring their bold ambitions and endleſs deſires. But in Hyſmael appeared ſuch a wonderful devotion and gravity, that his haughty thoughts were with the reverend Majeſty thereof covered; whereas in Selymus, his inhuman cruelty did blot and obſcure all his other princely Vertues; for he with reward and puniſhment retained the Majeſty of his Empire, but with the greater fame of ſeverity than bounty. Becauſe it was expedient in the exact diſcipline of that ſervile Government, whereof the greateſt ſtrength of the Othoman Empire conſiſteth, to uſe all rigor and ſeverity; otherwiſe it ſtood with the State of Hyſmael, who leavied always his Armies of his Nobility and Men free Born, with whom temperate Juſtice, civil Courteſie, and popular Clemency, are of greateſt force, to win their Fidelity, Faith, and Loyalty; for that there is no Man well Born, which feareth not more the blemiſh of infamy than the heavineſs of puniſhment; ſo that it was not to be marvelled, if Hyſmael by ſuch honorable Vertues did mightily defend the glory of his Majeſty and Renown. Unto theſe his rare Vertues, was alſo joyned a comlineſs of Face (the faireſt gift of Nature) well beſeeming ſo great a Monarch; for he was well Colored, quick Eyed, yellow Bearded, and that which amongſt the Perſians is accounted the ſign of ancient Nobility, hookt Noſed; and was withal exceeding Eloquent; by which good Gifts, he wonderfully won to himſelf both the Eies and Hearts of ſuch as beheld him. But in Selymus, his ſtern Countenance, his fierce and piercing Eies, his Tartar-like pale Color, his long Muſtacho's on his upperlip, like Briſtles, frild back to his Neck, with his Beard cut cloſe to his Chin, did ſo expreſs his martial diſpoſition and inexorable nature, that he ſeemed to the beholders to have nothing nothing in him but Miſchief and Cruelty. Which diverſity of countenances was alſo accompanied with no leſs diverſity of affections, and ſo conſequently with far unlike manner of Government. For Hyſmael was of nature courteous and affable, eaſie to be ſeen and ſpoken withal, doing nothing that beſeemed his Regal Function, but in the ſight of all men; his manner was to dine openly in the company of his Nobility, delighting much in Hawking and Hunting, accompanied with his Noblemen and the Embaſſadors of foreign Princes; He would oftentimes run, leap, and prove Maſteries with his chief Courtiers, being himſelf a moſt excellent Horſeman and cunning Archer; in his exerciſes he was ſo popular, that he would not ſtick openly to bath himſelf and ſwim in his Princely Baths; his Wives, the beautiful Daughters of his Nobility or Neighbour Princes, Ladies of great Chaſtity, he neither loathed nor divorced; after the ancient manner of the Perſian Kings, who always uſed moſt tenderly to love and cheriſh their Wives, doing them all the honour poſſible in Court, as Partakers of all their Fortune; and carried them, their Children, Nurſes, and richeſt Furniture into their fartheſt Wars, to their great trouble and charge, by the preſence of ſo dear Pledges, the more to encourage their minds in time of Battel. Whereas Selymus contrariwiſe did all things in ſecret, eating his meat alone without any company, attended upon with his Pages and Eunuchs only, and ſatisfying Natures want with ſome one ſimple diſh of meat: He ſeldom went abroad but to the Church, upon the Friday the Turks chief Sabbath; and then ſo beſet with his Penſioners and other Souldiers of the Court, that although he uſed to ride alone mounted upon ſome couragious Horſe, yet was it a hard matter by face to know him among ſo many armed men, who with great Pride and Inſolency kept back the beholders: He was ſeldom ſeen abroad in the City, chuſing rather for his recreation to paſs over in his Gally into Aſia, and there alongſt the Sea coaſt to take the air; his Wives he would not ſuffer to come to Court, neither uſed their company but for procreation ſake, and that (as was thought) without any great good countenance or familiarity; for that he being not greatly given to Women, but more delighted with unnatural pleaſure, thought a mans body and mind to be not a little weakned with the allurements of Women; wherefore he ſeldom reſorted to the cloiſter of choice Paragons in the midſt of Conſtantinople, ſhut in on every ſide with high and blind Walls. Thoſe dainty pieces, either taken from their Chriſtian Parents, or by chance ſurpriſed by Pirats, are there moſt curiouſly kept by ancient Matrons and old Eunuchs, by whom they are with all diligence inſtructed in the Principals of the Mahometan Law, and to read the Arabian Tongue, and withal, cunningly and comely to ſing, play, daunce, and ſow; but Selymus of all others uſed ſeldomeſt to ſee their allurements, as a man not greatly delighted with Women, or deſirous of many (and oftentimes unfortunate) Children; having but one Son (Solyman) by the Daughter of Muhamet a Tartar King, who afterwards by the ſufferance of God, proved a great Plague to the Chriſtian Common-Weal. Such ſpare time as he had from his ſerious and weighty Affairs, he uſed to ſpend in walking in his Gardens with ſome of his Baſſaes or other great Courtiers, and in beholding and noting the Noblemens Children there ſporting themſelves, would diſcourſe and conſult of many things of great importance. Some hours he would ſpend in the Baths, and reading the Hiſtories of his Anceſtors and other foreign Princes; imitating therein his Grandfather Mahomet the Great, who cauſed almoſt all the Hiſtories of the famous Princes of the World to be tranſlated into the Turkiſh Language, and their lively counterfeits to be with cunning hand drawn, that by their worthy examples he might be the more enflamed to extend his fame and glory. He would many times ſcoff at the great buſineſs of his Father Bajazet, who (as he ſaid) was ſo drowned in the Study of Averrois (determining nothing certainly of the Nature of the Soul) and the Motions of the Heavens, that he deſired rather the name of a ſharp Diſputer, amongſt the idle Profeſſors of Philoſophy, than of a renowned Chieftain amongſt his valiant Souldiers and Men of War.

One of the Perſian Embaſſadors finding him pleaſantly diſpoſed, demanded of him, why he did not wear his beard long, as his Father Bajazet, and other great Princes of that Age had done, thereby to ſeem unto their Subjects of greater Majeſty; to whom he anſwered, That he liked not to carry about with him ſuch an unneceſſary handful, whereby his Baſſaes might at their pleaſure lead him up and down the Court, as they had done his Father; noting thereby, that Bajazet whilſt he yet lived, had been too much overruled by the Baſſaes; which he could by no means indure, following no mans advice but his own in whatſoever he took in hand.

The Perſians better Horſemen than the Turks.

But to come unto the Perſians themſelves, they in their Wars had great diſadvantage of the Turks; for as they were ſtrong in Horſemen, ſo were they deſtitute of expert trained Footmen, by whoſe only means the Turks have atchieved their greateſt Victories, and performed their greateſt Wars. Beſide this, it was a great want in the Perſians, that they had not the uſe of Guns, againſt whoſe fury no ſufficient reſiſtance can be made, or force of man oppoſed; as appeared by the lamentable example of Uſun-Caſſanes at Artenga, and now of Hyſmael in the Calderan Fields; whoſe victorious Armies of Horſemen were in both places put to the worſt by the terror and violence of the Turks Artillery. For the naked Turkiſh Horſeman is not to be compared with the Perſian Man at Arms; who comes into the Field armed with a ſtrong Cuiras, a ſure Head-piece, and a good Target; whereas the Turkiſh Europeian Horſemen, altogether naked, uſe only a ſquare or crooked Buckler, wherewith they do ſcarcely cover themſelves; and the Aſian Horſemen Bucklers made of ſoft Reeds, wound round, and covered with ſome kind of Silk. The Perſian Horſemen alſo, wearing their Pouldrons and Gauntlets, and bearing Staves of good Aſh, armed at both ends, fight with them as occaſion ſerveth at the half Staff, after the manner of the Numidians, and with doubling and redoubling their often thruſts from on high, do eaſily wound or kill the unarmed Turks, with their Horſes; whereas the Turkiſh Horſemen, after the manner of the Grecians, couching their Staves in their Reſts, do at the firſt courſe moſt commonly break the ſame, being made of light and brittle Fir, and ſo preſently come to their Scimetars, or Horſemans Maces, being in all other things far inferior to the Perſian Men at Arms. As for the Turkiſh Archers on horſeback, they are in no reſpect to be compared with the Perſians, who well mounted and ſurely armed, and uſing both greater and ſtronger Bows, ſhoot more deadly Arrows, and ſo make ſmall account of the Turks. So that all things well conſidered, the Perſian Army devoted to their King, as well for the great and firm opinion conceived of his high Courage and divine Spirit, as for that they were to him by Faith obliged; although it was in number far inferior, yet had it been of the Turks invincible, if it had not been overwhelmed by the cruel, cowardly, and murthering Artillery, and wonderful multitude of Men. The cauſe why Hyſmael out of ſo many great and large Provinces then under his Obeiſance (able in ancient times with their multitude to cover the face of the Earth, and to drink the Rivers dry) brought now ſo ſmall an Army againſt the Turkiſh Emperor, breaking into the heart of Armenia; was for that Hyſmael to win the hearts of the People by Bounty, had remitted a great part of his Cuſtoms and Tributes, ſo as then ſtood beſt with his Policy, having but lately aſpired to the Kingdom, and thruſt down his near Kinſmen, the Poſterity of Uſun-Caſſanes and Jacup, the rightful Inheritors thereof; ſo that his Coffers being empty, and wanting Mony, the ſinews of War, he was not able to raiſe ſo great an Army as otherwiſe he might out of thoſe populous Kingdoms and Countries, yielding plentifully all things neceſſary for mans uſe. Whereas with Selymus it was far otherwiſe, whoſe Horſemen, Footmen, Captains, Canoniers, both at Sea and Land, Officers of Peace and Wars, received their dayly Wages and monthly Pays in ready Mony, of his Treaſurers and Paymaſters; for the defraying of which charge he never wanted Coin, having an ineſtimable Maſs of Mony alwaies in ſtore in the ſeven Towers at Conſtantinople; and his yearly Tributes and Revenues ſtill exceeding all his charges by a fourth part. The Strength of the Perſian King conſiſted in three kind of Souldiers; the firſt were they which were accounted Souldiers of the Court; the ſecond, ſuch as were by Cuſtom and Duty bound to ſerve him in his Wars; and the third, ſuch as were ſent to him from the Princes his Neighbours and Confederates. Thoſe which were accounted Souldiers of his Court, had their certain Stipends, and were altogether maintained of the Kings charge; of whom, according to the old cuſtom of the Perſian Kings, they at certain times receive Armor, Horſes, Apparel, Tents, and Wages, every one as he is in place and degree. And being attended upon with a gallant and ſtrong Garriſon of theſe, he maintaineth the Majeſty of his Court, eſpecially when he rideth in Progreſs. The Nobility and ancient Gentlemen of his Country, who hold Lands and Poſſeſſions deſcended unto them from their Anceſtors, or holden by the gift of the King, are ſent for in time of Wars, and are of duty bound to perform ſuch like ſervice as the Nobility and Gentlemen of Italy, France, and Spain do unto their Sovereigns; theſe hardly amount to the number of twenty thouſand, whereof it is well if the third part come well armed; the reſt content themſelves with Head-pieces and Jacks; and uſe for their Weapons either Horſemens Staves or Bows, which they can moſt cunningly handle, diſcharging their Arrows very near unto that they aim at, either forward or backward. They which come unto him from forreign Princes, confederate or tributary, are commonly ſent from the Kings and Princes of Iberia, Albania and the Countries bordering upon Media, and Armenia; who being half Chriſtians, bear a mortal hatred againſt the Turks. Hyſmael the Perſian King had then under his Dominion theſe great and famous Countries, Armenia the greater, Sulthania, Perſia, Aſſyria, Meſopotamia, Media and Parthia; whereof Armenia is the chiefeſt, famous for the great City Tauris, called in ancient time Ecbathana; this Country yieldeth unto the Perſian King his beſt Footmen; but his choice Horſemen come from out of Perſia, and eſpecially from Scyras, called of old Cyripolis; next unto them are from Aſſyria; the chief City whereof is Bagdat, called in ancient time Babylon. The Medes and Parthians are of all others acounted the beſt Archers next unto the Scythians.

The cauſe why Hyſmael came with ſo ſmall an Army againſt Selymus.

The Countries ſubject to Hyſmael.

Selymus with a new Army entreth into Armenia.

But now to return again from whence we have a little too far ſtrayed. Selymus after his great expedition againſt Hyſmael, wintering at Amaſia, by his Lieutenants and Captains in Europe and Aſia, raiſed ſuch a power, that with the firſt of the Spring he entred again into the Confines of the Perſian Kingdom, with a greater Army than before, and that ſomewhat ſooner than the extream cold of that part of Armenia (ſubject to the ſnowy Mountain Taurus) would either well ſuffer, or that the Enemy thought it had been poſſible for him to have ſo done. There was upon the further ſide of Euphrates a ſtrong Town called Clamaſſum, ſituate a little above that place where the River Melas (much celebrated by the Grecian Poets) falleth into the River Euphrates; which Town for the commodious ſituation thereof, ſtanding upon the firſt entrance of the paſſage into Armenia the great, the Perſians had furniſhed with a ſtrong Garriſon; this Town Selymus thought good in any caſe to be maſter of, by taking whereof, and of ſome other Holds thereabout, he ſhould open a fair way for himſelf into his Enemies Country. Hyſmael at the ſame time was gone with all his power againſt the Hyrcanians, Bactrians, and other ſavage People dwelling near unto the Caſpian Sea, then up in Arms againſt him; which wiſhed opportunity Selymus taking, and making a bridge over the River Euphrates, paſſed over with his Army, came before the Town, and laid hard Siege to the ſame before his Enemies were well awar of his coming. The Turks at their firſt approach compaſſing the City round with their huge multitude of Harquebuſiers and Archers, drave the Defendants from the Walls; and ſtill without reſt or intermiſſion bringing on freſh men, as Selymus had before taken order, and others at the ſame time breaking open the Gates, and in divers places ſcaling the Walls, enforced the Defendants to forſake their ſtandings, and to retire themſelves into the Market place; where although they were before ſore ſpent with labour and wounds, yet did they there with wonderful courage a great while notably withſtand the multitude of their Enemies ſtill ſwarming in, and in defence of their Country, like reſolute men, fought it out unto the laſt man.

Selymus having taken and ranſacked Clamaſſum, with two other ſmall Caſtles which the Defendants had for fear before abandoned, although he was with a deadly hatred and ambitious deſire prickt forward againſt Hyſmael, and thirſted after nothing more than the ſubverſion of the Perſian Kingdom; yet he thought it not good further to enter into Armenia, before he had out of thoſe Foreſts and Mountains chaſed the Mountain King Aladeules, who but the year before had moſt treacherouſly done him and his Army ſo many injuries in his return from the Perſian Expedition. For Aladeules not without cauſe fearing his own eſtate, as ſoon as he underſtood that Selymus had again taken the Field, and that he was come to the River Euphrates, and ſo to Clamaſſum, ſpeedily aſſembling his Forces, had in ſhort time raiſed a great Army for the defence of himſelf and his Kingdom; purpoſing that if Selymus ſhould go farther into Armenia, then after his wonted manner to look on as a beholder, and by the event of the War, to take occaſion of Prey, and by ſhutting up the paſſages of his Country, at his pleaſure to rob and ſpoil the Turks in their return. Wherefore Selymus leaving a Garriſon at Clamaſſum, retired back again over the River Euphrates unto the Mountain Antitaurus, where it was reported that his Enemies lay.

This Aladeules (as is aforeſaid) ruled over the rude and ſavage Mountain People, inhabiting the great Mountains Taurus and Antitaurus; which Mountains as it were linked together one to another, run from the Mountains called Scodriſci, and the Borders of Cappadocia, with a perpetual riſing, through many large Provinces and Countries unto the great Mountain Amanus, and uttermoſt bounds of Cilicia. The People of this Country were by Nature fierce and warlike, more famous for nothing than for the want of all things; who as men dwelling in a rough and bare Country, could little or nothing profit by Husbandry; yet in ſuch places as would bear any paſture, they had their breed of Horſes and Camels, and did with all diligence uſe graſing; but the greateſt part of their living conſiſted in hunting and ſtealing. Theſe are ſuppoſed to have had their beginning from the Galatians, Cappadocians, Armenians, and the old Inhabitants of Aſia the leſs, which by long and continual Wars in former ages, and eſpecially by the lamentable irruption of the Scythians, were inforced to forſake their Cities and Dwellings, and for ſafeguard of their lives to fly into thoſe rough and deſolate Mountains. Theſe diſtreſſed People ſearching every Hill and every Dale, and following the opportunity of the Rivers and Fountains, but eſpecially the mildeſt temperature of the Air, and favourable aſpect of the Sun, built in many places poor Country Villages, and afterwards divers fair Towns; where in proceſs of time they growing to better eſtate, there roſe up ſome amongſt them, which overruling the reſt, ambitiouſly took upon them the name of Kings, deſiring to be had in regard, and to be feared of their Neighbours, although they commanded but over rough Woods and ragged Rocks. Near unto the Confines of Aladeules Kingdom is the City Orpha, which many ſuppoſe to have been the famous City Edeſſa, becauſe that as yet there remaineth certain Monuments of Baldwin in Latine Letters; who after his Brother Godfrey was poſſeſſed of Jeruſalem, is reported to have taken Edeſſa, and there reigned. Not far from thence is alſo the ancient City Amyda, which at this day is called Carimida, joyning upon Meſopotamia; which Country lying between the two great Rivers Euphrates and Tigris, is now called Diarbecha. The chief City of Aladeules Kingdom was Maras, ſo called as may be thought of the fair River Marſias running through it out of the Mountain Celene, taking the name of Marſias overcome by Apollo, and made famous by the Verſes of many learned Poets. But Aladeules, after he ſaw that Selymus with his Army was entred into the Frontiers of his Kingdom, and drawing near unto him, brought down all his Horſemen, in number about fifteen thouſand, from the Mountains into a fair large Valley; commanding his Footmen, whereof he had great ſtore, to keep the Mountains on the right hand and the left; where having the high rocky Mountains and ſtrait paſſages much for his advantage, he determined in that place which he had long before choſen and fortified, to expect the coming of his Enemies. Selymus conſidering the diſadvantage of the place, although he perceived the Victory could not without great loſs of his men be obtained; and before perſwaded that his Enemies would never have willingly been drawn to Battel; yet made no doubt to adventure his Fortune, preſuming upon the multitude and ſtrength of his Army. Wherefore he commanded Sinan Baſſa the Eunuch (whom he had made General of the Europeian Horſemen inſtead of Chaſan Baſſa before ſlain) with a ſquare Battel to charge the Enemy afront, foraſmuch as the place would not ſuffer him to range his Battel in length, nor to uſe any Wings; and he himſelf with his Janizaries and Aſian Horſemen followed after in the Rearward. Neither were the Souldiers of Aladeules unmindful of themſelves or of their King, who valiantly fought in the head of the Battel, but having ſpent their Arrows, did couragiouſly receive the furious aſſault of the Turks; and ſtanding cloſe to them, ſtill keeping the advantage of the ground, did with ſuch force repulſe them, that the old beaten Souldiers of the Turks, ſeemed little or nothing to prevail either with their Multitude or Valor; for the Turks by reaſon of the ſtraightneſs of the place, could not incloſe them on either ſide, and were beſide grievouſly wounded by Aladeules Footmen, who ſtanding upon the ſides of the Hills with their Darts and Arrows from above, overwhelmed the Turks in the Valley. When Selymus ſaw that Aladeules, contrary to his expectation made ſtrong reſiſtance, and valiantly withſtood his Forces; he drew certain Companies of Harquebuſiers out of his own Squadrons, and ſent them to relieve their Fellows; and at the ſame inſtant commanded the Janizaries for all the danger to mount the Hill. Then the Mountain People terrified with the ſtrangeneſs of the Shot, and not able to abide the force thereof, by and by turned their backs, and by known ways fled into their ſure haunts, in the Mountains and Woods faſt by; yet the greateſt ſlaughter fell amongſt theſe Footmen, who when they ſaw the Horſemen put to flight, and the Janizaries coming up the Hills againſt them, did with much difficulty, by ſteep and broken ways clamber up the high Mountains; as oftentimes it falleth out, that both the ſtrength of mens legs and other their wonted forces fail them moſt, when ſurpriſed and overcome with ſuddain fear, they deſire to run and fly faſteſt. The Turks having them in chaſe had the killing of them until the going down of the Sun. The Horſemen with the King, upon their ſwift Horſes, well acquainted with thoſe Rocks and rough Ways, with little loſs retired themſelves into the further and ſtronger places of the Mountains.

Aladeules flies into the Mountains.

Aladeules after this diſcomfiture, finding himſelf in all things far inferior to his Enemy, thought it beſt by protracting the War, to weary him out; wherefore as the Turks purſued him, and burnt the poor Country Cottagess ſtanding in their way, he ſtill fled from Mountain to Mountain, never offering Battel or ſhewing himſelf, but in places of great diſadvantage; and therefore Selymus fearing leſt in that barren rough and unknown Country, he ſhould either want Victual, or by ſome other means be entrapped, if he ſhould ſtill with his whole Army follow after his ſtrong Enemies, upon the ſeventh day left off to purſue them any further. And encamping himſelf in the moſt convenient place of that Country, ſent Sinan Baſſa with his light Horſemen, who carrying with them certain days Victuals, ſhould ſtill at the heels follow the Enemy, and with all ſpeed and policy poſſible hunt after the King himſelf. Selymus in the mean time curiouſly inquiring of the Country Captives after the ſtrength of Aladeules, and what means he had to maintain the War; found, that he had taken with him his beſt men both Horſe and Foot; and had commanded the Country People to forſake the Villages, of purpoſe to leave all deſolate to the Enemy; and having ſurely intrenched himſelf upon a certain ſtrong Rock (whither he had before conveied great ſtore of Proviſion) was reſolved not to give Battel unto his Enemies, until he had drawn them into the impregnable Straits of the Mountains, where their huge multitude ſhould little avail them, but to increaſe their own loſs. Another cauſe there was alſo (as they ſaid) for that he feared to be betrayed by Alis Beg his Kinſman, General of his Horſemen; who firſt fled in the late Battel; whoſe unfaithfulneſs and hatred might ſeem to proceed of a juſt ground, for that Aladeules had in former time treacherouſly murthered his Father, upon a jealous ſuſpition of his aſpiring to the Kingdom.

Selymus underſtanding all this, cauſed the Captives to have their Irons ſtruck off, and inſtead of their Gyves lading them with Gifts and Promiſes, ſent them to Alis Beg with ſecret Letters and Rewards, to perſwade him in ſo fit a time to revenge his Fathers death; which thing if he would perform by ſome notable exploit upon Aladeules, he ſhould both purchaſe unto himſelf great credit with Selymus, and alſo the Kingdom. Theſe homely Meſſengers according as was given them in charge, having imparted the matter to Sinan Baſſa, within few days had ſo wrought, that Alis Beg (whom the deſire of a Kingdom together with Selymus his Rewards prickt forward to ſeek revenge) was eaſily drawn to joyn hands with Selymus. And when he could no other way hurt Aladeules, who miſtruſting all things, warily looked unto himſelf, he found the means to go over to Sinan Baſſa, carrying after him a great part of Aladeules his beſt Horſemen; by whoſe means the reſt alſo which remained being with Rewards corrupted, one Company after another came at laſt all over unto the Baſſa. Aladeules circumvented with this unexpected Treachery, which never before thought it poſſible that his Men ſhould all ſo ſuddainly have forſaken him and revolted to the Turks, was now glad to repoſe all his hope in ſecret flight. But Sinan Baſſa and Alis Beg, hardly purſuing him as he fled through the Mountains, hiding himſelf in Rocks and the thick Woods, at laſt drew him out of a Cave, being betraied by the Country Peaſants. Aladeules being brought to Selymus, was within a few days after put to death, and his head in great deriſion afterwards carried about through all Aſia the leſs; and afterwards by way of barbarous oſtentation, ſent by Selymus to the Senate of Venice, as a loathſome teſtimony of his Victory. Aladeules thus dead, Selymus reduced all his Kingdom to the form of a Province, which he divided into three parts, and after the manner of the Turkiſh Government, appointed to every part a Sanzack; yet ſo, that Alis Beg ſhould be chief over the reſt, with ſuch Sovereignty, as that he wanted nothing of a King but the name only. And for the better Government of all things in that new gained Kingdom, he left Sinan Baſſa there all the reſt of that Summer; with commandment, that after he had ſet all things in good order, he ſhould winter at Iconium; and he himſelf with a ſmall Train returned to Conſtantinople, for he had heard, that whilſt he was buſied in his Wars againſt Hyſmael and Aladeules in Armenia, that the Hungarians had made divers incurſions into Servia, and ſpoiled that Country. Wherefore for fear of loſing Samandria (which ſtanding near to Danubius, for the convenient ſituation thereof is reputed the Bulwark of Servia and Thracia) he ſent Jonuſes Baſſa then Governor of Boſna with eight thouſand Horſemen, who paſſing the River Savus entred into Croatia as far as Catinum; and at the ſame time tranſported another Army over Danubius into Hungary, to the intent that the Hungarians at one inſtant beſet with double danger, ſhould be inforced to fear their own State; and withall to ſhew unto the World, of what Strength and Power the Othoman Emperors were. Deeming it to concern much, both for the preſent and the time to come, to the daunting of the Chriſtians; if he ſhould by his happy Attempts make it known, that he could at once eaſily and readily maintain ſo many and ſo puiſſant Armies, and wage ſo great Wars in divers parts of the World, and ſo far diſtant one from another.

Aladeules taken and brought to Selymus, is put to death.

Selymus invadeth Hungary.

In the end of the year, when he had thus with double invaſion repreſſed the Hungarians, he ſpent the Winter following at Hadrianople and Conſtantinople, in making of greater preparation for War than ever he had before from the beginning of his Reign. For he was advertiſed, that the great Monarchs of the North his Neighbours, namely Maximilian the Emperor, Uladiſlaus King of Hungary, and Sigiſmundus King of Polonia, with the Princes of Germany, had combined themſelves together to make War upon him. But after he had learned by his ſure Intelligencers (whom he had with great charge ſent into all parts of Europe, diligently to obſerve what was done in the Courts of thoſe great Princes) that all the great meetings of the Chriſtian Princes proved nothing but glorious Words and ſumptuous Banquets; he being rid of that vain fear (God ſo appointing) turned himſelf and all thoſe his wonderful preparations again toward the Eaſt, to the great quiet of Chriſtendom in general.

Yet leſt happily in the abſence of himſelf and of his Armies, the Chriſtian Princes might take occaſion to invade his Dominions, he ſtrengthned the Frontiers of his Empire with moſt ſtrong Garriſons; and left his Son Solyman (who afterward proved the ſcourge of Chriſtendom) at Hadrianople with a ſtrong power, and Pyrrhus Baſſa his Tutor (a man of great Wiſdom and Government) at Conſtantinople. This great Baſſa was of Cilicia, a native Turk born, which was a thing accounted ſtrange, foraſmuch as the great Baſſaes were alwaies choſen of the Chriſtian blood. After that, he ſent Cherſeogles (whom of all others he moſt truſted) with his Army into Bithynia, and made Zafferus an Eunuch, Admiral of his Navy, which he had but a little before built, and with wonderful labor and charge rigged forth. Then ſtaying a few days at Conſtantinople to ſee the young Souldiers, but then choſen Janizaries, he departed thence and went to his old Army, lying with Sinan Baſſa at Iconium, purpoſing to have again invaded the Perſian.

1516. Selymus *goeth to I*conium.

When he was come thither, he underſtood that Campſon Gaurus Sultan of Egypt (with a great Army levied in Egypt and Judea) was come into Syria; giving it out that he would aid the Perſian King his Confederate, and with all Hoſtility enter into Cilicia, if Selymus ſhould farther proceed to invade Hyſmael the Sophi his Friend and Ally. Selymus perplexed with theſe News, and fearing that if he ſhould once paſs over the River Euphrates, Campſon lying ſo near in readineſs, ſhould forthwith break in at his back into Aſia by the Mountain Amanus, and ſo indanger that part of his Dominion; ſtaied at Iconium, and ſent his Embaſſadors with great Preſents to Campſon to pacifie him, if it might be. The chief Men in this Embaſſage were the Cadeleſcher, a Man of great account amongſt the Turks, and of them exceedingly Reverenced for the opinion they had of his great knowledge in the Mahometan Superſtition, who afterwards wrote the Commentaries of this War; and Jachis a great Captain. The ſcope of whoſe Embaſſage was, to intreat Campſon, that he would not hinder or diſturb Selymus from making War upon the Perſian King; who had ſo often and ſo forcibly invaded his Dominions in Aſia, and by bringing in a new form of Superſtition, had corrupted and altered the moſt certain grounds of the Mahometan Religion. And if they found him reſolutely ſet down and not to be by any conditions removed, then with all poſſible diligence to learn his ſtrength and farther deſigns, ſo far as by any means they could, and with all ſpeed to make their return.

The cauſes moving Campſon to fall out with Selymus.

But Campſon now far ſpent with age, and living in the height of worldly Bliſs, although he knew it fitter for him at thoſe years to give himſelf to eaſe and quietneſs, than to thruſt himſelf into Wars and other Princes quarrels; yet thought this Expedition to be for many cauſes both good and neceſſary. Firſt, he deadly hated the Man for his inhuman Cruelty, and therefore could never be perſwaded to renew the League with him which he had in former time made with his Father Bajazet; beſides that, he deſired to abate and repreſs his audacious inſolency, grown already by his proſperous Succeſs beyond the bounds of reaſon; for Selymus having taken Tauris, overthrown the Perſians, and ſlain Aladeules, began now to ſeem terrible to all the Princes that bordered upon him, and there were many which ſaid he was another Alexander, who whilſt other Princes ſat ſtill as Men aſleep, did in the mean time Plot in his victorious mind, the Monarchy of the whole World. But above all things, the fear of the loſing of Syria, and conſequently the loſs of all his Kingdom (the quickeſt motive for ſtirring up of the ſuſpitious minds of the greateſt Princes) moſt inforced Campſon to take in hand this War; ſo as much as the goodly Kingdoms of Egypt, Judea, and Syria, oppreſſed with the intollerable Government of the Proud Mamalukes, and therefore leſs faithful to the Egyptian Kings, were in danger to revolt to the Turks, if the Perſians ſhould by any miſchance or fortune of War be of the Turks vanquiſhed. For which cauſe Campſon in the beginning of this War, ſolicited by the Perſian Embaſſadors, had made a firm League and confederation with Hyſmael; and alſo moved with the miſery of the woful young Prince Aladin the Son of Achomates, was in mind perſwaded, that the cruel Turkiſh Tyrant might by his and the Perſian Kings Forces, eaſily be thruſt out of his Empire in Aſia and Europe. For Aladin, who after the death of Achomates his Father, fled to Campſon the Sultan of Egypt (as is before declared) had lived three years as a forlorn and diſtreſſed Prince in the Egyptian Court, and by all means he could deviſe incited the Mamalukes to revenge the injuries and cruelty of his Uncle Selymus. The eldeſt Son alſo of the late King Aladeules, a goodly young Prince, having at once loſt his Father, his Kingdom, and whatſoever he had elſe, was in good time fled to the Egyptian King, and had ſo filled the minds of all Men with the indignation and deteſtation of Selymus his exceeding cruelty, that the Princes of the Mamalukes of their own accord came to Campſon, humbly beſeeching him to take upon him ſo juſt a War; and if by reaſon of his great years he ſhould think himſelf unable to indure the travel thereof, it would then pleaſe him yet to give them leave of themſelves to take the matter in hand, for the repreſſing of the inſolency of that great and wicked Tyrant.

The order of the Mamalukes.

Theſe Mamalukes far excelled the Turks, not only in ſtrength of Body, skilful riding, and goodly armor, but alſo in courage and wealth. Beſide that, they had not forgotten with what ſmall power they had under the leading of Caitbeius their great Sultan overthrown the Turks great Armies in Cilicia, firſt at Adena, and afterward at Tarſus, where they took Priſoners, Meſites Palæologus the great Baſſa, and Cherſeogles, Bajazet his Son-in-Law; by which Victory they grew into ſuch a proud and vain conceit of themſelves, as if they had been the only Souldiers of the World, able of themſelves to vanquiſh and overcome whatſoever they ſhould ſet upon. Theſe ſo valiant Souldiers, were for the moſt part of the poor People, called in ancient time Getæ, Zinchi, and Baſtarnæ, born near unto the Euxine Sea and the Fens of Mæotis, eſpecially on that ſide where the River Corax falleth into the Euxine Sea; which Country is of later time called Circaſſia, of the People called Cercitæ near unto Cholchis. Theſe miſerable and wretched People, the Valachians, Podolians, Polonians, Roxolanes and Tartars, dwelling by Taurica (pulled from their Mothers Breaſts, or by other violent means ſurpriſed) were ſold to Merchants; who culling out the beſt for ſtrength of Body, or aptneſs of Wit, conveied them by Sea to Alexandria, from whence they were continually ſent to the great Sultan of Egypt; and by his appointment were at Caire (after the old manner of that People) delivered to Maſters of fence and ſuch other Teachers, who carefully inſtructed them, being ſhut up in their Schools, in all manner of feats of Activity; where after they were become able to bend a ſtrong Bow, and taught cunningly to Shoot, Leap, Run, Vault, Ride, and skilfully to uſe all manner of Weapons, they were then taken into pay, and received into the number of the Kings Horſemen or Mamalukes; and ſuch of them as proved cowardly or unapt, were made ſlaves unto the reſt. So that they ſeeing all honour, credit, and preferment, laied up in martial prowes, did with all diligence and courage imploy themſelves to military Affairs, and therein ſo well profited, that oftentimes they which at the firſt were but bare and baſe ſlaves, of the meaneſt of the Mamalukes, by many degrees of ſervice riſe at length to the higheſt degrees of Honour. All theſe Mamalukes were the Children of Chriſtian Parents, from the time of their Captivity inſtructed in the Mahometan Superſtition; for no Man born of a Mahometan Father, or of a Jew, could be admitted into the number of the Mamaluke Horſemen; which was ſo ſtraitly obſerved, that the honour of a Mamaluke Horſeman never deſcended unto the Sons of the Mamalukes; yet might they by Law inherit their Fathers Lands, Poſſeſſions, and Goods; by which reaſon the Sons of the Sultans themſelves never ſucceeded their Fathers in the Kingdom. Hereby alſo it came to paſs, that many Chriſtians of looſe life, or condemned for their notorious offences, flying thither, and abjuring the Chriſtian Religion, and ſuffering themſelves to be Circumciſed, being Men meet for the Wars, grew by degrees to great Honour; as did Tangaribardinus the Son of a Spaniſh Mariner, who by his forwardneſs and induſtry grew into ſuch credit and authority with Campſon the great Sultan, that almoſt all things were done by his advice and counſel; and was divers times by him imployed in moſt honourable ſervice, being ſent Embaſſador both to Bajazet the Turkiſh Emperor, and to the State of Venice, about matters of great importance. Yet his impiety eſcaped not the hand of God; for at length by the envy of the Court he was brought into diſgrace, thruſt out of his place, and caſt into priſon, where he, loaded with cold Iron, moſt miſerably died. Neither was it to be marvelled if the Mamalukes were grown to that exceſs of wealth, foraſmuch as the Egyptians and Syrians being miſerably by them oppreſſed, were not ſuffered to have the uſe either of Horſe or Armor, neither admitted to any matters of counſel; but being impoveriſhed and brought low with heavy impoſitions and daily injuries of the Mamalukes, gave themſelves wholly to the Trade of Merchandiſe, Husbandry, and other mechanical Occupations; over whom the Mamalukes had power and command, as imperious Maſters over their Servants, and would with greater inſolency than is to be believed abuſe the poor Country People, beating and ſpoiling them at their pleaſure; and not ſo contented, Raviſhing their Wives and Daughters without redreſs. The Egyptians (a People in ancient time much renowned for their valour and proweſs) were by their maſterful ſlaves kept in this miſerable thraldom and ſlavery about the ſpace of three hundred years. For after the declination of the Roman Empire, that rich Country falling into the Government of the Conſtantinopolitan Emperors, the Egytians ſoon weary of the proud and avaritious Sovereignty of the Greeks, called in the Saraſins, by whoſe help they expulſed the Greeks, and after choſe the General of the Saraſins for their King, after whoſe name the Egyptian Kings were of long time called Caliphs, as they had of ancient time been called by the names of Pharo and Ptolomey.

The imperious Government of the Mamalukes in Egypt, Ju*dea and* Syria.

The laſt of theſe Caliphs Reigned at ſuch time as the Chriſtians under the leading of Godfrey and Bohemund, paſſing as Conquerors through Aſia and Syria, erected the Kingdom of Jeruſalem. He being invaded by Almericus ſixth King of Jeruſalem, and finding himſelf too weak, praied aid of the Sultan of Syria, who ſent him Sarraco, a valiant Captain, with a ſtrong power to aid him; but Sarraco no leſs unfaithful than couragious, treacherouſly ſlew the Caliph, in whoſe aid he came, and took upon himſelf the Kingdom. After Sarraco ſucceeded Saladine his his Brothers Son, who utterly extinguiſhed the name and authority of the Caliphs in Egypt, whom Sarraco had yet left as high Prieſts. This Saladine oftentimes vanquiſhed the Chriſtian Armies in Syria and Judea, and at length quite overthrew the Kingdom of Jeruſalem, as it is in the former part of this Hiſtory to be ſeen. Saladine dying, left the Kingdom of Egypt to his Brother, whoſe poſterity ſucceſſively reigned of long time there, until the time of Melechſala. This Melechſala (laſt of the freeborn Kings, and of the poſterity of Saladine) had great and mortal Wars with the Chriſtians, wherein having loſt moſt of his beſt Souldiers, and repoſing no great confidence in the Egyptians, thought good to ſtrengthen himſelf with a new kind of Souldiers, meer ſlaves bought for Mony. For at that time the Tartars breaking into Armenia and Cappadocia, and overrunning the People called Comani joyning upon Cappadocia, made general ſpoil of that People, as of Priſoners taken by Law of Arms. Of this baſe People, Melechſala for a little Mony bought a great multitude, which he tranſported into Egypt, and furniſhed them with Arms; by whoſe proweſs he not only defended the Frontiers of his Kingdom, but alſo beſieged Lewis the French King in his Trenches not far from Damiata, called in ancient time Heliopolis, or Peluſium, and ſhortly after in plain Battel took him Priſoner, as is long before declared. But in the pride of this Victory, Melechſala was by the conſpiracy of theſe his new Souldiers ſlain; in whoſe place they ſet up one Turqueminius, a deſperate Fellow of their own Company, honouring him with the Title of the great Sultan of Egypt. Turqueminius of a baſe Slave now become a great Monarch (after the manner of Men) forgetting his old Companions which had ſo highly promoted him, and having them in great diſdain, was by one of them (called Clotho) ſuddenly ſlain; for which Fact he was by thoſe baſe Souldiers, his Companions, choſen Sultan in his place; who for the ſhort time of his Reign did much for the confirming of that ſervile Monarchy; yet was he at length ſlain alſo by Bandocader, ſometimes one of his fellow Servants, who alſo ſucceeded him in the Kingdom. After him in long order ſucceeded many valiant Men of the ſame ſervile ſtate and condition, whom for brevity I wittingly paſs over. Amongſt the reſt, Caitbeius (of whom we have before ſpoken in the life of Bajazet) was for wealth and martial proweſs moſt Famous; who according to the manner of his Predeceſſors, did with greater bounty and care maintain that ſervile Government, than any of them who had before him Reigned in Egypt; and was for his notable Government and noble Acts juſtly accounted amongſt the greateſt Princes of that Age. After whoſe death great troubles aroſe in that ſervile Monarchy about the Succeſſion. Whereby the Mamalukes drawn into divers Factions, ſome ſeeking to prefer one, and ſome another, had in four years ſpace with Civil Wars ſore weakned their Eſtate, and ſlain divers of their greateſt Princes which had aſpired unto that Kingdom. For appeaſing of which Miſchiefs, tending to the utter ruine of their Kingdom, the great Courtiers and chief Men amongſt the Mamalukes with one conſent offered the Kingdom to Campſon Gaurus (or as the Turks call him) Carſaves Gauris, of whom we now ſpeak, a Man of great integrity and courage, and altogether free from ambition. He, terrified with the dreadful example of ſo many Kings whom he had ſeen in ſhort time miſerably ſlain by the ambitious aſpiring of other proud Competitors; when he was ſore againſt his will hoiſt up upon the ſhoulders of the Nobility and chief Souldiers, and ſo carried into the Court, as their manner was, began earneſtly to refuſe the Kingdom, and to withſtand their choice, excuſing himſelf as unfit for ſo high a Place; and with trears ſtanding in his Eies, beſought the other great Lords his Friends, that they would forbear to thruſt him, well contented with his private life, into that glorious place ſubject to ſo many dangers; and the rather, for that he neither had Mony to give bountifully unto the Souldiers of the Court, as other the Egyptian Sultans had accuſtomed; neither held that ſufficiency and authority as was requiſite for repreſſing of ſuch violent and ſeditious tumults as were too riſe in that troubleſome time and confuſion of all things.

The beginning of the Government of the Mamalukes in Egypt.

The Nobility on the other ſide perſwaded him, That he would not upon a fooliſh obſtinacy or vain modeſty refuſe the offer of his preſent good Fortune, but couragiouſly to take upon him the Government of the State, now ſore ſhaken with civil Diſcord, together with the regal Dignity, which was with the general good liking of all the Men ſo frankly offered unto him. At laſt they all by ſolemn Oath promiſed unto him, That they would with all their power, policy, and wealth, maintain and defend the Majeſty of his State; and that the Men of War ſhould not demand their wonted Largeſs, before the ſame might by his Receivers and Treaſurers be raiſed of his Cuſtoms and other Revenues of the Crown. By which perſwaſions Campſon incouraged, ſuffered himſelf to be ſaluted Sultan, and ſo took upon him the Government. Afterwards, when he had given unto the Men of War ten millions of Ducats, by the name of a Largeſs, and by his moderate Government had cauſed Men generally to have his proweſs and wiſdom in admiration, he did with ſuch policy and dexterity reform the ſhaken State of that Kingdom, before rent in ſunder with Civil Wars, taking away by Poiſon and other ſecret devices, ſome few, the chief Authors of Sedition, that for the ſpace of ſixteen years neither tumult nor noiſe of War was at any time heard of in all Syria or Egypt; worthy undoubtedly the name of a moſt excellent and fortunate Prince, if when he had by ſingular wiſdom and policy eſtabliſhed the general peace and proſperity of his Kingdom, he could have there contented himſelf to have lived in quiet, and in the winding up of his life not raſhly have thruſt himſelf into the dangerous quarrels of other Princes.

The moderate and happy Government of Campſon.

The Cadeleſcher and Jachis (Selymus his Embaſſadors) departing from Iconium, came in few days to Campſon the great Sultan, who then lay incamped near unto the River Orantes, at this day called Farfar. Theſe Embaſſadors entertained by Campſon with greater bounty than courteſie, and ſhortly after their coming having audience in his Pavillion; did with moſt temperate and calm Speech deliver their Embaſſage. To whom Campſon anſwered, That it was the ancient Cuſtom of the Egyptian Sultans (foraſmuch as they held the chief place in their Religion) with all care and induſtry to keep the other Mahometan Kings and People in peace and concord amongſt themſelves; whereof he for his part had been always moſt deſirous; and was for no other purpoſe come with his Army into his Province of Syria, than to perſwade Selymus to peace. Who if he would needs wilfully proceed in his intended Wars againſt Hyſmael the Perſian King, his friend and confederate, he would then do what ſhould ſtand with his honour and place, and not longer ſuffer all to go to wrack, for the vain pleaſure and fury of one inſolent and ambitious Man. He ſaid alſo, That he had of long time before ſeen into Selymus his inſatiable, fierce and troubleſome diſpoſition; who having moſt unnaturally procured the death of his good Father, the old Emperor Bajazet, and ſlain his Brethren, Princes of great Valour; ſeven of his Nephews, Princes of no ſmall Hope; with many other of his beſt Friends and faithful Counſellors; could make no end of his ambitious Tyranny. Wherefore they ſhould tell Selymus, that one and all the conditions of peace ſhould be, if he would from thenceforth deſiſt from invading of Hyſmael, and reſtore to Aladeules his Son, his Fathers Kingdom, which had of long been under the defence and protection of the Egyptian Sultans, as of right and reaſon he ought to do, he ſhould in ſo doing, beſide his favour and friendſhip which might greatly ſtand him in ſtead, reap greater fame and glory by an aſſured and honourable peace, than by doubtful and dangerous War.

Campſon his anſwer to the Embaſſadors of Selymus.

The Embaſſadors, although they knew right well that Selymus would not for any threats give over his enterpriſe or lay down Arms, yet to the intent they might the ſooner be diſpatched, and ſo in time advertiſe Selymus of the Sultans ſudden coming, ſeemed wonderfully to like of his motion for peace, and to give good hope by their reaſonable perſwaſions to induce Selymus to like thereof; foraſmuch as they were of his ſecret Counſel, and Men able to do much with him; whereby they truſted (as they would have had the Sultan to believe) it would eaſily be brought to paſs, that thoſe ſparks might be quenched, which all things ſtanding upright, had not as yet kindled the Fire of War. So they being by Campſon rewarded, and having leave to depart, travelling day and night, returned to Selymus, who was then come to Cæſarea.

Campſon alſo removing from Orantes, came into Comagena unto the famous City of Aleppo, which City is probably ſuppoſed to have been built of the ruines of the ancient City Hieropolis, by Alepius the Emperor Julianus his Lieutenant; who in that Province did many notable matters, and called the new built City after his own name. It is ſituate near unto the River Singa, which riſing out of the Mountain Pierius, with many turnings and windings runneth through Comagena, and being but a ſmall River, falleth at length into the River Euphrates. This City Hyalon King of the Tartars took and burnt, at ſuch time as the Chriſtian Princes of the Weſt made War with the Egyptian Kings, for the Kingdoms of Syria and Jeruſalem. Which calamity notwithſtanding, it was again repeopled; and is at this day a famous City, for the commodious ſituation thereof much frequented with Merchants from the furtheſt parts of the World. It is ſcarce five days journey from Tripolis and Berytus, the great Ports of Syria, and is alſo near unto the Turks and Perſians; ſo that the Riches of the Eaſt are thither commodiouſly conveied out of Turky, over the Mountain Amanus which parteth Cilicia from Syria; and ſo likewiſe out of Perſia and Meſopotamia over the River Euphrates, where the City Byrtha of late time bounded the Kingdom of the Egyptian Sultans, from the Perſian.

Selymus underſtanding by his Embaſſadors (who had diligently noted all things in the Sultans Camp) both of the coming, and of the number of his Enemies; and alſo enformed of the Sultans proud Anſwer, who had ſo peremptorily preſcribed to him ſuch unreaſonable conditions as pleaſed himſelf; thought good to alter his purpoſe, and now to convert his Forces another way than he had before determined. For that to enter farther into Armenia, leaving ſo puiſſant an Enemy as Campſon at his back, ſeemed a thing too full of danger; and to give over the enterpriſe he had with ſo great care and charge undertaken, at the appointment and pleaſure of another Man, ſtood neither with his honour or ſtate. Wherefore in a matter ſo doubtful, he reſolved upon a notable and neceſſary point, well fitting the greatneſs of his mind. He made ſhew as if he would have gone directly againſt the Perſian, as he had before determined; and that the more certain report of this his purpoſe might be carried to Campſon, he ſent before part of his Army with his Carriages to the City Suaſſia, in old time called Sebaſta; it ſtandeth in the Frontiers of the Perſian Kingdom, where the great River Euphrates pent up with the Rocks of the Moun-

Mountain Taurus, breaketh again violently forth into Meſopotamia; but turning himſelf upon the right Hand, purpoſed to paſs the Mountain Taurus, and breaking ſuddenly into Comagena to come upon the Sultan before he were well aware of his coming. Wherefore calling unto him his truſty Janizaries, with the other Souldiers of the Court, he openly with cheerful countenance declared unto them what he had reſolved to do with the reaſons of the alteration of his former determination; perſwading them, that the Victory would eaſily be atchieved, if they as couragious Souldiers would with all celerity (before the Mamalukes could perceive they were returned) get to the top of the Mountains, and recover thoſe difficult paſſages; not fearing the vain Names and Titles of the Mamalukes. For why (ſaid he) the ſtrength of thoſe Horſemen is long ſince decayed and gone; the old Mamalukes, who in the time of Caitbeius were of ſome fame and reputation, are all dead. You ſhall in Battel meet but with a ſort of gallant Horſebreakers rather than Souldiers, which can cunningly mannage their Horſes in ſport, to the pleaſure of the Beholders, but know not how to encounter the Enemy, or to indure to be wounded; who as Carpet-Knights, effeminate with long peace, and corrupted with exceſs and delicacy of their great Cities, never ſaw their Foes intrenched, or armed Enemies, neither have heard the ſound of a Trumpet, but at Plays or Shews. Wherefore you are to make but ſmall account of them, being furniſhed with no ſtore of Ordnance or ſtrength of Footmen. But as the reverend Interpreters of our ſacred Laws and Religion, having orderly performed all their obſervances, do divine unto us all happineſs; ſo you as Men full of hope, ſet forward cheerfully unto moſt aſſured Victory over your proud Enemies. For God no doubt favoureth the quarrel of Men juſtly provoked, and offereth means of Victory to ſuch as take up juſt and neceſſary Arms. Yet to overcome the Enemy, and to enjoy Victory indeed, wholly conſiſteth in the courage and valour of them which deem nothing better or more honourable than to ſpend their lives for the honour of their Prince and Country. Here the Janizaries ſhaking their Weapons, forthwith cried out with cheerful voice, That he ſhould lead and conduct them whitherſoever he would; ſaying, That they were ready as couragious Men, to overcome all the difficulties of thoſe hard paſſages, and patiently to endure all the labours and dangers incident to that War.

Selymus, by the mountain People having found out the eaſieſt paſſages, reſolved to paſs over the Mountain with his Army in three places; and ſo appointing three great Companies of the common Souldiers, and Country People, for the opening of the ſtrait paſſages; he commanded the rough and uneven Ways to be made plain and ſmooth, for the tranſporting of his Ordnance, and the broken paſſages to be caſt even, that ſo his Baggage and Carriages might the better paſs; and the more to encourage his Souldiers to take pains, he promiſed preſent reward to all ſuch as in tranſporting of his Ordnance, ſhould take any extraordinary pain. Whereby it came to paſs, that the ſame being of the ſmaller ſort bearing Bullet of no great weight, was in ſhort time by the cheerful labour of his Souldiers, drawn over thoſe great Hills and Dales; ſo that in five days all his Army with his Baggage and Carriages were got over the Mountain Taurus, and come into the Plains of Comagena. For that Mountain where it taketh the name of Amanus, which is almoſt in the middle where the River Euphrates parteth the Mountain Taurus, and the Bay Iſſicus, is neither exceeding high, or yet impaſſable; for as it cometh nearer the Sea, it is not ſo rough as elſewhere, but is in many places inhabited and tilled by the Mountain Cilicians, a fierce kind of People accuſtomed to labour and toil, who are now called Caramanians, which is to ſay, the Inhabitants of the black Mountains; for that the burnt Rocks of the Mountain ſeemed afar off to be black.

Alis-Beg which betraied Aladeules, whom Selymus had a little before ſent for, as ſoon as the Army was come down into the Frontiers of the Enemies Country, with a ſtrong power of his light Horſemen, ſpeedily overran all that Country which is at the foot of Amanus and Taurus; thereby to underſtand of the Country People and ſuch as they could take Priſoners, where Campſon lay with his Army; and alſo by keeping the paſſages to do what might poſſibly be done, that Selymus his coming might not be known to the Enemy.

But Campſon, who with no leſs vanity than pride had fondly flattered himſelf, only by the authority and greatneſs of his name to have terrified Selymus, and overruled him at his pleaſure; could not be perſwaded that he was come over the Mountain Amanus, until certain news was brought him, that he was encamped with a moſt puiſſant Army within two days march of him. With which unexpected news being ſore troubled, and in the midſt of that danger to ſeek Counſel, as one which began rightly to conſider of his own ſtrength, and the ſtrength of his Enemy; began then to doubt what were beſt for him to do, and in great perplexity ſometime hoped well; and by and by was as a Man half diſcouraged and diſmaied. And now become exceeding careful both of his honour and himſelf, he began to doubt, whether it were better for him to give place to ſo great a danger, and ſhunning Battel to retire with his Army into places of more ſafety; or elſe couragiouſly to abide the coming of his Enemies, and to hazard the Fortune of a Battel, although it were upon great diſadvantage; foraſmuch as he reputed it far more honourable, after the example of his Predeceſſors from whom he had received that great Kingdom (both gotten and kept by martial Prowes) to die with honour in the Field, than by ſhameful and unwonted Flight, either to blemiſh their military Glory continued above the ſpace of 300 years, or for love of a ſmall remainder of life, being now 77 years old, to ſeem willing to reſerve unto an obloquy and ſhame his laſt days, deprived of all honour and reputation.

The wholeſome Counſel of Gazelles for protracting the War.

There were amongſt his Chieftains many, which preferred wholeſome Counſel before that which was in ſhew more glorious; but above all others, Jamburd Syrnamed Gazelles (ſometimes the follower of great Caitbeius) a valiant Man of great Honour, for his long experience in martial Affairs, and at that time Governour of Apamia. He, as he was of opinion, That to fight with the Turks Army, conſiſting for moſt part of expert Souldiers, with ſo ſmall a power, were a thing of deſperate danger; ſo was he alſo, that it were good ſpeedily to retire, and to chuſe the City of Damaſco, as the fitteſt place for thoſe Wars; foraſmuch as the Turks Army could make no haſt after them, by reaſon of their Footmen and Carriages, ſo that they might at eaſe and with ſafety retire; and there calling together all the Mamalukes which were in Garriſon in Judea and Egypt, and entertaining the Arabians their Neighbors, to protract the War until Winter, when as they might eaſily diſtreſs the Enemy for want of Victual. And that it was not to be feared that Aleppo, if it were furniſhed but with a reaſonable Garriſon, could by and by be taken of the Enemy, who had but ſmall Field-Pieces not fit for battery. Beſide that, in ſhort time Aid would come from the Perſians out of Meſopotamia; yea and Hyſmael himſelf hearing of the Turks expedition into Syria, was like enough to break into Aſia the leſs; neither would the Chriſtians refuſe to furniſh them with great Artillery from the Iſlands of the Rhodes and Cyprus againſt that common Enemy, if they were thereto in time requeſted. All which things being laid together, he ſaid, the Sultan might afterward upon even hand go into the Field, if he ſhould think it ſo much to concern his honour, to give his Enemies battel. But foraſmuch as the greateſt Wars, which at the firſt had moſt violent and moſt furious motions, by the politique Enemies delay, did moſt commonly in time grow calm, he ſhould not therefore make too much haſt to adventure the fortune of Battel; for that the errors of War, which many times chanced through the overſight or raſhneſs of the Chieftains, might well of good men be lamented and deteſted, but hardly or never recovered or amended.

Gazelles his grave and conſiderate Speech had much moved both the Sultan and others; yet the chearfulneſs of the Souldiers, and fooliſh hardineſs of the Mamalukes did ſo fill Campſons Ears, that he could not hearken to ſo good and wholeſome Counſel; for as ſoon as they heard certainly of the coming of the Turks, they began to leap and dance, and to rejoice among themſelves, that the time was come wherein they might make proof of their Valor, and win to themſelves Honour. For now (as they ſaid) was come that time they had long wiſhed for, wherein they would by notable ſlaughter of their Enemies, advance the Honour and Majeſty of Campſon their Sultan far above the fame of Caitbeius; and ſome even of the chief men about Campſon, upon flattery and vain oſtentation, alledging how honourably and with what ſmall labour they had before overthrown the Turks great Army at Taurus; perſwading him that the victory would eaſily and without any great danger be gotten. But eſpecially Cayerbius Governor of Aleppo and of the Province of Comagena (who after his War ended, was in reward of his foul Treaſon, by Selymus unworthily preferred to the greateſt Honours of Egypt) extolling with glorious words the Faithfulneſs, Courage, and Valor of the Mamalukes, and extenuating the Power and Strength of the Enemy, forced his Wits to the uttermoſt to overthrow the wholſome Counſel of Gazelles.

A ſecret grudge between Campſon and Cayerbeius Governor of Comagena.

For this Cayerbius for all his fair face bore a grudg in his heart againſt Campſon, becauſe he had ſome years before poiſoned his Brother, whom he had in jealouſie, being a man next to himſelf of greateſt Power, Wealth, and Authority amongſt the Mamalukes, and withal of an aſpiring mind. Whereupon Cayerbeius afterwards thinking it good to look to himſelf, and doubting the like practice to be intended againſt himſelf; being, as the manner of that Kingdom was, ſummoned to a Parliament at Caire, feigned himſelf ſick, and would not come; wherewith Campſon was not a little offended, yet for a time he thought it beſt to diſſemble the matter, and to wait ſome fitter opportunity for the taking away of that proud man, ſo forgetful of his duty, and bearing himſelf againſt his Sovereign, as if he had been an abſolute King in his own Province; this he thought might moſt covertly be brought to paſs, if he ſhould upon the occaſion of the preſent War (as then it fell out) or elſe under the color of going in perſon himſelf to the River Euphrates, come to Aleppo; for it was the manner of the ancient Egyptian Sultans, not to account themſelves worthy of the name of a Sultan or great General, before they had, as Cayerbeius had of late done, encamped their Army upon the ſide of the River Euphrates at the City Byrtha (which ſtanding upon the Bank of the River, retaineth at this day both the ancient Name and Fame) and there with ſolemn Pomp had in the ſight of the Army forced their Horſes into the River to drink; giving to underſtand by that ceremony, the greatneſs of their Empire, and that they were ready by force of Arms to prove, that all thoſe Countries were theirs, which lay alongſt the River Euphrates, from the Mountain Taurus unto the Deſerts of Arabia. But the conſideration of this War letted that he did not at his firſt coming oppreſs him, becauſe he deemed it to ſtand beſt with his preſent Affairs; and not yet knowing the purpoſe of Selymus, to expect the motions of the Turks and Perſians, and to defer the execution of his Wrath againſt Cayerbeius, until the end of the War; for fear leſt the other Mamalukes, diſmaied with the hainouſneſs of the ſuddain fact, ſhould either revolt from him, or elſe raiſe ſome Mutiny or Rebellion in that populous City. For Cayerbeius had by his Courteſy and Bounty many ſtrong Companies in the Army faſt bound unto him; and beſide that, was of greateſt Credit and Authority with them of Aleppo, having in his keeping a ſtrong Citadel, built upon the riſing of an Hill in the midſt of the City, which he kept with a ſtrong and ſure Garriſon.

But whiles Campſon doth thus ſlowly and conſiderately purpoſe his deſtruction, many of the Sultans ſecret Friends, to him more officious than faithful, ſecretly adviſed Cayerbeius to beware of the Sultan, and by ſome good means in time to provide for his own ſafety. He underſtanding of the danger, and thinking all delay deadly, ſent ſecret Meſſengers unto Selymus, diſcovering unto him the cauſe of his grief, and promiſing as occaſion ſhould ſerve to come over unto him, and to deliver into his power the Caſtle with the heart of the Citizens, and all the ſtrength of his own Horſemen; thereby to provide for his own ſafety, to revenge his Brothers death, and to further his Victory againſt Campſon; and for performance of promiſes on both ſides, required ſecret Hoſtages to be given. By the ſame Meſſengers he alſo advertiſed him, what Strength the Sultan was of, perſwading him in any caſe to make haſt to give him Battel before he had gathered any greater Power. Selymus nothing doubted to condeſcend to all that the Traitor had requeſted, promiſing of himſelf far greater things than ever he had required; aſſuring himſelf of the Victory, if his Enemy ſhould loſe ſo much of his Strength by the revolt of ſo great a Commander.

Campſon enforced by the general conſent of his Souldiers, and the violence of his inevitable Deſtiny, then at hand, rejecting the good and faithful Counſel of Gazelles, at ſuch time as Selymus was reported to be at hand; reſolved according to the Counſel of the Traitor Cayerbeius, to dare him Battel. He lay conveniently incamped upon the River Singa, almoſt ten miles from the City, in ſuch ſort as that his Souldiers might uſe the benefit of the River, and removed from the Houſes and Pleaſures of the City, might yet nevertheleſs be eaſily relieved with the ſtore and plenty thereof.

The Mamalukes notable Souldiers.

The Mamalukes were ſcarce in number twelve thouſand, but every one of them, according as he was of greater Place or Calling, ſo had he attending upon him more Servants, well furniſhed, with Horſe and Armor. A goodly and invincible Army, if the Battel might have been tried by true Valor. The Mamalukes wearing their Beards long and rough, with grave and ſtern Countenance, having ſtrong and able Bodies, uſed ſuch cunning in all their Fights and Battels, that after they had given the firſt charge with their Launces, they would by and by with wonderful activity uſe their Bows and Arrows, caſting their Targets behind them; and forthwith the Horſemans Mace, or crooked Scimeter, as the manner of the Battel or Place required. Their Horſes were ſtrong and couragious, in making and ſwiftneſs, much like unto the Spaniſh Jennets; and that which is of many hardly believed, ſo docible, that at certain ſigns or ſpeeches of the Rider, they would with their Teeth reach him up from the ground a Launce, an Arrow, or ſuch like thing; and as if they had known the Enemy, run upon him with open mouth, and laſh at him with their heels, and had by Nature and Cuſtom learned, not to be afraid of any thing. Theſe couragious Horſes were commonly furniſhed with ſilver Bridles, gilt Trappings, rich Saddels, their Necks and Breaſts armed with Plates of Iron; The Horſeman himſelf was commonly content with a Coat of Mail or a Breaſt-Plate of Iron. The chief and wealthieſt of them uſed Head-pieces; the reſt a linnen covering of the Head, curiouſly folded into many wreaths, wherewith they thought themſelves ſafe enough againſt any handy ſtrokes; the Common Souldiers uſed thrumb'd Caps, but ſo thick that no Sword could pierce them.

The order of Campſon his Battel.

Campſon of all his Army made four Battels; The firſt was committed to Cayerbeius, becauſe it was in his own Province, where the Battel was to be fought. The ſecond was led by Sybeius, who for his wonderful Activity was of them called Balvano, which in their Language ſignifieth a Tumbler, or one that ſheweth Feats of Activity; he was Governor of Damaſco, a man of ſingular Faith and Valor. Theſe two great Commanders were appointed at once to charge both the Wings of the Turks Army. After them followed Gazelles with the third Battel, to ſecond either the one or the other of the two foremoſt, as need ſhould require. Campſon himſelf led the fourth, all gliſtering in guilt Armor, behind the reſt almoſt a mile and an half. The laſt was left for the defence of the Camp.

The order of Selymus his Battel.

But Selymus according to his wonted manner ſo ordered his Battel, that his Aſian Horſemen were in the right Wing, his Europeian Horſemen in the left, his Janizaries and Artillery in the main Battel; before whom in the middle between the two Wings he placed his moſt valiant and gallant Penſioners, amongſt whom, contrary to his wonted cuſtom, he choſe to ſerve that day.

Cayerbeius as ſoon as he was come near the Enemy, in token of his brave Courage, gave a hot charge upon the Europeian Horſemen; and by and by, as if he would have compaſſed in that Wing, wheeled a great way about behind them, where chancing upon a great Company of Scullions, Drudges, and other baſe People that followed the Camp, with an infinite number of Camels and Carriages, he made there a great ſtir with little ſlaughter, that as a valiant and cunning Traitor he might in the ſelf ſame time ſatisfie the expectation of his Valor and of his Treaſon together. In the other Wing, the Governor of Damaſco, to enter upon the open ſide of the Enemy, forbearing to charge him afront, and turning about his Troops on the left hand, entred overthwart their Ranks; where the Mamalukes fought with ſuch fury, that having made great Slaughter of the Aſian Horſemen, they brake in amongſt them, as if it had been a raging Floud, bearing all down before them, until they came to the Enſigns in the midſt of that Wing; neither could Muſtapha the Beglerbeg (who was by Birth a Hungarian, and Selymus his Brother in law) neither the Imbrahor-Baſſa (or Maſter of the Houſe) though they did what they might to withſtand him, after the firſt were overthrown, ſtay the reſt, but that they would needs turn their backs and flie. So Sybeius as a valiant Conqueror having cut in two pieces the right Wing of the Enemies battel, and thruſting in betwixt the battel of the Footmen and the backs of the Penſioners, brought a great terror and fear upon the whole main Battel. The matter was now brought to extream danger; for Selymus by the breaking in of Sybeius was almoſt cut off from his Footmen, in whom he had repoſed his greateſt confidence. And now the Janizaries were hardly charged by Gazelles, who following the Fortune of Sybeius, had ſet upon the head of the Enemies Battel. The Aſian Horſemen alſo being put to the worſe, and cut in pieces, found no means how to reſtore again their diſordered Battel.

In this extremity Sinan Baſſa in good time came in with his Horſemen; by his coming, for that he had been but lightly charged by Cayerbeius the Traitor, and had brought with him many freſh Troops of Horſemen, the fury of the Mamalukes was repreſſed, the Turks again encouraged, and the Victory ſhortly after wrung out of the Mamalukes hands; the great Artillery being by the commandment of Selymus at the ſame time diſcharged amongſt them, by the terrible thundering whereof, the Mamalukes Horſes ſomewhat troubled, could not ſo well as before be ruled; neither could the men themſelves, although they were of wonderful Courage, much prevail, being on every ſide oppreſſed with the multitude of their Enemies. Yet in that diſtreſs being nothing diſmaied, although they were by Cayerbeius and their good fortune forſaken, they were not to ſeek either of courage or direction; but ſetting themſelves cloſe together, they brake through the midſt of their Enemies, with great ſlaughter of the Europeian Horſemen, and hurt of the Penſioners; and ſo with ſpeed fled towards the Camp and City. After whom followed Sinan Baſſa with the readieſt and freſheſt Troops of his Horſemen; for Selymus (who that day in the extream heat, for his wonderful pains, courage, and direction ſeemed undoubtedly greater than himſelf) riding up and down, called earneſtly upon his Souldiers to urge the Victory, and with all ſpeed to purſue their flying Enemies.

Campſon had now (his Deſtiny ſo leading him) ſet forward, of purpoſe to come to the relief of his men ſent before; or if the Turks ſhould be overcome, to be partaker of the Victory; when upon the way he underſtood by them that fled, That Cayerbeius was revolted, his Army overthrown, and the terror ſo great, as that the flight of his Souldiers was not now poſſibly to be ſtaid; beſide that, to augment the fear, it was reported, That the multitude of his Enemies and Force of their Artillery was ſo great, that they were not then to be encountred. With which heavy News, the proud old man, who in the perpetual courſe of his good Fortune had never taſted of evil hap, was ready for ſorrow and grief of mind to have ſunk down to the ground. And forthwith his own men, and the Enemy purſuing them, coming upon him, who in their headlong courſe without regard overthrew whomſoever they met, every man making ſhift for himſelf, without reſpect of others harms; he being a corpulent man of great years, and beſide the heavineſs of his Armor, troubled alſo with a Rupture, overcome with heat and grief of mind, fainted in that great preſs, and ſo falling down, was without regard trodden to death, after he had with great Majeſty governed the Kingdoms of Egypt, Judea, and Syria many years. The valiant Tetrarchs of Damaſco and Tripolts, whilſt others fled for life, either to the Camp or to the City of Aleppo, labouring in the hindermoſt of their flying Troops to repreſs the force of their purſuing Enemies, were both fighting honourably ſlain. Selymus erecting a few Tents in the ſame Field wherein the Battel was fought, and keeping moſt part of his Army in Arms, ſlept not all that night, but ſtood faſt as a man not yet aſſured of his Victory or good fortune; fearing leſt men of ſo great Valor as were the Mamalukes, ſhould in the covert of the night return and ſet upon him in his Camp; for he knew right well, that they were overcome and put to flight, rather by the Treachery of Cayerbeius and fury of his great Ordnance, than by the Valor of his Souldiers. But Gazelles and the other Mamalukes, after they certainly underſtood of the death of Campſon, having given their Horſes a ſhort bait, departed in haſt from Aleppo to Damaſco. The next day Selymus removing with his Army, took the rich Tents of his Enemies full of all princely ſtore, which he gave unto his Souldiers for a Prey; and marching from thence to Aleppo, had the City peaceably delivered unto him by Cayerbeius, where he favourably took the Citizens into his protection; and the more to win their hearts, granted unto them greater Priviledges than they had in former time enjoyed.

The death of Campſon.

Aleppo delivered to Selymus by Cayerbeius the Traitor.

In this Battel were ſlain not above a thouſand Mamalukes, but of their Servants and followers a great number; more being ſlain in the Flight than in the Fight, when as their Horſes fainting for heat, and dying under them for thirſt, many of them were inforced to betake themſelves to their feet, and ſo were eaſily ſlain of every baſe Horſeman. For a great number of goodly Horſes died there, which being foggy fat, and delicately brought up in cold Stables, could not endure the vehemency of the heat, and that unacquainted travel; for that day all things were burnt with the ſcorching heat of the Sun.

This famous Battel was fought the ſeventeenth of Auguſt, in the year of our Lord 1516, the very ſame day (which is ſtrange to tell) whereon but two years before, he had obtained the Victory againſt Hyſmael the great Sophi in the Chalderan Fields. Selymus loſt in this Battel three thouſand Horſemen; whereby it may eaſily be gathered, That he had there received a notable overthrow of his Horſemen, if Sinan Baſſa in the left Wing (which by the Treaſon of Cayerbeius eſcaped with ſmall loſs) had alſo happened upon his Sybeius, as the other General did.

The dead Body of Campſon laid out for all men to view.

The dead body of Campſon found two days after without any wound appearing thereupon, was by the commandment of Selymus laid forth in open place for all men to behold; that ſuch as believed him yet to live, and to be gone to repair his Army at Caire, might be out of all hope of his return; and others that were already revolted, might thereby be the more confirmed, as now out of all fear of him. Not long after, when the dead Body began to putrifie and grow noyſom, and to convince the fame of his eſcape, had lien open to the view of all men by the ſpace of three days, it was without any funeral Pomp or ſolemnity, ſimply buried in the moſt ancient Temple of Aleppo. Of the riſing and fall of this great man, Janus Vitalis hath written this Elogium or Epitaph.

Paulus Jovius Illuſt. virorum Elog. lib. 4.

Fortuna cæca, & ſurda, vere diceris,
Et mente una prædita.
Ad alta tollis ſcamna in imo conditos,
Ut mox cadant profundius.
Moroſa tu mortalium appetentium
Votum, omne fulmine ocyus
Fugas, deinde te nihil petentibus
Benignitate prodigis.
Campſon ut ille Gaurius, nil ambiens,
Nil te proterva flagitans,
Invitus imperator oræ Egyptiæ
Tumultuoſa militum
Ex fece plebis factus inſolentia,
Supra volabat nubila,
Inter receptus altiora ſydera
Mox excidens altiſſimus,
Abſumptus armis hinc & hinc rebellibus,
Gravis ſenectæ pondere
Fit ludus atrox impotentis alea
Tuæque pervicaciæ,
Amiſit & cum vita, opes quas maximo
Cum regno habebat maximas.

In Engliſh thus:

Fortune well call'd both deaf, and blind,
And thereto fond withal,
Thou ſetſt the beggar up aloft,
To work his greater fall.
Thou peeviſh Dame, more ſuddain than
The thunder Clap from high,
Rejects the ſuits of greedy Wights,
Which to thee call and cry.
And laviſhly conſumes thy ſelf,
And whatſo elſe thou haſt,
On ſuch as crave nothing of thee,
Nor wiſht not to be grac't.
As Campſon Gaurus ſeeking nought,
Ne craving ought of thee;
Againſt his Will by Souldiers rage,
Was rais'd from baſe degree.
And ſoaring up above the Clouds,
Made King of Egypts Land,
Receiv'd amongſt the higheſt Stars,
Did there in glory ſtand.
But forthwith falling thence, oppreſt
With Rebels, War, and Age;
Became the ſcorn of thine ore'thwart
Moſt fierce and fickle rage.
And ſo with life, together loſt
A World of Wealth alſo;
Which with his ſtately Kingdom great,
He greateſt did forgo.

Selymus coming to Damaſco.

Selymus having received the City of Aleppo into his Obeiſance, ſent Jonuſes Baſſa before him with a great part of his light Horſemen, to purſue his flying Enemies to Damaſco, whither he himſelf in few days after came alſo with the reſt of his Army, when he underſtood that his Enemies were departed thence and fled to Caire. They of Damaſco, thinking it not to ſtand with their good to ſtay the courſe of his Victory, and with their lives to hazard the great Wealth of that rich City; without delay preſently opened unto him the Gates at his coming. By whoſe example other Cities alongſt the Sea-Coaſt moved, eſpecially Tripolis, Berytus, Sydon, and Ptolemais, ſending their Embaſſadors, and receiving in the Turks Garriſons, yielded themſelves in like manner.

Not long after, Selymus held a great Counſel in his Camp, which then lay under the Walls of Damaſco; for he would not bring his Souldiers into the City for troubling the quiet and populous ſtate thereof, together with the great Trade of Merchandiſe, which at that time was with wonderful ſecurity kept there by Merchants of divers Countries, coming from far, even from the remoteſt parts of the World. And in the Camp ſuch was the military diſcipline of that moſt ſevere Commander, that the Souldiers (knowing the Victory to give them no whit the more liberty) ſuffered the fruitful Orchards and Gardens of the Citizens, in the moſt plentiful time of Autumn, to reſt in ſafety untouched, without any keeper. By which ſevere and ſtrait government he ſo politiquely provided againſt all wants,that his Camp was in all parts furniſhed with plenty of all things neceſſary, and that at prices reaſonable. There taking unto him men skilful in the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Country, and calling before him the Embaſſadors of all the Cities of the Country, he heard and decided the greateſt controverſies of the Syrians, appointed Governors over the Provinces and Cities, took view of the Tributes and Cuſtoms, and abrogated many Cuſtoms and Tributes due unto the old Sultans, which ſeemed either unreaſonable or grievous to the People; thereby to gain the fame of a juſt and bountiful Conqueror.

When he had thus ſet all things in order in Syria, and ſufficiently reſted and refreſhed his Army; and eſpecially his Horſes which with long and continual travel were grown maigre and lean; he of nothing more deſirous than of the Conqueſt of Egypt, and the utter ſubverſion of the Sultans State and Mamalukes Government; ſent before Sinan Baſſa into Judea with fifteen thouſand Horſemen, and a ſtrong Regiment of Harquebuſiers ſelected out of the Janizaries and other Souldiers, to try the paſſage of that Country, and to open the way for him to Gaza, which was thought would be unto him very troubleſome, by reaſon of the wild Arabians roaming upon and down that Country. The City of Gaza ſtandeth near the Sea towards Egypt, not far from the ſandy Deſarts, whereby men with much difficulty and dangerous travel paſs out of Syria, and ſo to Caire.

Tomombeius by the general conſent of the Mamalukes choſen Sultan of Egypt.

In the mean time, the Mamalukes who under the conduct of Gazelles were come to Caire, with all the reſt of their order which were thither aſſembled from all parts of the Kingdom, entring into Counſel together (as it often falls out in time of danger and diſtreſs) without all contention or envy, choſe Tomombeius (of the Turks called Tuman-bai) a Circaſſian born, to be their King. He was then the great Diadare, and by his Office next in honour and power unto the Sultan; whoſe Prowesſ and Policy was ſuch, that he only in the opinion of all the Mamalukes was thought able and ſufficient to ſtay and uphold the afflicted and declining State of their Kingdom. He by their general conſent and good liking promoted to the State of the great Sultan, thinking (as truth was) his own Majeſty, and the remainder of the Mamalukes hopes, to be wholly repoſed in Arms, and the fortune of Battel; began with great carefulneſs and ſingular induſtry to provide Armor, Weapons, and Horſes from all places; he alſo cauſed great ſtore of Ordnance to be caſt, and muſtered great Companies of ſuch of his Slaves as ſeemed meet for the Wars; beſide that, he entertained for Pay, many of the Moors and Arabians his Neighbours. He alſo for great reward, hired men skilful of the Countries, to go through the Deſarts of the Palmyrens into Meſopotamia, and ſo to Hyſmael the Perſian King with Letters, earneſtly requeſting him to invade the Turks Dominions in Aſia the leſs, or with all ſpeed to break into Comagena, being by the departure of the Enemy left bare and deſtitute of ſufficient Garriſons; and farther to advertiſe him, That Selymus who then lay in the borders of Judea, might eaſily be incloſed with their two Armies, and ſo be vanquiſhed, or for want of Victuals diſtreſſed; and the rather, for that there was no Fleet of the Turks upon that coaſt,able from Sea to relieve their Army by Land, or yet to tranſport them thence in caſe they ſhould by chance of War be diſtreſſed, and ſo think to return. In which doing, he ſhould both relieve the Egyptian Sultan his Friend and Confederate, for his ſake brought into ſo great danger; and alſo without any great trouble or peril notably revenge himſelf of ſo many ſhameful injuries as he had before received from that his moſt capital Enemy. Whilſt Tomombeius doth theſe things, Sinan Baſſa the forerunner of Selymus, having eaſily repulſed divers companies of the wild Arabians, who in manner of Theeves and Robbers lay upon the paſſages, had now opened the way, and was come to Gaza; where the Citizens, although they were in heart faithful unto the Mamalukes, yet for that to ſhut their Gates againſt the Baſſa, and to ſtand upon their guard without a ſufficient Garriſon, ſeemed a matter both perilous and unreaſonable, forthwith yielded their City upon reaſonable compoſition; and with the plenty thereof relieved the Turks Baſſa, giving him great (but diſſembled) thanks, that by his means and the good fortune of Selymus, they were delivered from the cruel bondage of the Mamalukes; promiſing for the remembrance of ſo great a benefit, for ever to remain his faithful Servants. Sinan commending their ready good will, required of them all ſuch things as he wanted, or had occaſion to uſe; which they ſeemed willingly to deliver; and ſo lodged his Army near unto the Walls of the City, within the defence of the Gardens, purpoſing in that place to expect the coming of Selymus.

Gaza yielded to Sinan.

In the mean time (as he was a man of great experience, and moſt skilful in Martial Affairs) he ſought by all means to get knowledge of that Deſart and unpeopled Country, not inhabited for lack of Water; and eſpecially of the nature of the great Sands whereby Selymus was with his Army to paſs; he alſo won by rewards the Inhabitants of the Country thereabout, by large offers, to procure unto him the favour of the Chieftains and Leaders of the Arabians, near unto thoſe places; and alſo to eſpy what the Mamalukes did at Caire, and wherein they repoſed their chief confidence, and forthwith to give him knowledge thereof.

On the other ſide, the Citizens of Gaza, in heart Enemies unto the Turks, as dayly feeling the grievances of the preſent Army, advertiſed Tomombeius of the coming of Sinan Baſſa; and that that power of the Turks Army might eaſily be oppreſſed before the coming of Selymus, if a ſtrong power of Mamalukes were ſent thither under the conduct of skilful Leaders; promiſing, that if the Mamalukes would at an appointed time upon the ſuddain in the night ſet upon the ſleepy Turks, they would at the ſame inſtant ſally out of the City upon the Camp, and there with Fire and Sword do what harm they could for the overthrow of the Enemy.

Of this device, Tomombeius and the Mamalukes liked well, and ſo without delay ſent Gazelles ſix thouſand choſen Horſemen, and a great number of the Arabians, to perform the exploit upon Sinan; for Gazelles, in that his wholeſome Counſel had been by Campſon and others rejected, (who being ſtraitway deſirous of Battel, had raſhly caſt themſelves and the whole State into ſo great calamity) and afterwards in the greateſt danger of the Battel having performed all the parts of a politick and valiant Chieftain, was grown into ſuch credit, that all Men held a great opinion both of his valour and direction.

inan ad- ertiſed of he coming f Gazel- s, goeth cretly to eet him.

But he was ſcarcely well ſet forth, when advertiſement was given unto Sinan by his Syrian intelligencers, That the Mamalukes with the Arabians were coming through the ſandy Deſerts, upon the ſudden to oppreſs him; and that they would be with him before two days were expired, foraſmuch as they had ſet forward upon the Spur, without any Carriages or Baggage to let them. Which overture in good time given, as it was the ſafegard of Sinans Army, ſo was it of greateſt importance and moment, for the obtaining of the full Conqueſt of Egypt afterward. But Sinan Baſſa, although he knew nothing of the Treachery of them of Gaza; yet as a Man of prudent and ſubtil Wit, ſuſpecting that ſuch a thing might happen; becauſe he would not at once have to do with a double Enemy, reſolved to go and meet the Mamalukes upon the way, and to give them Battel. Wherefore with great ſilence diſlodging his Army betwixt ten and twelve of the Clock in the night, he ſet forward and marched out of ſight of the City about fifteen Miles toward Egypt. There was near unto that place a little low Village, wherein Travellers uſed commonly to lodge, for the commodiouſneſs of a lively and plenteous Spring which there riſeth; there by chance both Sinan Baſſa had purpoſed to ſtay, and Gazelles in like manner had alſo determined to reſt a few hours to refreſh his Army, that he might by night, after he had well refreſhed his Horſes, come unlooked for upon his Enemies at Gaza; when news was brought to both the Generals almoſt at one inſtant, by the forerunners of both the Armies, That the Enemy was at hand.

Gazelles not a little troubled with that unexpected news, for that he perceived himſelf diſappointed of his purpoſe; and unable to fight with his Enemies in plain Battel, eſpecially his Horſes being ſore wearied with Travel, was inforced upon the ſuddain for the ſafegard of himſelf and his followers, to reſolve upon a new reſolution; yet nothing diſcouraged, with cheerful countenance and lively ſpeech exhorted his Souldiers to make themſelves ready for Battel, and that which they could not by policy bring to paſs, they ſhould now by plain force perform. Sinan on the other ſide having ſomewhat ſooner ſet his Men in order of Battel than had Gazelles, foraſmuch as he had before at good leiſure taken order what he would have done, if it ſhould come to the point of Battel; with conſtant look and long perſwaſions full of hope, encouraged his Souldiers to fight: But the concluſion of all his Speech was, That they ſhould play the Men, and not once think of flight, foraſmuch as all places about them would be ſhut up, and become impaſſible, if they obtained not the Victory; and that above all things they ſhould perſwade themſelves, that no one of them could that day periſh, but ſuch as the immortal God had by the inevitable Law of fatal Deſtiny, appointed to die; and that with like hazard valiant Men found life in the midſt of their Enemies Weapons, that Cowards by immutable Deſtiny found death in their ſafeſt flight.

The Battel between Si- nan Baſſa and Ga- zelles.

The Baſſa had placed his Harquebuſiers in the Wings of his Battel, which were ranged of a great length in thin Ranks, thereby to uſe their Pieces at more liberty, and with more eaſe to incloſe the Enemy; in the middle were placed the Horſemen to receive the firſt charge of the Mamalukes. Gazelles approaching the Enemy, ſent before the Troops of the Arabian light Horſemen to trouble the Wings of his Enemies Battel, and with a ſquare Battel of his Mamalukes charged the middle Battel of the Turks. The Battel was a great while moſt terrible, and the Victory doubtful; for although the Turks in number far exceeded, yet were they not able to endure the armed and couragious Mamalukes, but were glad to give ground; and quite diſordered by the breaking in of the Mamalukes, as Men diſcouraged, began to look about them which way they might flie; when by the commandment of Sinan the Harquebuſiers, who with the firſt Volley of their ſhot had repulſed the Arabians, wheeling about, incloſed all the Enemies Battel. By which means both Men and Horſe were a far off ſlain, with the multitude of the deadly ſhot; where true Valour helped not them, ſo on every ſide incloſed. For where any Troop of the Mamalukes preſſed forward upon the Turks, they quickly retired, and in all places of the Battel as much as they could ſhunned to encounter their Enemies with their Horſemen, labouring only to gaul them with ſhot. Gazelles ſeeing his Horſe ſpent with extream wearineſs, and that he was not to expect any further help, his Arabians beginning now to fall from him; and alſo conſidering, that many of his moſt valiant Souldiers were either ſlain or wounded, and having alſo himſelf received a great wound in his Neck, he with the reſt of his Army made way through the midſt of his Enemies, and having loſt divers of his Enſigns, fled back again to Caire through the ſame ſandy Deſerts whereby he came. In this Battel was loſt the Governor of Alexandria, and Orchamus Governor of Caire (both Men of great account among the Mamalukes) and beſide them a great number of Arabians, with a thouſand or more of the Mamaluke Horſemen. Neither got Sinan a joyful or unbloody Victory, having loſt above two thouſand of his beſt Horſemen, and amongſt them certain Commmanders, Men of great mark.

The Turks weary of this Battel, which had endured from noon till night, and many of their Horſes fainting under them, were not able to purſue their Enemies, and therefore encamped themſelves in the ſame place where the Battel was fought, near unto the Fountain. The day following they at leiſure gathered the ſpoil, and cutting off the Heads of their Enemies, which were eaſily known by their long and rough Beards, faſtned them up upon the Date Trees growing thereby, as well in witneſs of their worthy labour, as by that ſtrange and horrible ſpectacle to feed the eies of their fierce Emperor, who was ſhortly after to paſs that way, and ſo to manifeſt unto him the Victory of that day.

In the mean time they of Gaza upon the riſing of the Sun, perceiving the Turks Camp left empty, as Men not able longer to diſſemble their covert Treachery; and vainly ſuppoſing that Sinan Baſſa upon ſome knowledge of the coming of the Mamalukes, had for fear retired back into places of more ſafety, ſuddainly ſet upon ſuch as were left in the Camp, which were for moſt part ſick and weak Men (yet in number many) whom they moſt cruelly ſlew; and preſently after ſet upon two thouſand of the Turks Horſemen, ſent from Selymus to Sinan, which by chance were come thither the ſame day, enquiring with great carefulneſs what was become of the Baſſa and his Army; and ſpoiling them of his Carriages, put them to flight; who after that diſcomfiture, ſuppoſing the Baſſa (whom they had thought to have found at Gaza, tarrying for the coming of Selymus) by ſome miſhap or policy of the Enemy to have been loſt, with all his Army, and therefore fearfully retiring, were upon the way miſerably ſlain by the Arabians; neither had any one of them eſcaped, if they had not met with Juleb the Governor of Achaia at the City of Rama; for he was alſo ſent from Selymus to Sinan Baſſa with a ſtrong company of Grecian Horſemen, by whoſe coming the fury of the Arabians was well repreſſed. Yet theſe pilfering People ſtill calling forth to the prey more and more of their Leaders which dwelt in the Mountains adjoyning, and being grown to a great Army, overtook the Turks at a Village called Carasbara, where they inforced them to fight in a place of great diſadvantage. For the Arabians having before taken certain ſtraits, which cloſed in the paſſage at the further end of a large Valley, ſhewed themſelves at once, before, behind, and on both ſides of the Turks; their Weapons were Bows and Arrows, and long Spears armed at both ends, which they nimbly handled, after the manner of the Moors. Theſe Weapons they moſt skilfully uſed upon their ſwift Horſes, and both in their charge and retreat wounded their Enemies deadly. So that the Turks in number few, and for their Horſemens ſtaves inferior to their Enemies, durſt not offer to charge them; but keeping cloſe together, hardly defended themſelves, ſtill making way as they might; and had undoubtedly been brought into extream danger to have been utterly loſt, had not Juleb with four Pieces of Artillery which he brought with him for his defence, driven them which kept the ſtraits from their high places, and ſo opening the way, with all ſpeed brought through his Men; which ſtraits once paſſed, and coming into the open Fields, he with more ſafety marched forward, skirmiſhing afar off with the Enemy with his Archers and Harquebuſiers, and diſcharging his Field-pieces where he ſaw the greateſt and thickeſt Troops of thoſe wild People.

On the other part, the Arabians diſperſedly hovering about them in Troops, were ſtill in the tail of the Army, and ſuch as were wounded or weak and could not follow the reſt, they ſlew; and ſought by all means to hinder the Journy, not ſuffering them (circumvented with ſo many dangers) either to refreſh themſelves, or to take any reſt. This was unto the Turks a moſt diſmal day, for many of them tormented with thirſt, and weakned with wounds and extream labor, gave up the Ghoſt; and now no help remained in this deſperate eſtate, being ſtill beſet and hardly laid too with the multitude of thoſe fierce and deſperate Enemies; when ſuddainly a great number of other Turks came to them in the mid-way unlooked for, being now in deſpair and even at the laſt caſt; for Selymus having left the Imbrahor Baſſa with a ſtrong Army upon the borders of Perſia, for the defence of Syria and Aſia, and having ſent for new ſupplies of Souldiers to Conſtantinople, which ſhould with a great Fleet be tranſported into Syria, had now removed from Damaſco; and the better to provide for Victuals and Forrage, which began now to grow ſcant in that waſted Country; every day ſent before great Troops and Companies of his Army, as it were at certain appointed times.

So Juleb delivered of the preſent danger by the coming in of theſe freſh Souldiers, met with Selymus the next day, and in order told him all that had hapned unto him and his firſt Troops at Gaza and Rama, and all the way after; and alſo what they ſuppoſed by conjectures to have chanced to Sinan Baſſa with his Army, for the manifold wiles of ſo dangerous Enemies. With which news Selymus became exceeding Melancholy, and thereupon thought it not good to go any further, before he perfectly knew how all ſtood with Sinan; in which fortune he had repoſed all the hope of his good ſucceſs in that ſo great an enterpriſe. But whilſt he was in this dump, ſuddainly came the Syrian Spies, who declaring unto him all that Sinan Baſſa had done, converted that melancholy paſſion into no leſs joy and gladneſs; for he ſaw that by that Victory, Egypt was laid open unto him, and his deſires as good as half accompliſhed in leſs time than ever he expected.

News of Sinans Vi ctor, con forteth Se lymus.

The next day after, he removed with his Army to Rama, and by the way as he went (to the terror of others) burnt the Dwellings, together with the Wives and Children of thoſe Arabians, who but a little before had done ſo much harm to his Men in their paſſage. And from thence ſending before his Footmen to Sinan Baſſa at Gaza, he himſelf with his Horſemen turned out of the way upon the left hand to Jeruſalem, to viſit that moſt ancient and famous City, ſo much renowned both for the antiquity thereof, and the fame of the Religion of the Jews. That unpeopled and deſolate City lay then defaced with the huge Ruins of the old ſacred and ſtately Buildings; not inhabited by the Jews, the ancient Inhabitants thereof (who for their inexpiable guilt, as Men exiled out of the World, have no Country or reſting place) but for moſt part by a few poor Chriſtians, who to the great ſcorn and ſhame of the Chriſtian name, paid yearly a great Tribute unto the Sultan of Egypt, for the poſſeſſion of the ſacred Sepulcher; when as the Chriſtian Princes, flouriſhing at that time with glory, power, and wealth, could not by any motive of immortal glory or fame, be incited to revenge ſo great an injury; but deeming it (as ſhould ſeem) better agreeing with their ſtate, to ſpend their time in idle Vanities, or mortal War one againſt another, than in the quarrel of the moſt true and Chriſtian Religion.

Selymus having reverently worſhipped the ancient Monuments of the old Prophets, and done eſpecial ſacrifice unto his great Prophet Mahomet; gave unto the Chriſtian Prieſts keepers of the place (as unto good and devout Men) Mony to maintain them for ſix months; and ſtaying at Jeruſalem but one night, marched in four days to the reſt of his Army at Gaza; where by the way he had continual skirmiſhes both day and night with the Arabians; for they according to their wonted manner were deſperately at hand in every place, and where the ſtraitneſs of the ways inforced the Turks to extenuate their ranks, there would they be ready to skirmiſh with them, and ſuddainly unlooked for come to handy blows; and when they came into the Vallies, they tumbled down from the Mountains great ſtones upon them, which they had for that purpoſe before provided. At which time the Turks Harquebuſiers, in whom they had greateſt confidence, ſerved them to little purpoſe, for the Weather was ſo tempeſtuous and extreme moiſt with continual Rain, that the Pouder in their Flasks became wet and unſerviceable, and hardly could they keep Fire in their Matches. Yet by the valiantneſs of the Janizaries the matter was ſo uſed, that near unto the perſon of the Emperor no great harm was done by thoſe naked Robbers; for climbing up the Hills with Pikes in their Hands they drove them from their ſtandings, and enforced them to abandon the ſtraits and high places.

1517. Sinan Baſſa goeth to meet Selymus; as he was coming to Gaza.

But Sinan Baſſa (who after his Victory returning to Gaza, had put to death the authors of the late revolt, confiſcated their Goods, and exacted of the People in general a great ſum of Mony, as the juſt puniſhment of their falſe Treachery) hearing now of the coming of Selymus, went to meet him with his victorious Souldiers, furniſhed with the ſpoils of their Enemies. Whom Selymus moſt honourably received, and gave generally to the Captains, and particularly to the moſt valiant of the common Souldiers, garments of Silk, with a great ſum of Mony in reward of their good Service.

After that, he ſtaied but four days at Gaza, for that he thought it not good to give any long time of breathing unto his diſcouraged Enemies, now twice overthrown; or to ſuffer the new Sultan (not yet well ſetled in his Kingdom) to grow ſtronger by new preparations and ſupplies raiſed in the moſt populous and plentiful Country of Egypt. Which to let, although it required great haſte in ſetting forward, and ſerved as ſpurs unto him, naturally haſting to glory and renown; yet was his Army to be refreſhed after ſo long and painful Travel, and great proviſion to be made for the carriage of Water upon Camels all the way through the dry, ſolitary, and ſandy Deſerts. For between Gaza and Caire lie vaſt unpeopled and barren ſands, which moved by the Wind, riſe up in Billows in manner of a rough Sea, ſo troubleſome, that oftentimes it is not poſſible to ſee for duſt, and the light ſands in many places gauled deep with the wind, wonderfully troubleth the weary paſſengers. But ſuch a ſuddain calm enſued the great Rain which fell but three days before, that Selymus unto his great good Fortune wanted nothing that he could wiſh, for the happy conduct of his Army; for the air was become ſo calm, that there was no blaſt of wind to raiſe the Sand to trouble their ſight; and withal ſuch plenty of Water was found almoſt in every place, by reaſon of the abundant Rain, which being not yet ſunk far into the Sand, afforded them water in ſuch plenty, if they digged but two foot deep, that the Souldiers commonly thought it needleſs to carry any bottle of water for fear of thirſt. Yet for all that, the wild Arabians failed not in all that paſſage, on every ſide to hover about the Turks Army (as Hawks over their prey) and ſuffer none of them to ſtraggle out of order, or ſtay behind the Army, but they were ſtraitway ſnatched up and ſlain. Againſt whom Selymus provided an eaſie remedy, by placing his Field-pieces in divers parts of his Army, which by the direction of the Leaders (as every Man hapned to be neareſt unto the danger) were forthwith diſcharged upon the roaming Enemy. And in the rereward of his Army were placed ſtrong companies of Harquebuſiers, for the defence of the weak and feeble Souldiers, who could but ſoftly follow the Army, and were therefore moſt ſubject to danger.

By this means Selymus with ſome ſmall loſs received from the Arabians, in eight days march drew near to Caire, Sinan Baſſa going before him, who with his European Souldiers ſtill kept one days journey before. There is a Village about ſix Miles diſtant from the City of Caire called Matharea, famous for the plenty of moſt excellent Balm, with liquor of all others moſt fragrant and ſovereign, diſtilled out of low Trees there planted, whoſe uttermoſt rind the people cut with Ivory Knives to give the Liquor paſſage; which Balm for the notable vertues thereof, being not elſewhere to be had, Mens diſeaſes and wanton deſires have made of a wonderful price. Into that place near unto a Village called Rhodania, had Tomombeius conveied all his new and old proviſion of Artillery; and had drawn deep Ditches overthwart all the field, and croſs the high-way, which he had cloſely covered over the weak hurlds and earth, as if it had been firm ground. And he with his Mamalukes (in number about twelve thouſand) and a great multitude of Arabian Horſemen lay in places convenient, of purpoſe that when the Turks Battels ſhould approach, they ſhould firſt feel the force of his great Ordnance before they came within the ſhot of their Arrows, and forthwith upon great diſadvantage, with all his Forces ſuddainly to ſet upon them diſordered and intrapped. All which things were ſo cunningly and ſo politickly contrived and done, that there was none in the Sultans Army which doubted of the good ſucceſs of that day; and a great miſchief had undoubtedly befallen the Turks, had not Fortune which favoured Selymus, and frowned upon Tomombeius (or more truly to ſay, the fatal period of that Kingdom ſo requiring) by the falſe Treachery of a few, fruſtrated the great endeavors of the Mamalukes.

Tomombeius ſeeks to entrap the Turks.

There was in the Sultans Army among the Souldiers of the Court, four Epirot Mamalukes, who grieved to ſee Tomombeius (contrary to their deſires) preferred to the Kingdom by others of a contrary faction; whether it were upon a malitious diſpoſition, or upon hope of reward and better entertainment, or for that in ſo great a declination of their Kingdom, they thought it good to ſeek for new friends of more aſſurance, fled ſecretly to Sinan Baſſa, as to a moſt famous Captain, and one of their own Nation. For this great Commander Sinan, Selymus his right hand, was born in a poor Country Village of Epirus, in the Mountain Country of Ambracia; whom a wonderful miſchance preferred to that height of credit and wealth; for it is reported, that a Sow kept in the Houſe wherein he was Born, bit off his Genitors, being then but a Child, as he lay by chance ſleeping in the ſhadow; and being made of a greater eſteem by that miſhap, was by them which took up delicate Minions from the Turkiſh Emperor, brought to Conſtantinople, and preſented to the great Emperor Mahomet, Selymus his Grandfather; where fortune by the fatal direction of his good hap, advanced him to his appointed honors, whom ſhe had long before diſmembred. By theſe fugitive Mamalukes, Selymus and Sinan were inſtructed of all the devices of the Enemy, and eſpecially what ſtratogems Tomombeius had with great cunning and policy deviſed; whereinto they muſt needs fall, if they ſhould go directly on and not forſake the high-way. Wherefore guided by the ſame Fugitives, they fetcht a great compaſs on the left hand, and by an unuſed way, before it was day, having eſcaped the front of their Enemies Camp, with all the dangers prepared for them; they came and ſhewed themſelves at their backs in order of Battel, with their great Artillery ready bent, becauſe they were deſirous without delay to joyn Battel.

The coming of Selymus by an unexpected way makes great confuſion in Tomombeius Camp.

Tomombeius now too late perceiving that his Plot was diſcovered by the Treaſon of ſome of his own People; although he was therewith above meaſure grieved, for that all that he had with ſo great induſtry and the labour of ſo many Men brought to paſs, was through ſpiteful fortune made fruſtrate, and in a moment brought to nought; yet for all that, he was a Man of an invincible courage) preſently entred into his wonted and deep devices, and calling to him his chief Commanders, quickly told them what he would have done. Now in this ſhort moment of time he was to do many things at once; the ſignal was to be given for the Souldiers to mount their Horſes, and to make themſelves ready, the order of his Camp was to be changed, his Battel to be ordered, his Souldiers to be encouraged, and all his great Ordnance, as the caſe required, quite the contrary way to be turned; all which things, as they could but hardly and troubleſomely by one Commander be directed, ſo were they haſtily and diſorderly at once done by many. But above all other things, the great concourſe of people for turning and removing the great Artillery, moſt troubled the well ordering of the reſt; for many of them were huge Iron pieces of great weight, made faſt in Stocks of Wood, with Rings and iron Claſps, after the old and rude manner of ſhip Ordnance, which for their exceeding and ponderous weight, could not be out of their places removed, but by the ſtrength of many Horſes, and the great labour of Men, with leavers and rouls put under them; and ſuch as were mounted upon Carriages when they were drawn through all parts of the Camp, with the great clamour of the diſordered and haſty People, ſome drawing, ſome thruſting forward the ſame, with their tumultuous ſtir and doings, wonderfully troubled the other Souldiers as they were mounting to Horſe and repairing toward their Enſigns. But two things marvellouſly helped theſe difficulties, the Souldiers cheerfulneſs, and conſtancy, which was ſuch as paſſeth credit; for they did not upon any apprehenſion of fear fail either in hope or courage, as oftentimes it hapneth in ſuddain accidents, wherein even the old approved Souldiers do many times fail of their wonted valour. And although they were twice overcome in Battel, yet ſtill they were of greater ſpirit and confidence, as Men deſtitute neither of courage or skill, but only of fortune.

Wherefore Tomombeius having with much ado ordered this Battel, and his Souldiers with great cheerfulneſs, deſiring the ſignal to be given, commanded all the multitude of his Arabians to compaſs in the wings of the Enemies Battel behind, and ſo to skirmiſh with them; that ſo (if it were poſſible) the Turks Horſemen might with the danger of the doubtful fight with ſuch an uncertain Enemy, be diſordered before he ſet forward to charge them with his Troops; and withal commanded his great Ordnance (which was now turned upon the Enemy) to be preſently diſcharged. So did the Turks likewiſe, diſcharging at once from a convenient diſtance both their greater and ſmaller Ordnance; and ſpeedily recharging them, brought them within an Arrow ſhot; ſo that for a good ſpace they lay beating the one the other on both ſides with their great Artillery only; in which manner of fight the Egyptian Canoniers were almoſt all ſlain, and many of their Field-pieces broken by force of the Enemies ſhot. For Selymus had in his Camp many excellent and skilful Canoniers, whom he had with great entertainment allured out of Italy and Germany; and eſpecially of thoſe refuſe Jews, which by the zeal of King Ferdinand being driven out of Spain, afterwards to the ſhame of the Chriſtians, diſperſed thoſe rare and deadly devices through the Eaſt. The chief of theſe Canoniers was one Jacobus e Rogio Lepidi, a cunning Engineer, who but a little before overcome by the Turks rewards, abjuring the Chriſtian Religion, revolted unto the Mahometan Superſtition.

Chriſtian Canoniers ſerve the Turks againſt the Egyptians.

But after that the Mamalukes had brought the matter to Battel on both ſides, they gave out a moſt hideous and dreadful cry, and with exceeding fury aſſailed the Turks in three places; for Selymus ſtill keeping his wonted order, approached his Enemies with his Battel in form of an half Moon. Muſtapha Baſſa had the leading of the Aſian Horſemen in the right wing; and Jonuſes Baſſa, of the Europeians in the left; he himſelf ſtood in the main Battel with the Squadron of his truſty Janizaries, and great ſtore of Artillery; but Sinan the Eunuch Baſſa, General of the Field, led after him a great number of moſt valiant Horſemen, drawn out of every Troop, to be ready againſt all the uncertain events that might happen in the Battel, unto whom he joyned five hundred Harquebuſiers, Janizaries, Men of wonderful courage and activity, ſelected out of Selymus his own Squadron, to relieve ſuch part of the Army as ſhould chance to be moſt preſſed by the Enemy.

Sinan Baſſa General of the Field.

So almoſt at one time, whilſt Tomombeius ſtood in the main Battel againſt Selymus, and the Wings of the Mamalukes with equal Battel encountred the Wings of the Turks, and the Arabians alſo valiantly charging them in the rereward as they had in charge, four ſharp Battels were at once made in divers places. It is reported by ſome that were preſent in that Battel, that what for the clamor and cry of Souldiers, what for the noiſe of Drums and Trumpets and ſuch like Inſtruments of War, what for the thundering of Ordnance, clattering of Armor, and riſing of the Duſt, all Mens minds were ſo confounded and abaſhed, that running on headlong as Men furious and deſperate, when neither their Speeches could be heard, their Tokens known, their Enſigns ſeen, or Captains underſtood, miſtaking one another in that hurly burly, they ſlew many of their Friends in ſtead of their Enemies; for never Battels met together with greater hatred, neither did ever two great Kings with leſs care of their perſons and ſafety more reſolutely or deſperately make ſhew of their ſtrength and courage; for both of them with like danger both of themſelves and of their Armies, ſeeing plainly that they had put both their Lives and Kingdoms to the hazard of a Battel, promiſed unto themſelves no other hope of ſafety, but what they ſhould obtain by Victory. Gazelles deſirous both of honor and of revenge, to requite the Europeian Horſemen with like ſlaughter as he had before received from them not far from Gaza, with wonderful fury aſſailed Jonuſes Baſſa, and at the firſt encounter brake his firſt Ranks, and overthrew certain of his Guidons; at which time the Arabians preſſing couragiouſly in at their backs, enforced thoſe victorious Troops, which in all Battels had hitherto carried away the prize (the very flower of Thracia, Theſſalia, Epirus, Macedonia, and Græcia) to flie and ſhew their backs, which never Enemy had before that time ſeen. At which time Sinan Baſſa carefully attending every accident, came ſpeedily in with his moſt valiant Troops of freſh Men, upon the ſide of the Enemy, and reſtored again the Battel, now declining and foully diſordered. But whilſt Sinan, who in this his laſt worthy labour had interrupted the manifeſt Victory of Gazelles, was with an invincible courage valiantly fighting in the head of the Battel, he was by the coming in of the couragious Captain Bidon with his Mamalukes, overcharged and ſlain. His moſt valiant Followers alſo labouring to reſcue and carry away his dead Body, were by Gazelles unfolding his Troops (that ſtanding thin, they might at more liberty uſe their Swords, Sinan Baſſa with moſt of his Followers ſlain by Bidon.

Swords, in which manner of fight the Mamalukes far excelled the Turks) for moſt part ſlain, and the reſt put to flight; and that choſen Company of five hundred of the moſt valiant Janizaries, now deſtitute of their Horſemen, when they had moſt couragiouſly done what was poſſible for Men to do, being compaſſed round with the Mamalukes Horſemen, were all in a trice cut in pieces and trodden under foot. Thus reſteth this Eunuch Baſſa in the Bed of Fame, who living, had the leading of this moſt warlike Emperor Selymus his greateſt Armies in his moſt dangerous Wars.

Muſtapha in the other Wing of the Turks Battel coming on couragiouſly with his Aſian Horſemen, did ſore preſs the left Wing of the Egyptians (whereof Helymis the Diadare, and Giapal, two valiant Captains, had the leading) who but a little before had received great harm by the great Ordnance which was diſcharged out of the midſt of Selymus his Battel overthwart the Field; which Muſtapha perceiving, and deſiring to blot out the old infamy he had before received, did fiercely preſs upon them, ſo diſordered, and with his whole Troops overthrew their broken Ranks; and gliſtering in his bright Armor, with a loud voice encouraged his Aſian Souldiers, exhorting them that day with valiant proweſs or honourable death, to recover their ancient Honour of late loſt in the Fields of Aleppo.

At the ſame time alſo Tomombeius breaking through the middle Battel of the Turks Horſemen, was entred into the Squadron of the Footmen, with his crooked Scimeter giving many a deadly Wound, himſelf being a valiant big made Man, and of great ſtrength. The Arabians had alſo in a ring incloſed the uttermoſt parts of the Turks Army, and in many places inforced them to turn their Battel upon them, being ſore charged with a doubtful fight both before and behind; when Selymus ſet forward with his Battel of Footmen, and his Squadron of Janizaries, his laſt and moſt aſſured refuge in that his hard diſtreſs, whoſe invincible force, neither the couragious barbed Horſes nor their victorious Riders were able to abide; for part of them with their Harquebuſiers, and the reſt with their Pikes, had ſo ſtrongly ſet the front of their Battel, that nothing was able to ſtand whereſoever that firm Battel, linked together as if it had been but one whole entire body, ſwayed. Yet was this cruel Battel continued with divers Fortune on both ſides, from four a Clock until the going down of the Sun; neither was there any part of their Armies, which had not with divers ſucceſs and change of fortune, endured the fury of that Battel; for both the victors and the vanquiſhed being inraged with an implacable hatred one againſt another, fought deſperately as Men prodigal of their lives; the Mamalukes diſdaining to have the Victory wrung out of their Hands by them whom they had in ſo many places diſcomfited; and the Turks taking it in no leſs ſcorn, that they, whom but of late they had overcome and vanquiſht in two great Battels, ſhould now the third time make ſo ſtrong reſiſtance. So that on both ſides their fainting hands and bodies both wearied and weakned with Wounds, ſupported only with anger and obſtinacy of mind, ſeemed yet ſufficient to have maintained that bloody Battel until the next day, if the darkneſs of the night now coming on, had not made an end of that days ſlaughter.

Tomombeius undoubtedly vanquiſhed, and fearing to be utterly overthrown, firſt cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, that his Mamalukes which were indeed not able to withſtand the Janizaries, might not ſeem to be put to flight, but rather as Men commanded, to retire. Which he thought to concern much both for the encouraging of his Souldiers, and for the keeping of his own credit and eſtimation with his Subjects; for now the ſelf ſame fortune which had deceived his firſt hopes, ſeemed unto him (as it fareth with them in diſtreſs, ſtill hoping for better) to promiſe him more proſperous ſucceſs, if he were not diſcouraged; but reſerving ſuch remainders of his Forces as were left, he ſhould again couragiouſly renew the War.

The Battel thus broken off by the approach of the night, the Turks as Victors enjoying the Tents and great Artillery of their Enemies, purſued the Mamalukes until midnight, who held on their way to Caire, in manner as if they had fled. This great Battel was fought upon a Thurſday, the 24 day of January, in the year 1517. The Diadare was taken in the flight mortally Wounded, and with him the valiant Captain Bidon, having in the Battel one of his Legs broken in the Knee with a Faulchion ſhot, wherewith his Horſe was alſo ſlain under him. Selymus commanded them both the next day to be ſlain, either for that their Wounds were ſuppoſed to be incurable, or elſe for that it was his pleaſure, with the death of thoſe two honourable Perſonages to appeaſe the angry Ghoſt of Sinan Baſſa, whoſe death he wonderfully lamented.

Selymus cauſeth the Diadare and valiant Captain Bidon to be ſlain.

The Turks although they ſtill prevailed, yet was their Army greatly impaired even in their proſperous ſucceſs and fortunate Battels; the fourth part of their Army was conſumed with Sickneſs and the Sword, and that days labour had tyred a great number of their Horſes, beſide the long Journey they had before endured. For which cauſes Selymus was enforced to ſlack ſomewhat of his accuſtomed haſt; for as yet he had no experience of the diſpoſition of the Egyptians which dwelt at Caire; neither could he underſtand by any certain report, where Tomombeius ſtayed, or upon what reſolution he reſted. Which things not throughly known, he thought it not good to commit himſelf and his Army into that moſt populous and ſpacious City; but ſtaying four days at the Village of Matharea and Rhodania, carefully provided for his Wounded Souldiers, and cauſed the Bodies of ſuch as were ſlain to be buried; but the dead Carcaſſes of his Enemies he left to the Birds of the Air and Beaſts of the Field. And afterward removing his Camp thence, that he might more commodiouſly water, he came to the Plains between the old Caire and Bulach.

In the mean while Tomombeius, nothing diſcouraged with ſo many miſhaps, gathering together the Mamalukes from all places, encamped his Army commodiouſly between the new City of Caire and the River Nilus; he alſo Armed eight thouſand Ethiopian Slaves (which kind of Men he had not before uſed, for the remembrance of their old Rebellion;) beſide that, he opening the old Armory, put Arms into the Hands of the Mamalukes Sons, and Moors, (his Vaſſals) into the Hands of the Jews and Arabians alſo, and couragiouſly prepared for a greater and more mortal War than before. But foraſmuch as there were many difficulties in the mannaging thereof, having almoſt loſt all his great Artillery, with many of his moſt valiant Horſemen ſlain in the former Battels, he in his troubled mind did ſo caſt the doubtful hopes of his laſt device, (which cruel neceſſity wrung from him) that foraſmuch as he had by manly force nothing prevailed in open Field, he would now altogether uſe policy; as he which of late having unfortunately made proof of his ſtrength, his forces yet all whole, thought it not good again to adventure the fortune of a Battel; neither was he in hope if he ſhould ſo do, to be able with his ſmall power and deſperate ſupplies to protract the War until the heat of Summer, as he deſired. Wherefore he reſolved by night to aſſail the Turks Camp, and if poſſibly he could, to ſet it on Fire. For which his device he ſeemed to have two reaſons; whereof the one conſiſted in the ſpeedy execution, that he might deſperately attempt to do ſome notable exploit in the night, before the Enemy ſhould perceive the weakneſs of his power, which was not great, and ſcambled upon the ſuddain; as alſo before he himſelf ſhould grow into contempt with the natural Egyptians; who deſiring nothing more, than to caſt off the ſervile Yoke of the Mamalukes Government, with wavering minds expected but ſome fit occaſion to Rebel. The other was, That by the benefit of the night he might avoid the danger of the great Ordnance; which in ſuddain accidents, and eſpecially in the darkneſs of the night, ſerveth to little or no purpoſe; in which kind of ſtrength he had before to his great loſs learned, that his Enemies were too good for him. But theſe his reaſonable policies, when all things were in readineſs to have put the ſame in execution, were in like manner as the firſt overthrown by the Treaſon of ſuch as ſecretly revolted from him to the Enemy.

Tomombeius his purpoſe diſcovered to Selymus.

For Selymus underſtanding the whole Plot by certain Mamalukes (which having the Kings evil fortune in contempt, as it commonly falleth out with Men in miſery, dayly forſook him) commanded his Army to be always in readineſs, and making great Fires in divers parts of his Camp, kept moſt careful and vigilant Watch. By which his diligence it came fitly to paſs, that the night following, Tomombeius approaching his Camp, was repulſed with no ſmall loſs of his firſt Troops which unadviſedly were gone on too far; and had no doubt that night thereby received his laſt overthrow, but that he wiſely miſdoubting the unwonted light of the Fires ſhining in all parts of the Camp, in time called back his haſting Troops, which were themſelves with more haſte than good ſpeed marching into the very mouth of the Turks great Artillery, bent of purpoſe upon them.

Tomombeius diſappointed of his purpoſe, by perſwaſion of his Chieftains retired to Caire; for the Mamalukes ſtill put to the worſe in plain Field, thought it beſt to proceed in another manner; perſwading him, with the whole ſtrength of his Army to Man all the convenient places of that great City, otherwiſe expoſed to the Enemies pleaſure, and ſo to keep the Turks from entring. For they as Men brought to this extremity, that they muſt now fight for their Dwellings, Lives, Wives, and Children; thought it more honourable, and better agreeing with their ancient glory, ſo to do in their ſight, and in the entrance of their Houſes, than elſewhere further off. Wherefore the Mamalukes coming home to Caire, furniſhed all their Families and flat Roofs of their Houſes, with all manner of Weapons; every one of them now humbly requeſting the Egyptians their Neighbours, to take up Arms againſt the Turks their ancient and mortal Enemies, and not to ſuffer themſelves to be cowardly ſlain, their Goods ſpoiled, and their Wives and Children carried away into moſt miſerable Captivity; foraſmuch as the mercileſs and greedy Enemy, if he ſhould once get the Victory, would no whit ſpare them, although they ſhould as neuters ſtand looking on, and help neither party; for Victory (as they ſaid) always full of inſolent pride, would know no Friend but ſuch as with reſolute hand did their uttermoſt devoir in time of danger for the obtaining thereof.

The Egyptians diverſly affected toward the Mamalukes.

There were many of the wealthieſt of the Egyptians, who as they thought the change of the State would be hurtful to their Trades and Wealth, ſo were they ready in all they could to help the Mamalukes their old Lords; ſo on the other ſide there were many of the middle ſort of the Citizens, and a far greater multitude of the baſeſt ſort of the vulgar People, who having little or nothing to loſe, lived in hope now to make a gain of other Mens Loſſes; and withal, remembring what miſery and ſlavery they had endured about the ſpace of three hundred years, under the proud Government of the Mamalukes, kept themſelves cloſe in their Houſes, expecting the laſt event of Wars; and ſecretly rejoycing in their Hearts, that the time was come (God ſo appointing) wherein their outragious and cruel Maſters ſhould be juſtly and worthily puniſhed for their oppreſſion and hard dealing; and that which gladded them the more, was, That the revenge ſhould be taken by the hazard of other Mens lives, with which wiſhed ſpectacle they well hoped ſhortly to fill their deſirous Eies.

Tomombeius with much labour and greater care, fortified all the Gates and entrances of the City, appointed unto every Street a particular Captain, in every publick place encouraged the People, omitting nothing that could poſſibly be done or deviſed; and that which in ſo great a calamity and danger was of all other things the hardeſt, with cheerful countenance and undaunted courage made ſhew of greateſt hope. The Mamalukes alſo, beſide the neceſſity (which in caſes of extremity is of power to encourage and make deſperate the faint hearted Coward) provoked with emulation, ſtrove amongſt themſelves, who ſhould beſt perform all the duties of worthy Captains and Souldiers; for every one of them according to his conceit and device, cauſed great Ditches or great Timber-logs to be caſt overthwart the Streets; ſome in covert Trenches ſet up ſharp Stakes, whereupon the Enemy falling unawares, might be gaged; otherſome according to their ſtore, furniſhed the windows and fronts of their Houſes in the greateſt and moſt open Streets, with Harquebuſiers; all which things with many more, were done with ſuch celerity, that none of the beſt and moſt honourable of the Mamalukes refuſed to handle a Spade or Mattock, or to put his hand to any other baſe labour; ſo that nothing could be ſooner deviſed, but it was forthwith performed.

The deſcription of the great City of Caire.

This great and ancient City of Caire was not compaſſed with any Walls, yet were there divers Gates and Entrances which led unto it; whereof one broad ſtrait Street came directly from the Eaſt Gate unto the Caſtle and middle of the City; the reſt were ſo narrow and crooked, that by them no great Artillery could poſſibly be brought, or Souldiers enter without great danger. Into this place eſpecially had Tomombeius conveied his chiefeſt ſtrength; for that he knew his Enemies muſt of neceſſity come in that way for the largneſs of the Streets; the other parts of the City he kept with leſs Garriſons. But the innermoſt part where the Caſtle ſtood, was kept with a very great and ſtrong Garriſon of moſt valiant Souldiers; that whitherſoever the clamor of the Enemy or danger of the Battel ſhould call, they might ſpeedily from thence come with relief. For why, that City of all others the greateſt, could not with ſo ſmall power as Tomombeius then had, be in every place and entrance ſufficiently defended; for within the circuit of Memphis (now called Caire) are contained three great Cities, which joyned one to another with ſtragling Bridges, make one City; whereof the greateſt and moſt populous, is at this day called New Caire. It lieth in length ſix miles, alongſt the River Nilus, from which it is equally diſtant a mile; the breadth thereof, exceedeth not a mile and a quarter. In the midſt thereof is a Caſtle ſtanding upon a little riſing ground, ſomewhat higher than the reſt of the City; more notable for the beauty and greatneſs thereof, than for the manner of the fortification; for in it were many princely Gardens, a fair Street with many large Galleries, divers fair Tilt yards and Courts, with ſtately Chambers opening every way; the utter part thereof was garniſhed round about with Towers, Fortreſſes, and beautiful Batelments, from whence all parts of the City, the River Nilus running by, and the high Pyramids, were moſt pleaſantly to be ſeen. Not far from this princely Palace, is a Lake made by the hand of man, the Water wherein derived from the River Nilus, is on every ſide incloſed with moſt ſtately Buildings; and is a place of wonderful pleaſure, when as a man ſtanding at a Window may take both Fiſh and Foul, whereof there is in the Lake great ſtore. Another Lake there is far greater and fairer than this, in form of a Triangle, in the uttermoſt part of this new City of Caire toward Bulach; it is filled at the riſing of Nilus by a great Sluce made of Stone with Iron Floodgates, and being joyned to the great River by a broad Channel, is able to bear ſmall Boats and Barges; wherein Gentlemen for their diſport uſed to ſolace themſelves both by day and night in courting their Miſtreſſes. The Houſes were all gallantly built afront all about the Lake, with Porches garniſhed with open Galeries, and paved with ſmooth Marble even to the brim of the Lake; there the Citizens in their more proſperous times uſed to row up and down in Boats, and with pleaſant Muſick to delight the liſtning Ears of the hearers. On the Eaſt ſide of this Lake ſtood a moſt ſumptuous and ſtately Pallace, the late work of Queen Dultibe Wife of the great Sultan Cayerbeius, for manner of the Building and inward beauty far exceeding the other proud Buildings of this pleaſant place; for the Walls gliſtered with red Marble, and pargeting of divers colors; yea all the Houſe was paved with checker and teſſeled work; the Windows and Gates were made of Alablaſter, white Marble, and much other ſpotted Marble; the Poſts and Wickets of maſſy Ivory, checkered with gliſtering black Ebony; ſo curiouſly wrought in winding knots, as might eaſilier ſtay than ſatisfie the Eyes of the wondering Beholder; neither was the Furniture in it inferior to the magnificence of the Building, but ſuch as might fitly anſwer both a Princes ſtate, and a Womans quaint deſire. All which things ſhortly after Selymus (having obtained the Victory) carried to Conſtantinople; not ſparing the very Walls, but plucking them down, ſo to take out the curious Stones whole. Beſide the goodly Buildings about that Lake, in every place of New Caire was to be ſeen the fair Houſes of the chief Mamalukes, more commended for their commodiouſneſs, than for the manner of their Building. The reſt of the Buildings of the City was but low, repleniſhed with the common ſort of baſe People. There are yet extant in divers places of the City, three Churches of the Chriſtians; whereof one is holden in greater reverence than the reſt, for the fame of a low Vault in the ground, where it is reported the Virgin Mary flying the fury of Herod, to have repoſed her ſelf with her Child Chriſt Jeſus the Saviour of the World; another dedicated to the Virgin Barbara; and the third to St. George, which amongſt thoſe Nations are of great fame. Unto the City of New Caire, the City of Bulacha is joyned almoſt with continual Buildings. It is of an high and ſtately Building, lying cloſe unto the River Nilus, and was in Summer time frequented by the Mamalukes and other Noblemen, that they might at their pleaſure from their high places behold the inundation of that famous River. There land all the Ships which come up the River; yet the great meeting of the Merchants is at New Caire. On the other ſide of the River over againſt Bulach, are many Cottages made of Hurdles and Leaves of Date Trees, the Dwellings of poor Fiſhermen and Watermen. A little above Bulach is Old Caire, which is alſo joyned unto the new City with continual Buildings; yet diſtant from it about two miles and an half, and ſtandeth alſo faſt by the River Nilus. Over againſt it in the midſt of the River is an Iſland, notable for the pleaſantneſs of the Gardens and Banqueting Houſes therein; in it is an ancient Temple, famous for the love of King Pharoas Daughter and the danger of Moſes (a moſt ancient Hiſtory, yet every where there ſtill freſh in memory.) But moſt part of the Buildings of Old Caire, are now grown into Gardens and rude Ruins. It is ſuppoſed by many probable Conjectures, that there ſometime ſtood the ancient City of Memphis. Upon the Bank of the River, the late Sultan Campſon built a ſumptuous Tower, overtopping the Caſtle in New Caire, to convey Water thither out of Nilus; which being by many Wheels and ingenious devices forced into the top thereof, and there received into great Ciſterns, was from thence by Pipes of Stone and Lead, conveied into all places of the Kings great Palace at New Caire. About five miles diſtant from Old Caire on Africk ſide, ſtand the Pyramids, Monuments of the barbarous Egyptian Kings vanity; whoſe proud Names and Titles time hath worn out of thoſe huge and wonderful Buildings, of purpoſe made for the vain eternizing of their Fame and endleſs Wealth; ſo that of them it may now well be ſaid,

The Pyramids of Egypt.

Miramur perijſſe homines? monumenta fatiſcunt;
Interitus ſaxis nominibuſque venit.

What wonder we that men do dy? the ſtately
Tombs do wear;
The very Stones conſume to nought, with Titles
they did bear.

Within them are the Sepulchers of the old Egyptian Kings, divided into Chappels, garniſhed with Stone of great price curiouſly wrought. Yet are thoſe places of a loathſome ſmell, and for dakneſs thereof, dreadful to behold; for as men go down to come into them by a narrow way, almoſt ſwarved up with Rubbiſh, their lights are oftentimes put out with the damp of the Earth and ſwarms of Remiſe flying about their Ears. Some having got to the tops of them, report, that the Watch Tower of Alexandria, and the mouth of the River Nilus where it falleth into the Sea, is from thence well to be ſeen; and that for the great height of them, a man cannot ſhoot an Arrow ſo high as the midſt of the lower Tower whereon the Spire ſtandeth.

Of theſe outragious Buildings, are written many ſtrange and almoſt incredible things; as that an hundred thouſand men ſhould be occupied continually by the ſpace of twenty years, in building of one of them; during which time, the charges for Roots, Garlick, and Onions only, amounted to one thouſand ſix hundred Talents of Silver. Theſe wonderful Pyramids only excepted, nothing is in the three Cities more to be wondred at than the multitude of the People, who in number almoſt incredible go up and down every Street; but for moſt part ragged and torn, for that they which held any Wealth, durſt not make any ſhew thereof for fear of the Mamalukes. The Common People did then generally live with Mutton, Hens, and Rice, whereof the Country yielded plenty; neither had they as yet the knowledge of the curious,but unwholeſome forced Diſhes, and provocations of Gluttony,which other Nations had to their great coſt and hurt invented. But again to our purpoſe.

When Selymus underſtood aſſuredly, that Tomombeius was retired into Caire, and that the Mamalukes having thither aſſembled all their ſtrength were reſolved there to prove the uttermoſt of their fortune, he with his Army drew nearer unto the City, exhorting his Souldiers to ſet down themſelves that day for ever to vanquiſh and ſubdue their Enemies, whom they had ſo many times before overthrown; and now a little to force themſelves for the gaining of the rewards due to their former Labors and Victories; which (as he ſaid) would be ſo many and ſo great, as they had not the full thereof before in their immoderate deſires imagined. Telling them moreover, that there was but a few good Souldiers left with the deſolate Sultan, who already wounded and terrified, and not able longer to keep the Field, had made choice to end their days in the ſight and arms of their Wives and Children. Beſide that, he made them believe, that he was voluntarily ſent for by the Egyptians, deadly Enemies unto the very name of the Mamalukes,whoſe utter deſtruction they earneſtly expected; and had therefore promiſed him for the rooting up of that wicked and cruel kind of men, to aſſail them as occaſion ſerved out of their Houſes, and ſo to further his Victory; yet nevertheleſs he ſaid, That the accompliſhment of the whole matter, and to make a full conqueſt, conſiſted in the ſubduing of thoſe weak remainders of the vanquiſhed and ſcattered Army; foraſmuch as they were not to be accounted as men quite overcome, which did yet live in hope, with Weapons in their hands, poſſeſſed of the chief City and Seat of their Empire. Wherefore that they ſhould think, That in the fortune of that day, reſted the good or bad eſtate and condition of all their Lives, Honours, and Fortunes. Aſſuring them, that it would be a matter but of ſmall labour and travel, to bring it to a wiſhed end, if they would in that new kind of Fight (as they had always valiantly in other Battels under his conduct) but reſolve with themſelves, that they would overcome.

This his Speech much inflamed the minds of his Souldiers, but the hope of ſo great a Prey much more; ſo that being in good order and ready, they expected but the ſign of the Aſſault. When Selymus entring by the Gate called Baſuela, did at one inſtant thruſt in his Horſemen at divers places of the great City; but his Janizaries he brought in by the greateſt and largeſt Street. At the firſt entrance of the City, Horſemen encountred with Horſemen, and made a bloody Fight in the narrow Streets and Lanes; but the Footmen placing their Culverins and Falcons before and ſuddainly diſcharging them where they ſaw the thickeſt Troops of their Enemies, cleared the Street directly before them. But when they came to the Barricado's and Trenches, and were by force to remove the Timber Logs and other like things lying croſs the Streets, and ſo to paſs the Trenches, the Mamalukes on the other ſide valiantly withſtanding them; they fought with ſuch force and obſtinacy on both parts, that in the memory of man was never a more fierce and cruel Battel ſeen. For both the Mamalukes and the Turks in that Fight ſhewed the uttermoſt of their ſtrength and power; not ignorant, that in that, as in the laſt, they were to fight not for Honour only, but even for their Lives and Empire; when as greateſt rewards, or elſe extream miſery, were by dallying fortune on both ſides propounded both to the vanquiſhed and vanquiſher. At theſe Barricado's the Turks received great loſs, as alſo at the Trenches; for they unadviſedly running on, the hindermoſt ſtill bearing forward the foremoſt, tumbled by heaps one upon another into the covert Trenches, and were there miſerably impailed upon the ſharp Stakes, for that purpoſe before ſet up by the Mamalukes. The Women alſo and Children, with manly courage threw down Stones and Tyles, and ſuch other things from the tops of their Houſes, and out at their Windows, upon the Turks; and they on the other ſide as they could eſpy them, fetcht them off from thoſe high places with their Harquebuſes, or elſe violently brake into the Houſes from whence they were aſſailed, and there fought with diverſe ſucceſs. But moſt part of the Egyptians, diligently obſerving the fortune both of the one and of the other (accounting them both for Enemies) with diverſe affection aſſailed ſometimes the Turks,and ſometime the Mamalukes, ſeeming ſtill notably to help that part whom they ſaw for the time to have the better. Many cruel and moſt terrible incounters were at once made in divers places of the City; for as they croſſed from Street to Street, ſometime the one, and ſometime the other hapned upon new Troops of Enemies; and they which as Victors purſued their Enemies afront, were by others following them at the heels, ſlain down right; ſo that in the Victory none could aſſure themſelves of ſafety. The Lanes and Streets (a moſt horrible thing to behold) did ſo flow with the blood of them which lay by heaps ſlain, that the Duſt which at the firſt roſe wonderful thick, was quite laid, as with a plentiful Shower of Rain; the Air was darkned with the ſmoke of Shot, and ſhowers of Arrows; and ſuch was the clamor of the People and Souldiers, the clattering of Armor, and report of the Artillery, that the Earth ſeemed to tremble, and the Houſes to fall down.

A moſt mortal Battel fought in Caire.

A long and terrible Fight.

This dreadful and doubtful Fight endured two whole days and nights without intermiſſion; yet ſo, that the Mamalukes in number few, and not able to endure ſo long labour and watchings, giving ground by little and little, and forſaking their firſt Munitions, retired themſelves further into the City. The third day, beſet with the greateſt dangers that could be, as to loſe themſelves with all that they had, (which commonly enforceth mens courages in their laſt attempts) they renewed the Battel with ſuch reſolution, that they conſtrained the Turks to retire a great way, and for haſt to leave behind them certain of their Field-Pieces. With which repulſe it is reported, that Selymus deſpairing of Victory, commanded to ſet fire upon the Houſes; moved thereunto with juſt diſpleaſure againſt the Egyptians, for that Jonuſes Baſſa, now his greateſt

Man of War, had even before his face received a dangerous wound in his Head, by a Stone caſt out at a Window.

Now were the Houſes pitifully burning, and the Egyptians weeping and wailing cried for mercy. The Turks themſelves fought but faintly, expecting the ſound of the Retreat; when News was ſuddainly brought by many at once, that the Enemies in the other ſide of the City, were by Muſtapha Baſſa enforced to retire, and afterward had betaken themſelves to flight, as to their laſt refuge. For Muſtapha by the overture of the Egyptians and fugitive Mamalukes, was directed to a fair broad Street, where the Mamalukes had left their Horſes ready ſadled and bridled; that if the worſt ſhould chance, they might thither retire, and taking Horſe, ſpeed themſelves to ſuch places of refuge as they had before thought upon. All theſe Horſes reſerved by the Mamalukes as their laſt refuge, Muſtapha took away, having before put to flight the Garriſon which kept them, which was but weak, conſiſting for moſt part of Horſe-Boys, and Muleters; as ſafe enough in ſuch a place of the City as was leaſt to be ſuſpected and feared.

This accident (as it oftentimes falleth out in great and unexpected Miſchances) did not a little daunt the courage of the Mamalukes; who now ſeeing themſelves hardly beſet, and that dreadful Battel by no other hope or help maintained, but only by courage; being in their own judgment overcome, betook themſelves to flight. Moſt part of them haſting to the River of Nilus with Tomombeius (who in that Battel had all in vain proved the uttermoſt of his proweſs and policy) being tranſported over the River in Boats, fled into the Country of Segeſta; others of them hid themſelves in the Houſes of the Egyptians, and in the loathſome corners of the City. A thouſand five hundred of the better ſort of the Mamalukes fled unto the greateſt Temple of their vain Prophet; whereafter they had a great while valiantly defended themſelves as out of a ſtrong Caſtle, becauſe they would not yield themſelves but upon honourable conditions; at laſt overcome with thirſt, wearineſs, and wounds, together with the fury of the great Artillery, they yielded themſelves to the pleaſure of the Conqueror; part of whom the furious Souldiers ſlew in the Porch of the ſame Temple, and the reſt within a few days after were ſent down the River to Alexandria, there to be afterwards murdered.

mus.

Selymus having thus gained the Victory, forthwith ſent part of his Army to quench the Fire then raging, and cauſed Proclamation to be made through all the City, That all the Mamalukes which would yield themſelves within twelve hours, ſhould be taken to mercy; but unto ſuch as yielded not within the appointed time, ſhould remain no hope of life. Unto the Egyptians alſo that ſhould reveal the hidden Mamalukes, he propoſed rewards; but to ſuch as ſhould conceal them, he threatned to impail them upon Stakes, and having ſold their Wives and Children, to burn their Houſes: Upon which Proclamation, many of the Mamalukes before crept into corners, came forth and yielded themſelves, and were forthwith caſt into Iron. All which were ſhortly after, contrary to his promiſe, moſt diſhonourably murdred in priſon, becauſe (as it was given out) they ſought means to have eſcaped. Many of the Egyptians which would not break the bonds of Faith and Fidelity with the Mamalukes their old Lords, being impeached by their malitious Neighbours, moſt conſtantly died for their Friends, for whoſe ſake they had vowed themſelves to death.

With this Victory the Turks growing inſolent, ranſackt every place of the City, drew out the Mamalukes that had hid themſelves, and ſlew them, rifled the houſes of the Egyptians, as well Friends as Foes, and left nothing ſhut up or in ſecret. And ſome there were, which at one time in the ſame Houſes raged with Covetouſneſs, Cruelty, and Luſt; every man fitting his own humor, whereunto he was by nature or cuſtom inclined; for that in time and place of ſo great liberty, moſt men, but eſpecially the common Souldier, flattereth himſelf to the full, making conſcience of nothing, but meaſuring all things according to his inſolent and diſordered Appetite. The ſame day that Selymus took Caire, Gazelles (who but a little before by the commandment of Tomombeius, was gone to Thebais, to aſſemble the Arabians and to entertain new Supplies) came to Caire; but finding all loſt, and ſeeing no poſſibility either by force or policy to prevail, and therefore thinking it not good again to prove the fortune of War, which had ſo often with contrary courſe fruſtrated the endeavours both of himſelf and his Partakers; he came to Selymus, upon his Faith before given for the ſafety of himſelf and his Followers (which were three Arabian Captains, and a number of good Horſemen) and being admitted to his preſence, in the midſt of his greateſt Captains boldly ſpake unto him as followeth:

Gazelles his ſpeech to Selymus.

If fortune, whom by thy great valor thou haſt won to be thy Friend, had not envied our Felicity, thou ſhouldſt not have (moſt noble Selymus, at this time, after that all things have given place unto thy Valor) matter whereby thou mighteſt excel others in worthyneſs of mind alſo. Whilſt we were in Arms againſt thee for our Lives and Kingdom, our Wealth and State yet ſtanding whole, we always as men proudly preſuming upon their own vain Strength, made little account of thee or the name of the Turks; yea to ſay the truth, we hated thee as became Enemies: But now that we have to the uttermoſt of our power made proof of thy Foree, and have in all Battels been put to the worſt; admiring both thy wonderful and divine proweſs, and moſt proſperous Victories (not given thee without the Providence of the Immortal God) we humbly come unto thee by thy goodneſs to better our hard and adverſe Fortune; that thou by ſparing and pardoning thy vanquiſhed and yielding Enemies (by which only vertue men come neareſt unto the Gods) maiſt extend thy name and fame above the bounds of the reſt of thine immortal glory. We have faithfully ſerved Tomombeius, ſo long as he held the Strength and Majeſty, yea but the Name of a King, or lived in any countenance; but ſeeing he is (his Deſtiny ſo requiring) driven out of his Country, and wandreth the Deſarts, with uncertain report whether he live or not; we come unto thee, rather as men of him forſaken, than ſuch as have forſaken their Prince; ready to ſhew unto thee our Loyalty and Valor in our better condition and ſtate; if we may by thy goodneſs, changing our hard fortune, live and ſerve under thy worthy conduct.

Selymus, for that he right well knew Gazelles both for his Vertue and Valour, wherewith valiant men win Credit even with their greateſt Enemies, and alſo deſiring to joyn in League and Friendſhip with the Arabians (or rather Alarbes) whom he knew of all others to be moſt to be feared, received them all courteouſly; appointing unto every one of them an honourable Penſion, and perſwading them to forget their old eſtate, willed them to look for far greater things of his Bounty. Not long after, when as the Moors and wild Arabians, with certain Mamalukes that were fled to the City of Achaſia, made incurſions into the Country about Caire, and oftentimes did cut off the Turks which went any thing far from the City to ſeek abroad for forrage, he ſent Gazelles with part of his Army to repreſs them; who having quickly won and ſackt Achaſia, and ſlain moſt part of thoſe adventurers, to his own great praiſe, and the wonderful contentation of Selymus, honourably returned in leſs time than was expected.

In the mean time, Tomombeius in the Country of Segeſta (which is on the other ſide of Nilus towards Cyrenaica) miſerably beſet with ſo many miſchiefs, began to make head again. There were come unto him a ſtrong Company of Mamalukes from Alexandria, which he had by Letters ſent for out of the Garriſon of that City, and many others had followed him in his flight from Caire. And there were not wanting many great men amongſt the Arabians and Moors (the Inhabitants of that Country) which promiſed him their help and furtherance. Beſide that, many of the Egyptians, whoſe Houſes and Familes were become a Prey and Booty unto the inſolent Turks, promiſed him, That if he would by night come to Caire, they would raiſe ſuch a tumult in the City, as ſhould eaſily work the confuſion of the Turks; foraſmuch as they all having endured moſt horrible Indignities and Villanies, could no longer abide thoſe moſt inſolent men to rage and reign over them. They ſent him word alſo, that the Turks huge Army was now brought to a contemptible number, moſt part of them being ſlain in the battel at Caire; and the reſt being for the greateſt part brought to extream weakneſs with wounds and ſickneſs. For which cauſes, as Tomombeius his Forces increaſed daily, ſo hope alſo, which never failed the poor vanquiſhed and diſtreſſed King, began now alſo to revive in his invincible heart, above the condition of his miſerable eſtate. So that fawning fortune, which even then moſt cruelly and deſpightfully went about utterly to ſupplant him (of all other diſtreſſed Princes moſt miſerable) ſeemed but then firſt to change her frowning countenance, and to promiſe unto him more happy and proſperous ſucceſs.

Albuchomar diſcovereth to Selymus the power of Tomombeius, and the treachery of them of Caire.

Whilſt Tomombeius was making this preparation, one Albuchomar, an Egyptian, for Authority and Wealth the greateſt man by far in all the Country of Segeſta, whether it were to avert the miſery of the preſent War out of his Country; or elſe by the pleaſure of his revolt to gain the good liking of Selymus, upon whom all things ſeemed to fawn, came and certified him both of Tomombeius his Strength, and of the new practices of the Citizens of Caire. Whereupon Selymus cauſed ſtrong watch and ward to be kept in all places of that great City; and ſuch Citizens as he ſuſpected to favour Tomombeius, he ſhut up into the Caſtle; which being before abandoned by Tomombeius, was then together with the City in his poſſeſſion; and placed all alongſt the River, Boats furniſhed with Men and Artillery, to keep and defend the farther Bank of Nilus, and to impeach Tomombeius his paſſage over. Yet conſidering with himſelf, with how great danger he had ſo many times fought with thoſe deſperate Enemies, and what a difficulty it would be to intercept Tomombeius, (protracting the War in thoſe vaſt and unknown Countries, and ſtill preparing greater Forces, without whom he could nothing aſſure himſelf of all his former Victories) to prove if he might be won by Clemency and Bounty, he reſolved to ſend Embaſſadors unto him, to perſwade him to lay down Arms, and after ſo many overthrows, at length to acknowledge the fortune of the Victor; and withal to promiſe him upon the faith of a Prince, That if he would come in and ſubmit himſelf, he ſhould of the Courteſie and Bounty of the Conqueror, upon conditions reaſonable repoſſeſs that his late Kingdom, which he ſhould never be able by force to regain. But if he would needs deſperately proceed to make head again, forgetting his offered grace, together with his own diſability, he ſhould afterward when the matter was again tried by Battel, by his own juſt deſert never more find at the hands of his angry Enemy, any regard of his Princely State or Dignity.

The cauſes moving Selymus to ſend Embaſſadors to Tomombeius

For Selymus ſeeing himſelf by the courſe of his Victories drawn into a far Country, and not without cauſe fearing with ſo ſmall a power as he had left, to be oppreſſed in that ſo great and populous a City, even with the very multitude, men of doubtful Faith; thought it better by ſome honourable compoſition to aſſure himſelf of ſome great part of that he had won, than by going on, to thruſt himſelf with his Army into new dangers, with the hazard of all. Beſides that, he was certainly advertiſed, That the Mamalukes before fled into divers Countries, were in every place levying new ſupplies of Horſemen; and that the Fleet which went into the Arabian Gulf againſt the Portugals, was dayly expected at the Port of Suezzia, wherein were three thouſand Mamalukes under the leading of Amyraſes and Ray Salomon, two expert Captains, with great ſtore of good Braſs Ordnance; by which good helps, Tomombeius ſtood in fair poſſibility to recover his former loſſes, and to return again to Caire, whither he was by his ſecret Friends moſt earneſtly invited. But above all things, the care he had of the Perſians moſt induced him to think of Peace; for fear that if the Baſſa whom he had left at the Mountain Taurus, ſhould not be able to withſtand the Forces of the Perſian King, he ſhould ſo be excluded out of Aſia the leſſer, and Syria alſo, before his Fleet could from Conſtantinople arrive with new ſupplies of Men and Victuals at Alexandria.

Selymus his Embaſſadors ſlain by the Mamalukes.

Wherefore he ſent certain of the moſt reverend of his Turkiſh Religious, and with them ſome of the moſt honourable Egyptians, Embaſſadors to Tomombeius; who paſſing over Nilus, into the Country Segeſta, were without further hearing, with more than babarous cruelty ſlain by certain Mamalukes which chanced upon them; thinking thereby to gratifie Tomombeius, as yet not knowing of any ſuch matter, and to manifeſt their affection towards him, as alſo that they were not deſirous of any peace with the Turks.

This proud and inſolent fact utterly brake Selymus his patience, and ſhortly after made an end of that mortal War, together with the honour of the Mamalukes. For he being a man of an hot and cruel nature, even when he was nothing at all moved, could by no means brook that his Enemies, ſo often vanquiſhed and put to flight, ſhould ſo lightly reject his offers unto them as the caſe ſtood, both honourable and profitable; and that worſe was, violate his Embaſſadors againſt the Law of Nations, moſt religiouſly kept even amonſt the moſt barbarous and ſavage People. Wherefore provoked by ſo great an injury, he carefully provided for all things neceſſary for his expedition into Segeſta againſt Tomombeius. And becauſe it ſtood not with his honour (as he took it) nor with the good of the preſent ſervice, to paſs the River by Boats, he gathering together all the ſmall Veſſels and Lighters he could poſſibly, made thereof a large and ſtrong Bridge over Nilus.

Tomombeius underſtanding by his Eſpials, and from his Friends at Caire, of the preparations of Selymus, and of the Bridge he had made; fearing alſo the revolt of the Country People, whom he probably ſuſpected to be alienated from him, by the revolt of Albuchomar, a man of ſo great Power and Authority amongſt them; determined once again to prove the fortune of battel, which had ſo often deceived his expectation. For he juſtly meaſuring of his own ſtrength, and finding himſelf in all things inferior to his mighty Enemy, well ſaw that he was neither able to protract the Wars, neither in open Field to abide his coming with all his Forces; and to fly further into the Deſerts, was, as he deemed it, nothing elſe but to make ſhipwrack of that ſmall remainder that was left of his Honour and Credit. Wherefore by the advice of his beſt Captains (which was the laſt indeavour both of himſelf and of the Mamalukes) he departed betime out of the Province of Segeſta with four thouſand Mamalukes, and twice as many Moors and Arabians, and travelled day and night without intermiſſion to come to the River Nilus. By that deſperate attempt to deceive the Turks, ſuſpecting no ſuch thing from their vanquiſhed and weak Enemy; as alſo by celerity to prevent the fame of his coming; hoping ſo by his ſuddain and unexpected approach to overthrow that part of the Turks Army which ſhould firſt paſs the River, before they could poſſibly be relieved from the other ſide. Neither was he deceived in the computation of the time, which he having before exactly caſt, with the manner of his travel, fell out ſo fitly, that he came to the place he deſired, even at ſuch time as the Aſian Horſemen were come over the Bridge, as he had before gueſſed. The Harbengers and Pages of Selymus his Chamber, which were gone ſomething further than the reſt, to make choice of the moſt commodious place for the erecting of the Emperors Pavilion; by the riſing of the duſt, firſt perceived the coming of the Enemy; and Muſtapha the great Baſſa advertiſed thereof, ſuddainly raiſed an Alarum; which ſo unexpected a matter brought a great fear both on them which were already paſt over, and alſo on them that were on the further ſide of the River.

Tomombelus diſtreſſeth the Turks in paſſing the bridge made over Nilus.

Tomombeius preſently aſſailing his Enemies, as yet but putting themſelves in order, and repairing to their Enſigns, at the firſt onſet ſlew ſuch as made reſiſtance, and the reſt he diſcomfited and put to Flight. Neither was Muſtapha the great Commander (although he did what poſſibly he could, by his own example to have encouraged them) able either by his own invincible courage or other perſwaſion, after his firſt ranks were overthrown, to repair his diſordered Battel, or to ſtay the flight of his men; for in that ſo hot and ſuddain a ſkirmiſh all was full of tumult, ſlaughter, doubtfulneſs and fear; and all alongſt the Bank of the River, both above and beneath the Bridge, were to be ſeen fearful Companies of the Turks, ruthfully looking upon the River, and crying unto their Fellows on the other ſide for help. Many forced by the furious Enemy, took the River and there periſhed; others ſtriving at the end of the Bridge, to return that way, and overborn by their Fellows or others continually ſent from the further ſide, or elſe amazed with fear, fell into the River, and were there drowned; the Bridge was ſo broad that four Horſemen abreſt might eaſily paſs over at once, and ſo great numbers of them in ſhort ſpace be conveied over. But when the great Ordnance (the Turks chief ſtrength) was alſo to be tranſported, fewer Troops of Horſemen were ſent over, than the greatneſs of the preſent danger, or ſuddainneſs of the chance required. Neither did their great Artillery as then ſtand them in any ſtead, for that it could neither ſo ſpeedily be conveied over, nor without great hurt be diſcharged from the hither Bank to the further, by reaſon of their own men ſtanding between them and the Enemy.

In the mean time Selymus, who in the beginning of the skirmiſh came down to the Rivers ſide, filled a great number of Boats and other ſmall Veſſels with his Janizaries with their Harquebuſies, and withal haſted his Horſemen over the Bridge to relieve their Fellows diſtreſſed on the further ſide; in which Boats the nimble Watermen uſed ſuch diligence in landing of ſome, and preſently in fetching over of others, that in ſhort time they had tranſported divers Bands of thoſe moſt ready and valiant Souldiers; whoſe coming wonderfully comforted the Aſian Souldiers, even now at the laſt caſt, and ready to have given over. Caneglis alſo, the Tartar Kings Son and Selymus his Brother in Law, encouraging his Horſemen to take the River, with loſs of ſome few of his men recovered the further ſide, to the great admiration of the beholders; which in that Nation was not ſo much to be marvelled at, as they which by Troops with their Horſes had oftentimes ſwam over the great Rivers Taurus and Volga, no leſs dangerous than was the River Nilus.

Tomombeius at the ſame time, for that he ſaw ſpeedy Victory to conſiſt in one thing eſpecially, ſerring his Troops together, ſtrained himſelf with might and main to have gained the head of the Bridge, that by plucking away ſome few of the firſt Boats, he might ſhut in his Enemies already come over; and by cutting the Cables whereby the Boats were faſtened to the bank, all the Bridge with the Turks upon it, might be born away with the force and violence of that great River; whereupon roſe a moſt cruel and deadly Fight; for the reſolute Mamalukes in the front of their battel fought valiantly; and Muſtapha well conſidering the danger, had drawn to that place both his Enſigns and his beſt Souldiers; ſo that there was fought ſuch a fight, as a matter of ſo great conſequence required; the Mamalukes plainly ſeeing, that if they could obtain the place, they ſhould ſhortly after with little ado, overthrow all the former Victories of their Enemies. And the Turks no leſs ignorant, that except they kept the Bridge whole, they were all but loſt men that were already come over; and that the reſt of the Army together with their Emperor ſo far from home, and in the midſt of his Enemies, muſt of neceſſity ſhortly after run the ſame fortune. But Muſtapha well relieved by the Janizaries and the Europeian Horſemen, which were now come over in great number, not only received his Enemies charge, but preſſing upon them, gained ground, and by little and little inforced them to retire. This is that Muſtapha the Hungarian, and Bajazet his Son in Law, which for his own glory and perpetual fame, built that notable, ſtately, and ſumptuous Stone Bridge (of the Spoils of this Victory) over the River Stremon, which at this day men paſſing over into Thracia, wonder at, as at a work beſeeming the greatneſs of the Roman Empire.

Tomombeius, to give a time of breathing to his Mamalukes, who, their Horſes for wearineſs now fainting under them, were not able longer to ſhew their wonted Courage; and deſirous by them again to prove the uttermoſt fortune of the battel, exhorted the Moors and Arabians, a while to charge the Enemy, which thing they after the manner of their Fight valiantly performed; and ſhortly after the Mamalukes having a little breathed themſelves and their Horſes, came in afreſh and renewed the battel; with ſuch fury, that that Selymus doubting the Victory (although he was by his moſt faithful Counſellors perſwaded to the contrary) yet doubted not to adventure the Bridge, and in perſon himſelf to go and relieve his diſtreſſed Souldiers; who by his coming in, encouraged, and in the ſight of their Emperor deſiring every man for his part by ſome notable ſervice to deſerve both credit and preferment, repreſſed the fury of the Enemy; who in ſhort time after, by the coming on of certain freſh Companies of Janizaries, were notably repulſed, and ſo at length put to flight; whom the Horſemen which were not in the battel,purſued all the Fields over. At length alſo the Tartarians (who carried away with the force of the ſtream, were ſomewhat long before they could recover the farther Bank and come to their Enemies) were now come in alſo, and with their ſwift Horſes following the chaſe, augmented the ſlaughter. But Selymus above all things deſirous of Tomombeius, preſently commanded Muſtapha the great Baſſa, Gazelles and Cayerbeius, with certain freſh Troops of light Horſemen, to purſue him at the heels, and if it were poſſible not to ſuffer him to eſcape; for ſo long as he lived, he could not aſſure himſelf of any thing he had yet gotten. Theſe vigilant Captains not unmindful of their charge, following faſt after him, overtook him the next day at the ſluce of a great deep Fen, where he had a little reſted himſelf and his Followers, being then about to cut off a wooden Bridge, ſo to have hindred the Enemies purſuit. Some of his Followers being there ſlain, and ſome taken, he was again enforced to fly. The third day when he had almoſt loſt all his men, and was come with ſome few into the Territory of the Secuſſan Prince, theſe great Captains ſtill eagerly purſuing him, and denouncing unto the poor Country People which dwelt in Villages thereabout, all Extremities and Tortures, if they did not with moſt diligent watch and ward ſo keep the paſſages of thoſe Mariſhes, as that he ſhould not poſſibly eſcape; he was ſo beſet on every ſide, that for ſafegard of his life he was glad to hide himſelf all alone in a foul deep Mariſh; where ſhortly after he the poor Sultan was by the diligent ſearch of the Country Peaſants found out, hidden among the Flags and Bulruſhes, ſtanding in the water up to the ſhoulders, who delivered him miſerably bound unto the Turks. Shortly after he with certain Captains and other of his chief Friends taken in that Flight, was brought to Caire. Selymus before reſolved to put him to death, and the rather for the injury done to his Embaſſadors, would not ſuffer him to come into his preſence, but commanded him to be tortured, ſo to have cauſed him to have revealed the great Treaſures of Campſon his Predeceſſor, which were thought to have been by him hidden; in which moſt horrible and exquiſite Torments it is reported, that he with great conſtancy and ſtern countenance uttered nothing but certain deep ſighs and groans, overcoming with patience the Tyranny of the proud Conqueror; who after that, commanded him in baſe and ragged Apparel, with his hands bound behind him, as a Thief or Murderer condemned to die, to be ſet upon a foul lean Camel, and ſo to be carried in deriſion through all the publick and notable places of the City; that the Egyptians might ſee him, whom they but a little before had adored for their King, by change of Fortune caſt into extream miſery, by moſt ſhameful death to end both his life and Empire together, when they had thus deſpightfully led him as it were in triumph, and brought him to the chief Gate of the City called Baſuela, they there openly ſtrangled him with a Rope; and that he might be the better ſeen, and become more contemptible to all that paſſed that way, they hanged him up by the neck upon an Iron Hook in an Arch of the ſame Gate, and ſo left him to the worlds wonder. Palearius propounding him as a mirror both of the better and worſe fortune, for all men to look upon, aptly deſcribeth both his happineſs and miſery in theſe few Verſes following:

The miſerable end of Tomombeius laſt Sultan of Egypt.

Paulus Jovius Illuſt. virorum Elog. lib. 4.

Non fuit in toto, Rex æque Oriente beatus;
Nec magis in toto Rex Oriente miſer,
Quam dolor Egypti, olim Tomombeius, auro
Ingenti, atque armis, & ditione potens.
Captus ab hoſte fero, miſerum ſimul atque beatum,
Exemplo potis eſt, commonuiſſe ſuo.
Quid rides temere? quid fles? vis te cohibere?
Et natum poſthac te meminiſſe hominem?
Mi trabeum induto, gemmis auroque corona
Cingebat, fulgens & diadema caput.
Mi quandam ornabant pretioſa monilia collum,
Nunc fractam vili reſpice fune gulam.

In Engliſh thus:

In all the Eaſt a King more bleſt was no where to be found,
Nor in the Eaſt one more accurſt liv'd not upon the ground,
Than Tomombeius, Egypts grief, ſometime for ſtore of gold,
Of power great for Martial Force, and Kingdom he did hold.
But taken by his cruel Foe, may good example be Both to the happy and diſtreſt, of mans uncertainty.
Why do'ſt thou fondly laugh? Why do'ſt thou vainly cry?
Canſt thou from henceforth ſtay thy ſelf, and think th'art born to die?
My Garments were the Royal Robes, I wore the Crown of Gold,
With richeſt Stones moſt richly ſet, moſt glorious to behold:
My neck adorn'd with richeſt Gems which I did ſometimes wear.
But now truſt up in ſhameful Rope, behold me hanging here.

The Egyptians in doubt of their Eſtate bewail the death of Tomombeius.

This miſery beſel Tomombeius the thirteenth of April, in the year 1517, upon the Monday in Eaſter Week. There were many which ſhed tears to behold that ſo cruel and lamentable a ſpectacle, who by their woful countenance and pitiful lamentation ſeemed to deteſt that foul and unworthy death of their late Sultan; notwithſtanding that the Janizaries reproved them therefore, and threatned them with death, who like giddy braind Fools (as they termed them) enured to the ſlavery of the Mamalukes, joyfully and thankfully accepted not of their deliverance; for the Egyptians were as yet uncertain of their Eſtate, and therefore as men in ſuſpence (not without cauſe) ſtood in doubt what ſhould become of themſelves; fearing leſt the Turks, a warlike Nation, and a terror to all the Princes of Europe and Aſia, nothing more courteous than the Mamalukes, ſhould with no leſs inſolency rage and tyrannize over them,under their warlike and cruel Emperor. Beſides that, the woful ſight of Tomombeius hanging in the Gate, as the unworworthy ſcorn of Fortune, wonderfully wounded their hearts; for why, it was yet freſh in their remembrance, that he with the good liking of all men, and general favour of the Nobility, with good fame roſe up all the degrees of Honour both in Field and Court, unto the height of Regal Dignity; and therefore grieved the more to ſee him by inevitable Deſtiny caſt down headlong, ſo ſhamefully to end his Life and Empire together. A notable ſpectacle undoubtedly amongſt the rareſt examples of worldly fragility, both to the happy and unfortunate; the one, not to be too proud, or too much to flatter themſelves in their greateſt bliſs; and the other, to learn thereby with patience to indure the heavy and unworthy changes and chances of this wretched and miſerable world. And ſo much the more did Tomombeius ſo hanging, move men to compaſſion, for that the Majeſty of his tall and ſtrong body, and reverend countenance, with his long and hoary Beard, well agreed with his imperial Dignity and Martial diſpoſition. The ſame fortune with Tomombeius ran alſo divers of the Princes of the Mamalukes, with ſome others of the common ſort alſo.

Tomombeius thus taken out of the way, and all the Mamalukes almoſt ſlain, and no power of the Enemy to be heard of in all Egypt to renew the War; Selymus dividing his Forces, ſent them forth with his Captains, to take in the Countries and Provinces of Egypt lying further off. They of Alexandria after the battel of Caire having thruſt out the Garriſon, and eaſily ſurpriſed the Caſtle of Pharus (which the weak defendants choſe rather upon hope of preſent reward to deliver, than with doubtful event to defend) yielded themſelves many daies before unto the Turks. Damiata alſo, called in ancient time Peluſium, opened their Gates, and ſubmitted themſelves to the Victors. There was no City betwixt the River of Nilus and the Borders of Judea and Arabia, which yielded not to the obedience of Selymus. The Kings alſo of Africk bordering upon Cyrenaica, Tributaries or Confederates of the Egyptian Sultans, ſent their Embaſſadors with Preſents to Selymus.

There remained now none but the wild Arabians (a People never to be tamed) and eſpecially they of Africk, who having loſt many of their Friends and Kinſmen in aiding Tomombeius, would not (as it was thought) ſubmit themſelves unto the Turkiſh obedience. This wandering kind of People, living for moſt part by Theft, had filled the Countries from Euphrates, where it runneth by the Palmyrens, with all the inner parts of Egypt and Africk unto the Atlantick Sea, with huge multitudes of men; and being divided into many Companies under divers Leaders, have no certain dwelling places, but live an hard and frugal kind of life in Tents and Waggons, after the manner of the Tartars; their greateſt Wealth is a good ſerviceable Horſe, with a Launce or a bundle of Darts; they were alway at diſcord and variance amongſt themſelves, by reaſon whereof they could never agree for the expulſing of the Mamalukes, who otherwiſe had not been able to have ſtood againſt them, if they ſhould have joyned their Forces together. So that the late Egyptian Sultans ſeemed to hold their State and Empire among ſo populous a Nation, rather by their diſcord than their own ſtrength; wherefore Selymus having now by fit men, upon his Faith before given, allured many of their Chieftains and greateſt Commanders to Caire, honourably both entertained and rewarded them. By whoſe example others moved, came alſo in dayly; and having received their rewards, gave the Oath of their Allegeance to Selymus. Others which could by no fair promiſes or words be won, being cunningly intercepted by other Captains, and delivered to Selymus, indured the pains of their vain obſtinacy and malice. The other remote Nations toward Æthiopia, as they had in former time rather acknowledged the friendſhip than the command of the Egyptian Sultans; ſo now induced with the fame of the Victory, eaſily joyned in like amity with the Turk.

Selymus cunningly reduceth the Arabians to his obedience.

About the ſame time, Selymus ſent certain Troops of Horſemen to Suezzia, a Port of the Red Sea (of old called Arſinoe) about three days journey from Caire; in which Port Campſon the great Sultan (a little before the coming of the Turks) had with infinite charge and four years travel built a ſtrong Fleet againſt the Portugals, who by their Conqueſts in India had taken away all the rich trade of the Indian Merchandiſe into the Gulf of Arabia, to the great hinderance of the Egyptian Kings Cuſtoms; over which Fleet (a little before the beginning of the Turkiſh Wars) Campſon had appointed one Amyraſes and Ray Salomon Generals, with a ſtrong power of Mamalukes and great ſtore of Ordnance, againſt the Portugals. Theſe valiant Captains having yet done nothing in the ſervice they were appointed unto, as they lay at Gidda (the Port of the famous City of Mecha, wherein is the Temple of their great Prophet Mahomet) underſtanding of the death of Campſon, and of the coming of Selymus into Egypt, fell at variance among themſelves; one of them being willing to continue his obedience towards the new Sultan, and the other no leſs deſirous to follow the good fortune of the Victor. Whereupon a mutiny ariſing among the Souldiers, Amyraſes, who favoured Tomombeius, was inforced to fly to Mecha. But ſhortly after, Ray Salomon requiring to have him, and threatning all hoſtility except he were forthwith delivered, he was apprehended by them of Mecha, fearing to have Gidda their Port ſpoiled, and ſo ſent back again to the Fleet. Ray Salomon, that he might be Admiral alone, his Aſſociate being taken out of the way, and by ſome notable fact to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of the Conqueror, cauſed Amyraſes in the night to be caſt over-board; and giving to the Souldiers two months pay, and ſwearing them to the obedience of Selymus, in few days ſailing came back again to Arſinoe, where leaving the Fleet, he came directly himſelf to Selymus at Caire, of whom he was graciouſly received. After that, all the Princes which were before Tributaries or Confederates to the late Sultans of Egypt, even to the Confines of David, the moſt mighty King of Ethiopia (whom ſome call Presbiter John) without delay entred into the like ſubjection or confederation with the Turks.

Egypt, with all the Provinces thereunto belonging, thus brought into ſubjection, Selymus about the beginning of July, ſailed down the River of Nilus to Alexandria (Cortug-Ogli, a famous Pyrat of Halicarnaſſus, ſitting at the helm of his Gally) there to take view of his Fleet but late come from Conſtantinople with new ſupplies both of Men and Victuals, ſent from Pyrrhus Baſſa and his Son Solyman; which after he had well ſurveyed, and diligently viewed the Walls of the City, and of the Caſtle of Pharos, he returned again to Caire. In the mean time, the Mamalukes in durance at Alexandria, were by his commandment murdered every Mothers Son, in the entrance of the Priſon. At which time alſo above five hundred Families of the nobleſt and richeſt of the Egyptians were commanded to remove from Caire to Conſtantinople, and a great number of Women and Children, of the race of the Mamalukes, were tranſported thither alſo in Ships hired for that purpoſe. Into this Fleet beſides the Kings Treaſure and Riches, he conveied all the publick and private Ornaments of that moſt rich and famous City; with ſuch a covetous and greedy deſire of Spoil, that the very Marble Stones, commended either for the excellency of the workmanſhip, or beauty of the Stone, were violently rent out of the main Walls, to his great reproach and infamy. Lying at Caire, he with great pleaſure beheld the riſing of the River

Of this Cortug-Ogli ſee more in the life of Solyman.

Nilus, which had then overflowed the Country next unto it; and that with ſuch a deſire, that he moſt curiouſly enquired of the old Country men the meaſure and nature to the River; for by the diverſity of the riſing thereof (which they by certain marks and meaſures well find out) they prognoſticate ſometime abundant plenty, ſometime extream dearth, and ſometime reaſonable ſtore, when as the violent River moderately or furiouſly breaking out, ſomewhile ſo drowneth the greateſt part of the Country, that all the Seed ſeaſon it lyeth under water, and at another time floweth ſo ſparingly, that in many places it ſcarce layeth the Duſt, thereby foreſhewing an undoubted dearth; ſo that the Egyptians then aſſure themſelves of Plenty, when as Nilus keeping a mean, pleaſantly riſeth neither to the higheſt or lowaſt marks of his inundation.

Cayerbeius the Traitor made Governor of Caire and Egypt.

The Mamaluke Kingdom, together with the name of the Mamalukes, thus overthrown, and the Conqueſt of Egypt ſo happily atchieved, Selymus reſolved to make his return into Syria; and the rather, for that it was reported, That Hyſmael the Perſian King was coming with his Army into Meſopotamia, and ſo like enough to break into Comagena. Wherefore having as he thought good, diſpoſed of all things, he left a ſtrong Garriſon of his beſt Souldiers in Caire, and appointed Cayerbeius that notable Traitor, his Deputy and great Commander over all that great and new gotten Kingdom of Egypt, now converted into the form of a Province, as it remaineth at this day. Which honourable preferment ſo unworthily beſtowed, exceedingly both grieved and troubled Jonuſes the great Baſſa, before enflamed with the hope and juſt deſire thereof; for now that Sinan Baſſa was dead, he puffed up with the eſtimation of his own worth and valour, and proud of the Wound he had of late received in the preſence of Selymus at the entring of Caire, and to the uttermoſt of his power, ſuffering no man to grow near him in Credit and Eſtimation; thought himſelf the only man now left, to whom of all others, that eſpecial and honourable charge ſhould in the judgment of Selymus and of the whole Army of right be committed. Neither wanted he the general good liking of the Men of War, for immediately after he was recovered of his wound, when he in the moſt magnificent Houſe of the Diadare at Caire (which he in the Victory had rather of himſelf uſurped, than by the gift of Selymus obtained) daily kept princely Cheer for all comers (no ſmall means to gain the love of the common Souldiers) and gave frankly to them all; to ſome Horſes, to ſome beautiful Slaves; to ſome Mony, Plate, Jewels, rich Garments, fair Armor, and ſuch like; he won unto himſelf ſuch Favour and Credit, that whenſoever he ſhould (as the manner was) go to the Caſtle unto the Emperor, he was brought thither with a great and goodly train of his Favorites and Followers, as the man in all mens Judgment deſigned to the government of that great and rich Kingdom. All which things highly offended the mind of Selymus, who as he was apt to ſuſpect, and cruel where he feared, ſo did he alſo (in ſecret) envy great Vertues, accompanied with too much honour and power.

Jonuſes ſeeing Cayerbeius the Traitor thus unworthily promoted, overcome with grief and indignation (who as a man of a proud and haughty mind, took it as done to his own diſgrace) yet colouring his inward diſcontentment by counterfeiting himſelf ſick, for certain days came not abroad; nevertheleſs ſtill more and more tormented both with the injury (as he took it) done to himſelf, and the unworthy preferment of the Traitor, he could not ſo well contain himſelf, but that in his choler ſome words fell from him, whereby his diſcontentment was perceived. It hapned that Cayerbeius coming of courteſie to viſit him, and in the heat of the day familiarly calling for drink (which was Water and Sugar, after the manner of the Egyptians) immediately after he had drunk, felt ſuch grievous and unwonted gripings and tormentings in his Stomach and Belly, that many ſuppoſed him to have been poyſoned by the Baſſa; yet was he by the power and vertue of a more ſovereign and effectual remedy preſerved. Which report, whether it were true or no, was uncertain; but certain it is, that it ſank further into the mind of Selymus, than any man would have thought. He had now alſo a little before heard, that many of thoſe rich Egyptian Families, which he had before commanded to be removed to Conſtantinople, had for great ſums of Mony obtained of Jonuſes, (who had the whole ordering of that matter) that they might quietly and in ſafety remain ſtill in their own Country. Of which his covert dealing, great probability was alledged by ſuch as repined at his honour, and ſecretly accuſed him, That thoſe Princelike and exceſſive charges and expences, which he was not able poſſibly to maintain of his ordinary Penſion were royally ſupported with the embeſeled Spoil and Revenues of that new gotten Kingdom. Which malicious ſuggeſtions, as they tended to the lightning of his Credit, ſo alſo another crime (whether it were of fraudulent dealing or negligence, or other further reſpect, is uncertain) coming in the neck of the other, wrought his utter diſgrace, and final confuſion; for Selymus after the manner of great Princes (who more ſeverely to puniſh the former offences, notably deſſembling their preſent anger, expect but the occaſion of ſome new crime) with vigilant Eye waiting upon his words and deeds, proſecuted him with a mortal and deadly hatred, with a full purpoſe to deſtroy him.

Selymus commanded the wages of his Souldiers to be left in Garriſon at Caire, to be augmented.

A few days before it was certainly reported that Selymus would again return into Syria, the Souldiers appointed to be left in Garriſon at Caire, alledging the great diſtance of the place, and the greater dangers they were to expect, with the labors by them already endured, requeſted of the Bounty of their moſt fortunate Emperor, that they might have their Wages augmented. Which thing Selymus (never ſpare handed to his Men of War) eaſily granted, commanding Jonuſes the ſtately Baſſa, that the ſum they required, might be added to their accuſtomed Wages, and ſo entred into his accounts for the Wars. But he carried headlong with diſcontentment, made neither the Treaſurers nor Paymaſters acquainted with any ſuch matter as Selymus had before commanded; of purpoſe, that the Garriſon Souldiers deceived of their greater Wages promiſed them by the Emperor, might even at the firſt begin to hate and contemn Cayerbeius, as Author of ſo great an injury; that ſo the ſtate of Caire, and of that new gotten Kingdom, diſquieted by the mutiny of the Garriſon Souldiers, Selymus inforced to change his former purpoſe, ſhould inſtead of that ſtrange Governor (hated of the Egyptians for his late Treaſon, and not beloved of the Garriſon Souldiers, becauſe he was to them a Stranger) of neceſſity ſend ſome of his own Baſſaes, a Turk, for the better ſtay and aſſurance of that wavering and mighty Province. But all theſe things (as commonly wicked purpoſes have their foul events) fell out in fine far otherwiſe then he had in his troubled mind before conceived. For Selymus being departed out of Egypt, and now on his way almoſt as far as Jeruſalem, the Garriſon Souldiers at Caire, the pay-day being now come, and receiving no more, but their old accuſtomed wages, moved with that evil dealing (as contrary to the Emperors promiſe and their general expectation) began with more fury and rage than ever Jonuſes had before imagined, openly and inſolently to inſult and threaten the Treaſurer and Paymaſters, and with open mouth to rail upon Cayerbeius their Governor. With which ſo inſolent and opprobrious Speeches he aſtonied (as one not yet acquainted with the faſhions of the Turkiſh Garriſons) together with the Paymaſters, in beſt manner they could excuſed themſelves unto the Souldiers, requeſting them not to think ſo hardly of them who were altogether innocent in the matter, and with patience to underſtand the truth of the cauſe; wherein if they ſhould on their part find any fraudulent or evil dealing, they craved no favour, either refuſed any puniſhment. Thus Cayerbeius and the Paymaſters ſeeking by all means to avoid both the ſuſpition and the preſent danger; and the mutinous Souldiers no leſs haſtning to find out by whom they were ſo abuſed, and to be thereof revenged, it was at laſt with much ado agreed, That truſty Meſſengers ſhould forthwith be ſent to Selymus, who was not yet gone out of Judea, to underſtand of him the truth of the matter.

Theſe ſpeedy Meſſengers having with wonderful celerity diſpatcht their journey, overtook Selymus with his Army a little from Lariſſa in Judea; and admitted to his preſence, orderly declared unto him both the complaints of the Souldiers, and the carefulneſs of Cayerbeius and the Paymaſters to excuſe the matter, together with the danger they were in, with all the other accidents whatſoever which had hapned ſince the time of his departure from Caire. Which complaint ſo incenſed the mind of Selymus with new paſſions of anger and choler, being already ſore alienated with former diſpleaſures, that he without further delay commanded Jonuſes Baſſa to be brought before him to anſwer the matter; who although he were inwardly ſtrucken with the guilt of his own conſcience, and ſurpriſed with a deadly fear, which appeared in his colour as pale as Aſhes, ſeeing in the angry face and countenance of his Sovereign the moſt certain tokens of his heavy diſpleaſure; yet as he was a man of great Spirit, anſwered boldly, That he had forbidden the Souldiers Wages to be augmented, contrary to his Majeſties command, not upon any evil meaning to have inverted that mony to his own uſe, neither thereby to have drawn any man of purpoſe into diſgrace, as was by ſome his malicious Enemies ſuggeſted; but upon great reaſon, thereby to provide for his Majeſties Cofers wonderfully emptied with thoſe late Wars; beſide that, the conſtant report of new troubles like to ariſe out of Perſia, gave good occaſion for him to ſpare unneceſſary charges: Whereas on the other ſide, as he ſaid, the Garriſon Souldiers were already inriched with the plentiful Spoils of Egypt, and in a moſt goodly City poſſeſſed the ſumptuous Houſes and Lands of the Mamalukes, feeding upon the Goods of the Egyptians, and had already received both greater Pay and more bountiful Rewards from him, than ever any Souldiers had from any his Predeceſſors the Othoman Kings; in which caſe, if they were not paſt all modeſty, they might well enough take it in good part, if they were ſomething reſtrained in their unreaſonable requeſts. He alledged moreover, that great Princes which retain their Souldiers in reaſonable Pay in time of Peace and War, ought ſometime for Warlike Diſcipline, to require of them a moderation of their deſires, leſt whilſt they all ſtrive with greedineſs for their private gain, there want Mony afterwards in the common Treaſury to maintain a greater and more neceſſary charge, Wars ſtill riſing upon Wars; ſeeing that no Commander, were he never ſo valiant or fortunate, ever did any great matter in Wars, if he wanted Coin, the moſt proper Inſtrument and very Sinews of War, anſwering unto his other moſt heroical parts and ſufficiency. But as he was yet thus ſpeaking, Selymus full of wrath and indignation interrupted him; for if he ſhould have ſuffered him in longer diſcourſe to have recounted his former deſerts and worthy ſervice done, aſwell in the time of his Father Bajazet, as of late even in his own preſence, he was like enough to have had of them that were able to do moſt with him, interceſſors for him; and ſo without further delay, cauſed him even there in his own preſence to be executed; ſaying moreover, that others which would arrogantly preſume to preſcribe unto their Sovereigns what they had to do, ſhould for ever after by the example of that moſt inſolent Servant, be admoniſhed of their duty and condition. It is reported, that the Souldiers in deſpight of Selymus wonderfully lamented the unworthy death of this ſo worthy a man; for he beſide his notable and rare valor, ſo many times to his great honour in ſundry Battels approved, had by the dexterity of his Grecian Wit, Comelineſs of Perſonage, Military Eloquence, and gallant manner of living, ſo won the love and favour of all men, that there was few or none in all the Army which did not acknowledg himſelf ſome way indebted and beholden unto him; and did therefore condemn the Emperors Cruelty. They then began to tell how Muſtapha ſirnamed Caloger, a man of wonderful Credit and Authority both with Bajazet and himſelf, was in the heat of his fury ſlain without hearing; and that in like manner of rage, old Chendemus a man of greateſt honour and integrity of life, and of all the Chieftains which came out of the great Emperor Mahomets Nuſery, the moſt skilful, had been for his grave and wholeſome Counſel only, without cauſe murthered; neither was then Boſtanges his Son in Law forgotten; neither Cherſeogles (the one moſt honourable for the great place he held in Court and the Marriage of Bajazets Daughter, and the other a man of no leſs mark being his great Admiral, and bearing himſelf high upon his infinite Wealth, but more upon his Wife one of the Daughters of Selymus) both which two Noble Gentlemen about two years before had their heads ſtruck off, no man well knowing wherefore; and their dead Bodies caſt out at the Court Gate, to the terror of the beholders, as a miſerable ſpectacle of their own miſery and the Emperors Cruelty. Yea the remembrance of his old tyranny (renewed as it were with this late outrage) preſented afreſh unto all mens eyes the reverend old Emperor Bajazet his Father, with his two Brethren, Achomates and Corcutus, by right both called unto the Empire before himſelf; with many other young Princes of the Blood, of great hope and expectation, who as all men knew, periſhed through the unnatural and execrable Cruelty of this moſt mercileſs man. So that men generally did both fear him and hate him. Foraſmuch as he without all fear of God or regard of worldly ſhame, accounted no practice wicked, or device deteſtable, that might ſerve for the better eſtabliſhing of his Kingdom; and had ſet down in his mind, (long before corrupted with Ambition and Tyranny) That it was far better for the aſſurance of his eſtate, to be feared of all than beloved of many; and therefore ſpared no mans life, of whom he had but the leaſt ſuſpition. Howbeit that the ſeverity by him uſed againſt this ſo great a man and ſo gracious with the People, may in ſome ſort be excuſed, as juſtly moved thereunto by the preſumptuous and malicious dealing of the proud Baſſa under-hand, contrary to the charge given him by his Lord, to the peril of thoſe his great but late Conqueſts both in Egypt and Syria.

This great Baſſa, whilſt he yet lived and flouriſhed in the Court, in nothing ſo much offended the minds of the People (who generally both loved and honoured him) as by the Cruelty by him ſhewed upon the perſon of the fair Lady Manto his beſt beloved Wife. Who being a Greek born, and adorned with all the good gifts of Nature, whereunto her lovely conditions were alſo anſwerable, was by Zebalia her firſt Husband (a man of great honour) carried with him into the Wars, as his greateſt Treaſure and chief delight. But he ſlain, and ſhe by misfortune falling into the hands of the Turks (her Enemies) remained ſo priſoner with them for a time; until that this great Baſſa Jonuſes ſhortly after (ſeeing her amongſt the other Captives there taken, ſo far to exceed the reſt as doth the Sun the leſſer Stars) ſurpriſed with her incomparable beauty, became of her amorous; and in too curious viewing of the captive Lady, was by her himſelf taken Priſoner. Where finding her outward perfections graced with no leſs inward vertues, and her honourable mind anſwerable unto her rare feature, took her unto his Wife; honouring her far above all the reſt of his Wives and Concubines; and ſhe again in all dutiful loyalty ſeeking to pleaſe him, for a ſpace lived in all worldly felicity and bliſs, not much inferior unto one of the great Sultaneſſes. But long laſteth not the Summer Fruit of wanton Love, blaſted moſt time in the bloſſom and rotten before it be well gathered; for in ſhort time the Baſſa more amorous of her Perſon, than ſecured in her Vertues, and after the manner of ſenſual men, ſtill fearing leſt that which ſo much pleaſed himſelf, gave no leſs contentment to others alſo; began to have her in diſtruſt, although he ſaw no great cauſe, why, more than his own conceit, not grounded upon her evil demeanor, but upon the exceſs of his own liking. Which mad humor (hardly to be over purged) of it ſelf ſtill more and more in him increaſing, he became ſo froward and imperious, that nothing ſhe could ſay or do could now ſo pleaſe or content him, but that he ſtill thought ſome one or other, although he wiſt not who, to be therein partakers with him. So fearful was the jealous man of his own conceits. Yet could he not chuſe but love thoſe great perfections; whereat he could not enough wonder; although he found no contentment therein, tormenting ſtill both himſelf and her whom he ſo dearly loved with his own paſſionate diſtruſt; until at length, the fair Lady grieved to ſee her ſelf thus without cauſe to be ſuſpected, and wearied with the inſolent pride of her peeviſh Husband, together with his imperious commands, determined ſecretly to depart from him, and ſo to return again into her own Country. Which her purpoſe ſhe diſcovered unto one of her Eunuchs, to whom ſhe had alſo delivered certain Letters to be by him conveied unto ſuch of her Friends, as whoſe help ſhe was to uſe in her intended flight; which Letters the falſe Eunuch opened, and for the more manifeſting of the matter delivered them unto the Baſſa his Maſter. Who therewith inraged, and calling her unto him, forthwith in his fury, with a Dagger ſtab'd her to the Heart and ſlew her; ſo together with the death of his Love, having cured his tormenting jealouſie.

But leaving this great Baſſa with fair Manto unto their reſt, his courſe thus run, to return again unto Selymus; who now come into Syria, was by Letters from the Himbracor-Baſſa or Maſter of his Horſe (whom he had left upon the Frontiers of his Kingdom to attend the motions of the Perſians) advertiſed, That the Perſian preparations which had raiſed ſuch a hot rumor of Wars in the beginning of Winter, was grown cold in the heat of Summer; and that he had ſeen in all the time of his abode in thoſe quarters, none but certain ſtragling Companies, making ſhew as if ſome greater power had been coming, which had many times made ſuddain roads into the Country, with whom he had ſundry times proſperouſly encountred; and it was generally reported by ſuch Priſoners as he had taken, and by his own Eſpials alſo, that Hyſmael, troubled with the Hyrcanians and Tartars, had converted the greateſt part of his Forces againſt thoſe Nations; ſo the Winter now drawing faſt on, and deep Snows already fallen upon the Mountain Taurus, he could not though he would that year look after Aſia the leſs, or Syria. There were that reported, that the Tartars which dwell between the two Rivers, Tanais and Volga, were by Selymus his procurement, and money, ſet at work to keep Hyſmael buſied, by invading the Iberians and Albanians, which were under his protection; which thing he wrought by the means of Mahomet his Father in Law, the Boſphoran King who being of the ſame Language and Nation, by rewards eaſily induced the needy Captains of the Tartars his Friends and Confederates, to take up Arms againſt their Neighbours.

Many men marvelled that Hyſmael the Perſian King neglected ſo fair an opportunity, whereby he might (as moſt men thought) have thruſt Selymus quite out of Aſia and Syria, whilſt he was thus buſied in Egypt, yea and eaſily have deſtroyed him, ſhut up with all his power, eſpecially at ſuch time as the Egyptian Sultans Campſon and Tomombeius made ſo great reſiſtance. But they which could better judge of the matter, ſaw that Hyſmael was not of ſo great Power and Strength abroad, as at home; for his Army for moſt part conſiſted of Gentlemen, or ſuch as were by cuſtom bound to ſerve him in his defenſive Wars, voluntary men, and ſuch as ſerved without Pay. Theſe as they were the moſt valiant Horſemen of the Eaſt, ſo did they with ſingular Valour worthily defend the Kingdom of Perſia, and alſo as occaſion required, make War with their near Neighbours; but if any longer expedition were to be taken in hand, that they could by no means away withal, accounting it a grievous thing to depart from their Wives, unto whom they are ſo addicted that oftentimes they carry them with them into the Wars; and being a wanton and fine kind of People, are not able without Wages to draw after them according to their accuſtomed manner, ſo many Carriages and Horſes as might ſerve both for their neceſſary and wanton uſes. With which difficulty, the great King Uſun-Caſſanes, Hyſmael his Grandfather by the Mothers ſide, was much troubled in his Wars againſt Mahomet the Great; but was now much harder for Hyſmael to do, for that he having obtained his Grandfathers Kingdom by the meer good Will of the People, eaſing them forthwith of their heavy impoſitions, always thought the love of his Subjects (which is eaſily gotten with Bounty and Juſtice) the ſureſt riches of his Kingdom; and that to command only over the Bodies and Goods of his People, their Hearts altogether alienated and loſt by moſt heavy and grievous exactions, ſeemed not the part of a gracious and natural Prince, but of an outragious and momentary Tyrant. Whereas Selymus on the contrary part, who had by force, miſchief miſchief, and moſt deteſtable practices ſtept up into his Fathers ſeat, had after the manner of the Othoman Kings repoſed his greateſt and moſt aſſured ſtrength in a ſervile and mercenary kind of men, whom he might for pay as his own Creatures, at his pleaſure draw far from home, and as he beſt liked lead them from place to place, and Country to Country, for the enlarging of his Empire, and eternizing of his Name; and therefore according to the quality of his People, deemed true and ready power to conſiſt only in mony, and the ſeverity of his own command; whereby he had learned with moſt happy ſucceſs, in ſhort time to obſcure all the Victories of the former Othoman Kings, with the greatneſs of his own.

1518. All the Winter following, Selymus ſtaied with his Army in Syria ſpending the time in viſiting the Ports and Cities of that Province, and ſetting of things in order, for the better aſſurance thereof. But upon the approach of the Spring, when he certainly underſtood, that by the procurement of Leo the Tenth, then Biſhop of Rome, the Chriſtian Princes were entred into conſultation to make War upon him, and that ſupplications with great ſolemnity were made for that purpoſe, and honourable Embaſſadors ſent into all Provinces to ſtir up the greateſt Kings of Chriſtendom againſt him, he (leaving Gazelles his Lieutenant in Syria) by great journies returned to Conſtantinople; from thence as at hand to behold the devices and motions of Chriſtian Princes his Enemies. In the mean time, fearing no alteration to ariſe in the Provinces of Syria and Egypt, foraſmuch as he well ſaw, that Cayerbeius and Gazelles his Lieutenants, being at deadly hatred betwixt themſelves (as well for old grudges, as for the late Treaſon of Cayerbeius, the great cauſe of the ruin of the Mamalukes Kingdom) would never agree in one againſt him, but rather with a certain emulation ſtrive betwixt themſelves with diligence, faithfulneſs, and moderation, who ſhould deſerve beſt in well governing the Provinces by him committed to their charge, as indeed they did during the ſhort time of his Reign.

1519. Selymus purpoſing to invade the Chriſtians, ſtruck in the Reins of his Back with a Cancer.

Selymus being arrived at Conſtantinople, and purpoſing from thenceforth to turn all his Forces upon the Chriſtians, cauſed wonderful preparation to be made for his Wars, but eſpecially at Sea; whereby it was thought, that he would have either attempted the ſtrong Iſland of the Rhodes (a great moat in his Eye) or elſe ſome part of Italy. But as he was hatching this miſchief, or ſome other of no leſs importance, and in the mean time delighted himſelf with viſiting the Cities of Grecia and Thrace, and ſolaced himſelf in the pleaſant Country about Hadrianople, he was ſuddainly attached with the Hand of God, and ſtrucken in the Reins of his Back with a Cancer; which melancholy and devouring malady contemning all cure, did by little and little ſo eat and corrupt his body, as that he before ſo much honoured, became now loathſome and odious both to himſelf and others.

As he lay thus languiſhing, his incurable diſeaſe ſtill increaſing, leaning his head in the lap of Pyrrhus the Baſſa, whom of all others he moſt loved, ſaid, O Pyrrhus, I ſee I muſt ſhortly die without remedy. Whereupon the great Baſſa took occaſion to diſcourſe with him of many matters; and amongſt others, that it would pleaſe him to give order for the well beſtowing of the great Wealth taken from the Perſian Merchants in divers places of his Empire; perſwading him to beſtow the ſame upon ſome notable Hoſpital for relief of the poor. To whom Selymus replied, Wouldſt thou Pyrrhus, that I ſhould beſtow other mens goods wrongfully taken from them, upon works of Charity and Devotion, for mine own vain glory and praiſe? aſſuredly I will never do it; nay, rather ſee they be again reſtored unto the right owners. Which was forthwith done accordingly; to the great ſhame of many Chriſtians, who minding nothing leſs than reſtitution, but making ex rapina holocauſtum, do out of a World of evil gotten goods cull out ſome ſmall fragments, to build ſome poor Hoſpital, or mend ſome blind way; a poor teſtimony of their hot Charity.

Selymus lying thus ſick to death, and rotting above the ground in his Tent, as he was upon the way going to Hadrianople, ſent before Pyrrhus and Achmetes, two of his greateſt Baſſaes, to provide for the ſolemnizing of the great Feaſt, which the Turks call Bairam (and is as it were their Eaſter) purpoſing to come after himſelf at leiſure, as his weak Body would give him leave; and kept with him only Ferbates, the third of his greateſt Baſſaes and Privy Counſellors. But ſuch was the fury of his foul diſeaſe, continually attainting him with intollerable pains, that ſhortly after the departure of the other two Baſſaes, he breathed out his cruel Ghoſt, in the Month of September, in the year 1520, near unto the City Chiurli, in the ſelf ſame place where he had ſometime moſt unnaturally aſſailed his aged Father Bajazet, with purpoſe to have ſlain him, had not the fortune of the old Emperor in a great battel prevailed both againſt his Force and the Treaſon of his own People. Thus intending the miſchief he could not perform, cut off by a loathſome and untimely death, he to the great joy of all Chriſtendom ended his days, when he had lived ſix and forty years, and thereof reigned eight; which time of his Reign was nothing elſe but a moſt horrible and dreadful time of Bloodſhed. His dead Body was afterwards ſolemnly by his Son Solyman buried in a new Temple at Conſtantinople, which he to the imitation of his Father and Grandfather, had for that purpoſe before built. Upon his Tomb is ingraven in the Greek, Turkiſh, and Sclavonian Tongues, this ſhort Epitaph: 1520.

The death of Selymus.

The juſt judgment of God.

Hic maximus adſum Selymus, qui orbem domui.
Non bella relinquo, ſed pergo inquirere:
Non ulla me fortuna potuit evertere:
Licet oſſa jacent, animus quærit.

Phi. Lonicerus Turcicæ Hiſtoriæ, Tomo primo. lib. primo.

In Engliſh thus:

Lo here I lie great Selymus, which held the World in fear;
The World I leave, but not the Wars, which I ſeek, though not here.
No Fortunes force, or Victors hand, could take from me the Spoils:
And though my Bones lie buried here, my Ghoſt ſeeks bloody broils.

He uſed commonly to ſay, That nothing was ſweeter than to reign without fear or ſuſpition of his Kindred. A little before his death, he commended his Son Solyman to Pyrrhus Baſſa, ſtraitly charging him, that after his death he ſhould leave the Perſians, and turn his Forces altogether upon the Chriſtians. And the more to incenſe him to the effuſion of Blood, he left him the lively counterfeit of himſelf hanging at his bed ſide, with ſundry bloody Precepts breathing forth his cruel and unmerciful diſpoſition.

The Inſcription of the Table.

Sultan Selymus Othoman King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Prince of all Princes, the Son and Nephew of God.

On the right hand of the Table were written Greek Verſes to this ſence.

THe Prince that ſafely ſeeks to reign, and hold his State in quiet reſt, Muſt never ſuffer troubled care to harbour in his Princely Breaſt.
Nor think it ſin to ſpill the blood of his moſt near and deareſt Kin,
Not of his Brother, ſo thereby aſſured ſafety he may win.
Law, Faith, Devotion, and ſuch like, to break them all he muſt not ſpare, Nor conſcience make of any thing, to rid him from aſpiring care.
This is the way and only mean that may protect a Princes State,
And ſet him ſafe without all fear, whilſt none may live whom he doth hate.

The bloody and tyrannical Precepts left by Selymus to his Son Solyman, which he afterward moſt aſſuredly kept as is to be ſeen in his life following.

On the left hand of the Table was written in the Sclavonian Tongue.

Of him that ſeeks to work thy wo, deſeve not to be counted kind:
But take him for thy mortal Foe, and plague him with revenging mind.
The rotten limb is cut away for fear of doing further harm:
The gentle Prince doth bear ſmall ſway, if no abuſe can make him warn.
Forbearance makes men more offend, and to preſume of further grace,
It doth but ſtrength to Rebels lend, to thruſt their Sovereign out of place.

At the lower end of the ſame Table was written in Turkiſh Verſe.

What Prince in perſon dareth not in open Field to meet his Foe,
And there with unapplauded heart, his deadly darts himſelf to throw:
But hides his head for fear of harm, and ſhuns the danger of the Field,
When Martial minds with courage bold withſtand their Foes with ſpear and ſhield;
Let him well know, how that in vain he beareth Arms but for a ſhew,
And that the honour of the Field will never ſuch a Coward know.
Ne let him hope to gain the Spoil by any Wars he takes in hand,
That feareth with couragious mind his Enemies Forces to withſtand.

The LIFE of

THE

FOURTH and moſt MAGNIFICENT

Emperor of the Turks.

THE death of Selymus was with all carefulneſs concealed by Ferhates the only Baſſa then preſent, for fear leſt the Janizaries and Souldiers of the Court getting knowledge thereof, ſhould after their wonted manner in the time of the vacancy of the Empire, ſpoil the Merchants and Strangers in places where they lay in Garriſon, and eſpecially in the Imperial City; and not ſo contented, after their accuſtomed inſolency preſcribe unto the greateſt Baſſaes at their pleaſure. For preventing whereof, Ferhates diſpatched a truſty Meſſenger with Letters in Poſt to Solyman the only Son of Selymus, then lying at Magneſia; certifying him of the death of his Father; and that he ſhould deſerve well of his peaceable Subjects by haſtning his coming to Conſtantinople, whilſt all things were yet in good order, in time to repreſs with his preſence the feared diſordered proceedings of his Men of War.

Solyman hardly perſwaded that his Father was dead.

Solyman having to his great content peruſed the Baſſaes Letters, as one deſirous enough of the Empire; yet conſidering the cruel diſpoſition of his Father (who upon a meer jealous conceit of his aſpiring mind, and for certain words by him let fall in diſlike of his Fathers extream dealing, had practiſed moſt unnaturally to have taken him away by Poiſon; which danger he eſcaped only by the carefulneſs of his Mother, who miſdoubting the worſt, cauſed the Poiſoned rich Shirt ſent to him from his Father, to be firſt worn by one of his Chamber, whereof he in ſhort time after died) and alſo that the Letters were ſigned only by Ferhates, and the news not ſeconded from any of the other Baſſaes; fearing ſome hidden and ſecret Plot of his Father tending to his deſtruction, durſt not adventure to remove from his charge, but returned the Meſſenger as one to whom he gave little or no credit. Ten days thus ſpent, and the death of Selymus nothing as yet ſuſpected; Ferhates underſtanding by his Meſſenger the wearineſs of Solyman, and that he expected more aſſured advertiſement, ſent preſently unto the other great Baſſaes Pyrrhus and Muſtapha at Hadrianople, that they ſhould without delay repair unto the Court; unto whom at their coming he declared the death of the Emperor. Which after they had ſeen to be true, they by another ſecret and ſpeedy Meſſenger advertiſed Solyman again thereof, confirming thoſe Letters with all their Hands and Seals; whereby Solyman now aſſured of his Fathers death, preſently put himſelf upon the way, and by long and painful journies in few days came to Scutarium, called in ancient time Chriſopolis, over againſt Conſtantinople. Where he was met with the Aga or Captain of the Janizaries, and by him tranſported in a Gally over that ſtrait paſſage to Conſtantinople; where at his landing the Janizaries by the appointment of their Captain were ready to receive him, knowing as yet nothing of the death of Selymus, until that Solyman being now in the midſt of them, the Captain with a loud voice ſaid unto them, Behold your Emperor. Whereupon they all with great acclamation cried out, Long live the great Emperor Solyman; which conſent of the Men of War, is unto the Turkiſh Emperors the greateſt aſſurance of their Eſtate. And ſo with much Triumph he was by them brought into the Roial Palace, and placed in his Fathers Seat in the year 1520. in which year alſo Charles the Fifth was choſen Emperor of Germany. The Janizaries diſappointed by the Baſſaes of the ſpoil of the Merchants, eſpecially Chriſtians and Jews, received of the bounty of Solyman a great Largeſs, and in the beginning of his Reign had their accuſtomed Wages ſomewhat augmented alſo, to their wonderful contentment.

Solyman was about twenty eight years old when he began to Reign, and was at the firſt ſuppoſed to have been of a mild and peaceable diſpoſition; ſo that the Princes to whom the Name of Selymus was before dreadful, were now in hope that a quiet Lamb was come in place of a raging Lion. But in ſhort time they found themſelves in their expectation far deceived; and eſpecially the Chriſtian Princes bordering upon him, unto whom he became a far more dangerous Enemy than was his Father before him; converting his Forces moſt part of his long Reign upon them, which Selymus had almoſt altogether imployed againſt the Kings of Perſia, and Egypt, the greateſt Princes of the Mahometan Superſtition.

The

Gazelles Governor of Syria rebelleth againſt Solyman.

Gazelles ſlain.

The firſt that felt his heavy Hand was Gazelles Governour of Syria; who preſently upon the death of Selymus, thinking himſelf now diſcharged of the Oath of Obedience which he had given to Selymus, but not to his Succeſſors; and earneſtly deſiring to reſtore again the Kingdom of the Mamalukes lately overthrown, gathered together the remainder of the diſperſed Mamalukes, which ſpeedily reſorted unto him out of all parts of Aſia and Africk; and alluring with rewards the Leaders of the wild Arabians, with great numbers of the Country People of Syria, diſcontented with the Turkiſh Government, entred into open Rebellion, and by force of Arms drave the Turks Garriſon out of Byrtha, Trypolis, and divers others Cities of Syria, taking them into his own poſſeſſion. And the better to effect that he had taken in hand, he ſent Embaſſadors to Caire unto Cayerbeius, who had of Selymus received the Government of Egypt, the unworthy reward of his horrible Treaſon; perſwading him by any means to take revenge of the injury and wrong before done to the Mamalukes, and by killing of the Turks Garriſons to make himſelf Sultan of Egypt, and reſtore again the Kingdom of the Mamalukes, offering him therein the uttermoſt of his devoir and ſervice. But Cayerbeius, either not truſting Gazelles his old Enemy, or aſhamed by new Treaſon to augment his former diſhonor, or elſe (which was moſt like) miſdoubting his own ſtrength in performance of ſo great an enterpriſe; after he had attentively heard what the Embaſſadors had to ſay, cauſed them preſently in his own ſight to be put to death as Traitors, and with all ſpeed certified Solyman thereof, who without delay ſent Ferhates Baſſa with a ſtrong Army into Syria. Which thing Gazelles hearing, and having in his power moſt of the Cities of Syria, retired himſelf, with all his Army into the ſtrong City of Damaſco; whither at length, Ferhates the great Baſſa by long march came alſo. Gazelles reſolved to try the fortune of the Field, and ſo either by ſpeedy Victory or honourable Death to end the matter, rather than to ſuffer himſelf to be ſhut up within the Walls of the City, upon the coming of the Baſſa, valiantly iſſued forth with all his power, and gave him Battel; which for the ſpace of ſix hours was moſt cruelly fought, and many ſlain on both ſides. At length Gazelles being oppreſſed with the multitude of his Enemies (being eight times more in number) and hardly aſſailed on either ſide, was enforced to fight in a Ring, and there performing all the parts of a worthy General and valiant Souldier, honourably died together with his Mamalukes in the midſt of his Enemies, leaving unto them a bloody Victory. Gazelles thus ſlain, the City of Damaſco with all the Country of Syria without any more ado yielded again unto the Turks obedience, which the Baſſa took in ſo good part, that he would not ſuffer his Souldiers to enter into the City, then richly ſtored with Commodities of all ſorts, brought thither by Merchants out of divers parts of the World.

Syria thus pacified, the Baſſa went to Caire in Egypt, and there commending Cayerbeius for his fidelity, confirmed him in his Government; and inveying againſt the cruelty of Selymus (ſo to pleaſe the Egyptians) wiſhed them to hope for all happineſs under the peaceable Government of the new Sultan Solyman. And ſo when he had ſet all things in order in both the Provinces of Syria and Egypt, returned again to Solyman.

Belgrade won by Solyman.

The year following, Solyman by the Counſel of Pyrrhus Baſſa his old Tutor (a mortal Enemy unto the Chriſtians) and by the perſwaſion of the Janizaries reſolved to beſiege the ſtrong City of Belgrade, otherwiſe called Taurunum, ſituate upon the borders of Hungary, where the River Savus falleth into Danubius. Which City his great Grandfather Mahomet (ſurnamed the Great, and before him the warlike Amurat) had with all their power, long time before to their great loſs and diſhonour, vainly attempted. Wherein until that time were reſerved the Enſigns, then taken from the Turks, to their no ſmall grief, with other trophies of the glorious Victories of the worthy Captain Huniades, and the great King Matthias Corvinus his Son. Wherefore Solyman ſending his Army before, was come as far as Sophia, a City in Servia (the place where the Turks great Lieutenant in Europe is always reſiant) before that the Hungarians were aware of his coming; for they living at eaſe all the time that Uladiſlaus Reigned, and now ſleeping in ſecurity under the young King Lodovicus his Son, a Man of no experience; who contenting himſelf with the Title of a King, ſuffered himſelf to be pilled and polled by his Nobility and great Clergy-Men (inverting all the wealth of the Land to their own private gain) that he was not able to raiſe any ſufficient power to go againſt his puiſſant Enemy; eſpecially his Nobility, in whoſe hands reſted the wealth of his Kingdom, promiſing him much, but performing indeed nothing. Huniades with his hardy Souldiers, the ſcourge and terror of the Turks, were dead long before; ſo was alſo Matthias that fortunate Warrior; after whom ſucceeded others given to all pleaſure and eaſe; to whoſe example the People faſhioning themſelves, forgot their wonted Valour, and gave themſelves over to ſenſuality and voluptuous Pleaſure; ſo that Solyman without let, preſented his Army before the City of Belgrade, and with battery and undermining in ſhort time became Lord thereof, having loſt few of his People in that Siege. How much the loſs of that ſtrong City concerned the Chriſtian Common-wealth, the manifold and lamentable miſeries which afterwards inſued by the opening of that Gap, not unto the Kingdom of Hungary only, but to all that ſide of Chriſtendom, did, and yet doth, moſt manifeſtly declare. It was won by the Turks the nine and twentieth day of Auguſt in the year 1521.

After the taking of the ſtrong City of Belgrade, Solyman returning to Conſtantinople, brake up his Army and there lay ſtill almoſt all the year following. During which time, he cauſed great preparation to be made at Calipolis and other his Ports, for rigging up of a great Fleet; which cauſed the Italians, Venetians, and them of the Rhodes, to look about them, as Men careful of their Eſtates, fearing that thoſe Forces would ere long be imployed againſt ſome or all of them.

Philippus Villerius choſen great Maſter of the Rhodes.

About the ſame time Philippus Villerius a Man of great wiſdom and courage, then following the French Court, was in his abſence by the Knights of the Rhodes choſen great Maſter of that honourable Company; who embarking himſelf at Marcelles, after a long and dangerous journey (being not without the knowledge of Solyman hardly laied for at Sea by Cortug-Ogli a famous Pyrat of the Turks, whoſe two Brethren the Knights of the Rhodes had but a little before ſurpriſed at Sea and ſlain, and then held the third in Priſon) arrived in ſafety at the Rhodes, where he was with great joy and triumph received.

The great Baſſa, by whoſe grave advice Solyman was contented in all his weighty Affairs to be directed, conſulting with the other Baſſaes, of divers great exploits which was firſt to be taken in hand, for the honour of their Emperor and inlarging of his Empire, were of divers opinions concerning the beſieging of the Rhodes. Pyrrhus the Baſſa of greateſt account, diſſwaded the taking in hand of that Action, as too full of difficulty and danger; producing for proof thereof the example of the great Emperor Mahomet, Solymans great Grandfather; by whom it was unfortunately attempted, and in fine ſhamefully abandoned. But Muſtapha next in place and reputation to Pyrrhus, extolling the power and fortune of Solyman, ſaid, That the greatneſs of their Emperor was not to be concluded within the attempts of his predeceſſors as well appeared by the late taking of Belgrade; from whence firſt Amurath, and after him, Mahomet, two of the moſt warlike Princes of the Turks, had with great diſhonour been repulſed; and ſhould no doubt with like good fortune prevail againſt the Rhodes alſo, being able (if need were) to bring more Men before it than were ſtones in the Walls thereof. Which he ſo confidently affirmed, with extenuating the power of the Rhodians, that he ſeemed to make no doubt of the good ſucceſs of that War; preſumptuouſly affirming, that upon the firſt landing of Solymans great Army, they of the Rhodes would without delay yield themſelves and their City into his hands.

Amongſt others of great experience, whoſe opinion Solyman was deſirous to have, before he would take ſo great a matter in hand, was the famous Pirat Cortug-Ogli, a Man of a miſchievous and cruel Nature, but of great experience in Sea matters. Who preſented to Solyman by Muſtapha and Ferhates, two of the greateſt Baſſaes, going before him, after due reverence done, and commanded to deliver his opinion, ſpake unto Solyman, as followeth:

Cortug-Ogly the Pyrat perſwadeth Solyman to beſiege the Rhodes

The greatneſs of your deſerts (moſt mighty and puiſſant Emperor) maketh me (being by you ſo commanded) at this time frankly to ſpeak what I think may be for the glory and honour both of your Majeſty and Empire. I daily hear the pitiful lamentation of the miſerable People of Mitylene, Eubœa, Peloponeſus, Achaia, Caria, Lycia, and all alongſt the Sea Coaſt of Syria and Egypt, bewailing the ſpoil of their Countries, the ranſacking of their Cities, the taking away of their Cattel and People, with other infinite and incredible Calamities, which they daily ſuffer of the croſſed Rhodian Pyrats, no Man withſtanding them: Many a time have theſe wretched People holden up their Hands to me for help, moſt inſtantly requeſting me to be a mean for them to your Imperial Majeſty, whereby they might be protected from the injury, rapine, and ſlaughter of theſe cruel Rovers. Wherefore in their behalf I beſeech your ſacred Majeſty, by the moſt reverend Name of the holy Prophet Mahomet, and by your own moſt heroical Diſpoſition, to deliver your afflicted Subjects from theſe their moſt cruel Enemies, and at length to ſet them free from the fury, captivity, and fear, of theſe Pyrats, more grievous unto them than death it ſelf; and conſider with your ſelf, that this injury and inſolency tendeth not ſo much to the hurt of your poor Subjects, and oppreſſed People in private, as to the diſhonour and diſgrace of your Imperial Name and Dignity; which if any other Chriſtian King or Prince ſhould offer, your Majeſty I know would not ſuffer unrevenged; And will you then ſuffer theſe Robbers, Cut-throats, baſe People gathered out of all the Corners of Chriſtendom, to waſt your Countries, ſpoil your Cities, murther your People, and trouble all your Seas? For who can paſs by Sea to Tripolis, Damaſco, Alexandria, Caire, Chalcide, Lesbos, Chios, nay unto this your Imperial City of Conſtantinople, without moſt certain and manifeſt danger of theſe Rovers? What have we heard every Spring this many years, but that the Rhodians had taken ſome one or other of your Ports, led away your People into moſt miſerable Captivity, and carried away with them the rich ſpoils of your Countries? And that which is of all other things moſt diſhonourable, this they do under your noſe, and in your ſight, in the midſt and heart of your Empire. Pardon me I beſeech you moſt Mighty Emperor, if I too plainly ſpeak what I think; For whatſoever I ſay, I ſay it to no other end, but that you ſhould now at length do that which ſhould many years ago have been done. We your moſt Loyal Subjects may not, nor ought not for the increaſe of our Mahometan Religion, and for the enlarging of your Empire and Honour, to refuſe to adventure our Goods, our Bodies, our Lives, to all hazard and danger without exception. If you likewiſe be carried with love of Glory and Renown, or raviſhed with the deſire of never dying Fame; in what Wars can you more eaſily gain the ſame, or better imploy us your Servants, than in vanquiſhing and ſubduing the Rhodes, the reputed Bulwark of Chriſtendom, which only keepeth us from their Countries? But ſome will perhaps ſay, your Anceſtors have in former times unfortunately attempted that City; ſo did they alſo Belgrade in Hungary; yet hath your happy Fortune to your immortal Fame, brought the ſame under your ſubjection, being far more ſtrongly fortified than it was in times paſt; and do you then deſpair of the Rhodes? Caſt off ſuch vain and needleſs miſdoubt. The Turkiſh Empire hath always grown by adventures and honourable attempts: Therefore make haſt to beſiege it both by Sea and Land. If your Subjects mourning under the heavy burthen of the Chriſtian Captivity, built it with their own Hands for the Chriſtians; cannot they now at liberty, deſirous of revenge, and fitted with opportunity, with like hands deſtroy the ſame? If it pleaſe you to vouchſafe but to look into the matter (moſt dread Sovereign) you ſhall ſee that there is a divine occaſion by the procurement of our great Prophet Mahomet, preſented unto your moſt Sacred Majeſty, now that the Chriſtians of the Weſt are at diſcord and mortal War amongſt themſelves. Your Majeſty is not ignorant, that in mannaging of Wars, the opportunity of the time is eſpecially to be followed, and that when occaſion ſerveth, all remiſneſs and delay is to be carefully avoided; the changes of times are moſt fickle, and if you ſuffer your good hap now to paſs over, you ſhall perhaps in vain afterwards purſue the ſame when it is fled and gone.

Solyman by Nature an ambitious young Prince, prickt forward thus alſo by the perſwaſions of Cortug-Ogli and others, ſeeking their further credit and preferment by fitting his ambitious humor; but moſt of all by the inſtigation of the Baſſa Muſtapha, reſolved to go in perſon himſelf againſt the Rhodes. And firſt to make ſome proof of what ſpirit and courage Villerius the new choſen Great Maſter was of, in whoſe ſufficiency the greateſt part of the defence of the City was ſuppoſed to conſiſt; to him by way of a little cold Friendſhip, he ſent a Meſſenger with this ſhort Letter thus directed:

Solyman by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, greateſt Emperor of Conſtantinople and Trapezond, moſt Mighty King of Perſia, Arabia, Syria, and Egypt; Lord of Aſia and Europe; Prince of Mecha and Aleppo; Ruler of Jeruſalem; and Maſter of the Univerſal Sea; To the reverend Father, Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, and Legate of Aſia Greeting.

Solymans Letter to Villerius Great Maſter of the Rhodes.

I am glad of thy Kingdom and new promotion, which I wiſh thou mayeſt long and happily enjoy, for that I hope thou wilt in Honour and Fidelity exceed all them which before thee Ruled in the Rhodes; from whom as my Anceſtors have withdrawn their hand, ſo I after their example joyn with thee in amity and friendſhip. Joy thou therefore, my Friend, and in my behalf rejoyce of my Victory and Triumph alſo; for this laſt Summer paſſing over Danubius with Enſigns diſplayed, I there expected the Hungarian King, who I thought would have given me Battel; I took from him by ſtrong hand Belgrade, the ſtrongeſt City of his Kingdom, with other ſtrong holds thereabouts; and having with Fire and Sword deſtroyed much People, and carried away many more into Captivity as a triumphant Conqueror, breaking up mine Army, am returned to my Imperial City of Conſtantinople, from whence Farewel.

The Great Maſter having read theſe Letters, and well conſidered of the ſame, perceived forthwith Solymans meaning; and that Peace was offered him in words and ſhew, but War in deed and meaning. Which becauſe he was ready by force to repulſe, he rewarded the Turks Meſſenger, and ſent back with him another of his own, a private Perſon. For the Rhodians did ſeldom vouchſafe to ſend any honourable Embaſſadors to the Turkiſh Emperors (with whom they for moſt part lived in Hoſtility) either the Turks to them. By this Meſſenger he anſwered Solymans Letters with other of like vain, as followeth:

Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, to the Turk.

The anſwer of Villerius to Solymans Letter.

I right well underſtand your Letters, which your Meſſenger brought unto me. The friendſhip you write of is as pleaſing to me as diſpleaſing to Cortug-Ogli your Servant, who went about to have intercepted me upon the ſuddain, as I came out of France; but failing of his purpoſe, ſtealing by night into the Rhodian Sea, he attempted to have robbed certain Merchants Ships bound from Joppa to Venice; but ſending my Fleet out of my Haven, I ſtaied his fury, conſtrained the Pyrat to flie, and for haſt to leave behind him the Prizes he had before taken from the Merchants of Crete. Farewel, from the Rhodes.

By this anſwer Solyman perceived, that he was well met withal in his own fineneſs, and that he ſhould not ſo eaſily carry the Rhodes, as he had before done Belgrade. Yet being fully in himſelf reſolved to try his Fortune therein, he called unto him certain of the chief Commanders of his Wars, to whom he opened his whole determination in this ſort:

Solymans Oration to his Men of War, declaring his purpoſe of beſieging the Rhodes

Although I doubt not, worthy Chieftains, but that you are of the ſame mind now that you have been always of in the invading of other Nations; yet I have thought it good in matters tending to the common Glory, and good of us all, to uſe your general advice and counſel. Since the time that my Father left this World, we have made War with divers Nations and People. The Syrians by nature unconſtant, and prone to Rebellion, we have by force reduced to their former Obedience. The Sophi, that mighty King, Nephew unto the great King Uſan-Caſſanes, by his Daughter the Siſter of King Jacup, in heart and deed our mortal Enemy, not contented with the Kingdoms of Aſſyria, Media, Armenia, the greater, Perſia and Meſopotamia, we have with our Forces ſhut up within the compaſs of his own Dominions. The laſt year running through Hungary, both on this ſide and beyond Danubius we took Belgrade the ſtrongeſt Fortreſs in that Kingdom. And whatſoever elſe we attempted, we ſubdued. Yet for all that (to ſpeak plainly of my ſelf) my mind greater in conceit than my Empire, and the Blood of Othoman, findeth no contentment in theſe Victories. For whatſoever you have yet done, although it be great, yet I deem it all but little, in regard of your worth; my deſire carrieth me further. This have I always above all things moſt earneſtly deſired, to ſet upon the Rhodes, and utterly to root out all the ſtrength and forces, yea the very name of thoſe Rhodian Souldiers. And have not you alſo no leſs than my ſelf deſired the ſame? How often have I heard you crying out, The Rhodes, The Rhodes? I have expected the time that being diſcharged of other Wars, I might here imploy my whole ſtrength and power. That we ſo long deſired, is now come; there was never greater opportunity of good ſucceſs offered, a great part of the Walls of the City of the Rhodes now lying even with the ground; which cannot in ſhort time be repaired, eſpecially in their want of Coyn. Beſide this, the Garriſon in the Caſtle is but ſmall, and their aid from France far off, which will either come too late when the City is loſt, or that which I rather believe, never. For neither will the French King (being at mortal Wars with the German Emperor, and Lords of Italy) ſuffer his Store-houſes to be disfurniſhed, or his Ports bared of the neceſſary defence of his Shipping. Neither do you believe that the Spaniards (diſtreſſed at home with Famine, War, and civil Diſſention) will eaſily come hither out of Scilicia and Campania with ſupplies of Men and Victual. But you may perhaps think that great danger is to be feared from the Venetian Fleet, and the Iſle of Crete, which I aſſure you is not ſo; for I know (although I will not now manifeſt the ſame) how I have prevented that miſchief. Wherefore couragious Souldiers (born to the ſubduing of all Chriſtendom, much more of the Rhodes) with chearful hearts follow me your Sovereign againſt theſe your moſt perfideous and cruel Enemies. How long I pray you will you ſuffer that ſtain and diſgrace to ſtick upon the Othoman Family, and generally upon all the Name of the Turks, which theſe Rhodians caſt upon us the laſt time they were beſieged? Which was not ſo much done by their Valour, as by the unfortunate counſel of my great Grandfather Mahomet, calling home Meſithes Palæologus his General in that War, for one unlucky Aſſault. But admit that their Valour gained them Victory, will you therefore always ſuffer theſe pyratical excurſions upon our Main and Iſlands? The ranſacking of Cities and Countries? The carrying away of your Cattel and richeſt Subſtance? The captivity and ſlaughter of your Wives and Children? The ſlavery of your neareſt Friends and Kinſmen? So help me great Mahomet it ſhall not ſo be; I Vow in deſpight of Chriſt and John, in ſhort time to ſet up mine Enſigns with the Moon in the middle of the Market place of Rhodes. Neither do I ſeek any thing un- to my ſelf, more than the honour of the enterpriſe; the profit I give unto you my fellow Souldiers, their Coyn, Plate, Jewels, (which is reported to be great) their Riches and Wealth is all yours, to carry home with you unto your Wives and Children. Wherefore let us now with all our forces and courage ſet forward to the beſieging of the Rhodes.

Solymans purpoſe thus made known, and the ſame with one accord of all his Captains well liked; Pyrrhus the eldeſt Baſſa and of greateſt authority, who at the firſt diſſwaded the War, ſtanding up in the midſt of the reſt, ſaid:

I cannot but much admire the great Wiſdom and rare Vertues of our young Emperor, who ſo wiſely and adviſedly hath declared all the deep Counſels of a worthy Chieftain in taking of War in hand. Bleſſed be Mahomet, thrice and four times Bleſſed is this Empire, Bleſſed is our Eſtate, and Bleſſed are we with ſuch a Prince, which carrieth with him in his Wars, not only Men and Habiliments of War, but moſt deep wiſdom and policy. Which wholeſome manner of proceeding, if we had always before our eyes, and would follow, we ſhould in ſhort time bring under our ſubjection not the Rhodes only, but all the Kingdoms of the Chriſtians. Yet beſide that which our Emperor hath moſt carefully and conſiderately deviſed, mine age and experience would exhort you, by Gifts, Promiſes, Rewards, and all other means whatſoever, to corrupt, if it were poſſible, the very chief and principal Citizens of the Rhodes, thereby to enter into their moſt ſecret devices and counſels; which how it may be wrought, I will in few words give you to underſtand. I as a Man indifferent, deſirous of peace and quietneſs, will by Meſſengers, and Letters induce the Great Maſter to ſend ſome honourable Embaſſage to our dread Sovereign, which if I can once bring him unto, then let me alone with the reſt.

lyman keth eparati- againſt Rhodes

This counſel of the old Fox pleaſed all the hearers well, but above others the Emperor himſelf, who gave him in charge with all diligence and ſpeed, to prove what he could do; the other Captains he commanded to prepare the greateſt Forces they could, both for Land and Sea ſervice. Which preparation was ſo great both at Conſtantinople and others places, that it could not long be kept ſo ſecret, but that news thereof was brought to the Rhodes the fourth day of February; which news daily increaſing and ſtill confirmed by more certain reports, Villerius the Great Maſter for more certain intelligence, ſent a Chriſtian of Epidarius, who could perfectly ſpeak the Turkiſh Language, as a Spy to Conſtantinople; who by ſecret Letters from thence gave him knowledge that the Turks were preparing a great Fleet, and raiſing a mighty Army, advertiſing him alſo of a wonderful proportion of Artillery prepared for Battery; but againſt whom was not commonly known, ſome deeming it to be for the Invaſion of Italy, ſome for the Rhodes, others ſuppoſing it to be for Cyprus or Corcira; which diverſity of conjectures, made many (whoſe conceits averted from themſelves the fortune of that War) to be more careleſs and ſecure. But whilſt every Man was of Opinion, that it was made againſt any Man rather than himſelf; certain advertiſement was given to the Rhodians from divers places by Letters from their friends and confederates, That the Turks did with extraordinary diligence keep ſtrait Watch and Ward in all their Ports thereabouts along the Sea Coaſt, otherwiſe than they were before accuſtomed; which ſeemed to Prognoſticate ſome farther matter than the defence of their Frontiers. Villerius careful of his charge, as the Mark whereat the Enemy aimed, provided with all poſſible diligence great ſtore of Victual, Armor, Weapons, Shot, Pouder, and whatſoever elſe neceſſary for the defence of the City.

Villerius prepareth to make reſiſtance againſt the Turks.

The new Walls of the City, and Avergne Fortreſs, by Baſilius Engineer to the Emperor Charles the Fifth (a work begun in the time of Fabritius Caractus the late Grand Maſter, but not yet finiſhed) was now with all diligent labour ſet upon, every Man putting his helping hand unto ſo neceſſary a Work. Whilſt theſe things were with ſo great endeavour and labour a doing, a Meſſenger came from Conſtantinople, (ſent from the old Baſſa Pyrrhus) a ſharp Witted and cunning Fellow; who with much filed ſpeech in moſt ample manner doing his Meſſage, by the way, painted forth the great towardlineſs and courteous nature of the Turkiſh Emperor Solyman, with the great commendation of Pyrrhus Baſſa his Maſter; delivering from both of them Letters unto the Great Maſter to this purport.

Solyman by the Grace of God King of Kings, Lord of Lords, &c. To the reverend Father Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, and Legate of Aſia, Greeting.

Solymans Letter to Villerius.

I Am certainly informed that my Letters are delivered unto thee; which for that thou underſtoodſt them aright, I cannot expreſs how much it pleaſed me. Truſt to it, that I am not contented with the Victory I got at Belgrade; I hope for another, nay I aſſure my ſelf thereof, which I will not hide from thee whom I am always mindful of. Farewel from Conſtantinople.

Pyrrhus, great Counſellor to the mighty Emperor Solyman, to Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, and Legate of Aſia, Greeting.

Pyrrhus Baſſa his Letter to Villerius.

YOUR Letters, greater in meaning than Character, I have delivered unto our moſt mighty Emperor; but the Bearer thereof I would not ſuffer to come to his Preſence, leſt he ſhould be too much offended with ſo baſe a Meſſenger. Unto whom from henceforth ſend Men of worth, commendable for their years and diſcretion, with whom his Majeſty may (if he ſo pleaſe) confer and conclude of matters concerning the common Good; which thing if you ſhall do, it ſhall neither repent you of the doing thereof, nor me of my Counſel. The Meſſenger I ſend, bringeth Letters unto you alſo from our great Emperor; to whoſe divine Excellency how you are to anſwer, you are already admoniſhed. Farewel from Conſtantinople.

Theſe Letters being openly read, drew the minds of the Rhodians diverſly. Such as altogether wiſhed for peace, meaſuring others after their own plain meaning and integrity, commended the Counſel of Pyrrhus, ſaying, That he being an old Man of great experience, was not ſo deſirous of our quiet, as of the quiet of his Prince and Country; and therefore wiſhed by wiſdom to order that which the young Prince ſought for by War, fearing the uncertainty of Mans fragility, the common chance of War, the violence of Fortune, which hath oftentimes in a moment with a handful of Men overthrown with their ſtrong Armies. moſt [illegible]waſion of theſe men took ſuch effect, that Th[illegible] of the Knights of the Order called Raimund March, a Spaniard, a Noble Gentelman of great Courage, and very eloquent, skilful alſo in the Turkiſh Tongue, and then Muſter-maſter, was appointed to have been ſent Embaſſador unto the Turkiſh Emperor. Many there were of a contrary opinion, which ſuſpecting fraud and deceit, ſaid it were good to beware of the Enemies Counſel; asking, to what end this Embaſſage were? For ſhould we proclaim War (ſay they) againſt the moſt mighty Tyrant, not yet our profeſſed Enemy, who writeth all Peace? Or ſhould we intreat for peace, no War as yet proclaimed; that he which as yet is afraid himſelf, may now underſtand that he is of us feared? Beſides that, with what ſecurity, with what face can our Embaſſadors go, unrequeſted of the Turkiſh Emperor, without his ſafe conduct through thoſe Countries which we dayly burn and ſpoil? But they ſhall ſhew Pyrrhus the great Baſſaes Letters forſooth, his protection, his Credit and Authority ſhall defend them from all injury and wrong; as though the ſervant ſhould preſcribe Laws to his Maſter, and ſuch a ſervant as is moſt like unto his Maſter (that is) cruel, falſe of Faith, a hater of all Chriſtians, but eſpecially of us Rhodians; whom the mercileſs Tyrant having in his power, with his Navy and Army in readineſs, ſhall with cruel torture inforce to diſcover unto him our proviſion, the ſecrets of our City and Order. This opinion of the wiſer ſort, was greatly confirmed by the too much curioſity of the Meſſenger which was ſent, who with all diligence enquired of the State and Situation of the City, of the number and ſtrength of the Order. Wherefore in concluſion he was ſent back again accompanied but with one private Souldier to carry the Great Maſters Letters unto the Turkiſh Tyrant; the tenor whereof was thus:

Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, unto the Turk, Greeting

The anſwer of Villerius to Solymans Letter.

THat you are mindful of me grieveth me nothing; and I am alſo mindful of you. You repeat your Victory in Hungary, wherewith not being contented you hope for another; nay you promiſe and aſſure your ſelf thereof, before you have attempted the War. Beware you deceive not your ſelf; mens expectations never deceive them more than in Wars. Farewel, from the Rhodes.

The other Letters written to Pyrrhus, were to this effect:

Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, to Pyrrhus the Baſſa.

Villerius his anſwer to Pyrrhus the Baſſa his Letters.

I Have adviſedly conſidered thy Letters, with the behaviour and diſpoſition of thy Meſſenger. As I contemn not thy counſel, ſo I will not follow the ſame, whilſt my men of War do ſpoil the Countries and Ports of thy Lord and Maſter, which I bear withal, by reaſon of the injuries they have ſuſtained of the Turkiſh Pirats. But I will call them home, and will ſend Embaſſadors unto thy great Lord; ſo that thou before ſend me ſafe conduct under thy Maſters great Seal, for their ſafe coming and return. Farewel, from the Rhodes.

But theſe Letters were never delivered unto the great Turk, or the Baſſa; for as ſoon as the Turkiſh Meſſenger was come over into the Main, he preſently took Horſe, which was there in readineſs for him, and poſted towards Conſtantinople with as much ſpeed as he could, leaving the Chriſtian Meſſenger his Companion behind him; who returning back again to the Rhodes, and telling what he had heard and ſeen, gave them all great occaſion to deſpair of Peace; whereupon Villerius ſent into Crete to hire certain Companies of Cretenſian Archers. In the mean time advertiſement was given unto the Great Maſter by Letters from the Iſland of Naxos, That the Turks were ready to put their Fleet to Sea with the firſt appearance of the new Moon; which thing they moſt ſuperſtitiouſly obſerve in the beginning of all their great actions. The ſame news was brought alſo by certain Merchants of the Iſland of Pathmos, who came to the Rhodes with a great Ship laded with Corn from Eubœa; under the color of the ſale whereof, they (by the commandment of the Turks, to whom they were Tributaries) diligently noted all that was done in the City, ſhortly to be beſieged. The great Maſter with no leſs diligence, ſent divers of his ſmall Gallies amongſt the Iſlands and alongſt the Main, to learn what might be of the Enemies doings. Joannes Lupus one of the Knights of the Order, and Captain of one of theſe Gallies, meeting with a great Ship of the Turks laded with Corn, took her and brought her home to Rhodes. But Alphonſus Captain of another of the Gallies, lying in harbour in one of the Iſlands, and ſuffering his men to ſtraggle too far into the Land, was ſet upon by a Turkiſh Pyrat and taken.

Villerius advertiſed of the coming of the Turks Fleet.

About the ſame time the Turks by often Fires made upon the Main in the night ſeaſon, gave ſign unto the Rhodians, that they were deſirous to have ſome parly with them, as their manner was. Whereupon one Meneton a French man, one of the Knights, by commandment of the reſt of the Order, was ſent with a Gally well appointed to the Main to ſee what the matter might be; and with him was joyned Jacobus Xaycus a Paymaſter for the Gallies, that he might of the inhabitants of the place, and his Friends there dwelling, diligently enquire of all things concerning the intended War; for this Xaycus, beſides that he was a skilful Sea-man and one that knew the Coaſt well, had alſo good experience in Civil Affairs, and was wonderfully beloved and made of by the Turkiſh Merchants whoſe Language he had perfectly learned. Drawing near the Shore, he found the Turkiſh Merchants making merry upon the Main, with their Carpets, Cotten-Wool, and ſuch like Merchandiſe about them as they uſed to exchange with the Rhodian Merchants for woollen Cloaths; unto theſe Merchants he gave due ſalutations, gaging his Faith for their ſafety, and they likewiſe to him. But being requeſted to come aſhore to make merry until one of his familiar and old acquaintance might be ſent for, who as they ſaid was not far off; he anſwered, that he could not ſo do, except they would firſt deliver a Pledge for him a Shipboard. The perfidious Turks laughing as it were at his needleſs fear, willingly ſent their Merchandiſe and a Pledge aboard the Gallies. Xaycus then going aſhore, and embracing the Turkiſh Merchants which met him; upon a ſign given, was forthwith beſet on every ſide and taken Priſoner, and by Poſt Horſes conveied with all ſpeed to Conſtantinople; where he was with moſt exquiſite torments that could be deviſed for any man to endure, enforced to confeſs whatſoever his cruel Enemies could deſire. After Xaycus was by treachery thus loſt, then began their provident wiſdom to be highly commended, which were the occaſion, that the Decree made for ſending Embaſſadors unto the Turk, was again revoked. The hoſtage given for Xaycus, being brought to the Rhodes and examined, was found to be a ſimple Country fellow whom the Turks had of purpoſe well apparelled to deceive the Rhodians, who frankly and plainly according to his ſimple knowledg, anſwered to all things that were of him demanded; as that the Turks were making great preparation for Sea, upon the Coaſts of Caria and Lycia, and had taken up many Souldiers in the Countries thereabouts to ſend into the Frontiers of his Dominions towards Syria, for defence of the ſame againſt the Perſians. All which was true; for Solyman to put the Rhodians out of all ſuſpicion of invaſion (whom he knew carefully to obſerve his doings) ſent the Souldiers whom he had levied in the Countries neareſt to the Rhodes, far away againſt the Perſian, as if he had meant nothing againſt the Rhodes, and ſo upon the ſuddain to ſet upon them with his Army brought out of Europe, before they were awar. But this his device ſerved to ſmall purpoſe; for the Great Maſter perceiving by many circumſtances, but eſpecially by that late calamity of Xaycus that the Rhodes was the place the Turkiſh Tyrant longed after; and fearing that delay might bring farther danger, cauſed a ceſſation from all other buſineſs to be proclaimed, until all things neceſſary for defence of the City were accompliſhed; Watch and Ward was kept in every Street, the great Artillery planted upon the Walls and Bulwarks, Companies appointed for the defence of every place, the publick Armory of all warlike proviſion was open, all the Streets were full of Men carrying Weapons, ſome to one place, ſome to another. At which time a general Muſter was taken by the chief Men of the Order, where were found about five thouſand men able to bear Arms, among whom were ſix hundred Knights of the Order, and five hundred Souldiers of Crete; the reſt were for moſt part Mariners, able Bodies, who in the time of the Siege did great ſervice, encouraged by their Sea Captains; the Iſland People which repaired into the City, ſerved to little other purpoſe but to dig and carry Earth unto the Rampiers; and the Citizens (except it were ſome few of the better ſort) were for the moſt part weak and of ſmall Courage, not able to indure any labour or pains, and yet hardly to be kept in order and governed, great ſpeakers, but ſmall doers, greater in ſhew than in deed. The Great Maſter having carefully provided and ordered all things needful for the defence of the City, and fearing nothing more than the faint Hearts of the Citizens, cauſed them all to be called together; for incouragement of whom, he ſpake unto them as followeth:

Villerius his Oration unto the Rhodians.

Valiant Gentlemen and worthy Citizens, we hear that the Turk our mortal Enemy is coming againſt us, with a huge Army raiſed of divers Nations; from whoſe natural cruelty and wonted perjury except we defend our ſelves by force, one and the ſelf ſame danger is like to befal me, my Knights, and you all. For we have with common conſent and hand grievouſly ſpoiled him both by Sea and Land, and you are by booties taken by ſtrong hand out of his Dominions, inriched; and at this day we keep his People in grievous ſervitude, and he ours; but he injuriouſly, and we moſt juſtly: For his Anceſtors (weary of the dark Dens and Caves of the Mountain Caucaſus, their natural Dwelling) without Right, Title, or Cauſe, incited only with Covetouſneſs, Ambition, and the hatred of our moſt ſacred Religion, have driven the Chriſtians out of Syria; and afterwards oppreſſed the Grecians in Grecia; where not contented to have deſtroyed the People, with one ſimple kind of death (as Barbariſm is ever cruel and mercileſs) they have with moſt exquiſite and horrible Torments butchered many thouſands of that Nation. All whom, this wicked proud youth (whoſe miſchief exceedeth his years) an evil Neighbour to all men, not contented with the Dominions of Arabia, Syria, Egypt, the greateſt part of Aſia, and of many other places more, ſeeketh in Tyranny, Murther, Spoil, Perjury, and Hatred againſt Chriſt and Chriſtians, far to excel; and forceth himſelf to the uttermoſt of his power, to take from us our Iſlands, and to ſubdue the Chriſtian Countries; that ſo at length being Lord of all, and Commander of the World, he may at his pleaſure overthrow the Chriſtian Cities, kill the Chriſtians, and utterly root out the Chriſtian name, which he ſo much hateth. For the repulſing of which intollerable injury, we have eſpecially choſen this Iſland of the Rhodes for our dwelling place, becauſe the ſame ſeemed more commodious than any other for the annoying of this barbarous Nation. We have done what in us lay, holpen by you; we know by proof your great Valour and Fidelity, which we now have not in any diſtruſt. Wherefore I will not uſe many words to perſwade you to continue in your Fidelity and Loyalty, neither long circumſtances to encourage you to play the men; ſithence worthy minds are not with words either encouraged or diſmayed. But concerning my ſelf and my Knights of the Order, I will ſpeak a few words. I with them, with whom (as I hope) the Chriſtian Princes and other my Knights of the Weſt will in good time joyn their Forces, are moſt ready and preſt to defend your ſelves, your Children, your Wives, your Goods, the Monuments of your Anceſtors and ſacred Temples, dedicated to the ſervice of our God. Which opinion, that it may remain firm and fixt in your minds, if nothing elſe, my Faithfulneſs in your Wars, my Body not yet altogether ſpent but able enough to endure pains and travel, the Nobility of theſe worthy Knights of the Order, their Love towards you, and their Hatred towards your Enemies were ſufficient to confirm; but beſide this, the ſtrength of this City, which this noble Order hath with infinite charges ſo notably fortified with Ditches, Walls, Towers and Bulwarks, againſt all the force and fury of Artillery, is ſuch, as that no City may worthily be compared, much leſs preferred before the ſame. It is wonderfully ſtored with all kind of Weapons and Warlike Proviſion; we have laid up plenty of Wine, Fleſh, and Corn, in vaults, ſo that neither wet Weather nor Worms can attaint the ſame; of Wood and wholeſome Water not to be taken from us, things neceſſary for men beſieged we have plenty, and able men enough for the defence of the City. All which things promiſe unto us aſſured Victory, and ſuch end of the War as we wiſh for. Beſides this, Neceſſity, which giveth Courage even unto Cowards, will enforce us to fight. Yet ſtandeth on our ſide true Religion, Faith, Conſcience, Devotion, Conſtancy, the Love of our Country, the Love of our Liberty, the Love of our Parents, Wives, Children, and whatſoever elſe we hold dear; Whereas they bring with them the proud command of their Captains, Infidelity, Impiety, Unconſtancy, a wicked deſire of your Bondage, of your Blood, and the Blood of your Parents, Wives, and Children. Out of doubt (beloved Citizens) our good God will not ſuffer ſo many good vertues to be overcome by their foul vices. Wherefore be you in mind quiet and ſecure, and trouble not your ſelves with forboding fear of your Enemies; only continue in the Fidelity and Loyalty which you have always kept inviolate and unſpotted toward this ſacred and honourable Fellowſhip, in moſt dangerous Wars, and hardeſt chances of Fortune; and if need ſhall ſo require, with couragious hand ſhew your Valour againſt your Enemies, and make it known unto the Spaniards, French, Italians, Hungarians, and Engliſh, That the Rhodians are of power to daunt the Turkiſh Pride, and to avert their Fleets and Armies from Italy, which they have ſo many years threatned with Fire and Sword; and will no doubt thither with all ſpeed haſten and come, if (that which my mind abhorreth to ſpeak) they ſhould here prevail. Neither will his ambitious youth, in Courage, Falſhood, and cruelty exceeding Hannibal, imitate him in that, that having overthrown the Romans in the great Battel at Cannas, knew not to uſe his Victory; but he will preſently with more than Cæſars celerity, bring forth the Treaſures his Father got in Egypt, and with great Fleets and huge Armies invade Apulia, Calabria, and Scicilia; from whence he will forthwith break into France, and afterwards into Spain, and other Chriſtian Countries, raging through them with all kind of cruelty. But I am carried away further than I purpoſed, and than need is; For your Fidelity and Valour (moſt worthy Citizens) to endure the Siege, and repulſe the Enemy, is ſuch, as needeth not my perſwaſion; and of greater reſolution, than that it can be ſhaken with the dangers incident to men beſieged; yet the greateſt and moſt forcible miſeries of all, which is Hunger and Thirſt, I aſſure you, you ſhall never feel; which pinching calamities for all that, ſome People (in Faithfulneſs, Courage, and Valor nothing comparable to you) have nevertheleſs moſt conſtantly endured. For they of Petelinum, beſieged by the Carthaginenſians, for want of Victual, thruſt their Parents and Children out of the City, the longer to hold out the Siege, and lived themſelves with Hides and Leather ſod or broiled, and Leaves of Trees, and many other homely things, by the ſpace of eleven months; and could not be overcome until they wanted ſtrength longer to ſtand upon the Walls, and to hold their Weapons in their hands. They of Caſſilinum, beſieged by Hannibal, held out until a poor Mouſe was ſold for much Mony. You muſt of neceſſity keep Watch and Ward in your Stations; if your Houſes chance to be beaten down with the Enemies Artillery, you muſt have patience; for why, they ſhall be repaired again, and it is not a matter of ſuch importance, that we ſhould therefore yield unto our Enemies, in whoſe Courteſie and Fidelity no aſſurance is to be repoſed. For beſides that he is by Nature cruel and unfaithful, he can by no means be gentle and faithful towards us, which have done him ſo much harm, who only (as he himſelf ſaith) have oftentimes to his grief interrupted the courſe of the Victories of him the Conqueror both of Sea and Land; whom he hath ſo many times aſſailed by open force with all his Strength, Wit, Craft, Deceit and Policy; yet alwaies hitherto in vain, Almighty God ſtill protecting us, whom above all things (moſt dear Citizens) I wiſh you to ſerve and call upon, for except he keep and defend the City, the Watchmen do but watch in vain.

This chearful Speech wonderfully encouraged the Hearers, eſpecially the Vulgar ſort, eaſily carried away with pleaſing Words. But whilſt they in their jollity dream of nothing but of Triumph and Victory, the Wiſer ſort poſſeſſed with care, ceaſed not to do what in them lay, to procure, That the good commonly forewiſhed, might in fine come to effect. Among others Clement Biſhop of the Greeks, a man both for his place and devout manner of living had in great reputation amongſt them, laboured earneſtly by daily exhortations, to perſwade the Greeks his Countrymen in that great and common danger with heart and hand to joyn with the Latines in defence of the City; for although the Government was altogether in the Great Maſter and his Knights, which were Latines, yet the People both of the Iſland and City were for moſt part Greeks, who liked not altogether ſo well of the Latine Government, but that they did many times repine thereat. Howbeit the matter was at that time ſo ordered by the good perſwaſion of the Biſhop, and good Government of the Great Maſter, that they all agreed as one man, to ſpend their lives in defence of the City; and were ſo far from fear of the coming of the barbarous Enemy, that many of the Vulgar People, in whom appeareth commonly more Heat than Wit, wiſhed rather for his coming than otherwiſe. But look what they had fondly wiſhed, proved afterward to their coſts over true. For within a few nights after, the Turks by fire made in the night time upon the Main, gave ſign of parly unto the Rhodians. Whereupon a Gally well appointed, with a long Boat, was preſently ſent forth to ſee what the matter was; which drawing near unto the ſhore, was hailed by a Turk, accompanied with a Troop of Horſemen, deſiring the Captain of the Gally to ſend ſome on ſhore, with whom they might more conveniently parly; which thing the Captain refuſing; What, ſaid the Turk, art thou afraid of Xaycus Fortune? to whom the Captain in threatning manner anſwered again, Xaycus whom you have contrary to your Faith and Oath taken, troubleth me not; neither am I afraid of you, whom I truſt not; but if you have any thing to ſay let me hear it, or elſe get you further off, otherwiſe I will ſpeak to you by the mouth of the Canon. Then one of the Turks coming to the Water ſide, laid down Letters upon a Stone, ſaying, that in them was contained that they had in charge; which ſaid, he preſently ſet Spurs to his Horſe, and departed with the reſt of his Company. The Captain ſending out his long Boat for theſe Letters, found them directed in this ſort;

Solyman* by the grace of God, King of Kings, Lord of Lords, moſt Mighty Emperor of Conſtantinople and Trapezond, &c. unto the reverend Father Philippus Villerius Liladamus, Great Maſter of the Rhodes, to his Knights, and all his People in general.

The purport of which Letter was as followeth:

Solymans threatning Letters to the Rhodians.

THE compaſſion I have of my diſtreſſed Subjects, and the great injury you do me, hath moved me to Wrath. Wherefore I command you without delay to yield unto me the Iſland and City of the Rhodes, willingly and charitably granting you leave ſafely to depart with all your Riches, or to tarry if you ſo pleaſe under my Obeiſance, your Liberty and Religion in no part infringed with any Tribute or impoſition. If you be wiſe, prefer Friendſhip and Peace before bloody War; for unto them which are by Force ſubdued, are reſerved all extremities which the miſerable vanquiſhed uſe to ſuffer of the angry Conqueror; from which neither your own Force, nor forreign Aid, nor huge Walls, which I will utterly overthrow, ſhall be able to defend you, fare you well. All which ſhall aſſuredly be performed, if you ſhall make choice rather of my Friendſhip, than of my Force; wherein you ſhall neither be deceived nor circumvented; I take to witneſs God the Creator of Heaven and Earth, the four Writers of the Evangelical Hiſtory, the fourſcore thouſand Prophets deſcended from Heaven, and amongſt them our higheſt Prophet Mahomet, the reverend Ghoſts of my Father and Grandfather, and this my ſacred and imperial Head. From our Palace at Conſtantinople.

When theſe Letters were openly read in the Counſel Chamber at the Rhodes, ſome were of opinion, That it was good to anſwer the Turkiſh Tyrant roundly, thereby to give him to underſtand ſtand that they were not afraid of his Threats; otherſome thought it no Wiſdom with hard words to provoke ſo great an Enemy to further diſpleaſure. Thus whilſt every man would have framed an anſwer according to his own diſpoſition, in concluſion it was agreed upon, to give him no anſwer at all.

The ſame day theſe Letters came to the Rhodes, which was the fourteenth day of June, one of the Turks great Commanders at Sea with thirty Gallies, the Forerunners of the Turkiſh Fleet, arrived at the Iſland of Chos, famous in antient time for the Birth of Hippocrates the great Phyſitian, and the wonderful Picture of Venus left there unperfect by Apelles, which for the excellency thereof never man durſt afterward take in hand to perfect; which fruitful and pleaſant Iſland was then at the arrival of the Turks, part of the Dominion of the Rhodes. The Admiral of this Fleet here landing his Turks, began to burn the Corn which was then almoſt ripe, with the Country Villages round about. With which injury, Prejanes the Governor of the Iſland (a man of great Courage and Valor) moved, with a choſen Company of Footmen, and certain Troops of Horſemen, ſuddainly ſet upon the Turks, in divers places diſperſed abroad far into the Country, with ſuch a terrible cry of the Country People, and Inſtruments of War, that the Turks being therewith amazed, ran away as if they had been mad, and were many of them ſlain without reſiſtance; and had not the Gallies lien near the Shore, to receive them that were able to flie thither, there had not one of them which landed eſcaped the hands of the Iſland People. The Turks having received this loſs, left the Iſland, and put to Sea again.

The Rhodians for fear of the Turks deſtroy their Suburbs and places of pleaſure without the City.

The fear of the Country People.

The Rhodians for the moſt part now aſſured and out of doubt of the coming of the Turks, by the perſwaſion of Gabriel Pomerolus Vicemaſter, and other men of great experience, pluckt down the Suburbs of the City, and laid them even with the ground, their pleaſant Orchards alſo and Gardens near to the City, they utterly deſtroyed; the Great Maſter for example ſake beginning firſt with his own, being a place of great delicacy, lying under the Walls near to the French Bulwark; and taking into the City all ſuch things as they thought needful for the induring of the Siege, they utterly deſtroyed all the reſt, were it never ſo pleaſant or commodious, within a mile of the Town, leaving all that ſpace as even and as bare as they could poſſibly make it; to the intent, that the Enemy at his coming ſhould find nothing near the City whereof to make uſe. But whilſt the pleaſures and delights of the Suburbs are thus in defacing, another more heavy and woful ſight preſented unto the Eyes of the Citizens, filled the City with greater mourning and penſiveneſs than did the coming of the Enemy. The miſerable multitude of the poor Country People, ſome bringing Wood, ſome Corn, ſome Cattel, ſome Fouls, and other ſuch neceſſaries as they had out of the Country into the City (for ſo the Great Maſter had commanded) after whom followed great numbers of Women and Children weeping, with diſchiveled hair, ſcratching their faces and tearing themſelves after the manner of the Country, wringing their Hands, and caſting up their Eyes to Heaven, beſeeching God with heavy countenance and floods of Tears to defend the noble City of the Rhodes, and themſelves from the fury of their Enemies. Which multitude of Country People with their Proviſion being packt up into narrow rooms in the Houſes of the Citizens, and their Cattel ſtarving for want of Fodder, afterwards corrupted the Air; whereof inſued rotten Agues and the Flux, during the time of the Siege. But after the City was given up, ſuch a Plague and Mortality followed, as deſtroyed great numbers of the Turks and poor Chriſtians, which knowing not whether to go, choſe rather there to die, than to forſake their native Country.

The General of the Turkiſh Fleet which landed in the Iſland of Chos, and was of purpoſe ſent by Solyman to provoke the Rhodians to Battel at Sea; before he with his whole power came to beſiege the Iſland, came dayly with twenty Gallies half thoſe narrow Seas over, betwixt Lycia and the Rhodes, leaving the reſt of his Fleet riding at Anchor at the Promontary called Gnidum (not far from the City of Rhodes) ready to aid him as need ſhould require; this manner of bravery he uſed many days together, hoping thereby to allure the Rhodians out of their Haven to give him Battel; knowing, that if he ſhould therein obtain the Victory, it were at that time little leſs than the taking of the City, or if he could by cruel fight but weaken the Forces of the Rhodians, he ſhould therein do his Maſter good ſervice, and greatly further his Victory by diminiſhing the number of the Defendants. When he had many days without intermiſſion in this proud manner come half Seas over, and ſometimes paſſing further came and lay at the mouth of the Haven, as it were daring them to fight; the Rhodians not wont to be ſo braved at their own doors, moved with the intollerable inſolency of this proud Turk, by their continual importunity cauſed the Great Maſter to call a Counſel, to conſider whether they ſhould fight with this Fleet of the Turks or not. The Counſellors by the appointment of the Great Maſter aſſembled; the Chancellor, a man of great Authority and Spirit, famous for his noble Acts both at home and abroad, and chief of them which were of opinion this Fleet of the Turks was to be fought withal, ſaid:

The Chancellor his Speech perſwading the Rhodians to fight with the Turks Gallies.

So great diſgrace was not longer to be ſuffered, but preſently revenged; For (ſaid he) the huge Fleet of the Turks, I do not ſay at whoſe force and ſight, but at whoſe very name many men do tremble and quake (which for all that is unto us no great novelty, for every year we hear of the like) is as a head to be joyned unto theſe pyratical Gallies, as Members; and then will it be moſt expedient (which will be a moſt eaſie thing for us to do, having the better both for ſtrength of ſhipping and number and valor of men) to give that great head ſuch a blow and wound, by cutting off theſe limbs, that it ſhall ever after ſtagger and faint for want of ſtrength; or elſe there is no other Fleet at all prepared againſt us to follow this, and then this diſcomfited we ſhall be at quiet. Which thing in my judgment (though others which fear their own ſhadows and the falling of Heaven, ſay otherwiſe) is moſt like to be true; for the great Turk is not ſo ſottiſh to come hither, the fitteſt time of the year being ſo far ſpent, in the latter end of June, to beſiege this City, and ſuch a City as he knoweth to be moſt ſtrong, wanting nothing that is needful, and throughly manned with valiant Souldiers, from whence his Anceſtors have been with loſs and ſhame repulſed; when as the remainder of the Summer will be ſpent before he can encamp himſelf and place his batteries; and Winter time as you know is unfit for every Siege, eſpecially in this Iſland, wherein they can find no Haven or Harbor to reſt in. Wherefore on God his name let us ſet upon our proud Enemies; and let us not for a few threatning words ſent unto us from a fearful youth, upon a fineneſs and policy leſt we ſhould follow the tail of his Fleet bound for ſome other place, ſit ſtill like Cowards within our Walls with our hands in our boſoms, as men which for fear and dred durſt not ſhew their heads. Which our Cowardiſe and want of Courage we forſooth call Fabius his policy; But I would to God we were like Fabius, but I fear we ſhall prove more like Antiochus, the Etolians, the Vitellians, all whoſe courage conſiſted in words, vainly hoping to gain the Victory by ſitting ſtill and wiſhing well. But the help of God is not to be gotten with Womens Prayers and Supplications or theſe faint-hearted Policies, which Cowards call adviſed counſel, but Victory is gained by adventuring and expoſing our ſelves to danger and peril.

With theſe and ſuch like Speeches he ſo moved the multitude, which commonly conceiveth moſt Courage upon the greateſt uncertainties, that they deſired that they might fight; ſaying, That they would waſh away that foul diſgrace with the Blood and Slaughter of their Enemies; For why, they wanted not Weapons, Courage, or Hands (as they ſaid) to do it withal.

For all this, the graver ſort of the Counſel (without whoſe conſent the Maſter might in ſuch caſes do nothing) thought it not good in ſo dangerous a time to adventure any great part of their Forces, which they ſhould afterwards want for the defence of their City. The Turkiſh General deceived of his expectation, and perceiving that the Rhodians would not be drawn forth to Battel at Sea, withdrew his Fleet twelve miles off, unto a place called Villanova; where caſting Anchor and landing his men, he burnt the Corn all thereabouts which was now almoſt ripe, but forſaken of the People as a thing deſperate; as for the People themſelves, they were all fled, and had retired themſelves either into the City of the Rhodes, or elſe into ſtrong Caſtles in other places of the Iſland.

At the ſame time certain Troops of Horſemen ſent forth to have skirmiſhed with the Turks that were burning of the Corn, were by a Meſſenger ſent from the Great Maſter, commanded to retire; for the provident General ſought by all means to reſerve his Souldiers for greater dangers which he juſtly feared in the expected Siege; during which time he ſhewed himſelf a moſt politick Captain and brave Souldier; he would many times by day eat his Meat with his Souldiers, as one of them, and moſt part of the night keep Watch himſelf, walking up and down, reſting himſelf when he was weary upon ſome Stone or piece of Timber, or other homely ſeat, as it chanced. In time of Aſſault he was always more forward and adventurous than the grave Counſellors wiſhed, fearing neither Shot nor Enemy; yet did he always more commend diſcreet Counſel grounded upon Reaſon, than proſperous Actions commended but by their events. And that which a man would wonder at, amongſt ſo many cares in midſt of ſuch divers and dangerous chances, he carried always ſuch a Grace and Majeſty in his chearful countenance, as made him to be of the Beholders both reverenced and loved. All the time he could ſpare from the neceſſary Cares of his weighty charge, from Aſſaults, and the natural refreſhing of his Body, he beſtowed in Prayer and ſerving of God; he oftentimes ſpent the greateſt part of the night in the Church alone praying, his Head-piece, Gorget, and Gantlets lying by him; ſo that it was often ſaid, That his devout Prayers and Carefulneſs would make the City invincible.

The Turks Fleet deſcried at Sea troubleth the Rhodians.

The ſix and twentieth day of June early in the morning, news was brought into the City from the Watch Tower ſtanding upon St. Stephens Hill about a mile from the City, That a moſt huge Fleet was deſcried at Sea, making thitherwards all alongſt the Weſtern Coaſt of Lycia. This bad news much troubled the City, although it was not of moſt men unexpected; all places was filled with tumult and hurly burly, every man meaſured the greatneſs of the danger by the meaſure of his own fear, and ſuch a pitiful cry was in every place as is uſual in Cities preſently to be beſieged. Hereupon publick Prayers were made through all the City, and every man with great Devotion beſought the God of Heaven, That as it was his pleaſure that the Rhodians ſhould at that time be the Champions of the Chriſtian Religion, ſo he would give them Strength and Victory againſt their Enemies, and to turn the calamities of War upon the Enemies of his Name. Their Devotion ended, the Gates of the City were ſhut up, and People from all places ran unto the Walls, great Flocks of Women, Children, and aged men not able to ſtand without a Staff, going forth of their Houſes to gaze upon the dreadful Fleet (wherein was above two hundred Sails as is reported) filled the Streets, the tops of the high Towers and Houſes. The foremoſt of the Fleet was the Admiral of Calipolis, to whom Solyman had committed the charge of all his Navy, and to aſſail the City by Sea; the Rear-Admiral was Cara Mahometes an arch Pyrat, who was afterwards ſlain with a great Shot out of the City. The Vice-Admiral in the middle of the Fleet with a great Squadron of Gallies, having a fair Weſternly wind, ſtruck ſail directly before the mouth of the Haven (which was on both ſides defended with two ſtrong Towers well furniſhed with great Artillery) and began to row toward the City; whereupon an Alarm was raiſed, the Trumpets ſounded, and many haſted unto the Bulwark which defended the left ſide of the Haven, which the Enemy ſeemed to direct his courſe unto; and was indeed more ſubject to danger than the other. But the Turk ſeeing himſelf in danger to be ſunk with ſhot from the Bulwark, was glad to get himſelf farther off unto the reſt of the Fleet; the Rhodians from the Walls with loud outcries ſcornfully deriding him for his fooliſh attempt. This great Fleet in exceeding bravery and triumph paſſing by the City in ſight of the Rhodians (ſtanding upon the Walls with Enſigns diſplaied) did not more terrifie them, than they were themſelves terrified to behold the ſtrength of the City, and the chearfulneſs of the Defendants. But paſſing on, they came to the Promontory which the Inhabitants call Bo, about three miles diſtant from the City, Eaſtward. Which ſmall Harbor being not able to receive ſo great a Fleet, many of the Gallies were inforced to ride it out at Sea, where they were by Shot out of the City oftentimes indangered and inforced to get them further off. Whilſt the Enemy was there landing his great Ordnance and other Inſtruments of War prepared for the Siege, chuſing a place for his Camp, tranſporting his Land Souldiers from the Main into the Iſland, viewing the ſtrength and ſituation of the City, and in what place he might with moſt eaſe aſſault the ſame; the Rhodians in the mean time were not idle, but ſunk divers deep ſounds in many places of the City near unto the Walls, to diſcover the Enemies Mines, and fortified their Bulwarks with great Rampiers; in which work every man put too his helping hand without reſpect of Age or Calling. The Grand Maſter about that time ſent Lodovicus Andugus one of the Knights of the Order, into Spain to Charles the Emperor; and Claudius Ducenvillus another of the Order alſo, to Rome to the Cardinals, and Italian Knights of the Order; and from thence into France unto the French King with Letters; craving craving the aid of theſe Chriſtian Princes, for relief of the City, by Sea and Land beſieged. But all in vain, for they carried away with the endleſs grudge one againſt another, or reſpecting only their own States, returned the Embaſſadors with good words, but no relief.

The commendation of Prejanes.

At this time Prejanes Governor of Chios (of whom we have before ſpoken) a man comparable with any of the Captains of that age, an excellent Souldier both by Sea and Land, valiant and thereto fortunate, of an invincible Courage, brought up in the Wars from his Childhood; when he had by the ſpace of two or three days hid himſelf in the Rocks at Sea, for fear of the Turks great Fleet, came by night in a ſmall Pinnaſs to the Rhodes, having deceived the Turks Watch; at whoſe coming the Rhodians wonderfully rejoyced, for the Souldiers repoſed greater confidence in no man, than in him; and if any great exploit were to be done, him the Maſter truſted above any other; he always in Arms during the Siege, incouraged the Souldiers, ſearched the Watch, ſurveyed the Bulwarks, repaired the Breaches, and ſuch labors as others acounted extream miſeries, he chearfully endured, as if they had been but his pleaſure and recreations. At the ſame time alſo, Gabriel Martiningus of Brixia, a moſt skilful Enginier, came to the Rhodes out of Creta; by whoſe induſtry and cunning, fifty five Mines which the Turks did with infinite labor and charge make (by reaſon of the ſpringing of the Water, and hardneſs of the Rocks) during the Siege, were all by countermines diſappointed and defeated.

The deſcription of the Rhodes.

The City of the Rhodes is ſituate on a plain ground, on every ſide to be beſieged, only Northward it is defended with a goodly Haven, from whence it lyeth open all weſtward; betwixt it and the Hills round about it, lieth a ſtony plain ground not very broad, but of a greater length; theſe Hills are full of Springs, and Orchards planted with Olives, Fig-Trees, Vines, and ſuch other Fruits as ſuch dry and ſandy ground will bear. But what by Nature wanted, was by the Hand and induſtry of man ſupplied; for it was compaſſed about with a moſt ſtrong double Wall, and deep Trenches, threatning the Enemy with thirteen ſtately Towers; and ſure againſt all Aſſaults, with five mighty Bulwarks, with divers goodly fair Gates; and that which was the greateſt defence of all, within the City was alwaies kept a moſt exact and ſtrait form of Warlike Diſcipline. The defence of the whole City was thus proportioned; from the French Tower (which with the greatneſs and height thereof ſeemed to mate the sky) ſtood the Frenchmen with the French Lilies in their Enſigns, under their Commander Joannes Abbinus, a Noble Knight of the Order; from thence to St. Georges Gate lay the ſtout Germans, with the Eagle in their Enſigns; in the third ſtation were placed the French Avergnoys, with the Spaniards, for that the Ditches in that place were neither ſo deep nor broad as elſewhere; in the fifth place lay the Engliſh Garriſon, over whom the Grand Maſter himſelf commanded; after them ſucceeded they of Narbona; and laſt of all the Italians, in Valour not inferior to any of the reſt, under the leading of Petrus Balinus and Gregorius Morgutas. In every one of theſe ſtations were divers valiant Knights of the Order, whoſe names (worthy of eternal memory) for brevity we paſs over, all men of themſelves ſufficient to have taken upon them the whole charge.

A Turkiſh Woman Slave, conſpireth to fire the City.

The Enemy was not buſier without the City in placing his battery, but traiterous minds were as buſie within to have betraied the ſame. A Turkiſh Woman, Slave to one of the rich Citizens, had conſpired with certain of her Complices, at ſuch time as the Turks ſhould give Aſſault unto the Town, at one inſtant to ſet on fire the Houſes wherein they dwelt in divers places of the City, that the Defendants drawn from the Walls to quench the Fire, the Turks in the mean time might the more eaſily enter. But this Treaſon was in good time revealed, and the offenders worthily executed.

The painfulneſs of the Turks Pioniers.

The Turks had not as yet placed their battery, when as they took a certain Hill, whereon ſtood the Church dedicated to Coſmus and Damianus, directly over againſt the Engliſh ſtation; from thence (as it ſeemed, rather for exerciſing of their Souldiers than for any great harm they could do ſo far off) they began with ſmall battering Pieces to ſhoot into the City; and afterwards they began to dig Mines, and to caſt up Trenches; for the performance of which kind of work, and for the filling up of the Town Ditches, they had brought with them fifty thouſand Pioniers, men better acquainted with Country labour and keeping of Cattel, than with Wars, which being inforced unto their labour day and night, ſometime with Stripes and ſometime with death, did with incredible celerity bring that to paſs, which was before thought impoſſible. They cut ways through the moſt hard ſtony Rocks, raiſing the Plains as high as Mountains, with Earth brought two miles off, and laying the Mountains even with the Plains, and yet they never wrought in ſafety, but were miſerably rent in ſunder with the great Ordnance out of the Town; and that which moſt of all troubled them, the Rhodians ſallying out upon thoſe over-laboured People, having neither courage nor skill to defend themſelves, but truſting only to their heels, ſlew great numbers of them, and not of them only, but of others alſo appointed for their defence, whom the Rhodians (taking courage of their fear) fiercely purſued and ſlew down right. And when many others iſſuing out of the Camp in great Companies, thought to have relieved their Fellows, the great Ordnance before of purpoſe placed to moſt advantage, ſo thundred from the Walls among the thickeſt of them, that the ground lay covered with the Bodies and Weapons of the dead Turks. With which manner of Fight, after the Rhodians had twice or thrice troubled the Enemy, the Turks for their more ſafety wrought moſt upon their Mounts by night, keeping moſt ſtrong watch for the defence of their Pioniers, which for more aſſurance they doubled in the day time, and bent their Artillery againſt the places which the Rhodians uſed to ſally out at; which did not ſo much keep them in, as the fear of weakning themſelves by often ſallies, knowing that one man was unto them a greater loſs, than unto the Enemy an hundred. Amongſt others which in the beginning of this great Siege forced the uttermoſt of their devices to the deſtruction of the Turks, were certain Mariners, who having the Turkiſh Language perfectly, by leave of the Grand Maſter (diſguiſing themſelves in the habit of Turks) departed by night out of the Haven in a ſmall Boat, loaded with Apples, Plums, Pears, Melons, Grapes, and other ſuch Fruits as the time of the year afforded; and in the darkneſs came along the Coaſt, unto that part of the Iſland whereunto the paſſage was out of the Main. There as if they had been Turks come from the Main, they landed their commodities, which the Turkiſh Souldiers bought greedily. When they had thus ſold their Fruits, and in ſelling thereof diligently noted the ſpeech and talk of the Souldiers concerning the Siege, and were now ready ready to depart, certain Turks which greatly diſliked the hard beginning of this Siege, ſeeing themſelves if they did but ſtir, in danger to be ſet off with ſhot out of the Town, earneſtly requeſted the Mariners to take them with them into the Main; which to do, at the firſt the Mariners diſſembling, refuſed, as a thing dangerous; and beſides that, their Boat was too little to receive ſo many as would willingly have gone with them. Yet with much ado, they ſuffered themſelves to be intreated to take in ſeven or eight, ſuch a number as they could well maſter; who in hope of paſſing over into the Main, were (contrary to their expectation) brought Priſoners to the Rhodes, where they were by Prejanes brought up to the top of the higheſt Tower of St. Johns Church, from whence they might ſee all about the Country, and well deſcrie all the manner of the Turks Camp, which they ſimply diſcovered unto the Captain, and whatſoever elſe they were demanded; and amongſt other things confeſſed, that the Souldiers were greatly diſcontented with the Siege, having in the beginning thereof loſt ſo many men, and that they were ready to riſe in mutiny againſt their Captains, and would hardly by them be commanded out of their Trenches and Cabbins, ſaying, that all they did was but loſt labour, and that they ſhould find it another piece of work to win the Rhodes, than they had at Belgrade; wherefore if they were wiſe, they ſhould in time depart before they had received further harm both from the Enemy, and for want of neceſſaries, wherewith the Souldiers began already to be pinched. All which was then ſuppoſed to have been ſpoken by the Captives to pleaſe him in whoſe power they now were; yet it appeared afterwards to be all true. For Pyrrhus Baſſa conſidering the troubled ſtate of the Camp, and the general diſcontentment of the Souldiers, whom he was at that time gladder to pleaſe than to puniſh, writ unto Solyman at Conſtantinople, That if he would the Siege ſhould go forward, he ſhould without delay come in perſon himſelf to the Camp, for that the Souldiers without regard of ſhame were ready to riſe in mutiny and to abandon the Siege, refuſing to be commanded by their Captains.

In the mean time whilſt Solyman prepareth himſelf to ſet forward, the Turkiſh Captains underſtood by certain Fugitives (whereof in all Wars ſome are to be found) that the high Steeple of St. Johns Church ſerved them of the Town for a Watch Tower; for which cauſe, and for deſpight of the Croſs ſtanding upon the top thereof, they laboured nothing more, than with continual ſhot to beat down that Tower, which whilſt they were doing with great diligence, Solyman himſelf came into the Camp the eight and twentieth day of Auguſt in the Afternoon; where finding in his Army all the ſigns of cowardiſe and fear that could be ſpoken of or deviſed, and nothing done according to the command of ſuch as he had appointed for that charge, but all things out of order, he took more grief to ſee that great diſorder, than he did pleaſure and good hope of two hundred thouſand Souldiers which were in his Army. Yet for all that he was inwardly chafed with the heat of youth and indignation, againſt his own People as well as the Rhodians, but moderated himſelf betwixt his own rage and the offence of his Souldiers, and calling them together, cauſed them to be diſarmed, not leaving among them ſo much as a Sword; and compaſſing them in with fifteen thouſand Harquebuſiers whom he had brought with him well appointed, he ſtept up into his Royal Seat, there ſet on high for that purpoſe; where ſitting down, he pauſed a good while without any word ſpeaking, as if he had conſidered with himſelf whether he ſhould only puniſh the Authors of the Mutiny, or elſe with the puniſhment of many to revenge ſo foul a Sedition, little differing from open Rebellion. But following of himſelf the milder reſolution, he thought it ſufficient to correct the multitude and common ſort of Souldiers with ſharp and bitter words; and after general ſilence made, brake out into this cholerick Speech.

Solymans cholerick Oration to his Souldiers.

Slaves (quoth he) for I cannot find in my heart to call you Souldiers, What kind of men are you now become? are you Turks? Men wont both to fight and overcome? Verily I ſee the Bodies, Countenances, Attire, and Habit of my Souldiers; but the Deeds, Speeches, Counſels and Devices of cowardly and vile Traitors. Alas how hath my opinion deceived me? that Turkiſh Force and Courage is gone, the Valour and Strength both of Bodies and Minds, wherewith the Arabians, Perſians, Syrians, Egyptians, Servians, Hungarians, Bulgarians, Epirotes, Macedonians, and Thracians were ſubdued, is loſt; forgetting your Country, your Oath, the Command of your Captains, your Obedience, and all other Warlike Diſcipline; you have againſt the Majeſty of my Empire refuſed to fight, like Cowards betaken your ſelves to flight, for vain fear of death and danger, not beſeeming men of War. If any man ſhould at home but have named the Rhodes in your Feaſts, amongſt your pots, in your aſſemblies and great meetings, you could then with your Tongues brag to pull it down, you had much ado to hold your Hands; here, when I would make proof of your force and courage, it is nothing. But you thought perhaps, that the Rhodians ſo ſoon as they ſaw your Enſigns before their Gates, would ſtrait way yield themſelves and their City into your Power; Let all men ceaſe ſo to ſay or think, and believe me that know the truth, This baſe and infamous Den (which you ſee) is full of moſt cruel Beaſts, whoſe madneſs you ſhall never tame, without much labour and bloodſhed. Yet ſhall we tame them; for why, nothing is ſo wild but at length it may be tamed; which except I bring to paſs, I am fully reſolved and have vowed unto my ſelf, Either here to die, or ſpend my days; And if ever I do or ſay otherwiſe, let this my Head, my Fleet, mine Army, and Empire, be for ever accurſed and unfortunate.

And ſo without further Speech, deſiring rather to be accounted of his Souldiers gentle than ſevere, he pardoned them all their former offences, and ſwore them all again to his obedience. This mutiny ſo appeaſed, all things were afterwards done with better ſucceſs, and greater care both of the Souldiers and Commanders. Firſt, they planted in divers places twelve great Bombards, wherewith they threw up Stones of huge weight into the Air, which falling down into the City, might break down the Houſes, and whatſoever elſe they lighted upon; with the fall of one of theſe, the Great Maſter was like to have been ſlain. Howbeit this proved a device of more terror than danger, for with two hundred ſuch Shot were but ten men ſlain; which thing amongſt others, Apella a traiterous Fugitive declared unto the Enemy, with whom he had intelligence, as he himſelf confeſſed being taken upon ſuſpition and examined; for which his Treaſon he was juſtly executed.

Apella a Traitor.

The force of the Battery was more feared, wherein the Turks had planted forty great Pieces of Battery, and amongſt them twelve Baſilisks (ſo aptly named of the Serpent Baſiliſcus, who as Pliny writeth, killeth Man or Beaſt with his ſight) with theſe Pieces the Turks battered the Walls

The Turks battery.

Walls continually; but lying ſomewhat far off, did no great harm.

At the ſame time alſo Solyman cauſed battery to be laid againſt the Tower of St. Nicholas, ſtanding upon a narrow piece of ground pointing far into the Sea, defending the Haven upon the right hand, where ſometime ſtood the great Coloſſus of the Sun, accounted the greateſt amongſt the ſeven Wonders of the World. Which Caſtle was both ſtrongly and ſumptuouſly built at the charges of the Dukes of Burgundy, as appeared by their Arms there engraven in many places in Marble. This Tower was valiantly defended by Guido a Frenchman, who had the charge thereof, with two hundred Souldiers, amongſt whom were thirty Knights of the Order.

The Turks Artillery planted againſt the Tower, was by the ſkilfulneſs of the Chriſtian Canoniers in ſhort time diſmounted with Shot from the Tower, and many of the Gunners ſlain; ſo that they were glad to ſurceaſe any more to batter the Tower by day, but lying ſtill all the day they began to batter the ſame by night, wherein they prevailed no more than they had before done in the day time; For the Defendants warily obſerving ſuch places as were likeſt for the Enemy to place his Battery in, did ſo aptly place their Ordnance againſt the ſame, and to ſo good purpoſe that the Turks ſwore, their doings were by ſome means diſcovered unto the Enemies. So when they had in vain beſtowed five hundred great Shot, and made a ſmall breach which they durſt not once attempt to enter, they ſhamefully abandoned that place alſo.

The Engliſh Bulwark blown up.

All this while Pyrrhus was buſie in working of Mines to undermine the City, two and thirty of which Mines the Defendants fruſtrated with Countermines; in which kind of work many were loſt on both ſides; yet for all the carefulneſs of the Chriſtians, the Engliſh Bulwark, was undermined by the Enemy, and upon the fourth of September part thereof blown up, with ſuch violence, that unto them in the City it ſeemed at the firſt to be a general Earthquake; and therewith divers Engliſh were there overwhelmed. The Turks attempting preſently to enter, were by the Grand Maſter and his Followers with great ſlaughter repulſed.

But Muſtapha the Baſſa coming on with freſh Supplies, and crying out of the cowardiſe of them which retired, renewed the Aſſault; where for a while was fought a moſt ſharp and cruel Fight, the Leaders chearfully encouraging their Souldiers, and they likewiſe doing what was poſſible for men to do. All mens ears were filled with the thundering of the Shot, noiſe of Trumpets and Drums, and crying of Men. And unto the Turks it ſeemed that over their heads it rained deadly Shot, Stones, and Fire; for the Townſmen and Women mingled with the Souldiers, caſt down upon the Turks, Fire, Stones, Timber, and whatſoever elſe came to hand; ſo that they unable longer to indure the courage and force of the Chriſtians, turned their backs and ran away by heaps, not expecting any ſign of Retreat, every man ſeeking to ſave one; among whom as they fled, the great Ordnance ſhot off from the Walls made wonderful ſlaughter. At this Aſſault of the Turks were ſlain (as ſome write) almoſt two thouſand, and among them the Maſter of the Turks Ordnance, a man whom Solyman greatly loved; which Victory the Chriſtians gained not without ſome loſs; for beſides ſome few others that were ſlain, fifty Knights of the Order (men worthy of Eternal Memory) there ended their days alſo.

The Turks aſſault the Engliſh Bulwark the ſecond time, and are again repulſed.

The fifth day after (which was the ninth day of September) Solyman by the perſwaſion of Muſtapha the great Baſſa, commanded a freſh Aſſault to be given to the Engliſh Bulwark, which was attempted by the Turks with greater reſolution than the firſt. Seven Enſigns of the Turks were broken in by the ruins of the Bulwark, and had inforced the Defendants, oppreſſed with number to give ground, when the Grand Maſter coming in with the Enſign of the Order, guarded with a Company of moſt valiant Knights, drave them out again by force, and made good the place. Muſtapha ſeeing his men retire, couragiouſly reſtored the Battel by bringing on of new ſupply, and other Captains with Threats, Strokes, and terror of Death, enforced the Souldiers (who had before turned their Backs) now again to fight. So that there began a more cruel Fight than had before been from the beginning of the Siege; which was unto the Chriſtians more dangerous, for that they were overwhelmed with the multitude of the Turkiſh Shot. But in that extremity no man regarded either danger or life, only this they remembred, That thoſe were their barbarous Enemies, whom they muſt either victoriouſly overcome, or die therefore; with which fury the Aſſault was continued by the ſpace of three hours, until at length Muſtapha with his Turks diſcouraged, with the loſs of two thouſand of their Fellows, and of three great Noblemen, whom Solyman eſpecially favoured, and ſore beaten by the Spaniards out of their Flankers, were enforced to retire. Few of the Chriſtians in reſpect of ſo many Enemies, were ſlain, yet had the Enſign of the Order been then loſt, Joachimus Cluys the Enſign Bearer having both his Eyes ſhot out, had not Emericus Rujaulx an Avergnois, and one of the Knights of the Order, with incredible courage reſcued the ſame.

Muſtapha Baſſa falleth into diſgrace with Solyman.

After this ſecond Aſſault, falling out ſo unluckily unto the Turks, Muſtapha the great Baſſa began to grow in contempt with Solyman; and Pyrrhus to keep his credit by doing ſomething, with continual battery of ſeventeen great Pieces, did batter the Mount near unto the Italian Bulwark. At which time alſo Caſſius Governor of Bithynia, another of the Turks great Commanders, laboured by undermining to have overthrown the French Bulwark; ſo glad they were to attempt any thing to content their imperious great Lord and Maſter. But the endeavours of Caſſius was by Countermines through the careful diligence of Gabriel Chierus, having charge of thoſe works, fruſtrated; and Pyrrhus in the other place after he had by hot Aſſault ſlain them which were appointed for the defence thereof, and gained the Mount, and brought a great fear upon the City, was again with great loſs ſhamefully repulſed, and by the commandment of Solyman cauſed to retire. At this Aſſault the Governor of Eubæa, Solyman his Lieutenant General, a man of great honour (if any of the Turks Slaves are ſo to be accounted) was ſlain, for whoſe death Solyman was exceeding penſive and heavy.

The Engliſh Bulwark aſſaulted the third time by Muſtapha.

Muſtapha the Baſſa finding himſelf in diſgrace with Solyman for the two unfortunate Aſſaults by him given at the Engliſh Station, determined if it were poſſible by a third to recover his loſt credit; and for his better ſucceſs therein, agreed with Achimetes another great Commander, at the ſame time to aſſault the Spaniſh Bulwark; according to this reſolution Achimetes having with a Mine ſuddainly blown up a great part of the Wall of the Spaniſh Station, in the thick of the Duſt and Smoke, preſently entred his men, who by the ruines of the Wall recovered the top of the Rampiers. Muſtapha alſo at the ſame inſtant hardly charged the Engliſh, ſo that in both places was made a hard and doubtful Fight. Muſtapha, deſiring nothing more than with better ſucceſs now to redeem his former diſhonour, did what he might to incourage the Souldiers, calling upon them by name, and putting them in remembrance of their former Victories. The Rhodians on the other ſide mindful of their former honour, with the greatneſs of the preſent danger valiantly repulſed the Enemy, and forced him with ſhame to retire. In this Aſſault many Engliſhmen were ſlain, and Prejanes alſo ſore hurt, having before ſlain many of the Turks. Muſtapha beſide the loſs of his men, had alſo two of his Enſigns taken by Chriſtopherus Vaulderick, Commendator of the German Knights. Achimetes having won the top of the Walls, had there ſet up the Turkiſh Enſigns; but by the valiantneſs of the Defendants, and by means of certain ſmall Pieces of Ordnance, by Martiningus aptly placed in the Houſes before the new made breach, and by force of Shot out of the Flankers on both ſides of the Breach, whereof none fell in vain, he was again inforced to forſake the Walls and to retire.

The Turks Enſigns advanced to the top of the walls, are again caſt down.

The three and twentieth day of September, the Turkiſh Captains hoping by means of a Mine which they had made againſt the Avergne Bulwark, to enter and win the City, approaching the Walls with great Multitudes of Souldiers, ready to have entred upon the blowing up of the Mine, which being met with a countermine out the City, wrought not ſuch effect as was by them expected; ſo that having received ſome harm, ſtanding in a place of great diſadvantage, and done nothing, they returned again into the Camp. Yet all the expert Captains probably conjecturing that the Wall might be inwardly ſhaken by the Mine, though it were not by them outwardly perceived, cauſed that part of the Wall to be moſt violently battered all the reſt of day and night following; and by the fury of their Artillery, made a fair and large Breach. All that night was heard in the Turks Camp an unwonted clattering of Weapons, and of men running too and fro, as if there had been ſome great matter a doing; which the Rhodians conjectured (as the truth was) to be a ſign of ſome great Aſſault to be ſhortly given.

Another breach made in the Walls.

Solyman reſolving the next day with all his Force to aſſault the new made Breach, after he had by himſelf in a melancholy mood walked up and down in his Tent a great part of the night, ſent for the chief Commanders of his Army, to whom he declared his mind as followeth;

Your Valour and Wiſdom (worthy Captains) needeth not any exhortation, yet the deſperate madneſs of our Enemies maketh me to ſpeak unto you theſe few words. Who whilſt they yet do, as from the beginning, as men without reaſon deſperately defend their City rent with our Artillery, ſhaken with our Mines, their Churches and Houſes beaten down about their Eears, wearied and worn out with Slaughter, Labour, and Wounds, which muſt needs befal men ſo oftentimes aſſaulted, they worthily ſeem unto our Souldiers men of invincible Force and Courage; which opinion to have removed, much concerneth the happy and wiſhed ſucceſs of our Aſſault. Wherefore I would have you with effectual perſwaſion and bountiful promiſes to hearten on our Men to the winning of this City. Beſide this, you ſhall open unto them my purpoſe and intent, and that they ſhould not think that they are brought hither to beſiege one City; but that in taking this one, they ſhall upon the matter make a way into all the Dominions of the Chriſtians. Here be the Kinſmen, Allies, and Friends of all the Kings, Princes and Potentates of Chriſtendom; here is all our Enemies Treaſure, the Spoil whereof promiſed unto our Souldiers may ſerve to great purpoſe to encourage them forward; here is the ſtore of Ordnance, Armor, and other Warlike Proviſion, which ſhall both furniſh us, and in time to come miſerably confound the reſt of the Chriſtians. We ſhall beſide this, enjoy a moſt goodly and rich City, with a Haven of all others moſt commodious, from whence all things neceſſary for War may at all time as occaſion ſhall require, by Land and Sea be ſupplied; which as they ſhall be to us things of great importance, ſo ſhall we deſpoil our Enemies of far greater. This is their Caſtle, Storehouſe, Treaſury and Armory; this is the very receptacle and place of refuge for all ſuch as trouble the Turks by Sea; from hence ſhall we have free ſcope and paſſage into Apulia, Calabria, Sicilia, and many other Chiſtian Countries. But as for your ſelves valiant Captains, when as I conſider how that you have within theſe few months by your Valour and Wiſdom ſubdued unto my Empire the ſtrong City of Belgrade, which my great Grandfather Mahomet that mighty Emperor could not with all his power get; I reſt in great hope that theſe fierce and obſtinate Chriſtians ſhall not long be able to defend themſelves in theſe their Dens and lurking places.

Having ended this Speech, the Captains every one unto his Company made known what the great Emperors Will and pleaſure was; and open Proclamation made through all the Camp, wherein the ſpoil of that rich City was all granted unto the Souldiers, as a Prey and Reward for the pains they were to take.

Solyman heavy with ſleep and care, laid himſelf down upon his Pallat to take his reſt. But the Great Maſter (to whom the unaccuſtomed ſtir of the Enemy portended ſome great matter) all that night in Arms painfully viewed every part of the City, chearfully encouraging his Souldiers to remember, That they did watch for the ſafety of their Country, their Lives and Liberty. It fortuned the ſame night, that a poor Chriſtian ſerving a Turk in the Camp, calling ſecretly unto the Watchmen upon the Walls, gave them warning that the Turks prepared the next day to give a general Aſſault unto the City. Which thing when the Great Maſter underſtood, becauſe he would have nothing done raſhly or fearfully (as it commonly happeneth in things done upon the ſuddain) called together his Knights, and ſpake unto them, as followeth:

The Great Maſter his oration unto his Knights.

I am glad ſacred Companions and Fellows in Arms, that the time is come when in one Battel getting unto your ſelves great honour, and defending your Country, you may be juſtly accounted the worthy defenders and Revengers of the Chriſtian Commonweal and Name. The people againſt whom we are to fight to morrow, aſſaileth us only preſuming upon their multitude; But if we meaſure Valour, not by number, but by Courage and Proweſs, undoubtedly a few reſolute men will eaſily overcome a multitude of Cowards. You know your Enemy, and the manner of his fight; you are to fight (moſt worthy Knights) with them whom you have always vanquiſhed at Sea, and in juſt Battel ſometimes overcome by Land, at ſuch time as with their whole power they aſſaulted your Walls; omitting in the mean time many hot skirmiſhes, wherein you ever put them to the worſt; Wherefore you and they in the Aſſault to morrow ſhall have ſuch Courage, as Conquerors and men conquered uſe to have. Neither will they fight, becauſe they dare fight, but becauſe the great Tyrant and violent command of their Captains enforceth them thereunto. Wherefore remembring what you are by birth, what opinion the Chriſtian Commonwealth hath conceived of you, where you are, and what you have taken upon you; take up your Arms with juſt fury and indignation, and fight againſt them, following one frantick youth, as if you ſaw your Slaves bearing Arms againſt you; whereunto you are inforced, not only by the indignity of the wrong by them offered, but alſo by neceſſity, which of it ſelf is of power to make Cowards valiant and hardy. For here we are in an Iſland from whence we cannot eſcape, and in a City, whoſe rent and battered Walls do not ſo much protect and defend us, as our Weapons; wherefore to morrow we muſt here either vanquiſh them, or die therefore; to morrow ſhall give unto us either joyful Victory, or a moſt honourable death.

The Turks aſſault the City in five places at once.

The Rhodians valiantly defend the City.

As he was yet thus ſpeaking, news of approach of the Enemy cauſed him to make an end; and every man haſted with ſpeed unto the place of his charge. The Enemy coming faſt on; with a moſt horrible cry (as their manner is) fiercely aſſailed the City in five places, where the Engliſh, Spaniſh, Italians, Narbonenſes, and Avergnoies had their Stations. To the aſſault of every of which places, Solyman had appointed ten thouſand Turks. Muſtapha the Baſſa calling upon the name of his great Prophet Mahomet, and promiſing unto the Souldiers the rich Spoil of the City, fiercely aſſailed the Engliſh Station, from whence he had been three times before ſhamefully repulſed. Pyrrhus the other great Baſſa, with like fury aſſaulted the Italian Station. In both places was maintained a cruel and deadly fight; the Turks fighting for the Prey, and the Rhodians for their Lives and Liberty. Neither was there any, of what degree or order ſoever, which did not that day fight for the defence of the City. The Prieſts and religious were not then exempted, but fought among other Souldiers; Women, Children, and with them the aged Fathers, beyond the ſtrength of their Bodies and courage of their Minds, brought Weapons unto the Defendants, ſome Stones, which they had digged out of the Streets, ſome burning Pitch-barrels, ſome Hoops with Wild-Fire, ſome ſcalding Oyl, ſome boiling Pitch; which being caſt down upon the Enemies, troubled them ſo, as nothing was more feared; for upon whomſoever it fell, it ſtuck faſt, and ſo ſcalded their Bodies, that they were glad to caſt down their Weapons to tear off their Clothes, wherewith many of them rent off the Skin and Fleſh alſo. All which things fell ſo thick upon the Turks, as if it had rained Fire and Stones, beſides the deadly Shot, which amongſt ſuch a multitude of Enemies never fell in vain. The Great Maſter having a careful Eye over every part of the City, after he had well relieved the Italian Station, which was at the firſt hardly diſtreſſed by Pyrrhus, left there Antonius Monterollus, one of the Knights of the Order, with ſuch Company as he thought convenient for the ſafety of that place, and went himſelf with the reſt unto the Engliſh Station, which was then hardly laid to by the Baſſa Muſtapha. But whilſt he was there buſied in repulſing the Enemy, and had now well relieved the place, a ſuddain cry ran alongſt the Walls, that the Spaniſh Bulwark was already poſſeſſed by the Enemy; with which heavy news he was not a little troubled, but leaving there Emericus Gombaulus, one of the Knights of the Order, with a choſen Company of Souldiers for the defence of that place; he with his Guard haſted unto the Spaniſh Station, which he found by a wonderful chance already taken by the Enemy. In the beginning of the Aſſault, certain Turks to ſhun the danger of the Shot, had for fear hidden themſelves at the foot of this Bulwark, among the Stones, which had before been beaten down with the battery; in the mean time, other Turks of the ſame Regiment, under the leading of the valiant Captain Achimetes, hotly charged the Spaniards on the right hand of the Bulwark, not medling with the Bulwark it ſelf, as a thing of greateſt ſtrength; the valiant Souldiers appointed for the defence of the Bulwark, ſeeing their Fellows and Countrymen diſtreſſed faſt by them on the right hand, could not indure to ſtand ſtill as lookers on, but left the Bulwark, and went to the place ſo hardly aſſaulted; where whilſt they were valiantly encountring the Enemy, the cowardly Turks who had before hid themſelves for fear, hearing all ſtill over their Heads, and thereby gueſſing (as the truth was) that the Defendants were drawn thence to another place more diſtreſſed; to colour their fear, and prove their good fortune, like tall fellows, crept out of the holes wherein they had before for fear hidden themſelves, and ſecretly crawling up the battered Walls of the Bulwark, got into it before they were diſcovered, where finding none but a few Souldiers (who buſied in removing of a great Piece unto a place more convenient for the annoying of the Enemy, had laid down their Weapons) they ſuddainly ſet upon them, ſlew them, overthrew the Chriſtian Enſigns, and ſo became Maſters of that ſtrong Fort. The Turks without ſeeing that, wonderfully commended the Valour of thoſe men, and blaming themſelves of Cowardiſe, made great haſt through the midſt of the Town-Ditch to get up into the Bulwark to help their fellows. But in going through the Ditch, they were ſo cut off with Shot on both ſides out of the Flankiers, that few of them could get up into the deſired Bulwark. And the Great Maſter with a crew of valiant Souldiers, nothing fearing the armed Enemy, now in poſſeſſion of the Bulwark over their Heads, with great reſolution ſcaled the ſame. In the mean time Hugo Caponus, a Spaniard, and Menotius a Frenchman, both Knights of the Order, with a Company of Cretenſian Souldiers brake into the Bulwark by a Gate which the Turks had not as yet boulted, and being once got in, they made of the Turks a quick diſpatch; for whom they ſlew not with the Sword, they inforced to miſchief themſelves for haſt back again over the Walls. The Bulwark thus again recovered, which had been two hours in poſſeſſion of the Enemy, and the City delivered of a wonderful fear, the Great Maſter (well worthy of that name) leaving a ſufficient number of Souldiers for the keeping of that Fort, went with the reſt of his Company unto the place where the Spaniards with the reſt of the Defendants ſore charged by Achimetes, and now wearied and almoſt ſpent, had much ado to hold out, who incouraged with the ſight of the Great Maſter, as if Victory had attended upon him, with great cries and ſigns of joy valiantly and with great ſlaughter repulſed their Enemies, as if they had been freſh men. Long it were to recount the deadly fight and hard adventures which befel at the Aſſault of the other two Stations of the Avergnoys and Narbonenſes; but the Turks were in every place put to the worſt, and lay by heaps ſlain in the Ditches and Breaches of the Town. Solyman from his ſtanding (for that purpoſe made of high Maſts) beholding the miſerable ſlaughter of his men, and no hope of gaining the City, cauſed a Retreat to be ſounded, a thing welcome both to the Rhodians and the Turks. In this terrible Aſſault, which endured by the ſpace of ſix hours, divers of the Knights of the Order were ſlain, eſpecially of the French and Spaniſh Nation, with one hundred and fifty common Souldiers, all worthy of eternal fame; and

The Spaniſh Bulwark again recovered.

and of the Turks (as they which write moſt modeſtly report) twenty thouſand. The young Tyrant was ſo much offended with the ſhameful repulſe he had received at this laſt Aſſault, that he fell into a rage againſt all them which had perſwaded him to enter into that action, but eſpecially againſt the great Baſſa Muſtapha, whom he accuſed as an unfaithful Counſellor, and chief perſwader of that unlucky War; who flattering him in his vain humor, by extolling his Forces above meaſure, and falſly extenuating the power of the Enemy, aſſuring him that upon the firſt approach of his Army they would yield themſelves without reſiſtance, had drawn him into that dangerous Expedition, like to ſort to the great diſhonour of himſelf and all the Othoman Family; for which doing he adjudged him worthy of death, and in great fury commanded the Executioner without further delay to put him to death in his preſence. Which dreadful doom ſo ſuddainly and upon ſo light an occaſion, given upon a man of ſo great mark and quality, ſtruck ſuch a terror into the minds of all there-preſent, that none of them durſt ſpeak one word againſt the rigor of that ſentence, or ſo much as ſet a ſigh in pitying of his caſe. The Executioner now ready to give the fatal ſtroke, Pyrrhus the moſt ancient of all the Baſſaes, moved with compaſſion, and preſuming of his great favour with the Tyrant, whom he had from his Childhood had the charge and government of, ſtept forth, and appealing unto his mercy, earneſtly requeſted him to ſpare his life. Wherewith Solyman was ſo filled with wrath and indignation, that for his preſumption, and for ſending for him to Conſtantinople, to come to that dangerous Siege, he commanded him to be executed alſo. All the reſt of the Counſellors ſeeing the danger of theſe two great men, fell down at the Feet of the fuming Tyrant, craving pardon; ſaying, That the Enemies ground had already drunk too much of the Turkiſh Blood, and was not to be further moiſtned with the Blood of two ſuch noble Perſonages and worthy Counſellors. Solyman moved with this general interceſſion of his great men, pauſing a little upon the matter, the heat of his Fury being ſomething over, ſuffered himſelf to be intreated, and granted them their lives; unto Pyrrhus for his great Age and Wiſdom, and to Muſtapha for his Wives ſake, who was the Tyrants natural Siſter, ſometime the Wife of Boſtanges.

Solyman in his fury commandeth the two great Baſſaes, Muſtapha and Pyrrhus to be put to death.

The Baſſaes ſpared at the interceſſion of the other Counſellors.

All the time of this Siege, the Turks great Fleet, furniſhed with Men and all manner of Warlike Proviſion, lay before the entrance of the Haven without doing any thing at all; for the Admiral being no man of War, ſeeing the mouth of the Haven chained, and the Caſtles upon the entrance full of Ordnance, and ſtrongly manned, durſt not attempt either to enter the Haven, or beſiege the Caſtle; for which his Cowardiſe, and for that he had negligently ſuffered Proviſion both of Victual and Munition to be conveied into the City during the time of the Siege, to the great relief of the beſieged, he was by Solyman adjudged to die a moſt cruel death; but by the mediation of Achimetes, one of his beſt Men of War, the ſeverity of that ſentence was changed into a puniſhment, unto any noble mind more grievous than death it ſelf; for he was by Solymans commandment, openly ſet upon the Poup of the Admiral Gally, and there as a Slave received at the hands of the Executioner a hundred Stripes with a Cudgel, and ſo with ſhame was thruſt out of his Office.

Solyman diſplaceth his Admiral and puniſheth him as a Slave.

After that Solyman had in ſo many places with all his power ſo long time in vain beſieged the Rhodes, his haughty Courage began to quail, ſo that he was upon point to have raiſed his Siege and left the Iſland; yea the grief he had conceived, went ſo near him, that he many times fainted and lay ſpeechleſs, as if he had been a dead man. The remembrance of ſo many unfortunate Aſſaults, the death of ſo many worthy Captains, the loſs of ſo many valiant Souldiers (ſufficient to have ſubdued a great Kingdom) ſo much grieved him, that a great while after he ſhunned the company of Men, and would not ſuffer himſelf to be ſpoken withal; until at length he was again by Abraham his Minion, a man in whom he took ſingular pleaſure, recomforted, and perſwaded to continue the Siege; for that time (as he ſaid) which worketh all things, would at length tame the fierceneſs of his Enemies, whom the Sword could not upon the ſuddain ſubdue. In the mean time Solyman for his pleaſure, and to ſhew unto the Rhodians, that he purpoſed not to depart, began to build a ſumptuous Caſtle upon the top of the Mount Philermus in the eye of the City. During which time divers Letters were ſhot into the City with Turkiſh Arrows out of the Camp, wherein many of Solymans moſt ſecret Counſels were revealed, and the revolt of a great man promiſed, which the Rhodians by many circumſtances gathered to have been Muſtapha, who could not eaſily forget the injury ſo lately offered unto him by Solyman; needs it muſt be ſome of Solymans ſecret Counſel, otherwiſe he could not have revealed ſo great ſecrets as it were out of the Boſom of Solyman. But ſee the chance, at the very ſame time, tidings came unto Solyman, that Cayerbeius the Governor of Egypt was dead; in whoſe place Solyman ſent Muſtapha to Caire as Governor of Egypt, by that honourable preferment again to pleaſe his diſcontented mind, after which time no more Letters came into the City.

Solyman exceedingly grieved with the repulſe and loſs received at the Siege of the Rhodes was upon point to have left the ſame.

Now the Turks began to make fair Wars, their terrible battery began to grow calm, and for certain days it ſeemed by the manner of their proceeding, that they purpoſed rather by long Siege than by Aſſault to take the Town. Nevertheleſs the Enemies watching day and night in their Trenches, uſed all the policy they could, ſometimes offering unto the Souldiers upon the Walls great rewards, if they would yield up the City, and ſometimes threatning them as faſt; and to breed a diſlike amongſt the Defendants, they would oftentimes ſay that Solyman deſired only to be revenged upon the Latines, without meaning any harm unto the Greeks.

It was now the beginning of October, and Winter began to grow faſt on, great rain, with terrible thundering and lightning, and mighty Tempeſts, Heavens threats, then fell ſo abundantly, that the Turks before wearied in body with labor and wounds, were now alſo in mind diſcouraged. And that more increaſed their fear, the Sea was grown ſo rough, that the Admiral was not able in that open and dangerous Sea longer to ride it out with his Gallies; but was inforced to ſlip his Anchors, and as he might to run his Gallies on ground. In theſe troubles wherewith both Solyman himſelf and all his Army were at furtheſt of their Wits, and almoſt quite diſcouraged, Achimetes one of his moſt valiant and expert Captains came to comfort him, and promiſed if he would continue the Siege, in ſhort time to make him an open way into the City; upon confidence whereof, Solyman to encourage his fainting Souldiers, now ſcarce able for cold and lack of courage to hold their Weapons in their hands, cauſed them to be aſſembled before his Pavilion, where from an high place, he comforted them in this ſort:

Achimetes promiſeth to make a way for Solyman into the City.

I am

Solyman comforteth his Souldiers and perſwadeth them with patience to endure the Siege.

I am not ignorant (moſt valiant Souldiers) what great things you endure for mine Honour, and the Glory of mine Empire. This continual threatnings of the Heavens, this immoderate Rain, this terrible Thunder and Lightning, the coldneſs of the Weather, the want of Neceſſaries, with the manifold miſeries of this long Siege, do much perſwade me, to give you leave to lay down your Arms and to take your reſt. But firſt let us conſider if unto Men of Courage it be not a diſhonour, for the teediouſneſs of Rain and Tempeſt, to leave unto our Enemies the Victory already in our hands, and ſhamefully to forſake our Trenches, Forts, Mounts, overtopping not only the Walls of the City, but mating the Heavens, with ſuch other like Works made with my infinite Charge and your great Travel, all for the taking of this City. Truly this War either ſhould not have been taken in hand at all, or being once begun, is to be ended for the honour of the Othoman Empire. Which for ſo much as it could not be accompliſhed in Summer; the reputation of mine Empire in Common, and the regard of the Commodity of every one of you in private, enforceth me to perform it in Winter. For if we ſhall from hence depart with our Army, who doubts but the Enemy, not only for deſire of revenge, but alſo ſtrained by neceſſity, having loſt all he had of his own, will pray upon your Countries, Houſes, and Goods, and will bring you, your Wives, and Children, into a far more miſerable Slavery and Bondage, than that wherein he himſelf now is? Wherefore I adviſe you to continue the Siege, and never to depart before you have attained unto the end of your deſires. And admit there were no neceſſity in the matter, yet the Honour and Fame of the Action ought to impoſe upon you a reſolution both of Body and Mind to endure the Siege: For the Eies and Countenances of all Nations, eſpecially the Chriſtians, are fixed upon you; whom when they ſhall underſtand not to be able to endure the Field one Winter, they will of right call you Summer Birds, which ſo ſoon as any Storm ariſeth look after your Houſes and places of Repoſe. It is reported, that the Grecians for a Strumpet beſieged Troy ten years; and ſhall not the Turks, vexed and oppreſſed with Slaughters, Robberies, Invaſions both by Sea and Land, and that more is, with the ſervitude of two hundred and fourteen years, endure one Winters Siege? They will ſay, that the terror of your Name is but vain, and that Fame hath encreaſed the ſame (as many other things more) which not ſeen, are more feared in far Countries amongſt Men of ſmall experience: And that now every Man may ſafely enough abide your force, which make your Invaſions rather upon a fury and bravery than upon any good reſolution, which in all kind of War, (but eſpecially in beſieging of Cities) is moſt neceſſary; whereof many being by natural ſituation and fortification impregnable, time hath with her Handmaids, Famine and Thirſt, overcome and vanquiſhed, as it ſhall do this City of the Rhodes: againſt which beloved in Arms, there is a ſecret miſchief prepared, which may not in this open Audience be publiſhed; for it is as neceſſary that the vulgar ſort ſhould be ignorant of ſome things, as to know the ſame.

Many thought, that this was ſpoken rather of policy than upon any good ground; and although his hot perſwaſion had little moved the could courage of his deſpairing Souldiers, yet the regard of duty in that moſt Loyal Nation, with the greedy expectation of ſo great a ſecret, overcame all other difficulties; ſo that they departed (at leaſtwiſe in ſhew) contented to endure whatſoever ſhould befal.

Achimetes winneth the Vaumures of the Avergne Bulwark, raiſeth a ſtrong Penthouſe againſt the Wall, and ſo undermineth the ſame.

Achimetes author of this great expectation, and the only hope of Solymans ſucceſs, came oftentimes and aſſailed the Vaumures of the Avergne Station, which although they were not very high, yet were they always valiantly defended by the Rhodians. It fortuned, that this warlike Captain daily attempting the Vaumures, in the end by force obtained the ſame, and ſo poſſeſſed of the place he ſo much deſired, deſperately kept it until greater help came running in, who with wonderful expedition (with matter for that purpoſe before prepared) clapt up a ſtrong and defenſible covering in manner of a Penthouſe againſt the Town-Wall, betwixt the Wall and the Vaumure, under which they ſhrowded themſelves from the Defendants; which was an eaſie matter for ſuch a multitude to do, the Ditches of the Town in that place being now filled up ſo high, that the Defendants could not out of the Flankers ſcour the Ditch, nor yet without manifeſt danger come to caſt any thing down upon them from the top of the Walls; for the Turks Harquebuſiers which lying upon their Mounts, higher than the battered Walls of the City, ſuffered none to appear upon them without danger. So that the Rhodians who erſt thought themſelves at great quiet, were now overtaken with a ſuddain and an unexpected Miſchief; which at the firſt filled the City with fear and heavy ſilence, which ſtraightways after brake out into pitiful Outcries and Lamentations. The Turks lurking under their Penthouſe, labouring with Mattocks and Pickaxes to dig up the Foundation of the Wall; and Prejanes forward and couragious to do what might be done, threw down upon the Turks, Fire, Scalding Oyl, Burning Pitch, Wild Fire and ſuch things. But when the miſerable Men which ſhrunk from the Work for fear of the Fire, were again beaten forward by their imperious Commanders, and preſently ſlain if they made any delay, and freſh Men ſtill thruſt on in ſtead of ſuch as were hurt or ſlain; the fatal Work begun the ſeventh day of October, went apace forward, with the great and continual labour of theſe wretched Slaves. A great number of the Common Souldiers whom the Turks call Aſapi was imployed in this work; of whom Solyman in this Siege of the Rhodes, and other his Expeditions, made not much more account but as of Pioniers to work in Mines and to caſt up Trenches, and oftentimes with their Bodies to fill Town-Ditches to make a way for the Janizaries to paſs over upon; they by the conſtraint of Achimetes undermined the Wall, and as they wrought, ſhoared up the ſame again with Timber, whereunto they afterwards ſet Fire, hoping by that means to overthrow the Wall; which falling not out according to their expectation, for that they had not far enough undermined it, they aſſailed with great Hooks and ſtrong Ropes to have pulled it down. But the Rhodians with their great Ordnance from the Avergne Bulwark, quickly put them from that mad work with great ſlaughter, and fruſtrated all their long labour. Achimetes thus diſappointed of his purpoſe, ſtood in great doubt whether he ſhould give over the enterpriſe, for that he ſaw he laboured in vain, or elſe in that dangerous place to expect ſome better hap, the only mean to ſave him from the Tyrants heavy diſpleaſure, who as he knew meaſured all things by the event. Solyman underſtanding by Achimetes that the Wall (although it was not overthrown as was expected) was yet ſore ſhaken and weakned with undermining, cauſed his Battery to be planted againſt that part of the Wall ſo undermined; which ſo many ways weakned, and now ſore battered, fell down daily more and more. For remedy whereof, the

The miſerable ſtate of the Common Souldiers of the Turks, and the ſmall account is made of them.

the Rhodians laboured night and day to raiſe a new Wall, in ſtead of that which was beaten down.

At the ſame time, Solyman perſwaded by the general opinion of all his great Captains, that the City was that day or never to be taken, determining to give another general Aſſault, cauſed Proclamation to be made through his Camp; wherein he gave the ſpoil of the City unto his Souldiers, and the more to encourage them, ſpake unto them in few words, as followeth:

Solyman encourageth his Souldiers to a freſh Aſſault.

Fortune at length valiant Souldiers, having notably proved your Courage and Patience, now offereth unto you the worthy Rewards of your Labour and Pains. The Victory and Wealth of your Enemies which you have ſo much deſired, is now in your Hands. Now is the time to make an end of this mungrel People, of whom more are ſlain than left alive; and they not Men, but the Shadows and Ghoſts of Men, feeble and ſpent with Hunger, Wounds, Wants and Labour; who will I know reſiſt you, not becauſe they ſo dare, but becauſe of neceſſity they ſo muſt, enforced thereunto with all extremities. Wherefore now revenge your ſelves of the Falſhood, Cruelty, and Villanies of theſe Chriſtians, and make them a woful example to all poſterity, that never Man hereafter preſume to offer injury to a Turk, in whatſoever State he be. The way is already open into the City, there is a fair Breach made whereby thirty Horſemen may at once enter, nothing wanteth but Courage in you to aſſail the ſame.

The Souldiers encouraged with this Speech of their Emperor, made great ſhew of cheerfulneſs, and promiſed to do their uttermoſt devoir, threatning unto the Chriſtians moſt horrible Death and miſerable Captivity.

The diſtreſſed eſtate of the Rhodians and their couragious reſolution therein.

In the mean time, the great Shot flying continually through the Breach, did beat down many Houſes in the City; but the Countermure new built againſt the Breach ſtanding upon a lower ground, it ſeldom toucht, to the great good of the Rhodians. The ratling of the falling Houſes, the horrible noiſe of the Enemy, with the thundering of the great Artillery, wonderfully terrified the miſerable Citizens; in every place was heard the Lamentation of Women and Children, every thing ſhewed the heavineſs of the time, and ſeemed as altogether loſt and forlorn. The day thus troubleſomely ſpent, the night followed much more troubleſome; and after the night, the day of Aſſault of all other moſt dreadful; for with the dawning thereof, the gliſtering Enſigns of the Enemy were ſeen flying in the Wind, and the Turks cheerful with the hope of Spoil and Victory, haſted towards the Breach with great Outcries and Songs, after their Country manner; and there before one of the Gates of the City called St. Ambroſe Gate, ſet down a great number of their Enſigns deckt with Garlands, in token of Victory. The Turks great Fleet alſo at the ſame time ſailing too and fro before the Haven, made ſhew as if it would have aſſailed the City on that ſide; who had ſeen the City ſo beſet, would have ſaid that it would at one inſtant have been beſieged both by Sea and Land; and to moſt Mens judgments, it ſeemed that the Rhodian State ſhould that day have taken end and been deſtroyed. Yet for all theſe extremities, the Rhodians were nothing diſcouraged, but looking upon their Weapons as the only remainders of their hopes, not regarding any danger, upon the Alarm given came running out of their Houſes by heaps unto the Walls, like deſperate Men oppoſing their Bodies in ſtead of their battered Walls againſt their Enemies in defence of their Country. There needed neither Exhortation nor command of Captain, every Man was unto himſelf a perſwader to fight valiantly in defence of the City; and one of them propounded unto another the cruel death, the miſerable ſervitude, the mocks and taunts they ſhould indure, if they ſhould chance to come into the proud Enemies hand; all which was to be avoided either by honourable Victory or Death. The Turks conducted by Achimetes, fiercely aſſailed the Breach, which was by the Rhodians (ſtanding upon the ruins of their Walls) valiantly defended. In the mean time the diſmaied Matrons and Maidens, ſome in their Houſes, with heavy Hearts expected the woful Deſtruction of the City and themſelves, otherſome in the Churches with Floods of Tears and lamentable Cries, poured forth their Prayers to the Almighty, craving his help in that their hard diſtreſs, and to protect them againſt their barbarous Enemies. The deadly Fight at the Breach, was on both ſides with great courage and force maintained. The Turks were in good hope forthwith to win the City, if they did but a little more ſtrain themſelves; and therefore to terrifie the Rhodians the more, oftentimes in their fighting gave out moſt terrible outcries; and the Rhodians accounted the Turks as good as vanquiſhed, for they being ſo many in number, and in a place of ſuch indifferency, had not yet prevailed; beſide that, they were greatly incouraged with the greatneſs of the common danger, and the ſight one of anothers Valour, ſo that by their invincible Courage the Turks were inforced ſhamefully to retire. The Rhodians ſeeing their Enemies turn their Backs, gave a great ſhout in deriſion of them; the Turks diſdaining that they in number many (and now Victors, if they ſhould with a little reſolution maintain the Aſſault they had begun) ſhould be ſo derided of a handful of Men as good as already vanquiſhed, with great indignation returned again to the Breach, and more furiouſly aſſailed the Rhodians than at the firſt. At which time the City had undoubtedly been taken, had not they which defended the ends of the Wall, yet ſtanding on both ſides of the Breach, out of their Barricadoes with their Shot overwhelmed the Turks thronging in at the Breach, and others with murthering Shot out of the Flankers of the new built Wall ſo cut them in ſunder, that a greater ſlaughter for the time was hardly in any place ſeen. Achimetes beholding the wonderful ſlaughter of his Souldiers, and that he fought with great diſadvantage and loſs, againſt deſperate Men, who reſolving to die, feared no danger, gave over the Aſſault, and again retired; leaving behind him in the Breach and Town-Ditch, the Carkaſſes of five thouſand of his dead Turks beſides many more which afterwards died upon the hurts they received.

The Turks trouble the Rhodians with continual Alarms, and by caſting up of Trenches got into the City.

This Aſſault was given unto the Town the laſt day of November, a day dedicated to St. Andrew; after which time the Captains of the Turkiſh Army, although they deſpaired not of the Victory, yet terrified with ſo great ſlaughter of their Men, reſolved with one accord no more to attempt the City with any notable Aſſault; but by ſundry great Trenches to be made through the midſt of the ruins of the Walls, to get into the City; and with Mattocks and Pickaxes to overthrow the new made Wall and another Barricado which the Defendants had made within the ſame; and in the mean time whilſt this was in doing, to keep the Rhodians ſtill buſied with continual Skirmiſhes and Alarms. This deviſe put in execution by the wonderful labour of ſuch a multitude of People, ſerved the Enemy to greater purpoſe than all that he had before done; who daily overthrowing or deſtroying the new Fortifications which the Rhodians made in ſtead of them which were before overthrown, and by little and little creeping on further, drave the Defendants to that extremity, that they were glad to pull down many of their Houſes, therewith to make new Fortifications, and to make their City leſs, by caſting up of new Trenches; ſo that in ſhort time they were brought to that point, that they could not well tell which place to fortifie firſt, the Enemy was now ſo far crept within them; for the ground which the Enemy had thus gained within the City, was almoſt 200 Paces in breadth, and 150 Paces in length.

Parley offered by the Turks to the Rhodians.

Solyman, although he did now aſſure himſelf of the Victory, and was by nature cruel and deſirous of revenge, yet perſwaded by Achimetes and Caſſius (two of his moſt valiant Captains) that for the inlarging of his Empire, nothing was better than the fame of clemency; commanded Pyrrhus the old Baſſa to prove if the Rhodians might by parley be drawn to yield their City upon reaſonable conditions. Whereupon the Baſſa ſent one Hieronimus Menelia, a Genoway, unto the Walls, who craving of the Defendants ſafe Conduct, ſaid he had ſomething to ſay tending to the common good of the diſtreſſed City. All Mens minds were preſently filled with expectation of ſome great matter, and he commanded to ſpeak. Who anſwered, that he might not deliver his Meſſage openly, but would either by Speech in ſecret, or by Letters deliver the ſame unto one Mathias de Via his Countryman, one of the Citizens of the Rhodes. When Francis Fornovius, one of the Knights of the Order, a Frenchman of a cholerick diſpoſition, whoſe great courage was well ſeen in all that Siege (having as it is reported, with ſhot out of Saint Georges Tower himſelf ſlain five hundred Turks during the time of that Siege) being now preſent, and moved with indignation to here a motion made of private conference with the Enemy; bent his Piece upon the Meſſenger, and cauſed him forthwith to depart without doing his Meſſage. Many who in time of the Aſſault feared not any danger, but were altogether become deſperate and careleſs of themſelves, after that they had underſtood that the Enemy had offered parley, and that they began to conceive ſome hope of life, reſorted unto the Great Maſter, requeſting him, that he would provide for the ſafety of his loving People, whoſe warlike Forces were with many Aſſaults ſore weakned, the City beaten down about their Ears, and moſt of them which were left, either wounded or ſick: They had (as they ſaid) now ſufficiently proved both their force and fortune; wherefore he ſhould do well, to beware, leſt while he were too long in conſulting, the Enemy ſhould conceive a further indignation in ſeeing his offers refuſed. With theſe and ſuch Speeches they inforced the Great Maſter to ſend Embaſſadors to Solyman. The Men that were ſent, were Anthonius Groleus a Frenchman, Enſign-bearer for the Order, a Man of great reputation for his wiſdom and experience; and with him Robertus Brauſius, a Man of great gravity, and skilful in the Greek Tongue; for whom was received as Pledges, a Kinſman of the great Captain Achimetes, and a certain Epirot which fled out of the City unto the Turks, becauſe one of the Grecian Captains had ſtruck him with his open Hand, a Man of a ſharp Wit, and one that could perfectly ſpeak the Greek, Turkiſh, and Italian Tongues, as appeared to his great credit amongſt the Enemies, being had of them in great regard, although he was not known whilſt he dwelt in the City, that he was any ſuch Man. After that came alſo Solymans Enterpreter, for he himſelf could ſpeak no other Language more than his own, accounting it a great diſgrace, and againſt the Othoman Empire to uſe any other Language. The Embaſſadors admitted unto Solymans preſence, told him, That they were ſent to know, for what cauſe he had ſent to require parley? Who in a flaming heat, as if he had known nothing thereof, ſaid there was no ſuch matter; and commanding them preſently to void his Camp, ſent them away with Letters to the Great Maſter and the Citizens, to this effect.

Secret parley rejected.

Solymans Letter ſent to the Great Maſter and the Rhodians, by their Embaſſadors.

If I had not compaſſion of human Infirmity, which oftentimes tumbleth headlong Mens ambitious and haughty Minds, into moſt dangerous and unneceſſary Miſchiefs, truly I would not have directed unto you theſe Letters at this time; but as you have well deſerved, perſecute you with death and moſt miſerable ſervitude; which how eaſie a thing were it for me to do, you your ſelves know. But having now ſufficiently tried my force, if you be wiſe make proof of my Clemency. You have already ſatisfied your own fury, your own mad humor, and now adviſe your ſelves, lay your Hand upon your Heart, and without delay yield your ſelves as I command; your Lives I give, I give you your Wealth, and more than that, your choice to tarry there ſtill, or to depart; Refuſe not the grace frankly offered, which was of you to have been moſt heartily deſired. It ſhall not always be lawful for you (as at this preſent) to make choice of both. From our Camp.

Upon the return of the Embaſſadors, the poor of all ſorts flockt together to the Great Maſter his Houſe, not far from the Breach; where after the multitude of the common People was diſmiſſed, and the chief of the Burgers ſent for, the imperious Letter of the Turkiſh Tyrant was openly read before the Knights of the Order, and the better ſort of the Citizens. Whereunto the Great Maſter accounting it both honour enough, and ſufficient term of life honourably to die, anſwered in this ſort.

The Great Maſter his opinion concerning that Solyman demanded by his Letters

You heard (ſacred Fellows in Arms, and valiant Citizens of the Rhodes*) theſe imperious and ſorrowful Letters; whereunto how we are to anſwer, requireth no great deliberation; we muſt as reſolute Men either yield or die; all hope of the Victory is gone, except forraign Aid come. Wherefore if you will follow my Counſel, let us with Weapons in our Hands, until the laſt Gaſp and the ſpending of the laſt drop of our Blood, like valiant Men defend our Faith and Nobility received from our Anceſtors, and the Honour which we have ſo long time gotten both at Home and Abroad; and let it never be ſaid, that our Honour died but with our Selves.*

This Speech of the Great Maſter ſeemed unto many, heavier than the imperious Commandment of the Turkiſh Tyrant; and a great while Men ſtood ſilent, heavily looking one upon another, many with changing of their countenance and outward geſture, more than by words expreſſing what they thought in heart. At length a certain Greek Prieſt, with great compaſſion of mind (as it ſeemed) and Tears trickling down his Cheeks, brake forth into theſe words:

And

A notable Speech of a Greek Prieſt perſwading the Great Maſter to yield.

And I would alſo hold my peace, if I were a private Man; and not firſt of all in ſo great and troubled aſſembly, broach mine own opinion. But foraſmuch as the regard of our common preſervation, can wring a word out of no Mans mouth; and all Men know, that now is the time to ſpeak and ſay what every Man thinketh beſt, which ſhall neither always nor long be granted unto us, I will not let it now overpaſs and ſlip away: Wherefore let us ſuppoſe, that no command of a moſt mighty Prince beſieging us, were come unto us, but that I were reaſoning as a private Man with his Neighbour, or one Friend with another by the fire ſide, or in our cups without care, without any great affection to either party, as Men indifferent not liking or hating (as Men oftentimes do of Princes Affairs which concern them nothing) and then (as I hope) my Speech ſhall be unto you neither unpleaſant nor unprofitable. We Greeks and Latins, with joyned Arms, have now theſe ſix Months withſtood our deadly Enemies, not only abroad before our Walls, but alſo in the very bowels of our City, without any forreign help; which as we have of long time all vainly looked for, ſo are we now every one of us out of hope thereof. And yet our Enemy either moved with the ſecret goodneſs of God, or elſe ignorant of our ſtrength and forces, ſpent with Wounds, Slaughter, Sickneſs, and perpetual Labour, doth voluntarily offer that unto us, which was of us to be moſt of all deſired and earneſtly ſued for. Your publick and private Treaſures, the bodies of your ſelves, your Wives and Children he keepeth unviolated; he taketh from us only the City, which he hath for moſt part already beaten down and taken. Worthy Great Maſter, and you moſt valiant Knights, I have known proweſs and valour in many Battels at Sea, but eſpecially in this Siege; whereof ſeeing there is no more uſe in this our deſperate eſtate, I do appeal unto your wiſdom and diſcretion. Since all is now the Conquerors, in that he leaveth unto us our lives and Goods, that is to be accounted gains, and the yielding up of the City and Iſland no loſs, which the victorious Enemy already commandeth; which although it be a heavy matter and grievous unto the Nobility, yet your Fortune perſwadeth you thereunto. Wherefore if you be to be moved with any compaſſion, I account it better to yield, than to be ſlain our ſelves, or to ſee your Wives and Children by Law of Arms to be led away before your Faces into miſerable Captivity and Servitude. If any Chriſtian compaſſion remain in your warlike Minds, I beſeech you ſeek not the utter deſtruction of this innocent People, who (I may with modeſty ſay) hath not evil deſerved of you, whom Chriſt Jeſus, whom the Enemy himſelf, would have preſerved. That I ſay this which I ſpeak unto you for Chriſtian Charity, and for no other cauſe, let this be a ſufficient Teſtimony, That ſo long as you were able to reſiſt by your own power, or hoped for Aid from forrein Princes, I never ſpake word, or once thought of yielding; but now ſeeing the fatal ruine of all things about us, our common Eſtate brought unto the uttermoſt extremity, our deadly Enemy in the heart of our City, no hope, and that the War cannot longer be protracted; I wiſh you to yield, and for my part had rather make choice of Peace than War, and to prove the Enemies Favour than his Fury.

Moſt of them there preſent, were of the ſame mind with the Prieſt. But as nothing can be ſo reaſonably ſpoken as to content all Men, ſo this Speech was not of them all liked; ſome there were (though not many) which conſidering the harms they had done unto the Turks, and doubting with what ſafety they might yield themſelves into the power of that faithleſs People, had rather to have fought it out to the laſt Man, and ſo to have left unto them a bloody Victory. Amongſt theſe, one bold ſpoken Fellow ſtept forth, and in preſence of them all diſſwaded the yielding up of the City, in this ſort:

A moſt reſolute Speech of a common Souldier, diſſwading the yielding up of the Rhodes.

I have not been with any thing more unacquainted, than to deliver my opinion before Princes, or in ſuch great and publick Aſſemblies, being always more deſirous modeſtly to hear other Mens Opinions, than impudently to thruſt forth mine own. But now, ſeeing extream neceſſity will not longer ſuffer me to keep my wonted courſe of ſilence, I will frankly ſpeak my Mind, and tell you what in my Opinion is to be anſwered unto the heavy Meſſage and imperious Command of the moſt prefidious Tyrant. This cruel Enemy hath overthrown our Wall, and is entred three hundred Foot and more within our City, and as a moſt troubleſome Gueſt liveth and converſeth with us as it were under the ſame Roof. Such as liſt not longer to endure ſuch an unwelcome Gueſt and troubleſome Neighbour, perſwade you becauſe he is troubleſome, to give him all; but (worthy and ſacred Knights) I am of far different Opinion; neither do I think a Poſſeſſion of two hundred and fourteen Years is ſo lightly to be delivered up, and the Ground forſaken; but rather that this troubleſome Intruder is in like manner to be himſelf troubled, and with deadly Skirmiſhes continually vexed; whom after we had by force of Arms and undaunted Courage, maugre his Head, held out five Months, at length he brake into our City, not by any Valour in himſelf, but holpen by time, which tameth all things, and ſince his firſt entrance it is now almoſt forty days, in which time for all his haſt, he hath ſcarcely got forward a hundred and thirty Paces, hindred by the Blocks, we have laid in his way, and will not ceaſe continually to lay, if we be wiſe Men, and mindful of our former Valour. Deſtroy me you heavenly Powers, before I ſee with theſe Eies theſe ſacred Knights to yield up this famous City of the Rhodes, the ancient Bulwark of Chriſtian Religion, unto our mercileſs Enemies, polluted with the infamous Superſtition of Mahomet; who beſides the inſatiable thirſt they have of our Blood, how faithleſs and miſchievous they are by Nature, if we know not, we need not make example of our ſelves, but we may take example by the calamity of Conſtantinople, the late miſery of Eubœa, and that which later was, of Methone, as alſo by the Mamalukes at Caire, miſerably ſlain contrary to the League, contrary to the Faith and Promiſe by the Turkiſh Emperor himſelf before given. What, do you not remember how the Death of the moſt noble Captains at Belgrade was of late procured by the falſhood, craft, and deceit of the ſame faithleſs Miſcreants? Let us then, being Men of Wit and Underſtanding, truſt theſe mad Beaſts, let us give our ſelves into their power, which have no regard of right or reaſon, of Religion, or any thing elſe; whoſe Covetouſneſs and Cruelty it is hard to ſay which is greater, which for theſe many years have plotted and laboured nothing more, than how by policy or force they may utterly root out the Name of the Rhodians, which they ſo deadly hate. They keep us ſhut up and beſieged now the ſixth Month, feeling together with us extream dangers and endleſs labour, ſlain by heaps before our Walls and Fortreſſes, and cannot be removed hence with Thunder, Lightning, Storms, Tempeſts, and all the Calamities of Winter, a time which giveth intermiſſion to all War, both by Sea and Land; ſo deſirous they are of Revenge, and greedy of our Blood; and that not altogether without cauſe, for we have alſo ſhed theirs, and gladly would ſtill ſo do, if it lay in our power. But ſeeing it ſeemeth good unto God otherwiſe, and that we are ſurprized with inevitable neceſſity, yet let us whilſt we are at liberty, and have power our ſelves, by honourable, death amongſt the Chriſtian Enſigns, eſchew the Torments and Reprpaches which our cruel Enemies hope to inflict upon us; ſo ſhall we enjoy eternal Fame and Glory, prepared both in Heaven and Earth for ſuch as honourably die in defence of their Prince and Country; which Honour it becometh not them to envy unto thy moſt noble Name and Vertue, worthy Grand Maſter, which having for many years enjoyed the commodity and profit of Peace, and greatly enriched by Bounty of this ſacred Military Order, refuſe now to bear this laſt burden of War.

At theſe words an ancient Greek, for his Wiſdom and Diſcretion of great Reputation both with the Greeks and Latins, perceiving his Countrymen wrongfully touched, and the deſperate holding out of the City vainly perſwaded, took hold, and interrupting this young Gallant; in anſwer of that he had ſaid, ſpake as followeth:

The former Speech notably anſwered by a Greek, and the yielding of the City urged.

That grief of mind and deſperation can make Men rather Eloquent than Wiſe, as you have many times heard before this, ſo you might this day perceive alſo, moſt valiant Gentlemen; for adviſed modeſty never falleth into obloquy, neither confoundeth falſhood with truth; it deſireth not the ſlaughter of the Citizens, it perſwadeth not fury, nor exhorteth Men to madneſs; but it is by nature ſo engraffed in many, that when they cannot by their own Wiſdom and Policy deliver themſelves from their troubles, they yet ſeek to draw others into the fellowſhip of the ſame danger; ſo greedy have malice and miſery always been of company. But if you (worthy Commander) will give me alſo leave to ſpeak, a Man amongſt his Countrymen not of meaneſt Place and Authority, which thing both the preſent Calamity and urgent Neceſſity might of you eaſily obtain, I would alledge ſuch reaſons, and lay down ſuch matter, as ſhould not only refel the copious and glorious words of this ſharp witted Orator, ſcrap'd together of purpoſe to flouriſh out the matter, but alſo ſuch as might ſtir your mind to that which is honeſt, profitable, and neceſſary; expulſing hatred, fear, trouble or deſpair. This Gentleman, whom we all know, not only to be a vehement Orator, but ſomtime a Man moſt terrible, whereas for all his great words he is by nature mild, and ſo mild, that he never had the heart to kill, nay not ſo much as lightly to wound any one of them whom he calleth barbarous, mad, cruel, whoſe perfidious dealing he deteſteth, whoſe cruelty he accurſeth, whoſe manner of living he exclaimeth againſt, as altogether without Law, without Reaſon, without Order, without Regard; and now in time of Truce, and whilſt the Showers of Arrows, Iron Bullets, Fire and Stones doth ceaſe, creeping out of his Cave, maketh much ado, and keepeth a great ſtir; and not knowing in what danger he is, doth now with glorious words call upon death, whereof he hath hitherto ſhewed himſelf too much afraid, and all forſooth (as he ſaid) leſt he ſhould be enforced to endure the mocking and ſcorning of the Enemy. But this is meer Pride, not Chriſtian Fortitude or Humility. But our Enemy neither threatneth nor purpoſeth any ſuch matter, nothing ſo perfidious or cruel as he would make him, rubbing up the ſlaughter at Caire, Eubœa, Methone, and Conſtantinople, Cities taken either by Force or warlike Policy, and not yielded by compoſition, upon faith given betwixt the beſieger and the beſieged; who becauſe he would ſpare us, will not ſuffer us to do that whereby we ſhould undoubtedly periſh. But whereof proceedeth this new found Clemency? This unwonted favour toward the People of the Rhodes? I am not of the Tyrants Privy-Counſel, neither ever curiouſly ſought after the reaſon of another Mans Bounty, but am glad to receive it when I need it. Yet for all that, I will not diſſemble what I think in a matter ſo doubtful; he is willing (as I ſuppoſe) in this Siege and Conqueſt of the Rhodes, to ſhew unto other Nations whom he purpoſed to invade, both his Power and his Patience; leſt always ſatisfying his cruel Nature, he ſhould make deſolation in places he would Reign over, and ſo for ever alienating the Minds of Men, be inforced to fight with all Men with Fire and Sword; by which Rigour he hath not ſo much hurt his Enemy as himſelf. For this cauſe (as I ſuppoſe, he leaveth unto us life and goods, leſt whilſt he in going about to take them from us by force, and we ſeeking to keep them by deſperatneſs, we ſhould both fall into great deſtruction, no leſs lamentable unto the Conqueror than to the vanquiſhed. Beſides that, if he ſhould kill all here, truly he might then enter the Breaches of the City on the Bodies of the dead, no Men now left alive to reſiſt him. But Lerus is ſhut up, Arangia is ſtrongly Fortified, Lyndus is by Situation impregnable; here he knoweth are Weapons, Armor, and Men; here he muſt begin a new War, except he will have the remainder of your War, the fatal Plague of his Empire, to prey ſtill upon his Subjects; all which ſtrong places he ſhall have without ſlaughter, without bloodſhed (as reaſon is) if he ſhould let you and us poor wretches depart in ſafety with a little traſh. Except theſe worldly conſiderations have moved him to mercy and compaſſion; then out of doubt it is wrought by divine power and the ſecret favour of God towards us, and of our Saviour Chriſt Jeſus Crucified. Whereunto if you be Men well adviſed, if Religious, if mindful of the duty of Chriſtians, it becometh not you to oppoſe any Obſtacle, and with the ruine of your ſelves to deſtroy this miſerable People, which for this half years Siege, hath ſcarcely had ſo much reſt as might ſuffice the neceſſity of nature, ſtanding for you in Battel, enduring both Wounds and Death for your Honour and Victory; by whoſe faithful labour and diligence you have been always holpen both at home and abroad; whether you Invaded the Turk by Land in Mytilene, Naupactus, Methone, Patras, or other parts of Peloponneſus; or elſe by Sea thruſt him out of the Poſſeſſion of the Ionian or Ægeum; whereby it may appear even unto a Blind Man, how injurious it is, and far from truth, to object unto us, That enjoying the Fruits of Peace, we refuſe the Charges of Wars; nay we never refuſed Wars. But now it is come to that point, that if we would never ſo fain make Wars, we are not able ſo to do, the flower of our youth being ſlain; and the ſmall remainder that is left, not only weakned in Body with Wounds, Sickneſs, Watching, and reſtleſs Labour; but alſo in Mind diſcouraged, whilſt all things fall out proſperouſly to our Enemies, and to us adverſe; the greateſt and beſt part of our great Artillery being broken with continual uſe, which if it were whole we could have thereof ſmall uſe or profit, for want of Powder, which not only this City now wanteth, but alſo your ſtrong Holds, Lerus, Lyndus, Halicarnaſſus, Arangia. I was never deſirous or curious to look into other Mens doings, much leſs into your manner of War; but yet (Great Maſter) you cannot deny, but it is ſo; who have cauſed Souldiers to be brought from thence hither openly, and Gunpowder ſecretly; by which Policy you have withſtood your forreign Enemy theſe ſix Months, and deceived the treachery of one or two domeſtical Traitors. But I gladly admit we have all theſe things, I ſtand upon the truth, I ſay not what moſt Men ſay, but I ſpeak to pleaſe a few; and ſuppoſe we wanted neither Armour nor Courage, I would then ask you this, whether they would adviſe you to uſe them to your defence, or to your deſtruction? For unto both it cannot be, no more than at once to be a Free-man and a Slave. To uſe them to your deſtruction, that were madneſs and ſenſeleſs pride, hateful to God and Man; you ſhould therefore uſe them to defence; but how ſhall we defend a City (I do not ſay, as the truth is) already loſt and poſſeſſed by the Enemy, wherein he reigneth, rangeth, and turneth all upſide down? But having the Walls battered down, a great Breach in the Spaniſh Station, and another not like, but even now as good as made in the Italian Station, how ſhall we be able to keep this unfortunate Town, battered and rent at the French, Engliſh, and Avergne Stations, and the Tower of St. Nicholas? Which if it were not ſo battered and bared of all Warlike Proviſion, but ſound and throughly furniſhed with Munition and Victual, yet neceſſity enforcing, and reaſon perſwading, you ought to forſake it, forſomuch as all power of further reſiſtance is taken from you. Do you not ſee how eaſily and almoſt without any trouble, the Enemy (by means of the Caſtle he hath new Built upon the Mount Philermo, not paſt two Miles diſtant) can take from you all manner of Proviſion both by Sea and Land, and reſtrain you from going out or in? Truly notable Gentlemen, honourable for your Martial Proweſs, you ſee and have long ago foreſeen theſe things better than I, altogether ignorant in Martial Affairs, altogether buſied in the Trade of Merchandiſe, and caring for my Family; yet ſuffer me to ſay the truth. All the Powers whereby this Kingdom ſtood, are departed and gone; againſt the force of our Enemies no policy of force remaineth; and to expect Armies of Angels, or Souldiers from Heaven, and other ſuch like Miracles, is in my judgment more and more to provoke God to anger, although in his anger he be unto us merciful. Wherefore being deſtitute of all worldly help, let us as we may, provide for our ſafety. I beſeech thee (worthy Great Maſter) by theſe my aged Tears, by the natural piety ingrafted in thy noble nature, expoſe not this miſerable City to the ſpoil of the Enemy, our old and middle aged Men to the Sword, our Wives and Daughters to be Raviſhed, our Boys and Youths to the unnatural filthineſs of our barbarous Enemies, and to be corrupted with the mad and groſs Opinion of the ungodly Mahometan Superſtition: I would (noble Knights) you had ſeen with what Tears, with what Mourning our heavy Families and Children crying about their Mothers, ſent us hither, and what Prayers they made for us at our departing; I would you knew with what mind and how great hope they expect their ſafety from your clemency and adviſed reſolution.

The Great Maſter reſolved that the City was not to be defended, calleth a Common-Council of his Knights and the Burgeſſes of the City.

A Truce taken with the Turks for four days.

This Speech of the aged Greek might have moved a Heart of Flint; but the Great Maſter, who in his countenance ſhewed a greater courage than his preſent ſtate required, commanding every Man to his charge; after the matter had been thus moſt part of the night diſcourſed, gave then no other anſwer, but, That he would be careful of all their well doing. The next morning he ſent for Prejanes, Martiningus, and a few other of the greateſt judgment and experience; by whom he was fully reſolved, that the City in ſo many places by the Enemy laid open and ſhaken, was not poſſibly to be long defended; whereupon he cauſed a Common-Council to be called of all the Knights of the Order together with the Burgeſſes of the City; where after long debating, whether they ſhould fight it out to the laſt Man, or yield upon ſuch Conditions as were to be obtained; It was by general conſent concluded, that the City ſhould be yielded, and thereupon a Decree made which was by the Great Maſter pronounced. Whilſt theſe things were thus in doing, a Truce was taken with the Enemy for four days, but full of fear and danger. During which time, divers of the Turks preſuming upon the Truce, came by great Companies to behold the Walls and Rampiers of the City; wherewith Fornovius the Frenchman (of whom mention is before made) being ſore moved, in his choler without further command diſcharged a Tire of great Ordnance among the thickeſt of them, contrary to the Truce taken. At which time alſo the Rhodians received into the City ſecretly by night a Ship loaded with Wines out of Crete, and in her Alphonſus a Spaniard, chief Pilot of the Rhodian Gallies, and with him 100 voluntary Souldiers all Latins, all which went out of Crete without the knowledge of the Venetian Senate; for at that time the Venetians were in League with Solyman. The Turks juſtly offended with the breach of the Truce, and the taking in of new Supplies, which they ſuppoſed to have been far greater than in truth they were; without command of any Captain or Enſign diſplayed, in great numbers thruſt in through the ruins of the Breaches into the City as far as the Rampiers and Barricadoes new made, and furiouſly aſſailed the Defendants; In which Conflict many were ſlain and wounded on both ſides. But after the Turks had to their coſt again made proof of the courage of their Enemies, as without commandment they began that Skirmiſh, ſo of themſelves they brake it off and retired. After the Truce was thus broken, the Captain of the Turks Fencers, a bloody cruel Fellow, having taken three Chriſtians Priſoners, cut off their Hands, Ears, and Noſes, and ſent them ſo diſmembred into the City with Letters to the Great Maſter, charging him with the unjuſt breach of the Truce, barbarouſly threatning within three or four days to make like example of him to all poſterity. Amongſt others none was more troubled with this ſuddain and unexpected breach of the Truce, than Robertus Peruſinus, Raymundus Marchet, and Raymundus Lupus, three Knights of the Order, Men of ſingular Wiſdom and Gravity, Embaſſadors at that time in the Turks Camp; whom the barbarous People in their fury had undoubtedly ſlain or put to torture, if they had not feared the like meaſure to have been ſhewed to their Hoſtages in the City. But after that Nicholaus Vergotus, and Georgius Sandriticus, two of the Burgeſſes of the City, were come into the Camp with Articles containing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians were contented to deliver up the City, all their fury and rage was quickly appeaſed. Solyman for his greater Majeſty and the more terror of theſe Meſſengers, beſet round about with his great Army, and guarded about with his Janizaries in their richeſt Attire and gliſtering Armor, gave them audience; who admitted to his preſence, with great humility offered unto him in writing the conditions whereupon the Rhodians would yield up unto him the City. The chief points whereof were, That the Churches ſhould remain unto the Chriſtians inviolated; That no Children ſhould be taken from their Parents; That no Chriſtian ſhould be inforced to forſake his Religion and turn-Turk; That ſuch Chriſtians as would tarry ſtill in the City, might ſo do at liberty, without paying any Tribute for the ſpace of five Years; That all they which would depart might go with Bag and Baggage, furniſhed with convenient Shipping and Proviſion as far as Crete, and to carry with them ſo much great Ordnance as they pleaſed; and that the Chriſtians ſhould appoint a reaſonable day for the time of their departure. All which Articles Solyman condeſcended unto, and ſolemnly ſwore faithfully to perform the ſame. But how they were indeed performed the Writers of that age do much vary: It ſhould ſeem they were neither altogether kept, nor broken; but ſo performed as pleaſed the Conqueror; certain it is that many great outrages were through military Inſolency committed by the proud Turks upon the poor Chriſtians, contrary to the mind of Solyman. Jacobus Fontanus a Civilian, and at that time one of the Judges of the City (out of whoſe writings this Hiſtory is for moſt part collected) reporteth, That the Turks not expecting the departure of the Chriſtians, brake into the City upon Chriſtenmas Day, by the Gate called Coſquinium, polluted the Temples, ſhamefully abuſed the Chriſtians, and made havock of all things; and that he himſelf, falling into their hands, after he had with ſuch Mony as he had, redeemed himſelf, having not ſufficient to content all their greedy deſires, was by them hardly entreated and grievouſly beaten. The Great Maſter by the counſel of Achimetes, putting on ſuch ſimple Attire as beſt beſeemed a vanquiſhed Man that was to humble himſelf before the Conqueror, went out of the City into the Camp, attended upon with a few Knights of the Order; where after he had waited in the Rain moſt part of the day, before Solymans Tent, at laſt he had a rich Gown caſt upon him, and ſo brought into the proud Tyrants preſence. Where after they had a while at the firſt, with piercing Eies one earneſtly beholden the other; the Great Maſter humbling himſelf before him, was in token of Grace admitted to Kiſs his Hand, and welcomed by Solyman in this ſort.

Solyman his Speech unto the Great Maſter.

Although (ſaid he) I might worthily and juſtly infringe the Articles I have preſcribed concerning the yielding of the City, with thy moſt wicked croſſed Compiers, the People of the Rhodes, and thee eſpecially ſuch a Captial Enemy, from whoſe deſerved puniſhment, neither Faith nor Oath ought to ſtay a moſt juſt Conqueror; yet I have determined to be not only gracious and merciful unto thee, ſo great an Offender, deſerving exemplary Puniſhment, but alſo liberal and bountiful; who if thou wilt by weldoing amend the grievous Tranſgreſſions of thy former Life, I promiſe unto thee moſt honourable Entertainment, great Preferment, and the higheſt Places in my Empire, in my Army in time of War, and in Counſel in time of Peace. Not to refuſe this mine offer, both thy preſent eſtate perſwadeth thee, and the Chriſtians (whoſe quarrel thou tookeſt upon thee to defend againſt me, with better beginning than ſucceſs) deſerve at thy hands no better; for what ſhould let thee forſaken of all thy Friends, a Man as it were betraied and vanquiſhed, to caſt thy ſelf into the perpetual faith and protection of a moſt mighty and merciful Conqueror, of himſelf offering thee this undeſerved Grace and Favour.

Whereunto the Great Maſter preſently anſwered;

The reſolute anſwer of the Great Maſter to Solyman.

Moſt Mighty and Gracious Emperor, your offered Favours before your other worthy Captains I deſerve not; neither is my preſent eſtate and deſert towards you ſuch, as that I dare or ought to refel the ſame; yet I will ſpeak freely in the midſt of your Victorious Army, a Man vanquiſhed in preſence of the Conqueror, whoſe great Mercy I never deſpaired of, and whoſe Faith I never doubted; I had rather now I have loſt my Sovereignty, forthwith to loſe my private and unfortunate Life; or elſe for ever hereafter to live in Obſcurity, than of my People to be accounted a Fugitive rather than a vanquiſhed Man: For, to be vanquiſhed is but chance of War, and of ſo great a Conqueror no ſhame to him that is Conquered; but afterwards to forſake his own People and to turn to the Enemy, I account it ſhameful Cowardiſe and Treachery.

Solyman marvelling at the Courage and Majeſty of the Hoary old Prince, in his ſo great extremity, diſmiſſed him, and ſent him again into the City, guarded with his own Guard, until he was come into his Palace; and unto every one of the Knights attending upon the Great Maſter, was given a rich Garment, in token of Solymans Favour.

Solyman cometh into the City unto the Great Maſter.

Within a few days after Solyman coming into the City, went to viſit the Great Maſter alſo; whom he found buſie in packing up his things againſt his departure. Here when the Great Maſter falling down upon his Knees would have worſhipped him, he would in no caſe ſuffer him ſo to do; but with his hand putting aſide the Vail of Majeſty (which manner of Reverence the Turkiſh Emperors give only to God, and their Great Prophet Mahomet) took him up and Saluted him by the Name of Father. To whom the Great Maſter for his Wiſdom and Diſcretion now to him no leſs admirable, than he was before in time of War for his Valour and Coutage, ſpake in this ſort:

The Speech of the Great Maſter to Solyman.

If my Fortune and Succeſs had been anſwerable to my Heart and Courage, I ſhould here be in this City, rather as a Victorious Conqueror than a Man Conquered. But ſithence the fatal Deſtinies would needs overthrow the Rhodian Eſtate, I am glad that you are the Man before all other by Fortune aſſigned, of whom I ſhall receive both Force and Grace. And unto you, amongſt many other your rare and worthy Praiſes, this ſhall not be the leaſt, That you vanquiſhed the Rhodes and ſhewed Mercy. By this means you have joyned unto your dreadful Power, the Fame of Clemency and Courteſie; an Honour not of the Higheſt to be deſpiſed, by which alone we come neareſt unto God. Wherefore I doubt not but you will keep the conventions of the late Peace inviolated, which your own clemency perſwaded you to grant, and neceſſity inforced us to take. I ſhall now be an eternal example to the Turkiſh Emperors Clemency and Vertue, more than if I had by and by at the firſt yielded my ſelf; Obſtinate wilfulneſs hath made thy Glory and Mercy now Famous through the whole World, and unto the Worlds End.

Whereunto Solyman by his Interpreter, anſwered:

The notable anſwer of Solyman to the Great Maſter.

It is to me a great pleaſure, that God at length hath put into thy mind to make choice of Peace before War, which I would thou couldſt have liked of from the beginning; then truly thou ſhouldſt at this time have received of my great and mighty Majeſty, more good than thou haſt endured harm. Which that I have done unto thee, not for any hatred, but only for deſire of Sovereignty, thou mayſt gather by this, That I ſuffer thee and thine to depart hence at liberty, with all your Wealth and Subſtance; for I make not War, thereby to heap up Wealth and Riches; but for Honour, Fame, Immortality, and enlarging of mine Empire. For it is the property of a King royally deſcended, by ſtrong Hand to take from others, and to invade others; not upon a greedy and covetous Mind, but for the honourable deſire of Rule and Sovereignty; which whilſt my Neighbour withſtandeth, I count it enough by force of Arms to remove him.

But the Tyrant (as many ſuppoſed) ſpake all this by way of diſſimulation, having as it was commonly bruted, given order for the rigging up of a great Ship, and certain Gallies, for the ſuddain tranſporting of the Great Maſter and the Knights of the Order to Conſtantinople, which report ſeemeth to have been but feigned either of malice, or elſe by ſuch as leaſt knew Solymans Mind; for if he had ſo purpoſed, who ſhould have let him, having them all in his Power.

Jovius in his little Treatiſe Rerum Turcicarum dedicated to Charles the Fifth, reporteth that he himſelf heard Liladamus the Great Maſter ſay, That when Solyman entred into the Rhodes attended upon with thirty thouſand Men, there was not any Man heard to ſpeak a word, but that the Souldiers went as if they had been obſervant Friers; and that when he came to ask leave of Solyman that he might depart, he was ſo courteouſly uſed of him, that turning himſelf to Abraim the Baſſa, whom he above all Men loved, ſaid, Truly I cannot but grieve to ſee this unfortunate old Man, driven out of his own dwelling, to depart hence ſo heavily.

The Great Maſter embarking himſelf with his Knights and ſuch other as were willing to depart, in Veſſels and Gallies prepared for that purpoſe, departed out of the Iſland on New-years day at night; and after long and dangerous Travel by Sea in that Winter weather, landed at laſt at Meſſina in Sicilia, from whence he afterwards ſailed into Italy, and ſo travelled to Rome, where he was honourably received by Adrian the Sixth of that Name, then Biſhop there, a Hollander born, ſometime School-maſter to Charles the Fifth, and his Vicegerent in Spain; who if he had been as forward in the ſhort time of his Papacy to have relieved the Rhodes, as he was to maintain Charles his Quarrel againſt the French King, it is not unlike but that famous City had been relieved, and the Iſland in poſſeſſion of the Chriſtians at this day. Thus Solyman, whilſt the Chriſtian Princes were at diſcord amongſt themſelves, to his great glory and no leſs grief of all good Chriſtians, entred the Rhodes the 25 day of December, a day dedicated unto the Nativity of our Saviour Chriſt, in the year 1522, after it had been by the Knights of the Order valiantly kept and defended againſt the Infidels by the ſpace of 214 years, ſince the time they by force took it from the Infidels in the year 1308. and now being ſo long holden as was poſſible, againſt all the power of the Turks, was yielded up when it had been ſix Months beſieged. At this Siege Solyman loſt a great part of his Army; for beſides them that were ſlain at the Aſſaults, which were many, thirty thouſand died of the Flux.

Solyman entreth into the Rhodes on Chriſtenmas day, in the year 1522.

Whilſt Solyman thus lay at the Siege of the Rhodes, Ferhates Baſſa Governour of the Marches of the Turkiſh Empire, alongſt the River of Euphrates, by the commandment of Solyman went with a great Army againſt Alis-Beg, whom the Turks called Schach, Suar-Ogli, that is to ſay, King Suar his Son; which P. Jovius corrupting, calleth him by the name of Saxovar-Oglis. This Alis after he had betrayed his Uncle Aladeules the Mountain King, unto Sinan Baſſa, was by Selymus left chief Governour of that large and wild Country alongſt the borders of Armenia and Cappadocia, wanting nothing of the honour of a King but the Name only, as is before declared in the life of Selymus. Solyman jealous of his Honour, and fearing leſt he ſhould take upon him the abſolute Government of that Country (which indeed of right belonged unto him, the Children of Aladeules the late King, being now all dead) and ſo to make himſelf King; eſpecially if he ſhould joyn in friendſhip with the Perſian King; after the manner of ambitious Men, purpoſed by any means to have him taken out of the way; and had therefore ſent Ferhates to eaſe him of that care. The Baſſa without making any ſhew of Hoſtility marching with his Army along the Confines of his Country, as if it had been but to look to his charge, when he was come as near as he could to Alis, without miſtruſt, thought good to aſſay if he could by policy bring that to paſs which he was otherwiſe with great danger to attempt by force. Wherefore feigning himſelf to be extream ſick, he ſent Embaſſadors to Alis, requeſting him as a friend to vouchſafe to come unto him being at the point of death, unto whom he had many things of importance from the great Emperor to impart, and would if he ſhould die, leave with him all his charge until Solyman ſhould otherwiſe diſpoſe thereof.

Solyman ſends Ferhates Baſſa againſt Alis-Beg the Mountain Prince

Alis, who from his youth had always honoured the Turkiſh Emperors and faithfully ſerved them, miſtruſting no harm, came to the Baſſa, accompanied with his four Sons; whom the faithleſs Baſſa without regard of infamy, cauſed preſently to be put to death with their Father; and ſo reducing all that Country into the manner of a Province, under Solymans obeiſance, came to him with twenty thouſand Men, about the time that the City of the Rhodes was yielded up. This is the faithleſs dealing of the Turks, not with the Chriſtians only, but with them of their own ſuperſtition alſo; uſing it as no ſmall policy, utterly to extinguiſh the Nobility of all Countries ſubject to their ſervile Tyranny.

Alis and his four Sons treacherouſly ſlain.

Solyman after he had thus ſubdued the Rhodes, and diſpoſed of the Iſland as he liked beſt, returning to Conſtantinople, brake up his Army, and for the ſpace of three years after followed his pleaſure, not doing any thing worthy of remembrance. During which time and many years after, the rich and flouriſhing Country of Italy, ſometime Miſtreſs of the World, was miſerably afflicted and rent in pieces by Charles the Fifth (then Emperor) and Francis the French King, the one envying unto the other the glory of the Empire; and he not content therewith, ſeeking with immoderate ambition to make himſelf Lord of all Italy; moſt of the other Chriſtian Princes and States being at the ſame time either by the one or by the other, drawn into the fellowſhip of that War, to the great trouble and ſore weakning of the Chriſtian Commonweal. Whereupon Solyman waiting all occaſions that might ſerve for the enlarging of his Empire, and annoying of the Chriſtians, thought it not a fit time for him to ſet his foot into Hungary, whereunto he had already laied open a way by the taking of Belgrade. He knew right well that Lewis then King of Hungary was but young, altogether unacquainted with the Wars, commanding over his headſtrong Subjects (eſpecially his rich Prelates and Nobility) no otherwiſe than pleaſed themſelves, being himſelf rather by them altogether overruled; beſides that, he was in good hope, that the other Chriſtian Princes near unto him, either carried away with regard of their own Eſtate, would not, or elſe before unto himſelf by League faſt bound, could not afford unto him any great aid or ſuccour; the Germans he knew would make ſmall haſt unto ſuch Wars as ſhould yield them much danger, and but ſmall pay. As for the Princes of the Houſe of Auſtria, Charles the Emperor, and Ferdinand his Brother, although they were joyned unto the young King with the neareſt bonds of Alliance (Lewis having Married Mary their youngeſt Siſter, and Ferdinand, Ann, King Lewis his Siſter) yet was there as he thought ſmall help to be expected from them; Charles having his hands full in Italy, and Ferdinand altogether careful of himſelf; and that Sigiſmund King of Polonia would for the young Kings ſake break the ancient League he had with the Turkiſh Emperors, he could hardly be perſwaded:

Solyman upon the diſcord of the Chriſtian Princes and diſordered ſtate of Hungary, taketh occaſion to invade that Kingdom.

1526. Solyman cometh againſt Lewis King of Hungary.

The vanity of Tomoreus.

As for other Chriſtian Princes farther off,he ſtood not in any great doubt. Thus having with himſelf ſingled out this young Prince the Hungarian King, whom he had in his greedy mind already devoured, he ſet forward from Conſtantinople, and was come on his way as far as Sophia in Servia with a mighty Army of two hundred thouſand men, before that the Hungarians had any knowledge of his coming (ſo blind and ſenſeleſs was that State, which now ſleeping in ſecurity, had long before loſt thoſe Eies which ever watcht, and never ſpared coſt or pains to keep the ſame in ſafety) in ſtead of whom were others come in place, ſharp of ſight, and too too provident for that concerned their own advancement; but blind as Beetles in foreſeeing this great and common danger (wherewith they were ſhortly after all quite overwhelmed) until it was now brought home unto their own Doors. The young King of himſelf but weak, by reaſon of his youthful years, and nothing ſtrengthned by them for whom he had moſt done, and ſhould have been his greateſt ſtay, was wonderfully diſmaied with the fame of the approach of ſo mighty an Enemy; yet the better to withſtand him, he ſent Embaſſadors with all ſpeed unto the Chriſtian Princes his Neighbours, requeſting their Aid againſt the common Enemy, but all in vain. In the mean time, after the ancient manner of his Country he gave out general Summons for the Aſſembly of his Counſel for the Wars; whether his great ſtipendary Prelates (of duty bound to appear) came with their Troops of evil appointed Horſemen, and not half full; who alſo delivered in leſs ſums of Mony by far, than of right they ſhould have done, towards the maintenance of the charge of that common War. And the temporal Nobility, forgetting the warlike Diſcipline of their famous Anceſtors, as freſhwater Souldiers which had ſeen the Turkiſh Emperor in his ſtrength, and but little acquainted with ſome light skirmiſhes or ſmall invaſions, in their vain bravery made light account of the Turks; proudly vaunting, That although they were in number but few, yet they would eaſily overthrow the great numbers of them, if ever they came to handy ſtrokes. But above all the reſt, one Paulus Tomoreus Archbiſhop of Coloſſa, ſometimes a Minorite, who had before been in divers light skirmiſhes againſt the Turks, with great inſolency did ſo confidently brag and boaſt of the Victory he vainly dreamed of, that in his Sermons unto the Souldiers,and in open talk with the Nobility (if he could have done ſo much as he vaunted of) it ſhould ſeem that he himſelf had been enough to have overthrown the Turks whole Army.

Wholeſome Counſel not followed.

But when all the Kings Army was aſſembled, and a general muſter taken, there was hardly found five and twenty thouſand men in all, horſe and foot. So that the fooliſh hardineſs of Tomoreus, and others ſo forwards to give the Turks battel, was of moſt wiſe men diſliked. The old Souldiers and men of great experience ſaid plainly, That it was meer folly and madneſs with ſuch a handful of men to give battel unto the Enemy, who would bring eight times ſo many more into the Field as they were. Wherefore ſome wiſhed, that the young King ſhould be withdrawn from the eminent danger; among whom Stephanus Verbetius, a noble Captain, of all the reſt beſt acquainted with the Turkiſh Wars, gave Counſel, that the perſon of the young King ſhould for the ſafety of the Common State, whatſoever ſhould happen, be kept out of danger in the ſtrong Caſtle of Buda. But the unruly Souldiers with open mouth impugned his wholeſome Counſel, and ſaid plainly, That except the King himſelf did lead them, they would not at all fight. Of which opinion was alſo the raſh Prelate Tomoreus, perſwading them with all ſpeed to give the Enemy Battel, and that the noble young King under the protection of Almighty God ſhould in perſon himſelf go and give the ſignal of battel againſt his Enemies. The King overruled by this unlucky Counſel, upon a bravery without reaſon ſet forward with his Army, and came to a place called Mohatchz or Mugace, which is a little Country Village not far from Danubius, almoſt in the midle between Buda and Belgrade. And now Balybeus with twenty thouſand Horſemen (the forerunners of the Turkiſh Army) was at hand, at which time the Commanders and Captains of the Kings Army, entred into Counſel, Whether it were better to incamp their Army within their Waggons alongſt the River of Danubius, and ſo to expect the coming of Joannes Sepuſius, Count of Cilia, and Vayvod of Tranſylvania (who was then ſaid to be coming towards the King with his Tranſylvanian Horſemen, of all other fitteſt to have encountred the Turks; or elſe to march forward, and preſently to give them Battel? But Tomoreus, who now commanded all, knowing that upon the coming of the Vayod, he was to give place, and himſelf to be commanded (which unto ſo proud a man was no ſmall grief) for the maintenance of his credit and reputation, and to carry away the glory of the Victory he ſo vainly hoped for, could not abide to hear of any delay; but haſting headlong to his own deſtruction, did with ſuch vehemency impugn the wholſome Counſel of others, who would have expected the coming of the Vayvod, that he by his frantick perſwaſions, drew on the unadviſed young King into moſt apparent and manifeſt danger. For Balybeus divided his Horſemen into four Battels, which by turns skirmiſhed with the Kings Army without intermiſſion, and gave the Hungarians no leiſure to reſt either day or night, but continually wheeling about, kept them in ſo ſtrait, that no man could without great danger go to water his Horſe at the ſide of Danubius, which was faſt by, or once to ſtir out of the Camp, but were inforced to dig Pits for water in places where they lay; with which neceſſity Tomoreus was enforced to put the Army in order of Battel, and there was now no remedy, but he muſt of neceſſity fight for the honour of his Prince and Country. His Battel was ranged all in length, and his Horſemen not altogether (as it was thought) unfitly placed here and there by Troops among his Footmen; leſt the Turks (being in number eight to one) ſhould with their multitude compaſs them round, and ſo inforce them to fight as it were in a Ring; for now was Solyman come alſo with all his huge Army. The Hungarian Tents defended with a ſmall Garriſon, were left a little from the Army on the right hand, incloſed round about with Wagons, one chained to another; near unto the which, Tomoreus General of this unlucky Battel, had not altogether undiſcreetly placed a Troop of choſen Horſemen for the defence of the Kings Perſon againſt all uncertain Events of the Battel. But this day (unlucky to the Hungarian name, but unto the King himſelf moſt fatal and unfortunate) overthrew that his purpoſe, deviſed too late for the ſafety of the Kings Perſon; for at the firſt encounter the Hungarians, although they had received no harm by the Turkiſh Artillery (being mounted too high, of purpoſe as it was thought, the Gunners being for moſt part Chriſtians) were eaſily beaten down, and overthrown, oppreſſed by the multitude of their Enemies, eſpecially Tomoreus with the reſt of the Prelates and Nobility being almoſt all ſlain together, and the Hungarian Horſemen alſo either ſlain or put to flight. All things going thus to wrack, a Company of Turks aſſailed the Camp, which was hardly defended by the weak Garriſon. Which thing the Troop of the choſen Horſemen appointed for defence of the Kings Perſon, beholding, could not be ſtaid, but that they would needs help them which defended the Camp. The young King ſeeing all his Army diſcomfited, and himſelf forſaken of the Horſemen which he was in hope ſhould have guarded him, betook himſelf to flight. But as he was making ſhift for himſelf, thinking to have paſſed over a fenny Ditch, his Horſe in plunging out, fell backwards upon him into the Ditch; where being heavy loaden with Armor not able to help himſelf, he was in the midſt of the filthy Ditch in the Mud moſt miſerably drowned. Some few Horſemen eſcaped out of the Battel, the reſt were either ſlain or taken Priſoners. This woful Battel never ſufficiently to be lamented, as the ground of the miſeries of that worthy Kingdom, was fought the nine and twentieth day of October in the year 1526.

King Lewis drowned in a ditch.

Solyman having obtained this Victory, marched on directly to Buda, the Regal Seat of the Hungarian Kings, which was delivered to him with the Caſtle; upon condition, that he ſhould not violate any man either in Perſon or Goods, and at his departure to leave the ſame again unto the Hungarians; all which things he (according unto their requeſt) faithfully performed. Being entred into the Caſtle, he wonderfully commended the ſame, but lodged not therein, becauſe it is by their ancient Law forbidden the Turkiſh Emperor to lodg within any walled place which is not his own. Wherefore he returned and lodged in his Camp alongſt the River of Danubius.

The Heads of ſlain Chriſtian Biſhops and Captains preſented to Solyman.

Whilſt Solyman lay thus at Buda, ſeven bloody Heads of the Biſhops and greateſt of the Nobility (ſlain in the late battel at Mohatchz) were preſented to him, all ſet in order upon a woodden Step; whereat he ſmiled, to ſee his Courtiers laying their right Hands upon their Breaſts, and bending their Bodies as if they had done them great obeiſance, to ſalute them by name, and in diriſion to welcome them by the names of valiant Popes. But afterwards, when he had more particularly enquired what every one of them was, it is reported that he moſt of all deteſted Ladiſlaus Salcanius the great Biſhop of Strigonium, for his miſerable Covetouſneſs, that being a man of infinite Wealth, refuſed to ſpare part thereof unto his Sovereign, requeſting the ſame at his great need. Tomoreus he blamed of inconſiderate raſhneſh, for that he being a Clergy-man, would buſie himſelf ſo far in matters not belonging to his vocation: On the contrary part, he commended Franciſcus Perenus Biſhop of Veradium, a man honourably deſcended, for his wiſe Counſel (though it was not followed) for that he had heard it reported, that he as a true Prophet foretelling the common ſlaughter enſuing, had ſharply ſaid in the Counſel at ſuch time as Tomoreus would needs fight with the Turks, and was not by any means to be removed from that his fatal opinion, That he did foreſee what that their Frier-like General would the next day do; and that he would with ſo great an enterpriſe effect no more, but to make one Holyday the more in the Chriſtians Calendar, in remembrance of thirty thouſand Hungarian Martyrs, moſt miſerably ſlain of the Turk in an unequal battel, for defence of the Chriſtian Faith and Religion (for at that time, they which willingly expoſed themſelves to death in defence of the Chriſtian Faith, were all accounted for Martyrs;) Georgius Sepuſius and the others, he called raſh Fools, that would adventure with ſo ſmall ſtrength to incounter ſo ſtrong an Enemy. At ſuch time as the Counterfeits of King Lewis and Mary his Wiſe were ſhewed unto him, he honourably ſaid, That he was ſorry for the young King, that it was his evil hap to have ſo unadviſed Counſellors in a matter of ſo great importance, as to perſwade him againſt all reaſon to fight at ſo great diſadvantage; and that he came not into Hungary to take his Kingdom from him, but only to revenge the wrongs done unto him by the Hungarians; and that if he had eſcaped the danger of the Battel, he would aſſuredly have again reſtored unto him the Kingdom of Hungary, contenting himſelf with ſome ſmall Tribute; and that it ſhould have been unto him honour enough to have ſaved the Nephew of Sigiſmund King of Polonia his Confederate, ſo ſtrongly allied with the honourable Houſe of Auſtria. All which he commanded to be told to Mary the Queen, who was for fear fled from Buda to Poſſonium. Which might perhaps all ſeem to have been either diſſemblingly ſpoken, or falſly reported of the Equity and Courteſie of the barbarous King, if he had not ſhortly afterwards to the ample declaration of his Bounty and liberality, without any deſert, given the ſame Kingdom of Hungary to Joannes Sepuſius, not born of any Royal Blood, and then retaining the mind of a very Enemy. After that, he took away three goodly Images of Braſs of ancient workmanſhip, which were placed in the entrance into the Kings Palace, by that renowned King Mathias Corvinus the great favourer of rare Qualities and Vertues; theſe Images repreſented the forms of Hercules with his Club, of Apollo with his Harp, and Diana with her Bow and Quiver, all which he placed in the Tilt-yard at Conſtantinople, as a Trophy of the Hungarian Victory. Howbeit theſe Images were ſince taken down by the perſwaſion of the Mufti, and molten (as contrary to their Superſtition) and great Ordnance made of them. He carried alſo away with him three Pieces of Artillery of moſt excellent and curious workmanſhip; and certain braſen Pillars of chamfred work, which ſupported the Chapiters of the Gates. He tarried at Buda about twenty days; in which time to ſatisfie the cruel nature and greedy deſires of his Souldiers, he ſent out divers Troops of Horſemen into the Country thereabout, by whom all the Country betwixt Rob and the River of Tibyſcus was by that ſuddain and unexpected incurſion ſo deſtroyed, that it is reported that above an hundred and fifty thouſand People of all ſorts were either ſlain or led away into moſt miſerable Captivity. All which done, he returned again by the ſame way he came to Conſtantinople.

The Biſhop of Veradium too true a Prophet.

The honourable Speech of Solyman concerning his coming into Hungary.

Joannes Sepuſius Vayvod of Tranſylvania, aſpireth to the Kingdom of Hungary.

About the ſame time Joannes Sepuſius Vayvod of Tranſylvania, with a great power came now too late into Hungary to have aided the King; but glad, as was thought, of his death, as tending to his own advancement; foraſmuch as he was now (the King being dead without iſſue) a man of greateſt account among the Nobility of Hungary. Wherefore as one of a deep and reaching Wit, and in great hope to obtain the Kingdom, he began cunningly to labour divers of the Noblemen one by one, and inſtantly to requeſt them, that at the next Parliament they would not betray the Honour of their Country, in ſuffering the Royal Dignity of that ancient Kingdom to be transferred unto a ſtranger, of ſuch a Nation as happily loved them not; for why the Hungarians ought well to remember what great calamities they had received in former times, in chuſing foreign Kings and Strangers to rule over them, and in following their unfortunate Enſigns againſt the Turks; which thing the woful miſeries of times paſt might notably prove; which either Sigiſmundus of Bohemia, or Ladiſlaus the firſt, of Polonia, by their unfortunate Battels, once at Nicopolis, again at Columbarium, and laſt of all at Varnu, had brought unto the Hungarians. But to ſpeak, nay once to remember the harms received by the long Cowardize of Ladiſlaus, or this late raſhneſs of his Son King Lewis, would make any noble mind to bluſh and be aſhamed; under whoſe Government all Military Diſcipline, and the Glory of Hungary, might well be thought to be utterly loſt. And he ſaid there remained of the Nobility of Hungary, men honourably deſcended of moſt ancient Houſes, worthy of the Kingdom, which bare noble minds, and were of ſufficient Courage, Diſcretion, and Power, in this time of common heavineſs to reſtore the honour of the Eſtate, and worthily to defend the Kingdom; amongſt whom (ſaid he) I would not be accounted ſo baſe minded, or heavy headed (although there be many which for the honour of their Houſes and Wealth may ſeem to go before me) that I will therefore confeſs, that any of them is for Valour, Proweſs, or Fortune, better than my ſelf, either for conducting of an Army, or government of a Kingdom; for I ſhall be a King of Courage and Valour ſufficient, if by your favourable good Will I ſhall be thought worthy of your conſent and ſufferages. The Vayvod taking this courſe, by his earneſt ſute and labour had won the good Wills of many; and ſo much the eaſier, for that Stephanus Bator (a man of greateſt Nobility among the Hungarians) was a little before gone into Bohemia unto King Ferdinand, who was then greatly buſied (by reaſon of a Parliament there ſummoned) in procuring the favour of the Nobility and Commons of that Realm, againſt the time of the Parliament, wherein he was in good hope to be choſen King; as he was in ſhort time after.

At the ſame time the Hungarians were with great ſolemnity celebrating the Funeral of their late King; whoſe dead Body after the departure of Solyman from Buda, was found whole, by the demonſtration of one Cotriſcus, one of the Squires of his body, who was preſent when he was drowned; and ſo was brought out of the Fens of Mobatchz to Alba Regalis, where it was with great Pomp buried amongſt the Sepulchers of the other Kings of Hungary his Predeceſſors. Which ſolemn Funeral once ended, the general Military Parliament (by the Authority and Voice whereof the Kings of Hungary were by their ancient Laws and Cuſtoms to be choſen) was called; in the ſhutting up whereof, John the Vayvod having in that common heavineſs no Competitor, nor any of the greateſt Nobility which durſt ſtand againſt him, was with the great applauſe and conſent of all there preſent choſen King. To whom, forthwith Petrus Perennus came and preſented the ancient Crown of the Kingdom of Hungary, which was in his keeping, made after an homely faſhion of pure Gold; with which the lawful Kings of Hungary uſed alwaies to be ſolemnly crowned. It is reported, that it was the Crown of Stephanus firſt King of Hungary, and was by an ancient Cuſtom alwaies kept in the Caſtle of Vicegradle. And ſo John the Vayvod was orderly crowned, and conſecrated by the hands of Paulus Biſhop of Strigonium, lately choſen inſtead of Ladiſlaus Salcanius, ſlain in the Battel at Mugace, and by the hands of Stephanus Brodaricus Biſhop of Vacium, whom he choſe for his Secretary. And unto Americus Cibachus he gave the honour of the Vayvod of Tranſilvania, being but a little before choſen Biſhop of Veradium. In his preferment, he was greatly holpen unto the Kingdom by the Nobility which followed him out of Tranſylvania, men of great account both in Peace and War; amongſt whom deſcended of the Hungarian Blood, were chief, Stephanus Verbetius, Paulus Antandrus, Gregorius Peſchenius, Nicholaus Gleſſa, and Janus Docia. But whilſt this new King is in this ſort buſied in rewarding his Friends, and ſtrengthning himſelf in his Kingdom, he was advertiſed that Ferdinand his Competitor of the Hungarian Kingdom was choſen King of Bohemia; who out of the old controverſie betwixt Mathias Corvinus and Fredericus the Emperors great Grandfather, alledged great claim unto that Kingdom, derived from the time of Ladiſlaus, who was reported to have been poiſoned at the time of the ſolemnization of his Marriage, through the ambition and malice of Georgius Pogibracius; who affecting the Kingdom of Bohemia, ſhortly after obtained the ſame. And now it ſeemed that the time was come, wherein Ferdinand made greater with the Kingdom of Bohemia, and ſtrengthned with the power of his Brother Charles the Emperor, not forgetting his Right, might upon good ground lay claim unto the Kingdom of Hungary, unto him (as he pretended) of right belonging ever ſince the time of Albertus the Emperor. Neither did Ferdinand, beſide the ſtrength of Auſtria and Bohemia, want the furtherance of divers of the Princes of Hungary; having in his Court many of unquiet Spirit, half Fugitives, deſirous of change, which envied at the Vayvods Royal Preferment (as if it had been taken from themſelves, more worthy thereof than he) by the raſh and tumultuous favour of the Vulgar People. For beſides Bator, who in moſt Mens judgment might moſt worthily have required and obtained the Kingdom, there were others alſo almoſt of like Nobility and Valour, as Valentius Tauraccus, Stephanus Maylatus, Janus Scala, Gaſper Scredius, Baltaſor Pamphilus, and Ferentius Gnarius; to whom alſo was joyned Paulus Bachitius born in Servia, a valiant Gentleman, who being entred into the Mahometan Religion, to avoid the Turkiſh Slavery, got away unto the Chriſtians, and hardly eſcaped from the Battel of Mobatchz. By the perſwaſion of theſe Noblemen, Ferdinand of his own diſpoſition ready enough to claim his Right, eſpecially a Kingdom, and truſting unto his Strength in Auſtria, Bohemia, Rhetia, Stiria, and Caryntbia, marched directly towards Buda. With whoſe coming, John the new King being wonderfully troubled, as a man beſet with want of all things, having neither ſufficient Strength whereupon to reſt in his new got Kingdom, neither any great aſſurance of the Fidelity of his Subjects, like enough either for fear, or of their natural inconſtancy, to fall from him, determined not to abide the coming of his Enemy to Buda; but exhorting his Captains to follow him, although he were glad to depart and give place to his evil Fortune for a time, with ſuch Power as he had brought with him out of Tranſylvania, and ſuch other as he could otherwiſe levy, he paſſed over the River to Peſtum; and not daring any where thereabouts to reſt, by long marches paſſed over the River Tibiſcus, and there encamped at Tocai, which was a ſtrong Caſtle upon the further ſide of the River. His departure being known, Ferdinand marching on, obtained Buda without reſiſtance; where he ſtaid a while, and conſulted with his Captains,

Whether he ſhould purſue his flying Enemy, or not. But it was quickly reſolved, That the diſcouraged Enemy was to be ſpeedily purſued, before he ſhould gather greater ſtrength, or enter into greater Policies. Wherefore Ferdinand committed all his Army unto the Nobility of Hungary, his Friends, whom we have before named; who marching with all ſpeed poſſible, came to the River Tibiſcus; where paſſing over upon a Bridge made of Boats which they brought with them in Waggons for that purpoſe, they came with Enſigns diſplaied unto the Caſtle of Tocai, where the King lay with his Army in order of Battel. But terrified with the ſuddain coming of his Enemies, and debating with his Captains of the greatneſs of the danger, took a courſe unto himſelf rather ſafe than honourable; for his Captains deſiring nothing more than to joyn Battel, and in manner contemning their Enemies, perſwaded him to withdraw himſelf a little out of the Battel, and to keep him out of danger; and if things fell out otherwiſe than well, to reſerve himſelf unto his better fortunes; as for themſelves they would moſt reſolutely fight againſt thoſe traiterous Fugitives, foraſmuch as it were great diſhonour for them, being Hungarians, a warlike People by nature, to refuſe Battel being offered by the Enemy. Amongſt the Chieftains of the Kings Army, Ferentius Bodo an old Captain of great experience and courage was chief, to whom the King delivered his Enſign with his own hands, and he with great skill ordered his Battel, for the number of his Souldiers; he himſelf ſtood in the main Battel with the Hungarians, placing the Tranſylvanians in the Wings. In Ferdinands Army, Valentinus Turaccus led the main Battel with the Hungarians, under Ferdinands Enſign; ſtrengthned on the one ſide with Troops of Horſemen out of Styria, and on the other, with the Horſemen of Auſtria. But Paulus Bachitius (according to the manner of the Turkiſh Wars, wherewith he was well acquainted) with a Company of Light-Horſemen lay cloſe in ambuſh in a convenient place for that purpoſe, a good diſtance off, againſt the left Wing of the Enemies Army, ready as occaſion ſhould ſerve, to take his moſt advantage. It was not greatly needful for the Captains to uſe any perſwaſions to encourage their Souldiers, ready enough of themſelves to fight. The great Ordnance once diſcharged, the Armies came faſt on and joyned Battel, where the Wings of both Battels fought with divers fortune. The Styrian Horſemen were not able to endure the force of the Tranſylvanians, but were put to the worſe. And on the other ſide, the left Wing of Bodo his Army, conſiſting for moſt part of raw and unexpert Souldiers, was by the Horſemen of Auſtria overthrown. At the ſame time both the main Battels (being almoſt all Hungarians) fought with equal courage, and that ſo eagerly, as ſeldom had been ſeen a more fierce or cruel Battel. But by a freſh charge given by Ferdinands Horſemen, who had now put to flight the right Wing of Bodo his Battel, all Bodo his Army fighting moſt valiantly, was diſordered and put to flight; Bodo the General labouring to reſtore the Battel, and to ſave the Enſign to him before by the King delivered, was by the coming in of Paulus Bachitius with his Light-Horſemen taken. The other Captains ſeeing all loſt, and paſt hope of recovery, betook themſelves to flight; all the Kings Artillery and Enſigns were taken by the Enemy. The King ſeeing the overthrow of his Army, for ſafeguard of his life fled into Polonia. Ferdinands Captains following the courſe of the Victory, entred into Tranſylvania; where the People yielding themſelves at the firſt, all the whole Province ſubmitted it ſelf unto the Authority of Ferdinand. Bodo and the reſt of the Noblemen that were taken Priſoners, with the Enſigns taken from the Enemies, were ſent to Ferdinand. But when Bodo having his liberty promiſed, could not be perſwaded to renounce his Oath given to King John, and to bear Arms againſt him, he was by Ferdinand his commandment caſt into a dark Dungeon, where ſhortly after conſumed with ſorrow and grief, he miſerably ended his life.

King John flies into Polonia.

Shortly after, Ferdinand (the Hungarians generally ſubmitting themſelves unto him) was by their common conſent ſaluted King, and crowned with the ſame old Crown wherewith King John had been crowned, which the ſame Perenus (a man of little conſtancy) brought unto him; and with him was alſo crowned Ann his Wife, the only Siſter of the late King Lewis. All which ſolemn ceremonies were celebrated at Alba Regalis, the uſual place for the Coronation of the Hungarian Kings. Ferdinand by rare felicity thus poſſeſſed of two Kingdoms, whereunto he was not born, returned into Bohemia, and left his Deputies for the Government of the Kingdom of Hungary; theſe were Stephanus Bator, whom he appointed Viceroy, with whom he joyned Paulus Biſhop of Strigonium, who had alſo revolted from King John; and made Berethſaxtus Secretary, and Alexius Turſonus a Moravian, Treaſurer.

Ferdinand crowned King of Hungary at Alba Regalis.

King John thus miſerably diſtreſſed, and thruſt out of his Kingdom by Ferdinand, fled to Hieronimus Laſcus, a man for his honourable deſcent and learned vertue, of great fame and reputation amongſt the Polonians; who glad of ſo honourable a Gueſt, was more careful of nothing, than with all poſſible kindneſs and courteſie how to comfort him, wrapt up in ſo many calamities with the loſs of his Kingdom; he frankly promiſed unto him all his own Wealth (which was not ſmall) for the recovery of his former eſtate; and that which more was, for the reviving of his former felicity, the uttermoſt of his Wit and Device, which in the compaſſing of all great matters was accounted wonderful. That bountiful entertainment of this poor King by Laſcus, was not altogether unpleaſant to Sigiſmud King of Polonia, although (becauſe he would not offend Ferdinand, with whom he was joyned in Friendſhip and Alliance) he ſeemed to moſt men plainly to forget himſelf, in ſhewing ſo ſmall kindneſs unto King John, whoſe Siſter Barbara he had ſometime married; which was the cauſe that Laſcus forgot no point of courteſie in entertaining his Gueſt, and yet the credit of Sigiſmund with King Ferdinand not toucht. But when they had ſpent almoſt a month in conſultation, and debating of matters too and fro, Laſcus accuſtomed with his deep Wit ſharply to reaſon, and adviſedly to determine of moſt weighty cauſes, at laſt reſted upon this one point, That ready help in ſo hard and deſperate a caſe was only to be hoped for of the Turkiſh Emperor Solyman; being of opinion, that he being a moſt mighty Prince and of an honourable diſpoſition, anſwerable to his greatneſs, would not reject the humble Prayers of an oppreſſed and exiled King; eſpecially, if that being by his mercy and power reſtored, he could be content for ſo great a benefit to hold his Kingdom, as of the bounty of the Othoman Kings. For Laſcus ſaw that Solyman (ſo great and proud an Emperor) was not ſo deſirous of Kingdoms (whereof he had ſo many as could not eaſily be be reckoned, then commanding over a great part of the World) as of glory and renown, wherewith he underſtood him to be wonderfully delighted above all other Kings of the Eaſt, naturally carried away with that windy vanity. This Counſel (as in effect it proved) was unto King John wholſome and reaſonable, if a man do but reſpect the poor Eſtate of a King, ſo greatly wronged, living in exile, but reſpecting the Chriſtian Common-Weal, it was undoubtedly moſt dangerous and lamentable, for one mans particular profit to bring the whole State into moſt dreadful and horrible danger; but the ſick minds of worldly men, living in ſmall hope of doing well, and at the point of deſparation, refuſe no worldly remedies, be they never ſo doubtful or dangerous. And not long after, upon this reſolution with the King, Laſcus deſirous by noble actions to encreaſe the honour of his name, took the matter upon him, and went as Embaſſador from the exiled King to Solyman to Conſtantinople. The report was, that Sigiſmund did not only not ſtay him, but ſecretly gave him his ſafe conduct with Letters of Credence, wherein he commended him unto the Baſſaes and other great men in Solymans Court, deſcended of the Polonian Blood, as his faithful and loving Subject ſent thither upon an extraordinary and ſpecial Embaſſage. Laſcus as ſoon as he was come to Conſtantinople, with wonderful dexterity had in ſhort time won the Favour, not of the Baſſaes only, but of the other Courtiers alſo; preſenting them with ſuch Gifts as might for the fineneſs and rareneſs thereof, rather than for the value (as he thought) be moſt acceptable and pleaſing to their Wives; for amongſt that barbarous and corrupted People nothing is better welcome than Gifts, whether they proceed of ſimple good Will, or other reſpect, is no great difference. Amongſt the great Baſſaes at that time of greateſt Power and Authority, was Luſtebeius, or rather Lutzis, who had married Solymans Siſter; and Abraham born at Praga, a baſe Village in Acarnania, brought up in the Court from his Childhood with Solyman; he was then Viſier or chief of the Baſſaes, and Keeper of the Emperors Seal, and was by his office to ſubſcribe all ſuch Grants or Letters as paſſed from the Emperor; by which his great place and ſpecial favour he had with Solyman, he in Magnificence, Power and Authority far exceeded all the reſt of the Baſſaes, doing whatſoever pleaſed himſelf; and that with ſuch Sovereignty and the good liking of Solyman, that it was commonly ſaid, he was the commander of his thoughts. Laſcus thus inſinuated into the Court, and oftentimes talking with the Baſſaes without an Interpreter, for that he could well ſpeak the Sclavonian Tongue (the familiar ſpeech of the Turkiſh Courtiers) earneſtly ſolicited the Kings cauſe, wonderfully commending him; for at his firſt coming, after he had ſaluted Solyman, and was about to have declared the cauſe of his coming, he was after the manner of the Turkiſh Court referred to the Baſſaes; for Solyman uſed not to admit any Chriſtian to talk with him in his Court. Laſcus requeſted of Solyman, by the Baſſaes, That King John wrongfully thruſt out of his Kingdom by Ferdinand Duke of Auſtria, and the Treaſon of certain of the Hungarians, might by the Turkiſh power be again reſtored unto the Kingdom of Hungary, which he would hold by homage of the Turkiſh Emperor, as of right belonging unto him, ſince the time that Solyman with victorious hand revenging his wrongs, and ſubduing his Enemies, had by Law of Arms (Fortune ſo judging) gained the ſame. Promiſing that King John, who for his worthineſs was by the general good liking of the Hungarians lawfully choſen to be their King, and ſo after the ancient manner of that Kingdom crowned; if he were now received into Solymans Protection, and by him reſtored, ſhould never forget ſo great a benefit, but always moſt faithfully and thankfully to honour the Majeſty of Solyman, paying him ſuch yearly Tribute as it ſhould pleaſe him to impoſe, and to make it known to all men, that he was his Vaſſal. Which thing if it would pleaſe him to grant, it ſhould be no leſs honour and glory to Solyman himſelf, than profitable and comfortable unto the diſtreſſed King. For beſide, that heroical Kings are compared unto Gods, rather for giving than receiving; it was eaſie to be ſeen, how greatly it did concern the profit of the Othoman Kings to be neighboured with a weak and tributary King, rather than with Ferdinand, a Prince of great Power, lately choſen King of Bohemia, ſupported by the ſtrength of his Brother Charles the Emperor, commanding over the warlike Nation of the Germans; which was as much difference as was betwixt the maintenance of a continual heavy War upon his Borders, and the ſafe enjoying of a moſt aſſured Peace. Beſide that, it concerned the Turks to beware, that ſuch things as they had got by the Sword, they ſhould alſo by the Sword defend; and not to ſuffer any one to grow greater than the reſt in Riches and Power. For it might ſo fall out, that Charles, grown to be a Prince of mighty Power, might draw the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes to join with him in the common cauſe of the Chriſtian Religion, and in that quarrel, as the Chriſtian Kings of Europe had in former time done, with united Forces to ſeek to recover again what they had before loſt; whoſe Force it would be hard to withſtand. Theſe things being ſharply delivered, and by the Baſſaes again reported unto Solyman, who ſtanding at a ſecret Window, had before heard them as they were by Laſcus to the Baſſaes declared; it was no great labour to perſwade the Turkiſh Emperor, of himſelf deſirous of Glory and Sovereignty, again to undertake the Hungarian War, and to grant King John his requeſt, promiſing according to the ſucceſs of the Victory to give him that he deſired, that he would faithfully perform what he had promiſed, and not ſhew himſelf therefore unthankful.

Ferdinand ſendeth an Embaſſador to Solyman.

In the mean time, Ferdinand upon great reaſon thinking it neceſſary by all means poſſible to confirm himſelf in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Hungary; and fearing no force but the Turks, determined to prove Solymans diſpoſition, and to ſeek for his Friendſhip; hoping by reaſonable means to compaſs it, by ſhewing unto the barbarous Prince (not altogether abhorring from the commendation of Juſtice) his ancient Title and Claim, and that he was by the ancient Laws of the Country right Heir thereof; thinking that Solyman having obtained ſo many Victories, and ruling over ſo many Kingdoms, would now at length give himſelf to Peace, as a man contented with his glory already gotten. His deſire was, to be received into his Friendſhip, and to joyn with him in League upon the ſame conditions which Ladiſlaus and his Son Lewis had for certain years before obtained of the Othoman Kings, and Sigiſmund King of Polonia then alſo with like quietneſs enjoyed. Wherefore having found out a fit man, whom he might ſend upon this Embaſſage to Conſtantinople (one Joannes Oberdanſcus, a Hungarian) he furniſhed him accordingly, and gave him Gifts, ſuch as he thought good to beſtow upon the great Baſſaes. But when Oberdanſcus was come unto Conſtantinople, he found Solyman harder to be intreated than he had before hoped, and the Baſſaes altogether unwilling to hear of any League; for although he was courteouſly received of Solyman, and moſt patiently heard, whilſt he both eloquently and diſcreetly before the great Baſſaes, delivered his Embaſſage; yet in the ſhutting up of all, he received no more but a proud and inſolent anſwer; for Solyman ſaid, it was far from the manner of his Anceſtors, to receive them into grace and favour which had done injury to the Othoman name; wherefore that Ferdinand had done impudently to invade another mans Kingdom, and to think to hold it to himſelf; foraſmuch as his old Title and Claim which he ſtood ſo much upon, was altogether extinguiſhed and loſt by Law of Arms, by his late Victory againſt King Lewis; for which cauſes he adjudged him unworthy of his Friendſhip and Favour, purpoſing ſharply to revenge the wrong he had received; and proclaiming War, to come again into Hungary with ſuch a power as ſhould be ſufficient to invade Ferdinand, either in Auſtria or Germany. Wherefore inſtead of Friendſhip and League he denounced unto him all the calamities of War; and ſo commanded the Embaſſador with ſpeed to depart from Conſtantinople. But Oberdanſcus when he was come back again as far as Vienna, and had there told the Kings Lieutenants of the threatning words of Solyman, and that he would ſhortly come thither with his Army, he was not of any of them believed, but reputed for a vain man. Wherefore to ſhun the hatred of them which miſtook truth for falſhood, he made haſt to come to Ferdinand, who was then at Spires, labouring for voices to further his ſuit, for that at the next Aſſembly of the States of the Empire, which was then at hand for the Coronation of his Brother Charles, he himſelf as he well hoped, was to be choſen King of the Romans. The News brought by Oberdanſcus, did not a little trouble King Ferdinand, foreſeeing as it were what would happen; for that the Turkiſh Tyrant uſed not lightly to break ſuch promiſes, but to perform them to the uttermoſt; and that more encreaſed his care, he knew he ſhould come in evil time to crave help of the Germans, for the defence of his Kingdom in Hungary againſt ſo mighty an Enemy, eſpecially his Brother Charles the Emperor being buſied in his Wars in Italy, and he himſelf wanting Mony, the only means to raiſe an Army to withſtand the Turk.

Solyman cometh into Hungary with a great Army.

The Spring now come, and all things freſh and green, Solyman altering nothing of his former determination, having levied an Army of an hundred and fifteen thouſand men, ſet forward from Hadrianople, his Europeian Horſemen going before him conducted by Abraham the great Baſſa, and Achomates Michael-Ogli, General of the Acanzij or voluntary Horſemen; and his Aſian Souldiers led by Becrambeius Baſſa following after him; he himſelf with his Janizaries and Souldiers of the Court keeping in the middle.

King John cometh to Solyman at Belgrade.

And marching on in this ſort, came in fifteen daies to Belgrade, where King John accompanied with Laſcus and ſuch of the Hungarian Nobility as took his part, came unto him, of purpoſe to make himſelf known unto him which was to protect him; and doing him all the honour he poſſibly could, to requeſt him to proceed to revenge his quarrel. Solyman with grave and yet friendly countenance, raiſing himſelf a little from the Cuſhion whereon he ſate, gave him his right hand, proteſting, That nothing could happen unto him better, or that he more deſired of God, than to be able to relieve diſtreſſed Princes, eſpecially ſuch as were wrongfully oppreſſed by his Enemies; wherefore he willed him to be of good comfort, promiſing of his bounty frankly to beſtow upon him whatſoever he ſhould in that War win with the Sword from the Enemy. King John obtained this rare favour of Solyman by the earneſt mediation of Abraham the commanding Baſſa; whom he had before at Conſtantinople by his Embaſſador Laſcus ſo now with Gifts and Requeſts, that he throughly took upon him the defence of the Kings cauſe; wherein Laſcus was eſpecially holpen by Aloyſius Grittus the Duke of Venice his Son, who then followed the Turks Camp, and was for his Fathers ſake and the great ſufficiency he held himſelf, had in great reputation amongſt the Turks; and in ſuch favour with Abraham, who did all in all with Solyman, that he could perſwade him to any thing he would. For this Aloyſius Grittus, born and brought up in Conſtantinople, and wonderful eloquent in the Turkiſh Tongue, had by the honourable carriage of himſelf, and the great Port he kept in his Houſe, ſo throughly poſſeſſed Abraham (that all commanded) that he would many times bring Solyman himſelf over the Haven to Pera, to ſolace himſelf in Grittus his pleaſant Gardens and Banqueting Houſes, which he had there moſt ſumptuouſly made after the Italian manner; whereby to his great profit he obtained to be the chief man in receiving of the Turks Cuſtoms.

Solyman enters Buda without reſiſtance, and beſieged the Caſtle.

The fame of Solymans coming directly from Belgrade to Buda, ſo terrified the Citizens of Buda, that they almoſt all forſook the City and fled unto other places further off, ſome to Strigonium, ſome to Alba Regalis, ſome to Poſſonium; ſo that at his firſt coming he entred the City (almoſt deſolate) without any reſiſtance; the Caſtle holden by a Garriſon of Germans, he commanded to be beſieged. The Captain of the Caſtle was one Thomas Nadaſtus, a man of great account among the Hungarians, both for the honour of his Houſe, and his qualities anſwerable to the ſame, graced with ſingular Learning; he perceiving his Souldiers diſmaied with the ſight of ſo great an Army, and willing to ſurrender up the Caſtle; as beſeemed a valiant Captain, forbad his Souldiers to have any talk with the Enemy, commanded the great Artillery to be bent and diſcharged upon the Turks; and ſeeing his Souldiers ſlack and timerous, reproved them of Cowardiſe and Treaſon, threatning them with ſhameful death if they did not hold out the Siege to the uttermoſt, and ſhew themſelves valiant men, both for the honour of their Country, and of King Ferdinand whoſe Pay they received, and of whoſe bounty they were to expect Rewards and Preferments anſwerable to their Deſerts. But they miſdoubting by the running too and fro of the Turks, that the Caſtle was undermined; and ſmelling, or at leaſtwiſe imagining themſelves to ſmell the ſent of the Gunpowder, which they ſuppoſed to be in the Mine, and doubting to be preſently blown up; were ſtruck with ſuch a ſuddain fear, that neither the fear of future puniſhment, neither the ſhame of ſo foul a Fact, nor the reverence of ſo worthy a Captain could ſtay them, but that they would needs without further delay deliver up the Caſtle; which when they could by no means perſwade the reſolute Captain to conſent to, but that he ſtill with ſtern Countenance exclaimed againſt their Cowardiſe and Treaſon, they laid hands on him, and bound him Hand and Foot, and ſo preſently concluded with the Enemy to yield to him the Caſtle, ſo that they might in ſafety depart thence with Bag and Baggage; which their Requeſt Solyman granted. But when the Garriſon Souldiers (in number about ſeven hundred) were about to depart with their baggage towards Poſſonium, as was before agreed; and the Janizaries coming into the Caſtle, having looſed the Captain, were about to let him go alſo; Solyman advertiſed of the treachery of the Garriſon Souldiers, and of the Fidelity of the Captain, changing his mind, judged ſuch villanous minded men unworthy of his mercy, and in deteſtation of their perfidious dealing with their Captain, gave them all to his Janizaries to be ſlain; but to the Captain himſelf he offered honourable entertainment, which when he refuſed, Solyman courteouſly ſent him away; holpen therein by the commendation of King John, although his Siſter was married to Stephanus Maylat his deadly Enemy. Which bloody execution done by the commandment of the bloody Tyrant, the Turks ſaid was not only lawfully done, but alſo to the immortal glory of his name in the execution of Juſtice; which might peradventure ſeem reaſonable, if the perpetual hatred of that moſt barbarous Nation againſt the Chriſtians gave not juſt occaſion of ſuſpect, that it proceeded rather of their ancient malice, than of any regard of Juſtice. For why ſhould the Germans, who had offended to his great good, and therefore obtained his ſafe conduct, be thought worthy of ſo cruel death? when as Solyman himſelf in puniſhing the perjury of another, ran into wilful perjury himſelf; perverting the commendation of Juſtice which he ſo much deſired, by his moſt bloody and unjuſt ſentence.

Solyman cometh to Vienna.

Vienna badly fortified.

Buda the chief City of Hungary thus taken by Solyman, he reſolved forthwith to beſiege Vienna the chief City of Auſtria; in good hope, that by the carriage away of that, the other Cities of leſs ſtrength both of Hungary and Auſtria would without any reſiſtance be yielded unto him. Wherefore he ſent before him Achometes with the voluntary Horſemen, who according to the manner of the Turkiſh Wars, running through the heart of Hungary, and entring with Fire and Sword into Auſtria, paſſed by Vienna, miſerably burning and deſtroying the Country before him as far as Lyntz. The poor People not knowing where to hide themſelves from the fury of their Enemies, nor of whom to crave help, fled as Men and Women diſmaied, carrying with them their beloved Children, the unfortunate pledges of their love, and what elſe they could, as things ſaved out of the midſt of the Fire. For whatſoever fell into the Enemies hand, was loſt without recure; the old men were ſlain, the young men led away into Captivity, Women raviſhed before their Husbands faces, and afterwards ſlain with their Children, young Infants were ript out of their Mothers Wombs, and others taken from their Breaſts were cut in pieces, or elſe thruſt upon ſharp Stakes, yielding up again that breath which they had but a little before received; with many other incredible Cruelties, which were then by the mercileſs Enemy committed. Solyman himſelf ſhortly after followed theſe forerunners, and ſeting forward with all his Army from Buda towards Vienna, by the way took the Caſtle of Altenbourg, whether by force or compoſition, is diverſly reported; of the Garriſon Souldiers there placed by King Ferdinand, he reſerved three hundred Bohemians, whom he commanded to follow his Camp. He alſo aſſaulted the little City of Neapolis ſeven times in one day, and was as often repulſed; but being loath to ſpend any longer time about a Town of ſo ſmall importance he forſook that, and held on his way to Vienna, whither he came about the ſix and twentieth day of September, and incamped in five places round about the City, with ſuch a World of People, that unto them which viewed his Camp from the higheſt Tower in Vienna, it ſeemed that the ground was for the ſpace of eight miles all covered with the multitude of his Tents and People. King Ferdinand, who from the time that he had by his Embaſſador Oberdanſcus received the hard anſwer from Solyman, alwaies ſtood in doubt of his coming; and beſide his own Forces (which were not great to oppoſe againſt ſo mighty an Enemy) craved Aid of the Chriſtian Princes his Neighbours, eſpecially of the Princes of the Empire; Who granting him Aid againſt the common Enemy, appointed Frederick Count Palatine of Rhene and Duke of Bavaria, General of their Forces. But whilſt the Germans after their manner, ſlowly ſet forward, and made leſs haſt than the greatneſs of the preſent danger required; Solyman coming in the mean time, had ſo belaid the City, that it was not poſſible for Duke Fredrick by any means to get into it, but was glad to ſtay with his Army at Chremſe about twelve miles from Vienna. A few days before by good hap, upon the report of the loſs of Buda, twenty thouſand Souldiers Horſemen and Footmen out of divers Countries, were in good time come to Vienna: Amongſt theſe, the chief Commanders was Philip the Palſgrave, Duke Fredericks Nephew (a young Gentleman of great Courage and Hope, ſent thither but a little before with a few Companies of Horſemen and Footmen by Frederick his Uncle, who was coming after with a greater power himſelf, but was now ſhut out of the City by Solyman) Nicholaus Count of Salma, the Lord William Rogendorff, Steward of the Kings Houſhold, Joannes Cazzianer, a noble man of Croatia, and afterwards Governor of Vienna; and next unto them, Nicholaus Turrianus, Joannes Hardecus, Leonardus Velſius, Hector Ramſack, Men both for their Birth and Valour of great account amongſt the Germans. The City of Vienna as it was of ſome good ſtrength toward the North, by reaſon of Danubius, ſo in other places it was at that time neither by Art nor Nature ſtrong. The Ditches, ſuch as they were, were altogether dry, and eaſie to be paſſed over; the Walls of Brick, built round without any Flankers, and neither high nor thick, but after the ancient ſimple manner of Fortification of Cities; for before that time neither had King Ferdinand, fearing no Enemy, neither they of Vienna, who had not of many years ſeen an Enemy, had any care to fortifie the City; but as men altogether buried in ſecurity, and nothing fearing the coming of ſo mighty an Enemy (although they were thereof before admoniſhed by Oberdanſcus) had not ſo much as caſt up any Rampier or Bulwark, more than at the Gate of Carinthia, whereon they might conveniently place their great Ordnance; ſo that of an hundred great Pieces, and three hundred others of leſs charge, which might have wonderfully annoyed the Enemy, a great part ſerved to no uſe for want of convenient place to mount them upon. Yet as the ſuddain coming of the Enemy, and the ſhortneſs of the time gave leave, ſuch Bulwarks as they could upon the ſuddain, they caſt up, and planted their Ordnance thereon. The City was divided into divers quarters, and to every part a ſtrong Garriſon appointed for the defence thereof; all the Gates of the City were mured up, except ſuch as were of purpoſe reſerved to ſally out at. Now had Abraham the great Baſſa encamped himſelf upon an high Hill, where ſtood a ruinous Caſtle, from whence he might overlook all the City; yet ſo, as that he lay out of danger of Gun ſhot. Becrambeius, Solymans great Commander in Aſia, lay at the Gate called Purgatoria, near the Church of Saint Ulderich. In the third Camp towards the riſing of the Hills, lay Michael-Ogli, towards the Church of Saint Vitus. At the Scottiſh Gate toward Danubius, lay the Aſpi, with divers Companies of the Janizaries; which with Shot out of their Trenches, ſuffered no man to appear upon the Walls in that quarter without moſt manifeſt danger, and poured ſuch ſhowers of Arrows over the Walls into City, as if they had fallen out of the Clouds; that hardly could any man ſtir in the City unarmed, but he was forthwith wounded. Solyman himſelf lay near unto Saint Marks Church, compaſſed about with the Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court, defended alſo with the brick Walls of the Gardens thereabouts. Whilſt the Turks were thus incamping themſelves, the Chriſtian Defendants oftentimes fortunately ſallied out upon them, and ſlew many of them. In one of which ſallies Wolfgangus Hagen a valiant Captain, with cetain old Souldiers of the Spaniards, was ſlain fighting moſt valiantly at the Gates of the Caſtle; and in another skirmiſh Chriſtopherus Zetlitz a man of great courage, ſallying out of the City with five hundred Horſemen, even unto the Enemies Trenches, was intercepted and taken with ſix others of his Company; who were all compelled by the Turks to carry ſo many Heads of their ſlain Fellows upon Poles, and ſo preſented unto Solyman; of whom he inquired many things as well concerning Ferdinand himſelf, and where he was, as concerning the Princes which had the charge of the City, whether they were in hope to defend the ſame againſt his mighty power or not. Whereunto Chriſtopherus aptly and wiſely anſwered, although not altogether ſo truly, That King Ferdinand lay not far off at the City of Lintz, expecting the Aſſembly of a great Army; and that the Princes of Germany, Bohemia, Moravia, and of divers other places were coming unto him, with great Aid; ſo that if he would but ſtay a little until his Forces were come together, he ſhould then ſee whether of them were of greater Strength and Power; foraſmuch as it would not be long before the King would come and give him Battel: as for the Princes in the City, he ſaid, he knew no more of their minds, but that both they and all the Souldiers from the higheſt to the loweſt, had ſolemnly ſworn to defend the City, and not to give it over, unto the laſt man, repoſing their hope not in the Walls and Fortreſſes thereof,but in their Weapons and Valour, being men of great reſolution, and not eaſily to be vanquiſhed or diſcouraged. With which anſwer although Solyman was a little moved, yet diſſembling his preſent heat, ſaid, he had hitherto made War againſt divers Nations, and alwaies had the Victory, whereof he doubted not now alſo; but as for him and the others taken with him, they knew they were in his power to ſave or kill at his pleaſure; yet to make them know that he could ſhew mercy unto his vanquiſhed Enemies, he frankly granted them their lives and liberty; charging them, that after they were again returned into the City, they ſhould in his name wiſh the Defendants of themſelves to yield up the City, which it was impoſſible for them long to defend againſt his mighty power, which neither the ſtrong City of Belgrade, nor the famous City of the Rhodes were able to withſtand; and to accept of ſuch reaſonable conditions as he ſhould grant unto them; promiſing that amongſt other things proceeding of his infinite bounty, he would take order, that they ſhould in ſafety depart thence with bag and baggage; in which doing, they ſhould well provide for the ſafety of themſelves and of their Goods, by flying unto his mercy in time, before the fury of the War was grown to further extremity; all which it would be too late to expect after the Victory, when nothing was to be hoped for but cruel death, murther, and miſerable deſtruction. Wherefore, it were good for them well to conſider of the matter, and not fooliſhly to refuſe that was now frankly offered them of mercy, which they ſhould not afterwards obtain with any Prayers or Tears; for why, he was reſolutely ſet down (as he ſaid) not to depart thence before he had taken the City. When he had thus ſchooled them, he gave unto every one of them three Hungarian Ducats, and ſo ſent them away. They being received into the City with great joy, made relation unto the Princes and great Captains, of all the threatning and proud ſpeeches of the Turkiſh Tyrant; which they took in ſuch diſdain, that they would not vouchaſe to return him any anſwer. Solyman not a little dipleaſed, that his great words were ſo lightly regarded, by way of deriſion ſent word to the City, That if they wanted help, he would ſend them the three hundred Bohemians, whom he took in the Caſtle of Altenbourg; to whom anſwer was returned by them of the City, That they needed no help from him, wherefore he might diſpoſe of his Priſoners as he thought good. By this, Solyman perceived, that Vienna was not to be won with words, nor the Defendants to be diſcouraged with great looks; wherefore he began to uſe his Force, and with ſuch Ordnance as he had brought with him to batter the Walls; which becauſe it was not great, but fitter for ſervice in Field than for battery, did not much more harm than to beat down the Battlements and ſuch like ſtandings, made of Timber and Boards in manner of Galleries, hanging here and there over the Wall, for the ſmall Shot to play out of, a ſimple device inſtead of Flankers. His great Artillery provided for battery was coming up the River of Danubius, which he dayly looked for; but by good hap, Wolfgangus Hoder, a forward Captain, hearing of the Turks coming up the River, went out of Poſſonium with certain ſmall Veſſels well appointed, and meeting with the Turks, ſet upon them with ſuch courage and reſolution that he ſlew many of them, and ſunk divers of their Boats and Pinnaces, amongſt whom were they which were bringing up Solymans great Pieces for battery to Vienna; which was there all ſunk in the River, with the Boats that brought it. By this good ſervice, Solyman was diſappointed of his great Artillery, and the City delivered of a great danger. So Wolfgangus having made great Spoil among the Turks, and loſt ſome few men, returned with Victory to Poſſonium. Yet another part of the Turks Fleet coming up to Vienna, at the firſt coming brake down all the Bridges; for a little above the City, the River of Danubius dividing its Channel, maketh divers Iſlands, which by ſundry Bridges are joyned together, over which lieth the way from Auſtria unto the City. This Fleet ſo kept the paſſage, that no man could without danger either by Water or by Land go in or out of the City. Solyman having loſt all his Pieces for Battery, and ſeeing how little he prevailed with his Field-Pieces, fell to undermining of the City, hoping by that means to overthrow the Walls, and to make a way for his men to enter. This work, as the Turks chief hope, was with wonderful labor and diligence attempted in fifteen ſundry places; which was not ſo ſecretly done, but that it was by Drums laid upon the ground, by Baſons filled with Water, and Sounds made into the Earth,perceived by the Defendants; and ſo with Countermines met withal, that moſt part of thoſe works were utterly fruſtrated, and in them eight thouſand of his Turks either ſlain or buried quick.

Eight thouſand Turks loſt in the Mines.

The walls of Vienna blown up.

The Turks repulſed from the breach.

A moſt terrible Aſſault.

The Turks the third time repulſed.

Solyman to buſie the Defendants that they ſhould not ſo perfectly diſcover his Mines, divided his Army into four parts, appointing them orderly to ſucceed one after another in giving Alarms to the Town, that filling their Ears with continual noiſe, he might keep them always occupied. In the midſt of the hurly burly his Mine-works went forward with all ſpeed poſſible, neither was he in that his expectation deceived; for one of the Mines brought to perfection, unperceived by the Defendants, and ſuddainly blown up, ſhook and overthrew a great part of the Wall near unto the Gate which leadeth towards Carinthia, whereat the Turks gave a great ſhout, as if the City had now been taken, and withal couragiouſly ſtepping forward, preſſed in on all ſides, by the ruins of the Wall to have entred the breach, charging the Defendants with their ſmall Shot and Turkiſh Arrows as thick as Hail. Who on the contrary part like reſolute Men ſtood in the face of the breach, with more aſſurance than the Wall it ſelf, receiving them with deadly Shot and puſh of Pike, in ſuch furious manner, that the Turks for all their multitude, unable longer to maintain the Aſſault, began to retire. Which thing Solyman perceiving, ſent in new ſupplies, and ſo renewed the Aſſault before given over, but with no better ſucceſs than before; for having received a great overthrow, as Men forgetting both Duty and martial Diſcipline, they retied, not expecting any ſign of Retreat. At this Aſſault ſo many of the Turks were ſlain, that the ground near unto the Town lay covered, and the Ditches filled with their dead Bodies. Not long after the Wall was blown up in two places more, over againſt St. Clares Church; by which breach, being not very great, the Turks ſeeking to have entred, made a bloody Fight with the Germans which defended that place; which they fought ſo deſperately to have entred, that without regard they thruſt one another upon the points of their Enemies Weapons; who gliſtering in good Armor, readily received them being for moſt part naked Men, and ſlew them without number, and ſo enfored them again diſorderly to retire, having before filled both the breaches with their dead Carkaſes. Three days after enſued a moſt cruel Fight, when as another part of the Wall (near unto the Gate of Carinthia, and not far from the firſt breach) was ſo ſuddainly overthrown, that the Turks through the new made breach ſeeing the Chriſtians as they ſtood ready to come to the defence thereof, and likewiſe the Chriſtians them, now approaching; for eagerneſs and haſt on both ſides threw away their Pieces and Bows, and came to handy blows in the middle of the breach; the Turks with their Scimiters, and the Germans with their long Swords. At which time, as the Chriſtian Captains encouraged their Souldiers with chearful perſwaſions; ſo the Turkiſh Commanders enforced forward their Turks both with words and wounds. The Aſſault began ſo terrible, that it was thought a more fierce and deadly Fight was never ſeen from the beginning of the World; which was with great reſolution maintained by the Turks, for that many of their moſt valiant Horſemen forſaking their Horſes, thruſt in with their Targets and Scimiters, or elſe with their Lances amongſt the Janizaries and other Footmen, and there fought moſt deſperately. At laſt, after this furious Fight had endured by the ſpace of three hours and many of the Turks beſt Captains and Souldiers lay dead upon the ground by heaps; the Turks ſeeing no hope to prevail, gave over the Aſſault, and retired to their Camp.

The Lord William Rogendorffe.

Vienna again Aſſaulted.

The Turks repulſed.

Long and tedious it were to recount every Aſſault given during the time of that dreadful Siege, with every particular accident not unworthy the remembrance, which for brevity wittingly I paſs over. Yet among the reſt, the moſt valiant Leader (though afterward unfortunate) the Lord William Rogendorffe is not to be forgotten, who oftentimes perceiving many of the Turks ſtragling diſorderly abroad in the Country, one day upon the ſuddain ſallied out upon them with certain Troops of Horſemen, with ſuch violence, that at the firſt onſet he overthrew them, and having them in chaſe, did ſuch ſpeedy execution, that of five thouſand three hundred ſcarce one hundred and forty eſcaped his hands; after which time his Name became terrible unto the Turks. Solyman was exceedingly grieved with the often and bloody Aſſaults by him in vain given to the City; but purpoſing now to prove the laſt and utmoſt of all his Forces, he called to him the chief Commanders of his Army, whom at the firſt he ſharply reproved as Men of no Courage, which being many times as good as poſſeſſed of the Victory, had moſt cowardly contrary to the manner of that victorious Nation, turned their backs upon their Enemies, in the breaches already half won; wherefore he willed them to pluck up their Hearts, and to make all things ready for a new Aſſault, wherein he expected that they ſhould with couragious forwardneſs and reſolution, recompence their late Cowardiſe; for why, he accounted it a great diſhonour to forſake the Siege begun; wherefore they ſhould reſolve the next day as victorious Conquerors to take the City, or elſe there as faint hearted Cowards to end their days. The next day after this heavy charge given, which was the fifteenth of October, the great Commanders of the Turks Army with all their Forces aſſailed the City, thruſting their Men into the breaches by heaps, as if they would, if no way elſe, yet with very multitude (if it had been poſſible) have diſcouraged or overborn the Chriſtians; they were come to handy Blows, and the Fight was in every place moſt terrible, the Chriſtian Defendants ſtill repulſing them with greater Courage than they were able to aſſail them. Beſides that, to the great advantage of the Defendants, many Pieces of their great Ordnance skilfully mounted in places moſt convenient, and continually diſcharged among the thickeſt of their Enemies as they preſſed on, made of them ſuch ſlaughter, and ſo cut them off, that being throughly diſcouraged, they ſhrunk back, and could not by any threats or command of their Captains be thruſt forward; chuſing rather to be ſlain of their own Captains (as ſome of them were) than to be rent in ſunder with the murthering ſhot of the Chriſtians. So that the Captains ſeeing now no other remedy, gave over the Aſſault and retired, leaving behind them many thouſands of their dead Turks in the Town-ditches.

The next day after this Aſſault, Solyman deſpairing to win the City, and fearing the coming of King Ferdinand and the Count Palatine with a ſtrong Army, as it had been to him reported, conſidering alſo that Winter was now coming faſt on, determined to raiſe his Siege; and to colour the diſhonour thereof, he ſent certain of the chief Priſoners which he had taken, richly Apparelled with their Purſes full of Mony, into the City, to tell the Captains, that he came not with purpoſe either to beſiege or take the City, but to revenge the wrongs done unto him by his Enemy King Ferdinand, and to have fought a Battel with him for the Kingdom of Hungary; whom foraſmuch as he could not draw unto Vienna, he would remove thence to ſeek for him, as his Capital Enemy; wherefore they ſhould do well to yield themſelves; which if they would, he promiſed not to enter their City, but to receive both the Citizens and Souldiers into his protection, reſerving unto them their Lives and Goods, with perpetual freedom. Which his offer the Defendants ſcornfully refuſed, as proceeding of meer deſparation. The next night following, Solyman with more than barbarous Cruelty, cauſed all the Priſoners in his Army to be ſlain, which pitiful Outcries was of the Souldiers heard into the City, not knowing what the matter ſhould be, until that the next day after the departure of the Enemy, they found the dead Bodies of Men, Women, and Children in all places of the Camp wallowed in their own Blood, a moſt lamentable Spectacle to behold. Solyman purpoſing to forſake the Siege, cauſed Abraham the great Baſſa to ſhew himſelf in order of Battel, as if he would have given a freſh Aſſault: In the mean time he himſelf roſe upon the ſuddain with the reſt of his Army, and returned towards Buda in ſuch haſt, that he neither put any Garriſon into ſuch places as he had taken, neither demanded of them any Tribute. After whom the Baſſa followed, keeping himſelf a days journey behind him; and ſo in five days he arrived with all his Army at Buda, thirty two German Miles from Vienna.

Eighty thouſand Turks loſt at the Siege of Vienna.

This Siege was given over by Solyman about the ſixteenth of October, wherein he is reported to have loſt eighty thouſand Men, amongſt whom was his great Lieutenant of Aſia, with many other of his forward Captains and beſt Souldiers. Of the Defendants few or none of name were loſt; but of the Country People it is ſuppoſed that there was about ſixty thouſand ſlain and carried away into Captivity; all the Country about Vienna was miſerably ſpoiled, all their Trees and Vines being by the Turks cut down to the ground. Solyman according to his promiſe reſtored Buda unto King John; who by ſolemn writing acknowledged himſelf his Vaſſal, and to hold the Kingdom of Hungary of him as his Lord and Sovereign. Unto him Solyman joyned Aloyſius Grittus as his Legate, to help him to provide ſuch things as ſhould be needful for the defence of that Kingdom.

Solyman reſtoreth the Kingdom of Hungary to King John.

It hapned one day whilſt Solyman lay at Buda, and had given King John with divers of the Nobility of Hungary acceſs into his Pavillion, that he fell earneſtly in hand with King John, to pardon Paulus Biſhop of Strigonium, and Petrus Parenus (who had taken part with King Ferdinand) and to receive them into his favour again; which Men King John in no caſe liked of, becauſe that they as Traitors unto their Prince and Country, forgetting their Faith and Oath, had performed the like duty to Ferdinand, as they had but a little before done unto him at the time of his Coronation; wherein he ſhewing himſelf unwilling to be entreated, ſaid, That their mutable Minds fraught with Infidelity, would never contain themſelves within the bounds of Loyalty, but find occaſion to commit ſome fouler Treaſon than they had before. Whereunto Solyman ſtraining his Voice a little as one ſomewhat moved, moſt honourably replied, Can any thing (ſaid he) happen unto thee in thy life better or more honourable, than if by this kindneſs thine Enemies ſhall be of all Men accounted Ingrateful, that is to ſay, Men noted with eternal Infamy, when as in thy ſelf the commendation of a good and courteous Prince ſhall for ever remain? And ſo not long after, fearing the cold of Winter then approaching, dangerous for his Beaſts for Carriage, eſpecially his Camels, bred and brought up in the hot Countries of Aſia; he ſet forward to Belgrade, and ſo travelling through Thracia, returned to Conſtantinople.

The honourable ſaying of Solyman to King John

All this while that Solyman thus raged in Hungary and Auſtria, Charles the Emperor lately reconciled to Clement the ſeventh of that Name, then Biſhop of Rome, with a ſtrong Army beſieged Florence, by his Lieutenant Davalus, (who might have done much againſt the Turks, if he had been ſo well imployed) labouring by all means to repreſs the liberty of the Citizens, whereunto they had but a little before aſpired, and to bring them again under the ſubjection of the Family of Medices, whereof Clement was the chief. Which thing with much ado he brought to paſs, inveſting Alexander the Biſhops Nephew in the Dukedom of Florence, and afterward giving him his baſe Daughter in Marriage; forgetting his Brother Ferdinand in the mean time, thruſt out of the Kingdom of Hungary by Solyman, and the Dukedom of Auſtria waſted by the Turks, with the City of Vienna in danger to have been loſt. Which common calamities might well have moved both the Emperor and the Biſhop, to have had more regard of, than by oppreſſing the liberty of one free City, to ſeek how to ſerve their own private reſpects.

1530. Solyman Circumciſeth his three Sons.

The year following, which was 1530, Solyman with great Solemnity and Triumph, after the Turkiſh manner, Circumciſed three of his Sons, Muſtapha, Muhamet, and Selymus, at Conſtantinople.

Solyman hardly diſgeſting the diſhonour he had before received at Vienna, and oftentimes ſolicited by King John, for aid againſt Ferdinand, who with greater ſtomack than power ceaſed, not continually to moleſt him; but moſt of all prickt forward with the inſatiable deſire of inlarging his Empire, after the manner of the Othoman Kings, accounting his Neighbour Princes always his Enemies, and their Dominions the objects of his Victories, and ſpoil for his Souldiers; raiſed ſuch an Army, as for the greatneſs thereof might worthily have been a terror unto the World; not ſo much purpoſing the protection of King John, which he in ſhew moſt pretended; neither the Siege of Vienna, as was commonly bruted; as the conquering of Auſtria, Carinthia, Croatia, Styria, and the reſt of King Ferdinands Dominions, and ſo afterwards of all Germany. For the accompliſhment whereof, he had in his immoderate deſire prefixed unto himſelf the ſpace of three years, which the great Monarchs of Rome could not perform in more than ſo many Hundreds. It was commonly reported, that the proud Tyrant would many times ſay, That whatſoever belonged unto the Empire of Rome, was of right his, foraſmuch as he was rightfully poſſeſſed both of the Imperial Seat and Scepter of Conſtantine the Great, Commander of the World, which his great Grandfather Mahomet had by law of Arms won from Conſtantine the late Chriſtian Emperor, whom he ſlew at Conſtantinople. And therefore both in his common talk and writings, as oft as he had occaſion to make any mention of Charles the Emperor, he would proudly, and as it were in diſdain term him by the name of the King of Spain, but never by the name of Emperor.

King Ferdinand ſends Embaſſadors to Solyman.

The preparation of Charles the Emperor againſt Solyman.

The diſcord of the Chriſtian Princes, and the great troubles even then ariſing in Germany about matters of Religion, did not a little encourage the barbarous Tyrant to take in hand this great expedition. King Ferdinand certainly advertiſed, that Solyman was in perſon himſelf ſetting forward with his huge Army, ſent unto him three Embaſſadors; whereof Leonardus Negarola, a noble Gentleman, well learned and skilful in divers Languages, was chief, with rich Preſents, and reaſonable offers to entreat with him for Peace. Who meeting him upon the borders of Servia, were by him courteouſly received, and patiently heard; yet obtained of him no other anſwer, but that they ſhould follow his Camp, and attend his further pleaſure. The report whereof brought a general fear upon all Germany, but eſpecially them of Auſtria, in whoſe freſh remembrance as yet remained the bleeding Wounds of their Country, their Brethren and Friends ſlain, their Wives and Children led away into Captivity, their Goods and Cattel loſt, their Houſes and Fields burnt, and thouſands of other grievous calamities which they had endured in the late Invaſion of the Turks. Charles the Emperor had in very good time a little before, for a while well appeaſed the diſſention then ariſing in Germany about matters of Religion; putting them in hope of a free and general Council to be holden for the deciding of all ſuch matters; and in a great Aſſembly of the States of the Empire to be holden at Ratisbon, ſhewing the greatneſs of the imminent danger, ſo puiſſant an Enemy threatning unto them all the calamities of War, with the manifold miſchiefs like to enſue, if they ſhould in ſo unfit time fall at variance amongſt themſelves; offering with great reſolution, to go in perſon himſelf with all his old expert Souldiers, in defence of the common Chriſtian cauſe; ſo much prevailed with the Princes of the Empire, and the Embaſſadors of the free States, that they highly commended his forwardneſs, and all other matters for that time ſet apart, agreed all with one conſent, at a prefixed day to ſend unto Vienna ſuch warlike Forces as they had in any time before ſet forth for the defence of the Chriſtian Religion, and the Majeſty of the Empire. Whereupon he wrote unto Alphonſius Vaſtius (his Lieutenant General in Italy, and one of the greateſt Captains of that age) that he ſhould without delay call together the old Captains, and to levy ſo many Companies of Harquebuſiers as they poſſibly could; and with them and the Spaniſh Souldiers to repair forthwith unto him into Auſtria. He alſo enjoyned Andreas Auria his Admiral, that he ſhould with like diligence rig up a ſtrong Fleet of Gallies and Merchants Ships, and to go againſt the Turks Navy into Græcia. At the ſame time he ſent for his choice Horſemen out of Burgundy and the Low-Countries, and many noble Gentlemen and old Souldiers out of Spain; for the guard of his own perſon he entertained twelve thouſand Germans, ſuch as had longeſt ſerved in his Wars in Italy, over whom commanded Maximilian Herberſtene and Tamiſius, both famous Captains. At the ſame time Clement the ſeventh then Biſhop of Rome, although his Coffers were greatly emptied by the late Florentine Wars, which had coſt him ten hundred thouſand Ducats; yet to make ſome ſhew of his devotion in ſo dangerous a time, with the great good will he bare unto the Emperor; after he had with grievous exaction extorted from the Clergy a great maſs of Mony (whereunto his rich Cardinals contributed nothing, as if it had been a thing utterly unlawful for them, in ſo good a cauſe to have abated any jot of their pontifical ſhew in the Court of Rome) ſent the young Cardinal Hippolitus Medices his Nephew, being then about twenty years of age, a Man indeed fitter for the Wars than for the Church, as his Legate unto the Emperor, accompanied with more good Captains than Clergy-men, and his Coffers well ſtuffed with Treaſure, whoſe coming to Ratisbone was unto the Emperor and the Germans very welcome; for beſides that he was a young Gentlemen of very comly Perſonage, and exceeding Bountiful, he entertained for thoſe Wars (beſides the Company he brought with him) eight thouſand Hungarian Horſemen, of all others beſt acquainted with the Turkiſh Wars.

Strigonium beſieged by King John.

King John underſtanding, that the formoſt of Solymans great Army were come as far as Samandria in Servia, thought it now a fit time to wring from King Ferdinand ſuch Towns as he yet held in Hungary; wherefore he ſent Aloyſius Grittus (whom Solyman had left as a helper for his Eſtate) to beſiege Strigonium, which is a City of Hungary ſituate upon the ſide of Danubius, about thirty Miles from Buda, the Caſtle thereof was at that time holden with a ſtrong Garriſon of King Ferdinands; whereunto for all that Grittus laid ſuch hard Siege both by the River and by Land, that the Defendants doubting how they ſhould be able to hold out, eſpecially if Solyman ſhould take that in his way, as it was moſt like he would; ſent for relief to Cazzianer a warlike Captain, then Governour of Vienna, and General of all King Ferdinands Forces; by whoſe appointment certain ſmall Frigats were ſent down the River of Danubius, from Poſſonium, well manned; who ſuddainly ſetting upon the Turks Fleet (which ſo kept the River, that nothing could that way poſſibly be conveied either in or out of the Caſtle) ſhould by their unexpected coming open that way. But Grittus having intelligence thereof by certain Hungarians, which though they ſerved King Ferdinand, made no great account to flie ſometime to the one part, ſometime to the other, as beſt fitted their purpoſe; preſently reſolved to ſend his Fleet up the River, and by his ſuddain coming to oppreſs his Enemies, in like ſort as they had thought to have done him. And the more to encourage his Souldiers, he promiſed great rewards to all ſuch as ſhould perform any extraordinary piece of ſervice in that Action; and ſo having throughly furniſhed all his Fleet with good Souldiers, but eſpecially with Turkiſh Archers, ſent them up the River to ſeek their Enemies; who fearing no ſuch matter, as Men ſurpriſed with the ſame miſchief they had prepared for others, were at the firſt exceedingly diſmaied; yet conſidering that they were reaſonably well provided for their coming (although they yet wanted ſuch help as Cazzianer had appointed to ſend them) they thought it a great ſhame to flie, and therefore putting themſelves in order of Battel, came down the River, and with great courage encountred their Enemy. There began a ſharp and cruel Fight, many being ſlain and wounded on both ſides; but at laſt they of Poſſonium not able longer to endure the deadly ſhot of their Enemies, and eſpecially of the Turkiſh Archers, (who with their Arrows ſore gauled both the Souldiers and the Mariners) they turned their backs and fled; in which Fight of ſixty Frigats which came from Poſſonium, only thirteen eſcaped, with Corporanus the General, all the reſt being either ſunk in the Fight, or elſe taken by the Enemy, being run aſhore and forſaken by the Poſſonians, truſting more unto their Legs by Land, than their Oars by Water.

Beſides this loſs of the Frigats, there was ſlain of the Poſſonians almoſt five hundred. After this Victory, Grittus hoping that they in the Caſtle of Strigonium, deſpairing now of relief, and fearing the coming of Solyman, would not long hold out, left off to batter or undermine the Caſtle, (wherewith he perceived he little prevailed) purpoſing by lying ſtill, and keeping them in the Caſtle from all relief, to enforce them in time to forſake the place. Thus whilſt the divided Hungarians with their own hands inconſiderately ſought one anothers deſtruction, with the ruin of their Country; Solyman the great Enemy of all Chriſtians was ready at their backs to devour both the one and the other, as in few years after he did.

Much about this time the old Spaniſh Souldiers in Italy, drawn together by Vaſtius, as the Emperor had before commanded, were come to the Alpes. In this Camp, of one ſort of Men and other, was above twenty thouſand, whereof almoſt the third part was not ſerviceable; for the old Souldiers enriched with the long Wars in Italy, and the ſpoil of the rich Country of Lumbardy, wherein they had of late been Billited, brought with them all their old gotten ſpoils and ſubſtance, not forgetting ſo much as their Women, and whatſoever elſe ſerved their pleaſure; for carriage whereof they drew after them a great multitude of Carriages and unneceſſary People, all which ſerved for no other uſe but for the Souldiers pleaſure, and to conſume Victuals. Which their licentious wantonneſs Vaſtius deſiring to reform, gave ſtrait commandment through all the Camp, That they ſhould leave behind them all ſuch unneceſſary Baggage, and appointed what Carriages ſhould ſuffice for every Company. Whereat the Souldiers began at the firſt to murmure, and preſently after to ariſe up in Mutiny; for many of the Captains being rich, and diſliking of that long and dangerous expedition, covertly incited the common Souldiers to cry out upon Vaſtius the General, for their Pay already due. Which thing once put into their heads, and the matter ſet on foot, quickly grew to that height, that they all with one voice ſaid flatly, That they would go no foot further before they had received their Pay. Vaſtius although he well perceived that tumult to be raiſed by ſome of his Enemies, which ſought thereby to lighten his credit, was glad for all that for the preſent to diſſemble the matter, and yielding to the neceſſity of the time, to content the mutinous Souldiers with one months Pay, promiſing them their full contentment, at ſuch time as they ſhould come unto the Emperor; and ſo when he had with much ado appeaſed that Tumult, he ſet forward into Germany.

Mutiny, among the Spaniſh Souldiers.

Immediately after the Spaniards followed the Italians, who with ſuch chearfulneſs offered themſelves to that ſervice, that every Captain brought with him twice ſo many in his Company as was expected; ſo that Vaſtius (who before doubtful for their forwardneſs in ſo dangerous a War, eſpecially in the aid of the Germans, of whom they had in the late Wars received great harms, had by great and earneſt perſwaſions induced divers of the Nobility, and others of the better ſort, to enter into that honourable Action, in hope that they would draw after them great numbers of their Friends and Tenants, (as indeed they did) was now glad to ſend back again many of the common Souldiers, by reaſon of the multitude; and alſo to his great diſcredit, and the offence of many, full ſore againſt his will to diſplace moſt part of thoſe forward Gentlemen, whom he had but a little before made Captains, who to their no ſmall charge had gallantly furniſhed themſelves according to their degrees and places; for the Emperor had then appointed what number of Italians he ſhould bring; and alſo given commandment, That rejecting the reſt, he ſhould commit the leading of them only to thoſe old expert Captains, of whoſe valour and diſcretion he had before had good experience. There were Martius Columna, Petrus Maria Rubeus, Philippus Torniellus, Joannes Baptiſta Caſtalius, Fabritius Maramaldus, Pyrrhus Stipcianus, and Camillus Columna, being all Men of great worth, and approved faith towards the Emperor.

In theſe Italian Companies were fourteen thouſand ſelect Footmen, beſide many other brave Men who voluntarily reſorted from divers places to Vienna. After theſe Footmen followed Ferdinand Gonzaga with two thouſand Horſemen, and certain Troops of Grecians and Spaniards, and with them came many noble Gentlemen out of all parts of Italy, who had before been great Commanders, but now ſerved as private Gentlemen voluntarily without charge or pay; accounting it a great ſhame to tarry at home as Cowards, and not to be preſent in that religious War.

The Emperor alſo about the ſame time having taken view of his Horſemen come out of the Low-Countries moſt excellently appointed, and Shipping his great Ordnance, whereof he had bought great ſtore at Nurembergh, departed down the River from Ratisbone to Lyntz. The River of Danubius never carried ſo many Veſſels and Souldiers ſince the time of the great Roman Emperors, as it did at that preſent; and yet beſides them which went down the River by Shipping, the pleaſant Banks on both ſides were filled with great Companies of Horſemen and Footmen paſſing all alongſt the River under their Colours, with their Drums and Trumpets ſounding, which altogether made the moſt glorious ſhew that a Man could well behold upon earth.

Solyman cometh into Hungary.

In the mean while, Solyman in ſix and fifty days march come to Belgrade, thruſt over the great River Savus by Bridges made in divers places, an infinite number of his Horſemen into Hungary, and leaving Danubius on the right hand, turning a little upon the left, marched directly towards the rich Country of Stiria, called in ancient time Valeria, and now Stiermark. By the way as he went he came to the little Town of Gunza, which one Nicholas Juriſchitz (a Man of an invincible Courage) kept with a ſmall Garriſon of his own. This Town ſtandeth in a Plain not far from the City of Sabaria, built ſquare, and but of a ſmall compaſs, not very ſtrongly walled, a poor obſcure thing, never famous till now by the great diſhonour that the Turkiſh Emperor Solyman there received. Abraham the chief Baſſa (who ſo abſolutely commanded among the Turks, as if Solyman had received him into the fellowſhip of the Empire with himſelf) was very deſirous to ſave this Captain Nicholas, for that he knew him to be a Man of great Courage, and was familiarly acquainted with him at ſuch time as he lay Embaſſador a Conſtantinople; wherefore he attempted firſt by gentle perſwaſions and large offers, and afterwards by moſt terrible threats, to induce him to yield the Town to Solyman. But finding him ſo reſolutely ſet down, that he was neither by fair nor foul means, but only by force to be removed out of his Town; he incloſed the ſame round about with the huge Army of the Turks, and by Mines overthrew the Walls in three places. Which ſuddain breach whilſt the Garriſon Souldiers moſt valiantly defended againſt the furious Aſſault of the Janizaries on the South ſide of the Town, the Baſſa planting his Field-pieces upon the Hills on the North ſide, did from thence grievouſly annoy the Defendants; who fiercely aſſailed by their Enemies before, and beaten with the great Ordnance behind, were grievouſly diſtreſſed. Wherewith the worthy Governour ſomewhat troubled, though not much diſcouraged, ſuddainly of Timber and Boords raiſed up a Curtain twelve foot high, at the backs of his Souldiers, wherewith they were ſo covered from the ſight of their Enemies, that they could not make any certain ſhot at them, but only at that Curtain at all adventures, not doing any thing ſo great harm as before; and with deſperate and reſtleſs labour, in deſpight of all the Turks great power, repaired the Breaches, in as ſtrong manner as at the firſt. In the mean time two hundred of the Turks Horſemen ſtragling from the Camp, and ſeeking after Booty into the Country as far as Neoſtat, were by the Hungarian Horſemen intercepted, and all ſlain or taken; whoſe heads the Hungarians brought to Vienna, and the more to encourage the Souldiers which daily repaired thither, in token of good luck ſet them up upon ſtakes upon the Walls of the City. Then was it certainly known of the Priſoners, that Solyman had in his Camp five hundred thouſand Men, and three hundred Field-pieces, which were not of greater bigneſs but that a Camel might well carry one of them, being taken from the Carriage; for why, Solyman purpoſing by deſtroying the Country before him, to draw the Emperor unto Battel; had (as they ſaid) brought no greater pieces of Battery with him. Which report of the Priſoners was alſo confirmed by the Embaſſadors of King Ferdinand, whom Solyman gave leave to depart at Gunza, giving to every one of them a Gown of Velvet and a piece of Plate, with Letters unto the Emperor and King Ferdinand his Brother; wherein proudly uſurping the Titles of many Kingdoms, he moſt inſolently wrote himſelf Lord and Sovereign of almoſt all Countries and Nations. But the effect thereof was, That he was come into Hungary, to revenge the wrongs which they had done unto King John his Friend and Vaſſal; and would with Fire and Sword enter their Countries, and by the power of God and his great Prophet Mahomet, the favourers of juſt quarrels, give them Battel, if they durſt meet him; wherefore if they would as valiant and courageous Princes meet him in the Field, he would in one Battel end that quarrel with them, and in reward of the Victory either win or loſe the Empire of the World. When Solyman had thus a great while lain at the Siege of Gunza, and thereto given divers ſharp Aſſaults, being ſtill with great loſs and diſhonour repulſed, he in the ſpace of four days caſt up near unto the Town-Ditch two great Mounts of Faggots and Earth, as if they had been two great Mountains, of ſuch heighth, that they overtopped not the Walls only, but even the higheſt Towers in the Town (by which wonderful work the greatneſs of the Turks Army might eaſily be conjectured;) one of theſe great Mounts he caſt up directly againſt the face of the Town; and the other at a corner of the ſame, to Flanker along the Wall; from whence he did with his ſhot not only beat them which appeared upon the Walls for the defence thereof, but them alſo which upon occaſion went too and fro in the Streets. Theſe Mounts being with incredible celerity brought to perfection, the Town-Ditch filled up, and many of the Defendants either ſlain or wounded upon the Walls, the Turks gave a moſt furious Aſſault at the place which was before ſhaken with the Mine; againſt whom the valiant Captain as need was in that extream danger, oppoſed all the ſtrength he had left. But the Turks ſtill preſſing on with there infinite multitude, were got up to the top of the Walls with eight Enſigns, from whence they had repulſed the Defendants; which being all either wounded or wearied, ſhrowded themſelves under the defence of their Penthouſes, being neither able nor of courage to make further reſiſtance, ſo that the Walls were now abandoned, and the Town there left without Defendants; when ſuddainly ſuch a great clamor was made by the loud outcries and lamentation of the Women and Children and other fearful People, that the Turks which had recovered the top of the Walls, ſtrucken with a ſuddain fear, thinking the Town to have been full of Souldiers, ſtood as Men aſtonied and diſmaied, whereupon the Defendants began again to take courage, and to ſhew themſelves; at whoſe ſight the Turks poſſeſſed with a needleſs fear, forſook the Wall, and could not by any perſwaſions or threats of their Captains be brought on again to the Aſſault. The Town was that day in all Mens judgments defended by the mighty power of God, and not by the ſtrength of Man. It grieved the proud Tyrant above meaſure, that ſo baſe a Town ſhould ſo long hold out againſt all his power, ſo that oftentimes in his rage he would threaten to raſe it down to the ground, and not to leave any ſign thereof remaining; which he would undoubtedly have in time performed, had not Abraham the great Baſſa (by whoſe counſel he was altogether directed) otherwiſe perſwaded him; who waiting a fit time, when his choler was paſt, told him, that it was not worth his name and greatneſs, to ſpend his time and forces upon ſo ſmall a Town of no importance, by raſing whereof he ſhould neither get honour nor profit; for why, no Man would marvel, if he with ſo puiſſant an Army ſhould take ſo ſmall a thing, eſpecially by long Siege, whereby the ſtrongeſt places are enforced to yield; and when he had ſo taken it, it would be accounted a greater honour for ſo little a Town to have holden out ſo long, than for him to have with ſo great forces in long time conſtrained it; but if it ſhould otherwiſe fall out, as the chances of War are uncertain, that he ſhould by any occaſion be conſtrained to leave it, he ſhould thereby get no ſmall diſhonour; wherefore it were more wiſdom to ſpare his Souldiers labour in ſo ſmall a matter, whereof he was not to expect either honour or profit, and for to reſerve them for his greater deſigns, and not vainly to ſpend his forces and time in beſieging of ſo baſe a Village, from whence he might now depart with leſs diſhonour than he could afterwards, when he had proved the uttermoſt of his forces, and yet in the end glad peradventure to forſake it; wherefore it were more for his honour to raiſe his Siege, and calling the Governour of the Town unto him, to give him the Town as it were of bounty, than to ſpend ſo many good Men as he muſt needs caſt away in the winning of it by force; with theſe and like reaſons the Baſſa prevailed ſo much with Solyman, that Nicholas the worthy Governour of the Town was by a Herald at Arms ſent for to come to the great Baſſa, Solyman diſdaining (as it ſhould ſeem) to ſpeak with him himſelf. The Governour being ſent for, though he was grievouſly wounded, and in ſmall hope of life, yet ſtoutly refuſed to come to any parley, except he were firſt well aſſured both by ſafe conduct and good hoſtages for the ſafety of his perſon, and that nothing ſhould be exacted of him, not befitting his Religion and Honour; which ſtout anſwer cauſed Solyman and the Baſſa to think, that his ſtrength was not yet ſo weakned, but that he was ſtill able to hold out the Siege; and thereupon, that he required for his ſafety was forthwith granted, and two Men of great account ſent for hoſtages for him into the City with Solymans ſafe conduct. Which being received, the Governour went forth, and was by Abraham the great Baſſa honourably received into the Camp, and commanded to ſit down by him in his Tent; where he was by him firſt by the way of courteſie demanded, whether he had recovered his old infirmity wherewith he was troubled at ſuch time as he was ſent Embaſſador unto Solyman at Conſtantinople? After that, whether the wounds he had received in the laſt Aſſault, were dangerous or not? But laſt of all, and that which moſt concerned the matter, upon what hope he alone had ſo long and ſo obſtinately withſtood the mighty Sultan Solyman, when as all his Neighbours round about him had ſo willingly ſubmitted themſelves? ſaying further, That he marvelled much why he repoſed any confidence in the lingring King Ferdinand. Whereunto the Governour modeſtly anſwered, That he was (thanks be to God) well delivered of his old Diſeaſe, and that his wounds were without danger; but as concerning his holding out, he ſaid, that he for his great Wiſdom knew, that it was the duty of a good Souldier valiantly to withſtand his Enemies, and not to be troubled with any evil hap, or diſcouraged with any chance of War; as for himſelf, he ſaid, when Mans help failed, he had repoſed his full truſt in God, by whoſe power he had been hitherto preſerved, which as he well hoped ſhould never fail him at his need; and that King Ferdinand was not ſo far off, but that he would before it were long be there preſent with a great Army; wherefore he did not greatly marvel, that he was not relieved before that time, foraſmuch as many lets and occaſions might chance which might hinder the Kings purpoſe, conſidering that fortune always by nature unconſtant, was in nothing more like unto her ſelf in her unconſtancy, than in martial Affairs. The Baſſa wondering at the invincible courage of the Governour, ſaid, That although the great Emperor Solyman might now at his pleaſure utterly deſtroy the Town, with all that therein was, yet being by nature of a moſt honourable and mild diſpoſition, and a great lover of valiant and couragious Men, had commanded him in his name to give him that Town, and the lives of all them that were in it, as a reward of his Valour ſhewed in the defence thereof; yet ſo that he ſhould ſwear Obedience unto him, and receive ſome few Turks into the Town, in token that he had yielded the ſame. The politick Governour knowing that of eight hundred valiant Souldiers, he had ſcarcely a third part left, and them alſo ſore weakned with wounds and want of reſt, thought it neceſſary to make his Peace in the beſt ſort he could; for what could have hapned unto him more wiſhedly, than with his Honour to keep the Town ſtill, and with the loſs of a few pleaſing words to deliver himſelf, with ſo many of his Friends, from extream fear and peril? And ſo in all his talk ſhewing no ſign of fear, and with great words ſetting forth the ſtrength of his Garriſon (which was indeed brought to an extream weakneſs) ſaid he was ready at the firſt to have yielded up the Town, for the old acquaintance he had with him at Conſtantinople, but was always letted by the Germans and Spaniards which were there in Garriſon, fierce and cruel Souldiers, whoſe hard hearts were (as he ſaid) hardly intreated to ſuffer him at that time to come out of the City into the Camp; wherefore he could promiſe to a be Friend to all ſuch Turks as ſhould paſs that way, and to relieve them with ſuch things as his waſted Country could afford; and further in token of his ſubmiſſion, to ſet up one of Solymans Enſigns in the chief Tower of the City; but as for receiving any Turks into Garriſon, in token that he had yielded up the Town, he was willing ſo to do, but that he was greatly afraid they ſhould be evil entreated by the Germans and Spaniards, who deadly hated the Turks; whereof it was to be thought, that new Wars would eftſoon ariſe. In concluſion, he ſo cunningly uſed the matter, that the great Baſſa was contented with this ſmall token of ſubmiſſion, that he ſhould receive in at one of the Gates of the City, one of Solymans Captains with ten Janizaries, which being done accordingly, and they courteouſly for a while entertained and again diſmiſſed, the great Baſſa held himſelf with that ſimple ſubmiſſion well contented; when as the Governour had neither German nor Spaniard as then in Garriſon. So when Solyman had with his great Army lain at the Siege of Gunza by the ſpace of twenty eight days, and in that time to his great loſs aſſaulted the ſame thirteen times, he roſe with his Army, glad of a little fained ſubmiſſion for the ſafegard of his honour; and leaving Vienna on the right hand, whither moſt part of the Chriſtian Army was aſſembled, took the way on the left into Carinthia, and ſo came to the River Mura, and from thence to the City Gratia. This turning of Solymans out of the way from Vienna, where he knew his Enemies lay, put all fear out of the minds of the Chriſtians, which they had before not without cauſe conceived, inſomuch, that he but a little before feared as a Prince of great pride and power, ſhamefully repulſed at the little Town of Gunza, and now ſhunning his Enemies at Vienna, began to grow into contempt as if he had been running away for fear. Which diſgracc the Turks ſought by divers excuſes to cover, as that the ſtrong City of Neoſtat lay betwixt him and Vienna, which could neither without much difficulty be taken, nor danger left Enemy behind him; beſides that, Winter began to approach, which cauſed him (as the Turks gave it out) to content himſelf with the ſpoil of the rich Countries betwixt the Rivers of Savus and Dravus, and ſo in good time to return again to Belgrade. But they which ſeemed to ſee farther into the matter, were of opinion, That Solyman underſtanding by his eſpials, and ſecret advertiſement from his Friends, that the Princes of Germany had with one conſent joyned their Forces with the Emperors, brought out of Italy, Spain, and the Low-Countries, which at his ſetting forth he leaſt feared, and that the Chriſtian Army in number great, conſiſted not of raw Souldiers, but for the moſt part of ſuch as had been trained up in Wars; Men both for courage and ſkill nothing inferior to his Janizaries and beſt Men of War; choſe rather to take the ſpoil of the Country, as he might with ſafety, than to adventure his Perſon and State to the hazard of a moſt doubtful and dangerous Battel.

The Governor cometh to the Baſſa.

His anſwer to the Baſſa.

Solyman departeth from the Siege of Gunza.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Michael-Ogli by the commandment of Solyman, ſent Caſon with fifteen thouſand of his voluntary Horſemen (who in Solymans expedition againſt Vienna, had run through the Country of Auſtria as far as Lyntz) charging him without ſtay to ſpoil all the Country far and near which lieth between Caſon ſent with fifteen thouſand Horſemen to ſpoil Auſtria.

Danubius and the Alpes, thereby to learn what he could of the ſtate and ſtrength of the Emperors Camp; and by doing all the harms he could poſſibly, to leave a moſt lamentable remembrance of the Turks being in Auſtria. Caſon was of himſelf forward enough, and deſirous of the ſpoil; but ſo much the more, for that he was by the former Road into that Country become both famous and rich; wherefore dividing his Horſemen into three Companies not far diſtant one from another, he ſuddainly oppreſſed an infinite multitude of all ſorts of People in the Fields and Country Villages as he went; all which he either ſlew without mercy, or carried away as miſerable Priſoners. Thouſands of Men and Women tied together in Chains and Ropes, were by the cruel Turks enforced to run as faſt as their Horſes; the Country Villages were all burnt down to the ground, and in them the poor Children of the Chriſtians, whoſe Parents were either ſlain or carried away Captives; ſo that all the Country every way almoſt for the ſpace of a hundred and fifty Miles, was covered with Smoke and Fire, within three Miles of Lyntz; where King Ferdinand then lying, was glad to get himſelf farther off to Strabinga, where his Brother Charles the Emperor lay. This cruel Turk according to his charge, having with Fire and Sword without compaſſion wrought all the Wo he could poſſible upon the poor Chriſtians, and now loaded with the ſpoil of the Country and multitude of Priſoners, began to return the ſame way he came, thinking to find Solyman either at the Siege of Gunza, where he left him, or nearer hand at Neoſtat coming towards Vienna. But he as is aforeſaid, riſing with ſmall honour from Gunza, and fearing the power of the Chriſtians, was quite gone another way as far as Gratia, the Metropolitical City of Stiria, ſtanding upon the River of Mura; which turned to the utter deſtruction of Caſon and all his followers; for as ſoon as it was perceived by the burning of the Country all about, that the Turks were come near to Lyntz, the Chriſtian Captains with their Companies went out of the Camp, ſome one way, ſome another, as was thought moſt convenient for the meeting with theſe miſchievous Turks, which never reſted in one place; wherein they uſed ſuch diligence in taking the paſſages, that it was not poſſible they ſhould eſcape unfought withal. Four Companies of Spaniſh and Italian Horſemen under the leading of Lewis Çove a valiant Captain, firſt lighting upon them in a Valley near unto Neoſtat, and deſperately charging them, were by the Turks for moſt part ſlain. But Caſon perceiving how he was on every ſide laied by the Chriſtians in the Vallies betwixt Neoſtat, Sabaria, and Veſprinium, the night following with more than barbarous Cruelty ſlew four thouſand of the Chriſtians he had before taken Priſoners, becauſe he ſhould not be hindered by them in his flight; and dividing his Army into two parts, about midnight began to ſet forward, uſing the benefit of the night to have eſcaped from his Enemies out of theſe Vallies wherein he was encloſed. One part of this Army led by Feriſes taking the way Southward, did with incredible labour cut a way through the thick and overgrown Woods (a thing thought altogether impoſſible) and ſo with little or no loſs came to Solyman into Stiria. Caſon with the other part of the Army breaking out of the Valley of Storamberg, chanced upon the Palatine (General of the Forces ſent from the German Princes) who with ten thouſand Footmen and two thouſand Horſemen, and certain Field-pieces brake the Battel of the Turks, and ſlew of them a great number; In which conflict Caſon his chief Enſign was taken. He fighting moſt valiantly in the rere-ward to give others time to eſcape, was himſelf there ſlain; whoſe gallant Head-piece preſented afterwards to the Emperor, confirmed the report of his death. They which eſcaped from the Palatine, in their flight fell into the hands of Lewis, and the Marqueſs of Brandenburg, by whom they were ſlain like Beaſts. The Hungarian Horſemen led by Valentinus Turacus, lighting upon them which fled from Lewis and the Marqueſs, had the killing of them for the ſpace of ſeven Miles; and of all others did upon them the cruelleſt execution, following them hard at the heels with their freſh Horſes, and fiercely inſulting upon them in their own Language. Thoſe few diſperſed Turks which eſcaped the fury of the Hungarians, fell into the Hands of the Country People about Veſprinium and the Lake of Bulaton, which came out on every ſide in hope of ſpoil, who ſhewed them ſmall favour; ſo that of eight thouſand which were with Caſon, it was thought not one returned to Solyman.

Four thouſand Chriſtian Captives murdred by Caſon.

The ſlaughter of the Turks.

The Emperor underſtanding that Solyman was gone as far as Gratia in Stiria, called his chief Captains together into the Caſtle of Lyntz, to know their opinions, whether it were beſt to follow the Enemy into Stiria or not. The Cities of Lyntz, Gratia, and Vienna, are ſituate almoſt in form of a Triangle; but from Lyntz to Gratia is three good days journey of bad rough way by Horſe. Some ſaid it was beſt to Fight with the Turks in that uneven Mountain Country, where the Turks chief ſtrength conſiſting in the multitude of his Horſemen, ſhould ſtand him in ſmall ſtead, but ſhould be enforced to try the Battel with his Footmen, wherein he was inferior to the Chriſtians. This Counſel although it had in it many difficulties, yet for that it proceeded from the moſt approved Captains, ſo moved the Emperor, that he preſently ſent Apontius a Spaniard (the moſt famous Captain Antonius Leva his Lieutenant), to take view of that paſſage; who ſhortly after returned again to Lyntz, bringing word that all the Country as he went was deſolate and for fear forſaken of the Inhabitants; but concerning the place of the Enemies above, he could learn no certainty. Whereupon it was by general conſent concluded, that they ſhould all go to Vienna, whither all the ſtrength of the Germans was already aſſembled, there to take a general view of the Army, and to give the Enemy Battel if he ſhould again return. Some there were of great Courage which openly diſliked of that going to Vienna; ſaying, that the Emperor ſhould rather in that diſtreſs of the Provinces of Stiria and Carinthia purſue his Enemy, than turn out of the way to Vienna. But others of greater judgment, whoſe opinion prevailed, ſaid, It was one thing to invade, and another thing to defend; ſo that the Emperor might with honour enough encamp himſelf in the Fields of Vienna, and from thence to expect and deride the baſe expedition and vain brags of his proud Enemy, who a far off challenged him into the Field, and then like a Coward durſt not come near him.

Charles the Emperor his power at Vienna.

The Emperor coming to Vienna, and taking a general view of the Army, found therein two hundred and ſixty thouſand Men, whereof ninety thouſand Footmen, and thirty thouſand Horſemen were accounted old expert Souldiers, and of them many whole Companies and Bands, of ſuch as had before been Generals, Captains, Lieutenants, nants, Antients, or other Officers and Men of Mark in other Armies, and now were content to ſerve as private Men. It was thought that ſo many worthy Captains and valiant Souldiers, were never before in the memory of Man aſſembled together into one Camp; for the Princes and free Cities had not ſent thither common Souldiers, but their choſen and approved Men; ſtriving as it were amongſt themſelves, who ſhould ſend the beſt. All the flower and ſtrength of Germany from the River of Viſtula to the Rhine, and from the Ocean to the Alpes, was by the Princes of the Empire and free Cities either ſent thither, or of themſelves voluntarily came thither. A thing never before heard of, that all Germany ſhould as it were with one conſent, be glad to take up Arms for their common ſafety, in defence of their honour and liberty; eſpecially againſt People brought out of the furtheſt parts of Aſia, Syria, and Egypt. Beſide the great number of Spaniards, Italians, and Burgundians; the Bohemian Camp lay not far off, ſtrengthened with them of Silicia and Moravia. There were alſo ſome Troops of Polonian Horſemen, not ſent thither by publick Authority, but ſerving as voluntary Men; King Sigiſmund winking thereat, who as he was careful not raſhly to break the League he had made with Solyman; ſo leſt he ſhould ſeem careleſs of the Chriſtian common cauſe, by notable diſſimulation left place for ſuch of his Subjects as would (as if it had been without his knowledge) to ſhew their Valour in the moſt honourable War.

The Order of the Chriſtian Army

The Chriſtian Army ready to receive the Enemy, lay in a great Field near unto Vienna, in this Order; Three great Squadrons of Pikemen, ſtanding one Squadron a great way diſtant from another, were ſo placed againſt the Enemy with like and equal Front, that all the Horſemen divided into two parts, might well be received into the great ſpaces betwixt the three Squadrons; for it was not thought convenient to oppoſe ſo ſmall a number of Horſemen in open Field without the Footmen, againſt almoſt three hundred thouſand of the Turks Horſemen. The right wing of the Horſemen was led by the Emperor himſelf, and the left by King Ferdinand. Before and behind, and on every ſide of the three Squadrons of Pikes, ſaving in thoſe places which were left open for the Horſemen, about thirty paces off, were placed twenty thouſand nimble Harquebuſiers ranged in length, and but five in a rank; ſo that whilſt the firſt diſcharged, the ſecond, and after them the third, and ſo the reſt readily and orderly coming on, might without let deliver their Bullets upon their Enemies; neither was it thought any diſadvantage to place them ſo thin, for that if they found themſelves by the Enemies oppreſſed, they might eaſily retire amongſt the Pikes, ſtanding faſt at hand. Before the Harquebuſiers was planted the great Ordnance, whereof, the Emperor had ſuch ſtore. and ſo well placed, that he could therewith (as with a moſt ſure Trench) have compaſſed in his whole Army. Only the Hungarians, Men well acquainted with the manner of the Turks fight, choſe to lie in the open Field in two great wings, under the leading of their two valiant Captains Valentinus and Paulus. Many noble Gentlemen beholding this goodly Army, wept for joy, conceiving a moſt aſſured hope of Victory, if the proud Enemy durſt with all his Forces joyn in Battel. But Solyman, who by all means ſought with his great number of Horſemen to keep the wide and open Fields, certainly advertiſed both of the Emperors ſtrength and the manner of his lying, got him over the River of Mura, and at Marpurge by Bridges which he made on the ſuddain, paſſed over the great River Dravus. And ſo he which that Summer held almoſt all the World in ſuſpence, with the doubtful expectation of the ſucceſs of that War; having with all that his huge power wherewith he threatned the World, done nothing at all worth the remembrance, but was in every place either overcome, or elſe ſhamefully repulſed; left Stiria, and returned the ſame way he came, directly betwixt the Rivers of Savus and Dravus, to Belgrade, and ſo to Conſtantinople; leaving here and there ſome remembrance of his barbarous cruelty, and ſtill looking behind him if the Emperor were not at his heels; at ſuch time as a few Dalmatian and Croatian Horſemen did ſtill purſue the tail of his Army. It is reported, that he carried away with him thirty thouſand Chriſtians into Captivity, beſides many thouſands of poor Country People ſlain by the mercileſs Turks; but eſpecially by Caſon and his Followers; and ſo to his eternal infamy was twice in the ſpace of a few years driven out of Germany. The Emperor underſtanding of Solymans departure, determined with all ſpeed to return into Italy; although King Ferdinand his Brother moſt earneſtly entreated him before his departure, in ſo fit a time to imploy thoſe great Forces againſt King John, who now as it were forſaken of Solyman, might eaſily with ſo puiſſant an Army have been thruſt not only out of Buda, but alſo quite out of the Kingdom of Hungary, wherein he was by Solyman as his Vaſſal placed. But the Emperor, for that Winter began now to approach, and the Plague was got into the Camp, yea even into his Court, continued in his former purpoſe of departing into Italy; yet yielding ſo far unto his Brothers requeſt, as to leave behind him all the Italians, who joyned with King Ferdinands own Forces were thought ſufficient for the accompliſhment of the Hungarian War.

Over theſe Italians, one Fabritius Maramaldus was by the means of Alphonſus Victius appointed General; but no order taken for the payment of their Wages, whereby the Souldiers might be the more encouraged to take in hand that War, and alſo kept in obedience. Which think at the firſt much offended the minds of the other Captains, thinking themſelves diſgraced by the preferment of Maramaldus, a Man of no greater account than themſelves; but as ſoon as it was known abroad, the under Captains and Officers of the Bands, led with the credit and favour of their old Captains; ſaid plainly, That they would not go into Hungary, except either King Ferdinand would in perſon go himſelf, or elſe one of the great Commanders, Vaſtius or Leva were appointed for the General; and the Common Souldiers ſaid flatly, that they would ask leave to depart, except they had three months Pay, which they knew well they ſhould never get of that poor King; already brought unto great wants. Vaſtius to appeaſe this Mutiny, travelled greatly with his Souldiers, perſwading them to remember the faith of Souldiers, and by their conſtant perſeverance to maintain their honour they had got by their chearful coming; telling them, That valiant Souldiers never wanted Pay, furniſhing themſelves by their Victories with all things neceſſary from the Enemy. And as for Maramaldus their General, they had no juſt cauſe to miſlike him ,being an old Captain of great experience, for courage and policy not inferior to any of the greateſt Commanders, and placed by the Emperors own appointment as a Man moſt ſufficient, whoſe judgment they ought not in any caſe to diſlike. When Vaſtius had with theſe and ſuch like reaſons well appeaſed the tumultuous Souldiers, and was gone out of the Camp into Vienna, to take further order for the remedying of all difficulties; Night the Nurſe of ſedition came on, whoſe darkneſs excluding all modeſty and fear, gave further ſcope and place unto the mutinous Souldiers inſolency. By chance there was at that time brought out of the City into the Camp very courſe, hoary, mouldy Bread; which ſome of the Souldiers having brought, and thruſting it upon the points of their Spears, ſhewed it unto their Fellows in great choler, railing againſt King Ferdinand, which in his own Kingdom in the beginning of the War had made no better Proviſion, but with ſuch corrupt and peſtilent Bread to feed them being Strangers, which were only for his defence and quarrel to adventure their lives. And but a little before, a certain Spaniard, being but a common Souldier, coming into the Generals Tent, and caſting the like Bread down at the feet of Vaſtius, bitterly curſing the Emperor and King Ferdinand, had raiſed a wonderful Tumult; wherefore the Italian Souldiers flocking together out of their Tents, gave many hard Speeches concerning their Pay, their Victuals, and the difficulties of the Hungarian War. There one Titus Marconius of Volattera, a Man of a troubleſome Spirit, but reaſonably well ſpoken, was by the other Souldiers ſet up upon a great heap of Saddles, that he might be the better heard, and by divers ſeditious Captains requeſted frankly to ſpeak his mind, ſo far as he thought concerned the ſafety and welfare of them all. Where it is reported that he ſpake unto them in this ſeditious manner as followeth:

The ſeditious Oration of Titus Marconius, to the mutinous Italians.

And ſhall the Spaniards (ſaid he) beloved Companions and Fellows in Arms, as you have heard, go into Italy? And to our great hurt again return into their old Wintering places? And that which I am aſhamed to ſay, as notable Gueſts lie with our Wives? And we Italians as baniſhed Men fight this Winter with Ice and Snow in Hungary? And that forſooth for a moſt beggarly King, and him alſo to the Hungarians a Forreigner and meer Stranger, againſt a natural born Prince, of his Subjects well beloved and ſtrongly backt with the power and wealth of the Turkiſh Emperor? And that which might juſtly grieve any couragious mind under the conduct of Maramaldus, who oftentimes blinded with anger and haſty cruelty, hath ſo furiouſly thruſt us through with his Sword, that he ſeemeth not more to deſire the name of a Captain for any thing, than for the killing and murthering of us now his Souldiers. Neither can I believe that you, who have oftentimes been Captains and Antients your ſelves, will be ſo mad, as to ſerve under a common Captain, without hope of any Pay, of any Proviſion, of Victory, or return. Truly it delighteth me not ſo much to have come hither for the honour of the Italian Name (no more reckoned of than a Ruſh) although I have eleven times ſerved; as it doth this day aſhame me to ſee this ſhameful end of the War, ended before it was well begun. But in Regal Dignity is no ſhame, nor equity in rewarding the Souldier; for Kings now adays make account of Souldiers only according to their neceſſity; this is it alone that giveth us Pay, this is that getteth us love, this is it maintaineth our reputation; all which Peace once by Victory obtained, leeſe their Grace. So fareth it with us at this preſent (Fellow Souldiers) the Emperor and his Brother King Fardinand, delivered from the fear of a moſt dangerous War, to eaſe themſelves of this multitude of us, ſeek to thruſt us into Hungary as Beaſts to the ſlaughter, by the ſpending of our Blood, hoping to purchaſe unto themſelves Victory, and by the loſs of us to take no harm themſelves, though the Turks and Hungarians ſhould with Sword and Famine utterly deſtroy us, ſhut up with the Ice of Danubius, and the Snow of the Alpes. *But peradventure you underſtand not theſe devices, no more than you underſtand what this terrible and bloody * Comet, ſhooting his Beams towards* Italy, pretendeth. Verily it is not fatal either to Solyman or Cæſar, but rather threatned unto us death and deſtruction; for they with like counſel full of ſafety and diſcretion, would not open any way unto their own deſtinies, but warily withdrew themſelves one from the other, and ſhunned all the dangers of the Field. Wherefore if it were lawful for them, without any blemiſh of their Majeſties, ſo notably to provide to keep themſelves out of danger, when as on each ſide half the World lay as a reward of the Victory, ſhall not we look to our ſelves, that we be not thruſt thither from whence appeareth no hope of return, but with utter deſtruction, when as we may do it without offence, and by good right, eſpecially ſeeing no Pay is offered us. That you ſee what a goodly end is made of that notable War, wherein only we the Italians, in ſtead of commendation and reward, reap injury and diſgrace; and are peradventure of purpoſe exiled into Hungary, that this flour of Chivalry being drawn out of Italy, and ſent far out of the way, Colonies of Spaniards and Germans may be placed in our ſteads. Truly it ſeemeth hard dealing, to be ſent out of the way into a barbarous Country, where we ſhall find all hoſtility, and no place of refuge to receive us, being diſtreſſed. Beſides this, we ſhall alſo whether we will or no, feel how heavy and intollerable it will be both to our bodies and minds, to endure the miſeries of this Winter and dangerous War; and in the mean time, with no ſmall hearts grief imagine what things our Children, our Brethren, our Kinſmen, yea our Wives, ſuffer at home of the Spaniards and Germans. Wherefore worthy Companions, it concerneth us more at this time to have a good foreſight, than valiantly to Fight. The occaſion preſented unto us for our ſafety and welfare, ſtandeth upon a fickle point, it muſt be done without delay, and we muſt hie us hence before that the Spaniards truſs up their Baggage; and ſo preventing the Emperors formoſt Companies, come firſt our ſelves into Italy; for if we ſhall ſtay but a little to conſult upon the matter, Vaſtius and our other proud Commanders will preſently be here, the very betrayers of the Italian Blood, who for their own gain and our miſchief, have brought us into theſe ſtraits; who I know will moſt earneſtly entreat us, and with many ſubtilties ſeek to ſeduce us, by offering us great pay, and whatſoever elſe we ſhall require; which will all prove but words. But you, if you be Men, refuſe to talk with them, as with your Common Enemies, or rather in revenge of their old injuries kill them. Here wanteth not in this Aſſembly valiant Men, for courage and integrity of life their betters far, which can lead you forth, order your Battel, and fortunately uſe this your courage and forwardneſs. Wherefore if you be wiſe ſet forward reſolutely, and good fortune no doubt will attend you in your haſt; for the full accompliſhment of your deſire conſiſteth in your haſt only.

* At this very time a great Blazing Star was ſeen in the Firmament at Vienna.

Eight thouſand of the Italians in mutiny, forſake their Captains, and return into Italy.

Marconius had no ſooner made an end of this mutinous Speech, but the tumultuous Souldiers in every Band began highly to commend and approve the ſame, and by and by ſuch a confuſed noiſe was heard through all the aſſembly, as uſeth to riſe amongſt the diſcontented vulgar People, ready to riſe in Arms; but the Drums preſently ſtriking up a March, they made no longer ſtay, but without delay pluckt up their Enſigns, and forward they go directly towards Neoſtat. In this tumult, in ſtead of their old Captains, which either were not then preſent, or refuſed to go with them, they choſe others to be their Leaders; who once named by the ſeditious multitude, might in no caſe without dander refuſe to take the charge upon them, were they never ſo unwilling. Theſe were Montebellius, Nerius, Melcarius, Sanctius, and the two Twins of Millan, called Gluſſani, who drew after them eight thouſand Souldiers; the reſt partly for ſhame, and partly for fear, ſtayed ſtill with Maramaldus their new appointed General. When they were thus gone, Vaſtius and divers other great Companies hearing thereof in the City, poſted after them ſix miles, and at length overtaking them, requeſted them to ſtay, and not to diſhonour themſelves with ſo foul a Fact; telling them that their Pay was ready for them, and omitting nothing wherewith they might have been moved to ſtay, mingled their prayers with grievous threats; but they reſolutely ſet down, would neither hear nor ſtay, but as men inraged with fury and their own guilty Conſcience, with ſtern looks diſcharged ſome ſmall Shot upon them. Whilſt Vaſtius would there have ſtayed the Company, and did what he poſſibly could by threatning and otherwiſe, to have terrified their Leaders, and to have brought them back, he was oftentimes in danger to have been ſlain. In the end he was glad to forſake them, and to return as he came. King Ferdinand by this ſudden departure of the Italians, for that time diſappointed of all his hope of recovering the Kingdom of Hungary from King John; in great choler wrote unto his Subjects of Styria and Carinthia, whereby the Italians were to paſs, That they ſhould ſhew them no manner of courteſie in their paſſage; whereupon enſued great hurt on both ſides. Yet for all that, theſe Italians in deſpight of what could be done, at length recovered Tiliaventum in the borders of Italy, where they disbanded themſelves, and returned every man to his own dwelling, leaving King Ferdinand unto his own Forces. The Emperor alſo breaking up his Army at Vienna, and purpoſing now as before, to return into Italy, appointed Ferdinand Gonzaga to go formoſt with the light Horſemen, with whom alſo he went himſelf; after him followed Vaſtius with the Spaniards; two days after came the Cardinal, whoſe Train was of all the greateſt; laſt of all followed the mercenary Germans; in which order he returned in ſafety into Italy.

Charles the Emperor returneth into Italy.

This was the end of thoſe wonderful Preparations made by the two great Monarchs Solyman and Charles the Fifth, in the year, 1532. which held the World in great ſuſpence with the fearful expectation of ſome marvelous alteration; and ſo much the more, for that at the ſame time appeared a great Blazing-Star by the ſpace of fifteen days. All which for all that, God ſo appointing, ſorted to far leſs harm than was of moſt men feared.

Auria goeth againſt the Turks.

Now whilſt Charles the Emperor was thus in Arms againſt Solyman in Auſtria, Andreas Auria by his appointment, with a Fleet of thirty five tall Ships and forty eight Gallies, wherein he had embarked twenty five thouſand good Souldiers well appointed, did in the mean time wonderfully annoy the Turks in Peloponneſus. With this Fleet Auria departing from Meſſina in Sicilia, and paſſing alongſt the Coaſt of Italy, into the Ionium, near unto the Iſle of Zacynthus met with Vincentius Capellius the Venetian Admiral, with a Fleet of ſixty Gallies ſet forth by the Venetians for defence of their Territory; who offered unto Auria all poſſible kindneſs, but excuſed himſelf, that he could not joyn with him in that War againſt the Common Enemy, by reaſon of an old League betwixt the Turks and the Venetians, which Solyman had but a little before renewed. So that at that time the Venetians ſtood as men indifferent betwixt Charles the Emperor and Solyman, offering like kindneſs to both, but taking part with neither, yet in readineſs to fall out with either, if they ſhould by Sea or Land offer any injury to their State; wherein they bare themſelves ſo indifferent, that it was thought, that they at one and the ſelf ſame inſtant advertiſed Auria, That Hymerales the Turks Admiral lay with his Fleet of ſixty Gallies evil appointed, in the Bay of Ambracia, where he might eaſily be ſurprized; and gave likewiſe warning to him of the coming of Auria with a ſtrong Fleet, wiſhing him in time to provide for his better ſafety, by retiring his Fleet into ſome other place of more aſſurance, which he preſently did; for knowing himſelf too weak, he departed from Ambracia, to the ſtrong Haven of Calcide. Which thing with other like, well conſidered, might give juſt cauſe to any Chriſtian heart, to bewail the State of that time, wherein the Chriſtian Princes being either in mortal Wars amongſt themſelves, or intangled by Solyman with Leagues of no aſſurance, omitted the faireſt opportunity that could have been wiſhed for the abating of the Turks greatneſs; for if the Venetians joyning their Forces with Auria, had in time purſued the Turkiſh Admiral, it was like, that not only all Solymans Power at Sea had been utterly diſcomfited; but alſo moſt part of Grecia, mindful of their ancient Empire and Liberty, and then ready to have rebelled, and joyned hands with the Chriſtians, might have been recovered out of the Turkiſh Thraldom; yea and the Imperial City of Conſtantinople greatly indangered, few or none being left for the defence thereof, beſide young Janizaries and effeminate Eunuchs, the heartleſs Keepers of the Turks Concubines; Solyman himſelf being then far off in Hungary, and having drawn with him the greateſt ſtrength of his Empire.

Auria taking his leave of the Venetian Admiral, with much Honour done at Sea on both ſides; was ſhortly after advertiſed, That the Turks Admiral was fled to Calcide. Wherefore now out of hope to do any good againſt him, he directed his courſe to Corone (which is a ſtrong City upon the Coaſt of Peloponneſus, about twelve miles diſtant from Modon) with purpoſe to beſiege it; which when he had well viewed, and conſidered of the ſtrength thereof, he laid Siege thereto both by Sea and Land, battering it moſt terribly at one time with fourteen great pieces of Artillery by Land, and a hundred and fifty by Sea, ſo that a more terrible Battery had not been lightly heard of; for all that, the Turks valiantly ſtood upon their defence, and manfully repulſed the Italians, which under the Leading of the Count of Sarne aſſaulted the City by Land. The Turkiſh Garriſons lying about in the Country of Peloponneſus, did what they might to have relieved the City; who by the valour of the ſaid Count were diſcomfited, and Zadares their chief Leader ſlain; whoſe Head, with others of the ſlain Turks, were ſet upon Stakes, to the terror of the Defendants.

Auria beſiegeth Corone in Peloponneſus.

At length the Turks wearied with Aſſaults, and terrified with the thundring Shot which never ceaſed, and driven alſo from their greateſt ſtrength towards Sea, by the deſperate aſſault of certain reſolute Chriſtians, whom they had now full ſore againſt their wills received as it were into their boſoms; fearing alſo to want Victual and Powder, if they ſhould longer hold out without any hope of Relief; yielded the City and Caſtle to Auria, upon condition that they might in ſafety depart thence with bag and baggage. Corone thus taken, and a ſtrong Garriſon of Spaniards there placed, and the Chriſtian Greeks which dwelt in the City ſworn unto them, Auria put to Sea with his Fleet, and ſailing again by Zazinthus, came to Patras another ancient City of Peloponneſus, which he eaſily took and ranſacked; for the Turks diſtruſting the ſtrength of the City, had ſtrongly intrenched themſelves near unto the Caſtle; which place alſo, together with the Caſtle, they in ſhort time yielded to Auria; covenanting, that they, and eſpecially their Wives, might with their Garments only depart in ſafety into Ætolia; which was by Auria ſo preciſely performed, that when three thouſand of them paſſed along through the Army of the Chriſtians, ranged on both ſides, and ſome of the Souldiers began rudely to handle ſome of the Women, and to take from them ſome of their Jewels, he cauſed them preſently, to the terror of others, to be hanged. Auria leaving his Army at Patras, with commandment to follow him by Land, ſailed alongſt the coaſt of Peloponneſus, until he came to the Strait of Naupactum, now called Lepanto, which is the entrance into the Gulf of Corinthia, parting Peloponneſus from Ætolia, with a Strait ſomewhat narrower than the Strait of Helleſpont. Upon this Strait ſtood two Caſtles, the one called Rhium, upon the coaſt of Peloponneſus, and the other Molycreum in Ætolia, which Bajazet had wonderfully fortified, and ſtored with Ordnance for the keeping of that Strait. Auria threatning all extremity unto the Captain of the Caſtle on Peloponneſus ſide, if he did enforce him to plant his Battery, ſo terrified him, that he without delay yielded unto him the Caſtle; covenanting only, That he and his Souldiers might in ſafety depart thence; which granted, and the Turks departed, Auria gave the ſpoil of the Caſtle unto his Souldiers which came with him by Sea; whereby he ſo offended the minds of the other Souldiers which came by Land from Patras, that they were about to have forſaken him. The other Caſtle upon Ætolia ſide was not ſo eaſily taken, being valiantly defended by a Garriſon of old Janizaries, appointed for the keeping thereof. Yet in the end by fury of the Ordnance a breach was made, whereby the Chriſtians forcibly entring, ſlew three hundred of the old Garriſon-Souldiers, not taking any one to mercy; the reſt fled into a ſtrong Tower in the midſt of the Caſtle, where ſeeing no remedy but that they muſt needs fall into the hands of their Enemies, they deſperately blew up themſelves, and the Tower, with a great part of the Caſtle, with Gunpowder, in ſuch ſort, that it ſeemed all the Sea coaſt to have been ſhaken with an Earthquake; and the Gallies which lay a Bow-ſhot off, were almoſt overwhelmed with ſtones blown out ſo far off. The great Ordnance taken in this Caſtle was valued at 70000 Ducats; whereof certain pieces of a wonderful greatneſs, with Arabian letters written upon them, were afterwards by Auria brought to Genoa; and in remembrance of the Victory, mounted upon the Bulwark at the mouth of the Haven. All theſe things thus happily atchieved, Auria ſtrongly fortified the City of Corone, ſtoring it both with Munition and plenty of Victual, committing the defence thereof to Mendoza a valiant Spaniard, with a ſtrong Garriſon of Spaniards; promiſing of his own charge to relieve him whenſoever he ſhould need, if the Emperor ſhould defer to do it. The Strait of Naupactum laid open, Salviatus with the Gallies of Malta ſcoured all alongſt the Gulf of Corinth, doing great harm unto the Turks which dwelt on both ſides of the Gulf, ſpoiling and terrifying them even as far as Corinth. Not long after, Winter now approaching, Auria receiving Letters from the Emperor, of Solymans departure out of Hungary, returned with his Fleet loaded with the ſpoil of the Turks, to Naples, and ſo from thence home to Genoa.

Corone yielded to Auria by the Turks.

1533. The Turks beſiege Corone.

In the beginning of the Spring following (which was the year, 1533.) it was riſely reported that the Turks were coming with a great Fleet towards Peloponneſus; and not long after, Mendoza Governor of Corone, by Letters advertiſed Peter of Toledo, Vice-Roy of Naples, That he was both by Sea and Land hardly beſieged by the Turks; and that he would to the uttermoſt of his Power valiantly defend the City, ſo long as he had any proviſion of Victual: Wherefore he moſt earneſtly requeſted, That if the Emperor would have the Town kept, he ſhould in time ſend him Relief, whereupon the oppreſſed Grecians taking heart, were like enough to rebel, and to help to expulſe the Turks quite out of Peloponneſus. But above all things he forgot not to crave ſpeedy Aid of Auria, and to put him in mind of the faithful promiſe he had made to relieve him at his need. Upon this news, Charles the Emperor commanded Auria his Admiral, to rig up a convenient Fleet for that Service, promiſing forthwith to ſend unto him twelve Gallies, which he had new built in Spain. He alſo requeſted the Knights of Malta to Aid him with their Gallies againſt that common Enemy. Wherefore Auria having with wonderful celerity rigged up thirty tall Ships, and as many Gallies, came to Naples to take in his Souldiers; there the old Garriſons of the Spaniards which for want of pay were riſen in mutiny againſt the great Commander and General Vaſtius and the Vice-Roy, and had rifled the City of Averſa, and done no little harm all about in the Country of Campania, were again pacified by a pay given unto them, and preſently embarked for Corone, under the Command of Rodericus Macicaus their General; at which time alſo Frederick of Toledo the Vice-Roy's Son, with a Company of brave Gentlemen went aboord, vowing unto the Sacred War that their firſt Service. The Knights of Malta came thither alſo with their Gallies. But whilſt theſe things were a doing, Auria to incourage them of Corone, for fear leſt they deſpairing of help, ſhould fall to ſome hard compoſition with the Turks, ſent Chriſtopher Palavicine a reſolute young Gentleman of an invincible courage, with a moſt ſwift Gally to Corone; who by daylight paſſing through the midſt of the Turks Fleet, ſafely recovered the Haven, to the great joy of the beſieged Chriſtians; and ſhortly after when he had well viewed all things he was ſent for, with the ſtrength and manner of the Enemies lying, and filling the minds of the Defendants with aſſured hope of ſpeedy reſcue, about noon time of the day he ſuddenly brake out again through the midſt of his Enemies, and as it were miraculouſly eſcaped in ſafety, for all that they could do, although they ceaſed not to give him chace ſo long as they were in any hope to have overtaken him. Auria departing from Naples, came to Meſſina, where he certainly informed of the Enemies force both by Sea and Land, with the number of their Gallies, and ſeeing that the chief hope of relieving of the City conſieſted in celerity, ſtayed not for the Gallies he expected out of Spain, but held on his courſe towards Grecia; for it was told him, that the Enemies Fleet daily increaſed, by the coming in of the Turkiſh Pirats; and that Aſſem-Beg (otherwiſe called the Moor of Alexandria, an arch Pirat) was ſtill looked for, in whoſe good directions the Turkiſh Captains repoſed the greateſt hope of their Victory. When he was come as far as Zazynthus, he was informed by the Venetians, That Luſtibeius Baſſa (or rather Lutzis Baſſa the Turks great Admiral, and Solymans Brother in law) with Solyman of Acarnania, and the Moor (men for their skill at Sea, of great Fame and Reputation) lay before Corone, with eighty Gallies manned with divers Companies of the old Janizaries; ſo that it was thought a matter of exceeding peril for him to adventure to relieve the Town, except he took the advantage of ſome proſperous gale of Wind. Wherefore Auria to have yet more certain knowledge of the Enemies Fleet, ſent before him Chriſtopher Palavicine with one Gally, again to view the manner of the Enemies lying; who paſſing the Promontory of Acrites, ſaw all the Turks great Fleet lying in very good order before the City; and ſo returned to Auria, confirming that the Venetians had before reported, and that the Turks Fleet was greatly increaſed, and lay ready as it ſhould ſeem to give him battel as ſoon as he ſhould approach the City. For all that, Auria nothing diſmaid with the greatneſs of the Turks Fleet, made no ſtay, but ſtill kept on his courſe, and with a fair gale of Wind paſſing the Promontory of Acrytes, came directly towards Corone.

The order of Auria his Fleet before Corone.

Two great Gallions, of all the Fleet the moſt War-like Ships, came formoſt; whereof the one was Aurias's own, which he had built with a wonderful Charge; and the other was of Sicilia, Theſe two great Ships were appointed by Auria to turn a little upon the left hand; and at ſuch time as the Enemy ſhould ſet forward from the ſhore, to caſt Anchor betwixt both the Fleets; that as occaſion ſhould ſerve, they might as out of two ſtrong Caſtles, beat the Turks Gallies with their great Ordnance, wherewith they were for that purpoſe wonderfully ſtored. Next unto theſe great Gallions followed the other War-like Ships with full ſails; after whom came the Gallies in three Squadrons, whereof Salviatus had the leading of the right Wing, which conſiſted of the Biſhop of Romes Gallies and them of Malta; in the left Wing and near unto the Enemy commanded Antonius Auria; and in the middle was Auria himſelf.

The Chriſtian Fleet diſordered.

At the firſt ſight of the Chriſtian Fleet, the Turks moved not from the ſhore, but diſcharged their Ordance at them afar off, and then begun to ſet forward and to draw nearer; eſpecially the Moor, who with greater courage than the reſt, aſſailed the ſide and the rereward of the Fleet; for the Chriſtians keeping on their courſe right forth to Corone, and turning nothing to the left hand, as was before appointed, ſeemed as if they had fled; and ſo much the more, for that the Gallies in the right Wing, for fear of the Turks great Ordnance, did fetch a great compaſs farther off into the Sea, and many of the middle Squadron and of the left Wing alſo, had diſorderly thruſt themſelves in amongſt the Ships, although they had received little or no harm of the Enemies great ſhot.

In this confuſion of the Chriſtian Navy, the Moor requeſted Lutzis the Admiral, not to let ſlip ſo fair an occaſion, wherein the Chriſtian Fleet might eaſily have been overthrown; but whilſt Lutzis doth ſlowly and conſiderately ſet forward, Auria in the mean time had put his Fleet again in order, and with a fair Wind was come to Corone.

Auria arriveth at Corone.

Two of the Ships by the way falling foul one on another, ſtaid behind, being not able to keep way with the reſt; about which all the Turks Gallies preſently flockt, and took the leſſer of them, killing all the Spaniards they found therein. Out of this they boorded the greater, and with a bloody fight had won the Forecaſtle and Waſt of the Ship; when Auria, accounting it no ſmall diſhonour to have his Ships ſo ſurpriſed at his heels, cauſed all his Gallies to turn again upon the Enemy, to reſcue thoſe Ships. The Turks ſeeing that, and with the Weſternly Wind by little and little fallen down ſo far with the Ships, that they were come within the danger of the ſhot of the Town, began with great ſtir to forſake the Ships, and to betake themſelves to their Oars, and ſo in manner of flight withdrew themſelves.

The Turks Fleet flies to Modon.

Whom Auria purſued a good way to Modon, thundring in their Poupes with his great ſhot, which he liberally beſtowed amongſt them; whilſt in the mean time Antonius Auria came to reſcue the two diſtreſſed Ships. There the Spaniards which but a little before had hardly maintained their cloſe fights, began now as men revived, to ſhew themſelves, and couragiouſly to make reſiſtance; and they which came with Antonius Auria to their reſcue, entring with wonderful celerity on every ſide, ſlew and took 300 Janizaries, which with great courage had entred thoſe Ships, and were there left by the ſudden departure of their Fellows. Amongſt whom was taken one Joſuphus an old Captain of 1000 Janizaries; to whom Auria after he was come to Corone, gave a fair Suit of Apparel and a chain of Gold, and ſo ſet him at liberty without any ranſome, thereby to provoke the Turks to the like kind of courteous dealing with the Chriſtians. Aſſam-beg the Pirate, and the other Captains of the Turks Fleet, wonderfully blamed Lutzis the Admiral, for that he would not then fight with the Chriſtians, when as he was thereto moſt earneſtly requeſted both by the Captains and Souldiers in general, and had a fair opportunity of Victory offered at ſuch time as the Chriſtians Fleet was diſordered; but he excuſed himſelf, ſaying, That it was given him in ſpecial Charge from Solyman the Emperor, That he ſhould in any caſe reſpect the ſafety of his Navy, and not to come to the hazard of a battel.

Corone relieved by Auria.

The Turks which beſieged the City by Land, upon the approach of the Chriſtian Fleet, forſook their Trenches and fled; at which time Mendoza the Governor ſallying out, took great ſtore of Victual and War-like proviſion which the Turks had for haſt left behind them. So Auria to his great honour having driven the Turks from Corone both by Sea and Land, furniſhed the City with ſtore of Corn, Wine, Victual, Powder, and Shot; and committed the defence thereof to Macicaus and the Companies of the mutinous Spaniards which he had brought from Naples; comforting the Greeks, and exhorting them, patiently for a while to endure thoſe Calamities of War; telling them that the Emperor would the next Spring make War againſt the Turks both by Sea and Land in Peloponneſus, and free them from the Turkiſh Bondage.

Auria returns, and before Modon braveth the Turks Fleet.

And ſo imbarking the old Garriſon of Spaniards, departed from Corone, and came before Modon, where he lay as it were braving the Turks Admiral, hoping thereby to draw him out of that ſtrong Harbor to battel. But when he ſaw that the Enemy could by no means be allured out of his ſtrength, or aſſailed as he lay, he departed thence to Corcyra, and ſo back again to Meſſina in Sicilia.

The Moor of Alexandria well beaten, and taken by Canalis the Venetian.

Within a few days after, Aſſam-beg the Moor of Alexandria and moſt famous Pyrate, lying in wait for the Merchants Ships of Venice coming out of Syria with Merchandize, by chance met with Hieronimus Canalis upon the Coaſt of Crete; where in the night time was fought betwixt them a fierce and cruel Battel; wherein of the Moors thirteen Gallies, four were ſunk, three taken, and the reſt having loſt moſt part of their Rowers, fled to Alexandria. In this Fight were ſlain three hundred Janizaries which were going to Caire, and a thouſand other Turks; of all them that were taken, there was ſcarcely one ſaved, but the Moor himſelf, who grievouſly wounded in the Face, for ſafeguard of his life was glad to diſcover himſelf; for the Venetians maintaining their State by Trade and Traffique, do of all other ſhew leaſt favour unto Pyrats. When the Moor had made himſelf known to Canalis, there was great care taken for the curing of his Wounds, and either of them began with notable diſſimulation to excuſe the matter to other; ſaying, That they were both deceived by the likeneſs of the Gallies, and miſtaking of their Friends for Enemies; when as for all that, they knew one another right well. For the Moor ſaid, that he took thoſe Venetian Gallies for to have been part of Auria his Fleet; and Canalis excuſed himſelf, by ſaying, that he miſtook him for Barbaruſſa, who a few years before had ſurpriſed three of the Venetian Gallies. Yet the Venetians doubting how Solyman would take the mater, by their Embaſſador ſought to excuſe what was done, as a thing happening by error and miſchance; of which excuſe Solyman accepted, and ſaid moreover, that Canalis had done well and Souldier like, to repulſe by force the wrong that was offered him. Three of the Emperors Gallies ſtaying behind the reſt of the Fleet, were near unto the Promontory Palinurus, upon the Coaſt of Apulia, intercepted and carried away by Sinam, ſirnamed the Jew, a notable Pyrate of that time alſo.

Macicaus ſlain.

The Winter following, the Spaniards and Greeks in Corone began to want Victuals, eſpecially Wine and Fleſh; for the Turks had ſo blocked up the City, that nothing was to be had out of the Country; wherefore the Souldiers requeſted Macicaus their Governor and General to lead them forth to ſome piece of ſervice againſt the Enemy, forſomuch as they were not to hope for any relief elſewhere before April, wiſhing rather valiantly to die like men in Fight againſt the Turks, than to languiſh within thoſe dead Walls for want of Victual. But Macicaus mindful of his charge, ſought by many reaſons to diſſwade them from ſuch purpoſe, ſhewing them what an offence it were raſhly to depart out of the City committed to their cuſtody, which might be unto them dangerous, although they ſhould ſpeed never ſo well; and that thoſe wants which they rather feared than felt, would well enough be overcome by ſparing and patience; and therefore told them plainly, that he was reſolutely ſet down to keep the City for the Emperor, and to indure all hardneſs, rather than to incur the infamy, That he had forſaken the City, and betraied his Garriſon. Yet for all this the matter was ſo urged by Didacus Touarres and Hermoſilla, both great Captains, and by the general importunity of the Souldiers, that Macicaus was enforced to yield to their deſire, and to promiſe them to go; yet earneſtly proteſting, that he did it altogether againſt his Will, rather enforced than perſwaded unto that, whereof he had no great hope of ſucceſs. Among other that were ſo forward in this action, was one Barbatius, a moſt valiant Greek, who could perfectly ſpeak the Turks Language, and of all others beſt knew the By-waies and ſecret paſſages of the Country; he undertook to be their Guid, and by unknown Waies to bring them unto the Enemies undiſcovered in the dead time of the night, when as they feared no ſuch matter. So Macicaus commending the cuſtody of the City to Liſcanius and Mendeſius, with charge that they ſhould ſuffer no man to go out of the City after his departure, for fear of giving any knowledge unto the Enemy, ſet forward about ten a clock in the night towards Andruſſa, Barbatius being his Guid; who ſhunning the common beaten Waies, brought them by ſecret and uncouth Paths that night half the way to Andruſſa; but upon the riſing of the Sun he brought them into a ſecret woody Valley, where they reſted and refreſhed themſelves all that day, and ſetting forward at night, came to Andruſſa before day. In this Town, which was of no great ſtrength, lay one Caranus, a warlike Captain with three thouſand Footmen, whereof the one half were Janizaries; and in the Suburbs lay Acomates with a thouſand choſen Horſemen, with which Garriſon the Turks kept all that ſide of Peloponneſus in awe. Macicaus brought by his Guid unto the place where his Enemies lay, went directly to the Town to have ſurpriſed it; Hermoſilla in the mean time ſtanding ſtill with certain Companies of Spaniards over againſt the place where the Horſemen lay. But this could not be done with ſo great ſilence, but that ſome of the Horſeboys being awake diſcovered them by the fire in their Matches; who firſt awaked the negligent Watchmen, and afterwards raiſed an Alarm in the Suburbs; whereupon Hermoſilla couragiouſly ſet upon the Horſemen, being altogether unready, and ſlew many of them before they could arm themſelves, and ſet fire alſo upon the Stables wherein the Turks Horſes ſtood, with the rage whereof many of the Turks periſhed, with their Horſes and Armor. Great and terrible was the noiſe raiſed upon the ſuddain in the Suburbs, but eſpecially of the Horſes, which burnt as they ſtood faſt tied in the Stables, or by chance breaking looſe, ran up and down with their Tayls and Mains on a light fire; by occaſion whereof, an Alarm was raiſed in the Town, and the Turks got to the Walls before the Spaniards could enter. Macicaus himſelf labouring to break in at a Poſtern, was ſhot in the Head with a ſmall Shot, and ſlain; divers others near unto him were ſlain alſo. The Turks perceiving the ſmall number of their Enemies, ſallied out upon them, and enforced them to retire to Hermoſilla, who had already made great Spoil amongſt the Horſemen, by whoſe ſkilful direction, the Spaniards retired in ſo good order, making many ſtands, with their Harquebuſiers all drawn into the Rearward, that ſuch of the Turks as were moſt forward to purſue them, did by their death cauſe the reſt to make leſs haſt. Acomates with ſuch of his Horſemen as had eſcaped the Fire, haſted thither alſo, bringing with him two hundred Harquebuſiers, which he had cauſed his Horſemen for haſt to take up behind them upon their Horſes; but whilſt he ſought eagerly to be revenged upon his Enemies, and with too much heat preſſed on with the foremoſt, he was ſhot in the Body with a Bullet and ſlain. So the Horſemen which had before received a great loſs as they lay in their lodgings, accounting it in their good haps that they were not there all ſlain, and having now loſt their Captain, ceaſed any further to purſue their Enemies, but returned. The Spaniards and Greeks, although they were wearied both with their long march and evil ſucceſs, retired ſtill as reſolute men, ready to fight, and ſo returned to Corone. Preſently after, the Turkiſh Garriſon removed from Andruſſa to Megalopolis, now called Londarium; after whoſe departure the Chriſtian Souldiers of Corone came thither and buried the dead bodies of their ſlain Fellows (which till then lay unburied) and brought back with them the Head of Macicaus their late General, which the Turks had there ſet up upon a long Pole, which they honourably buried at Corone. Not long after, the Plague began to grow hot in Corone, ſo much the more grievous, for that it came accompanied with many other hard difficulties. For which cauſes, the Spaniards as men at once inforced with many extremities, imbarked themſelves with all the great Ordnance, and ſuch Greeks as would go with them, in certain Ships which came with Corn out Sicilia, and ſo departed, leaving the Town empty for the Turks to come unto.

Corone forſaken by the Spaniards.

It was commonly reported, that the Spaniards left Corone not without the ſecret conſent of the Emperor, which was the rather thought to be ſo, becauſe that they which forſook the place, received thereby no diſgrace, and the Emperor himſelf had offered to give the Town to Clement Biſhop of Rome, the Venetians and the Knights of Malta, who all refuſed to receive it, as loath to be at ſo great a charge in keeping a place ſerving for no greater purpoſe; the very cauſe why the Emperor was ſo willing to part with it. Now Clement the great Biſhop had by means of Aloyſius Grittus made a motion of a Peace, to have been concluded for ten years betwixt Solyman and the Chriſtian Princes, and thereupon the Town to have been again delivered unto the Turks; which Peace Solyman was not altogther unwilling to grant, being then wholly bent to invade the Perſian King. Ferdinand was alſo in good hope that his Brother Charles the Emperor, would for the yielding up of that Town have covenanted with the Turk ſome great matter for his benefit in Hungary, which as was thought would alſo have been eaſily obtained. But whilſt the Emperor drawn diverſly with the conſideration of his honour in keeping it, and of his profit in giving it up, ſtood too long in reſolving, the Town in the mean time was by the Spaniards (their neceſſity dayly increaſing) abandoned, and ſo left to the Turks for nothing.

Solyman now purpoſing to turn his forces againſt 1534. the Perſians, of whom he had in the Frontiers of his Dominions received great hurt, eſpecially in Comagene; renewed the League he had with the Venetians, and ſome other Chriſtian Princes; but of all other his Affairs with the Chriſtians, he was moſt careful of the intereſt he had already gotten in Hungary. For it was reported, that King John his Vaſſal induced by the continual ſolicitations of his Subjects, was deſirous of Peace with King Ferdinand, upon condition that he might quietly enjoy the Kingdom during his life; and after his deceaſe it to remain to King Ferdinand and his Heirs. Wherefore Solyman, that nothing ſhould be there done in his abſence without his knowledge, ſent Aloyſius Grittus the Duke of Venice his Son (of whom we have before ſpoken) a man both for the honour of his Houſe, the good carriage of himſelf, and the ſpecial commendation of Abraham the chief Baſſa, in great credit with him; with Commiſſion as his Lieutenant to be aſſiſtant unto King John, in ſuch magnifical ſort, as that without him the King might conclude nothing in matters of State, concerning either Peace or War, with any other the Chriſtian Princes. With this proud Commiſſion from the grand Seignior, Grittus entred into Tranſylvania, then a part of the Kingdom of Hungary (much about the ſame time that Solyman ſet forward from Conſtantinople againſt the Perſian) attended upon with ſeven thouſand perſons of one ſort and other, among whom were Urbanus Batianus, and Janus Docia, two famous Hungarian Captains with their Companies, and many of the Turks Janizaries alſo. At his firſt coming, to make his Authority the more known, he ſent out his proud command unto the great Men and Governors of the Cities of that warlike Province, charging them forthwith to repair unto him as great Solymans Deputy, authoriſed by him to hear and determin all the controverſies and matters of State concerning the Kingdom of Hungary. At that time Americus Cibachus Biſhop of Veradium, a man of great Nobility and Power, withal ſingularly well qualified, was Vayvod or Governor of Tranſilvania, an honour next unto the King; he underſtanding that Grittus was come into his Province, and making ſmall haſt to wellcome him, as one not greatly moved with his coming, or much regarding the commandment of Solyman; wonderfully offended Grittus, who deſired nothing more than at his firſt entrance to have confirmed the opinion of his Authority in the minds of the Vulgar People by the preſt and ready attendance of the Vayvod. But it was commonly bruted, that the ſtout Biſhop upon a Chriſtian Zeal deteſted the Friendſhip of the Turks, and could not well brook that they ſhould be too much acquainted in his Province, for fear leſt that fruitful Country abounding with Men and Horſes, ſhould by one means or other fall into their hands. Grittus was come to Baxovia when he underſtood by many Meſſengers, that the Vayvod was coming with a great Train, and lay about ten miles off, encamped with divers gallant Troops of Horſemen, in warlike manner appointed; for the Biſhops of Hungary being wonderful rich, were by old cuſtom bound to keep great numbers of Horſemen, which as occaſion ſerved they uſed to bring into the Field againſt the Turk; accounting it great honour with their religious hands to defend the cauſe of Religion. But then eſpecially the Nobility of the Country well appointed reſorted on every ſide, on courteſie to honour and contenance their great Biſhop and Governor, at whoſe commandment they were; inſomuch as the Biſhops retinue made ſhew of a good Army. Which thing moved Grittus exceedingly, that he ſhould be enforced contrary to his expectation to parly with the Biſhop in the open Fields, as with an Enemy in ſight of all their Followers. Hereof roſe envy, a deadly miſchief always repining at another mans honour; when as the one ſwelling with Turkiſh Pride could not then abide any equal, and the other jealous of his honour, could by no means endure any ſuperior, in ſuch place as he had the Sovereignty of. When theſe two great men had met together in the open Fields, and there dined more like Enemies than Friends, without any ſhew of friendſhip or good will; Grittus inwardly chafing at his bare entertainment, covertly threatned to be revenged upon all ſuch as ſhould make ſo light account of his Authority; and immediately as he departed from the Banquet, taking his Cap from his Head (which was after the Turkiſh manner made of a high faſhion, of rich Sables) and opening it with both his Hands, ſaid, This Cap will not hold two Heads, and therefore it muſt be fitted to one, and ſo put it on again. John Docia one of the Hungarian Captains, his Followers, who deadly hated the Vayvod (for that he had long time before, for his malepert Speech in a great Aſſembly, given him a blow with his Fiſt) took hold of that Speech of Grittus, as a fit occaſion for him to work his revenge: and ſaid, Your honour maketh a fit compariſon, neither can this Province contain two equal Governors or Commanders, nor you ever enjoy your Power and Authority, except you do this day with ſpeedy and manly reſolution defend both Solymans credit, and your own. You know not this proud Beaſt Americus, whoſe Pride and Inſolency if you but ſay the word, I will quickly put down; for he hateth Solyman, he regardeth not the King, and of you he maketh no account at all, for why, he aſpireth unto the Majeſty of a King, and ſaith that the Vayvodſhip of Tranſylvania well beſeemeth a King; for that in this Country Decebaldus the Dacian ſometime reigned, whom the warlike Emperor Trajan with all the force of the Roman Empire hardly ſubdued. No man can more proudly or arrogantly ſet himſelf forth than he, neither more craftily or cunningly diſſemble to ſerve his turn. Indeed he hath for faſhion ſake preſented your honour with a few ſimple Preſents, and given you his Hand alſo, better known for his Falſhood than his Faith; to the intent that when you are once paſt his Country, he may ſcoff and jeaſt at your Decrees; verily he deadly envieth at your Honour and Felicity, and grudgeth in his heart, that you ſhould ſet down the Laws of Peace and War in Hungary; and whereas he doth manifeſtly aſpire unto a Kingdom, he feareth you above all others, leſt you ſhould trouble his deſigns, abate his credit, and chaſtiſe his inſolency. Verily, he that thus maligneth your happyneſs, and contemneth your Authority, is not to be ſuffered, but by good reaſon to be taken away; thereby at this your firſt entrance to defend the credit of your Commiſſion, and honour of your Name. For nothing is more dangerous than a faithleſs Companion, and a ſecret Enemy, eſpecially when you ſhall leave him at your back behind you; for when he ſhall, as occaſion ſerves, ſhew forth his hidden malice, he ſhall ſo much the more ſlily and deſperately endanger your Perſon. Grittus enraged with his Speech more than before, thought it beſt to make haſt, and to uſe his Authority to the full; he commended Docia, and promiſed him in ſhort time to requite his good will towards him, eſpecially if he would by ſome notable attempt abate the Biſhops Pride. It is reported, that Grittus gave him no other charge, but to take the Biſhop that ſo he might after the Turkiſh manner have ſent him in Chains to Conſtantinople, and beſtowed the honour of the Vayvod upon Hieronimus Laſcus the Polonian, who in hope of that honourable Preferment unto him promiſed by King John, had done unto him great and faithful ſervice, as his Embaſſador both unto Solyman, and alſo unto the French King. But when King John perceived that he could not conveniently without manifeſt danger place him, being a Polonian (who could ſcarcely ſpeak the Hungarian Language) Governor over ſuch warlike People; he as it were enforced by neceſſity, preferred this Americus the Biſhop of Veradium, a man of them both reverenced and feared: Which ſo grieved Laſcus, a man of great Stomach and Experience, and thereunto excellently learned, that he would never admit of any excuſe of the Kings, but alwaies after complained, that he was by the King deluded. Yet for all that, he kept himſelf within the bounds of Loyalty, and enjoyed certain Lands and Towns which the King had given him in the Borders of Polonia; and eſtranged nevertheleſs from him in mind, was now become one of Grittus his Followers, hoping of his better Preferment by his means unto Solyman; and for that cauſe was not ſo forward to do the King ſuch ſervice as he had in times paſt. Now by the commandment of Grittus, a ſtrong Company of Turkiſh Horſemen, and certain Troops of Hungarians, were delivered to Docia; who ſecretly departing that night from Baxovia, came ſuddenly to the Vayvods Camp, having a little before by his Hungarian Spies learned that he lay in the open Fields in his Tent, by reaſon of the great heat, without any watch or guard attended on only with his Pages and Houſhold Servants; as a man without fear; and that all the reſt of his retinue lay diſperſed in the Country Villages round about. All which ſerved ſo well for Docia his purpoſe, that the Vayvod ignorant of his death ſo nigh at hand (who rather contemned than feared his Enemies) was ſuddainly oppreſſed by Docia his Souldiers; ſo that whilſt he was yet lying in his Bed, and ſcarcely well awaked by his Chamberlains and the noiſe of the Enemy; Docia breaking into his Tent, cut off his Head as he lay. All they which lay near, amazed with the ſuddainneſs of the matter, fled away for fear, and left their Horſes and other things for a Prey to the Turks and other of Docia his Followers. Docia having done ſo great an outrage, returned to Grittus, preſenting unto him the Vayvods Head, which he brought in his Hand by the Ear. Laſcus was then preſent, but altogether ignorant of the murder, who as a man moved with a natural compaſſion in ſo ſuddain and horrible a Fact, and forgetting all former grudges (as in like caſe it oftentimes chanceth) ſtood as one diſmaid, nothing rejoicing at the unworthy death of his Enemy. To whom Grittus turning himſelf, ſaid, Laſcus, Doſt thou not know this ſhaven Pate, truly it is a great Mans Head, but of ſuch an one as was very ambitious, rebellious, and proud. To whom Laſcus replied, Truly though I loved him not, yet I thought it not ſo whilſt it ſtood upon his Shoulders; diſallowing therein the Cruelty of the Fact. Which thing Grittus perceiving began to repent him of that was done, and ſaid openly, that although he was worthily ſlain, yet he could have wiſhed rather to have had him taken Priſoner. The report of this horrible murder once bruted abroad, the Biſhops Kinſmen and Friends, yea almoſt all the People of that Province riſe up in Arms againſt Grittus, to revenge the death of the reverend Biſhop, whom living they had both loved and feared. Never did any People in revenge of a common wrong; enter into Arms with greater deſire, more heat, or quicker ſpeed; ſo that in few days there were aſſembled together forty thouſand Horſe and Foot, under the leading of Stephanus Maylat a Noble Gentleman, who of all other moſt honoured the Biſhop, and in that common grief took upon him as chief, the perſecuting of the Authors of ſuch inhumane Cruelty. Grittus perceiving how grievouſly the matter was taken, with the danger he was in, began to doubt with himſelf what courſe were beſt for him to take. To go forward, and to fall into the hands of the furious People, the ſame was preſent death; and to return and leave the honourable deputation he had with ſo great expectation of all men taken upon him, was unto his aſpiring mind no leſs torment than death it ſelf. Thus perplexed, he with all ſpeed got himſelf with his Followers to the ſtrong Town of Mege, in hope to ſhroud himſelf until ſuch time as the rage of the Country People were either of it ſelf appeaſed (as it oftentimes falleth out in ſuch ſuddain Tumults) or elſe he ſhould be relieved by King John, or the Turks Sanzacks which had the charge of the Frontiers of the Turkiſh Empire. The Townſmen of Mege ſeeing Grittus accompanied with ſo many Turks, ſhut the Gates againſt him; yet at length by the perſwaſion of the two Hungarian

Captains Docia and Batianus, they gave him leave to enter into the baſe Town, having before retired themſelves with all their Subſtance unto the higher Town, which in manner of a ſtrong Caſtle commanded the lower. Here whilſt Grittus with all carefulneſs fortifieth the place, and diſpatcheth the Meſſengers unto his Friends abroad for Aid; his Enemies with hideous noiſe and outcries approaching the Town, at their firſt coming attempted to have ſcaled the Walls and Rampiers thereof, which thing whilſt they diſorderly did, with greater fury than diſcretion, they were eaſily repulſed, and many of them ſlain by the Turks Janizaries and Harquebuſiers. After which loſs, by the direction of Maylat their General, they withdrew themſelves out of the danger of the Shot, and incamped on every ſide of the Town, hoping as the truth was, that their Enemies unprovided of Victual, could not long hold the place, but muſt of neceſſity either ſtarve with Famine, or yield it up. In the mean time Grittus reſolutely enduring all the calamities of a man beſieged, fell ſick, and ſo much the more, for that he could hear nothing of any Aid which he expected from his Friends; for King John glad in his mind of the diſtreſs of the Overſeer, or rather Competitor of his Kingdom; and alſo knowing that he could not without great diſcontentment of his Subjects oppoſe himſelf againſt ſuch a multitude riſen upon ſo juſt a cauſe; yet for faſhion ſake ſent certain Troops of Horſemen to his relief; who not altogether ignorant of the Kings mind, made ſuch haſt, as men that purpoſed not to come in time to do him good. As for the Turks Sanzacks of Belgrade and Samandria, they envying at his honour, flatly refuſed to depart from their charge, to relieve him without expreſs command from Solyman himſelf; and Laſcus (before one of Grittus his chief Followers, but now a beholder of his diſtreſs) when he had a little before departed from him to procure him ſome relief, as he promiſed, did now in this extremity forſake him alſo. The Citizens in the upper Town (who a great while had ſtood looking on from above as men indifferent) perceiving the full reſolution of their Countrymen to be revenged, and the difficulties wherewith the Turks were incloſed, aſſailed them alſo from the high Town. Grittus thus beſet on every ſide, offered unto the Tranſylvanians a great Maſs of Mony, to ſuffer him to paſs forward into Hungary; but their furious minds more deſirous of Revenge than Mony, were not to be moved with any Gold. In fine, he ſent rich Jewels to the Governor of Moldavia his Friend, to be ready at a certain hour when he would ſally out of the Town, to receive him with certain Troops of Horſemen; ſo if it were poſſible to ſave himſelf and his Children. Grittus (whether it were upon a doubtful hope, or urged by inevitable deſtiny) ſallying out of the Town at the appointed time, with Solymans Commiſſion in his hand, and miſſing of the Moldavian, fell upon Francis Scheden the late Biſhops nigh Kinſman, and Maylat his familiar Friend; who furiouſly running in upon him with tumultuous Speech, violently caught from his Head his rich Cap of Sables, and with his Horſemen took him, being weak with ſickneſs, and making no reſiſtance. His Followers, eſpecially the Turks, incloſed on every ſide, were either ſlain or taken. But Grittus himſelf being brought to the Generals Tent, beſet round with his armed Enemis, and there examined, Why he had commanded the Vayvod to be ſlain; earneſtly proteſted, That he never commanded any ſuch thing, and that it was done without his knowledge. Which his anſwer ſerved not his turn, all the People crying out againſt him with one voice, that he ſhould as a ſacrifice be offered unto the Vayvods Ghoſt. Whereupon he was by Maylat delivered again to Francis Schenden to be executed, who without delay cauſed his Head to be ſtruck off. The Nobility and the Vayvods Kinſmen (after the manner of that People) dipped ſome part of their Garments in his Blood, the longer to keep in mind the remembrance of the Revenge. This was the ſhameful end of Aloyſius Grittus the Duke of Venice his Son, Solymans Deputy in Hungary, with whom he was in ſuch credit as never was any Chriſtian, abounding in Wealth and worldly Felicity; but climing too faſt up the evil ſtaved Ladder of Ambition, ſuddenly fell and never riſe more. The Executioner ſtripping his dead Body, found about him ſo may precious Stones and Jewels as were valued at forty millions of Ducats. And not long after, Laſcus ſent for by the King to Buda, was ſtraitly examined upon torture concerning Grittus his Commiſſion and purpoſes, and was in great danger of his life; but at laſt by the interceſſion of Sigiſmund King of Polonia, he was ſet at liberty, and ſo fled out of Hungary unto Sigiſmund his Court in Polonia, after he had long time wearied himſelf, and adventured his life in the Hungarian State. Docia the Author of this Tragedy, was by the furious People afterwards rent in pieces, and ſo periſhed.

The Riches found about Grittus.

The ſame time that Grittus went from Conſtantinople into Hungary, Solyman the Turkiſh Emperor dreading no danger out of Europe, took in hand two great Expeditions both at one time, the one by Land into Aſia againſt the Perſians, and the other by Sea into Africk againſt the Moors; promiſing unto himſelf in his inordinate deſires, the Monarchy of the whole World in ſhort time, if he might ſubdue theſe two great Nations whom he had already in hope devoured. But foraſmuch as all cannot be told at once, which was at one time in divers places ſo far diſtant done, omitting for a while the Expedition made in perſon himſelf againſt the Perſians, we will firſt declare what he did by his Lieutenants againſt the Moors. Hariadenus, ſirnamed of the Chriſtians Barbaruſſa (who ſucceeding his elder Brother Horruccius in the Kingdom of Algiers in Africk, had by many Victories ſo inlarged the Kingdom before gotten by his Brother, that his Name and Power was now become terrible both to the Chriſtians and wild Moors, and his fame grown great in the Turkiſh Court) was the chief Author and perſwader of Solyman to invade Africk. But it ſhall not (as I think) be far from our purpoſe here briefly to rehearſe by what means thoſe two Mytilene Brethren, baſely born, crept out of a ſmall Galliot unto the Majeſty of great Kings; that herein they which come afterwards may alſo admire the wonderful changes and chances of theſe worldly things, now up, now down, as if the life of man were not of much more certainty than a ſtage Play.

Solyman at one time purpoſeth to invade Perſia and Africk.

Theſe two Brethren, Horruccius and Hariadenus, born at Mytilene in the Iſland of Lesbos, weary of the poor and baſe eſtate they led at home with their Father, a Renegate Grecian; ſtealing a little Galliot, committed themſelves and all the hope of their good fortune to Sea, where by chance they conſorted themſelves with Camales, a moſt famous Pyrat of that time; under whom Horruccius the elder Brother, for his forwardneſs became a Captain; and growing rich by many Purchaſes, and alſo ſtrong with Gallies and Slaves which he had at ſundry times taken; and at laſt conſorting himſelf with Haidin Sinam the Jew, Salec, and other leſs Pyrats (which afterwards became became men of great fame and account) over whom he commanded as an arch Pyrat, came ſeeking after purchaſe as far as Mauritania. At which time Selymes King of Julia-Cæſarea, which now we call Algiers, was in Arms againſt his Brother Mechemetes, Competitor of the Kingdom; who aided by the Numidians, now commonly called Arabians, put his Brother in great doubt of his Eſtate. Selymes glad of the coming of Horruccius and the other Pyrats his Followers, with a great Maſs of Mony paid before hand, induced Horruccius and the reſt to take upon them the defence of him and his Kingdom againſt his Brother; which thing Horruccius ſo happily performed, (eſpecially by the means of his Harquebuſiers, as then no ſmall terror to the wild Moors and Numidians) that in ſhort time he repulſed that ſavage People, and ſet Selymes at peace in his Kingdom. Horruccius being a man of a ſharp wit, and by nature ambitious, noting in the time of his ſervice the Kings mild and ſimple diſpoſition, void of all diſtruſt; and that the naked Moors were no Souldiers, but a light and unconſtant People, alwaies at variance among themſelves; and that the wandring Numidians living barely divided into many factions, were eaſily by reward to be won, or by force conſtrained; ſuddenly falſified his faith, and villanouſly ſlew Selymes the King, as he was bathing himſelf, miſtruſting nothing leſs than the falſhood of the Pyrat; and in the ſame hurl murdring ſuch as he thought would withſtand his deſire, and with Bounty and Cruelty overcoming the reſt, ſo wrought the matter, that he was by general conſent choſen King of Algiers. Thus of a Pyrat become a King, he ſhortly after by Policy ſurpriſed Circello (a famous City about ſixty mile diſtant from Algiers) by his Souldiers ſent thither in the habit of Merchants. After that, he by his Brother Hariadenus (no leſs valiant than himſelf) troubled all the Mediterranean Sea from Algiers with his Gallies, and all his Neighbours; himſelf by land with daily incurſions, leaving nothing untoucht, which might by force or policy be had; ſo that his power daily encreaſed, men of ſervice continually reſorting unto him, as the chief man in all thoſe parts. Not thus contented, he to enlarge his Kingdom, drave the Spaniards out of Bugea, a City famous both for the great Trade thither, and for the Mahometan School ſometime there kept; at the taking whereof he loſt his right Hand with a Shot, and inſtead thereof ever after uſed a Hand of Iron, wherewith he obtained many worthy Victories againſt his Enemies; for near to Algiers he overthrew an Army of the Spaniards, with Diego de Vara their General. And ſhortly after, at ſuch time as Hugo Moncada returning out of Italy with the old Spaniſh Souldiers landed in his Country, he enforced him again to Sea; where he with all his expert Souldiers either periſhed by ſhipwrack, or driven on ſhore, were ſlain or taken Priſoners by Horruccius, and thruſt into his Gallies. At laſt having in ſundry Battels overcome the King of Tremiſſa, Charles the Emperor his Confederate, and thruſt him out of his Kingdom, he ſtirred up both the Chriſtians and Numidians againſt him; ſo that coming to take Ora and Portus (two ſtrong Holds kept by Garriſons of Spaniards ſent thither to aid the King of Tremiſſa) he was by them and the Moors at the firſt repulſed, and afterwards quite overthrown; where moſt part of his Army being ſlain or taken Priſoners, he with a few of his Friends ſought to ſave themſelves by flight over the deſart Sands; and ſeeing himſelf hardly purſued by his Enemies, ſcattered many pieces of Gold upon the Sands as he fled, thereby to have ſtaied their haſty purſuit; but they more deſirous of him than of his Gold, followed ſo faſt, that at laſt they overtook him, and without further delay ſtruck off his Head, which was afterwards ſent into Spain, and carried upon a Launce through all the Towns and Cities alongſt the Sea Coaſt; to the wonderful rejoycing of the People, unto whom he had in former time done great harm.

Horruccius ſlain, and his head carried about in Spain.

After the death of Horruccius, Hariadenus inferior to his Brother neither in Courage nor Martial Proweſs, by the general conſent of the Souldiers took upon him the Kingdom of Algiers. He, made Heir not only of his Brothers Kingdom, but of his Vertues and haughty Thoughts, and of the ſurname alſo of Barbaruſſa, began forthwith to aſpire unto the Empire of all that part of Africk; accounting what he had already gotten, too little and too baſe to anſwer his deſires. Wherefore he entred into Arms, and became a terror both to the Moors and Numidians; holding Peace with ſome, and Wars with others, as beſt ſerved his purpoſe; and with his Gallies robbed and ſpoiled the Coaſts of Spain, Sardinia, and the Iſlands Baleares; Fortune ſo favouring him in all his enterpriſes, that he became both famous and fearful to his Enemies. He ſlew Hamet, a great Commander among the Numidians, and chaſed Banchades and Amida, two of their greateſt Princes, out of the Country; and with like fortune at Sea, overcame Hugo Moncada, a famous Spaniard, who ſore wounded, had much ado to ſave himſelf by flight, when he had loſt divers of his Gallies. He alſo in Battle at Sea overthrew Rodericus Portundus, Admiral of Spain; in which fight the Admiral with his Son were both ſlain, and ſeven of his Gallies taken; in token of which Victory, he ſent part of the rich ſpoil there taken, with the Admirals Enſign, as a Preſent unto Solyman; whereby he became famous in the Turks Court; but much more, after he had repulſed Auria from Cercenna, and taken two great Genoway Ships which were coming to Auria loaded with Men and Munition; the loſs whereof filled the City of Genoa with much ſorrow. All things ſorting thus according to his deſire, and his name become no leſs terrible in Spain, Italy, Sicily, and the Iſlands of the Mediterranian, than it was in the greateſt part of Africk; Solyman grieved with the loſs of Corone, Patras, and the Caſtles upon the Straits of Lepanto, taken from him by Auria, Himerales his Admiral being ſhamefully put to flight, by the Counſel of his Baſſaes, but eſpecially of Abraham the chief Baſſa, ſent Embaſſadors unto him to Algiers; offering him the greateſt honours of his Court, and to make him Admiral of all his Fleet, if he would forthwith repair unto Conſtantinople; for why, he was the only man in all mens judgments, who for his years and great experience at Sea, as well as for his invincible Courage and Glory of his late atchieved Kingdom, was to be compared with Auria, and to be oppoſed againſt the Chriſtian Fleet. Sinas a great man in Solymans Court, was with this Embaſſage ſent, and ſpeedily traſported to Algiers by Mangalis, a famous Pyrat, then Governor of the Rhodes; who at his landing, was honourably received by Barbaruſſa, and audience given him. Barbaruſſa underſtanding the cauſe of his coming, was exceeding glad thereof, preſently conceiving no ſmall hope of obtaining the Monarchy of Africk, if he might once come to Solymans preſence, and at large ſhew unto him the ſtate of Africk, and power of the Chriſtians, with their continual diſcord amongſt themſelves. Wherefore without further delay committing the protection of his Son Aſanes (then about eighteen years old) and the Government of his new gotten Kingdom to Ramada and Agis, two of his nigh Kinſmen and aſſured Friends, of whoſe Fidelity he doubted not; he with forty of his own Gallies in moſt warlike manner appointed, ſet forward with Solymans Embaſſador towards Conſtantinople; where by the way he met with a Fleet of Genoway Ships bound for Sicily for Corn, which after a ſharp and cruel fight he took and burnt. After that, landing by night in the Country of Elba, not far from Naples, he ſuddenly ſupriſed Rhium a rich City; where loading his Gallies with the Wealth thereof, and carrying away with him all the Inhabitants into Captivity, he arrived at Conſtantinople in the year 1533, where he was by the great Courtiers brought to Solyman, of whom he was joyfully received, if it were but for the Preſents which he gave him; which were fair Boys and young Maidens ſumptuouſly apparrelled, Eunuchs, and wild Beaſts of Lybia, as Lyons, Leopards, and ſuch like. But after he had certain days diſcourſed at large with the great Baſſaes, of the State of Africk, the ſtrength of the Chriſtians, and how the Wars were to be managed, he was afterwards by them ſeldomer ſent for, and offering himſelf into their Company, was hardly admitted; for Envy (the inſeparable Companion of growing honour) had quickly overtaken him in the Court, ſo that many men letted not openly to ſay, It had not been the faſhion of the Othoman Kings, to prefer Pyrats (the worſt kind of Thieves) to the honour of their great Admiral; and that there wanted not, neither ever would want men both vertuous and valiant in the Turks Court, which could with great honour maintain and augment the glory of the Turkiſh Empire both by Sea and Land; whereas he had againſt all right and conſcience, by ſhameful Treachery intruded himſelf into another mans Kingdom in Africk, and there perſecuted the Mahometan Princes and People, being of no Religion himſelf, as one that was born of a renegat Greek, and from his youth lived as a mercileſs Pyrat, and common Enemy of Mankind. By which Speeches Barbaruſſa perceived in how evil time Abraham Baſſa his beſt Friend, and by whoſe means he was ſent for, was abſent from Court; who at that time was gone to Comagena, and wintered at Aleppo, with purpoſe (as Solymans Forerunner) with the firſt of the next Spring, to paſs over Euphrates againſt the Perſian. After long ſuit, and much expectation, Solyman anſwered Barbaruſſa by Ajax and Caſſimes two of the great Baſſaes, That all the matter concerning him ſhould be referred to the diſcretion of Abraham the chief Baſſa, for that he was by his Counſel eſpecially ſent for into Africk; wherefore if he did expect any thing, he ſhould repair unto him in Syria, that according to his grave judgment all things might be ordered. Barbaruſſa thus rejected into Syria, although he well perceived that it tended to his no ſmall diſgrace; yet in hope by ſufferance to obtain another Kingdom, ſeemed contented with the anſwer, and reſolved forthwith to take upon him that long and painful journey; which the old King luſtily performed, and ſo poſting by Land through Aſia the leſs, and travelling over the Mountain Amanus, then covered with deep Snow came in the dead time of Winter to Aleppo in Syria, where he was honourably received by the great Baſſa, and heard at large, to his ſo good contentation and liking, that he deemed him of all others the fitteſt to command the Turks Power at Sea; and to that purpoſe writ commendatory Letters in his behalf to Solyman; wiſhing him for his ſufficiency to place him as the fourth with the other three Baſſaes of his Counſel.

Roſcetes.

After Barbaruſſa was again arrived at Conſtantinople with theſe Letters, and that it was once known how effectually the chief Baſſa had commended him to Solyman, it was a wonder to ſee how on a ſuddain the face of the Court was changed upon him, every man either for Friendſhip or Flattery began now to ſpeak of his praiſes, and to extol his worthineſs; who was now in all mens mouths but Barbaruſſa? ſo great was the Power and Authority of the chief Baſſa, that being abſent, yet was his approbation of all men accounted ſufficient to prefer whom he pleaſed; and his Letters Laws to the reſt of the Court. Barbaruſſa had brought with him from Algiers, one Roſcetes the Elder Brother of Muleaſſes King of Tunes, who wrongfully driven into exile by his younger Brother, had lived certain years at Algiers, but now by the perſwaſion of Barbaruſſa was come with him to Conſtantinople, to crave aid of Solyman, againſt the oppreſſion of his Brother. Him Barbaruſſa oftentimes ſhewed unto the great Baſſaes, and in his diſcourſes with them concerning the Conqueſt of Africk, ſet him out as a moſt fit inſtrument for ſubduing of the Kingdom of Tunes, as a man whom the People more affected than they did Muleaſſes the Uſurper. After long deliberation and conſultation had with the Baſſaes concerning the invaſion of Africk, Barbaruſſa now admitted unto the preſence of Solyman, in theſe or like words perſwaded him to that War, for the entrance whereunto we have thus far digreſſed.

Barbaruſſa his ſpeech to Solyman to perſwade him to invade Tunes.

What thing the Prieſts with loud voice uſe to pray for, at ſuch time as the Othoman Emperors enter into the Temple to pray, the ſame thing do I alſo wiſh unto thee moſt mighty Solyman; which is, That thou ſhouldſt remember thy Progenitors by Juſtice and Religion to have got for thee this Empire, than which, more magnificent and richer the Gods have not given to any; Fortune hath never deceived them that trod that way, and thou hitherto haſt ſo traced their ſteps, that thou haſt eaſily ſurmounted their Fame and Glory, adminiſtring Juſtice to thy Subjects; and inflamed with the hope of eternal praiſe, making continual War againſt the Enemies of our Religion, the true office of a zealous Prince. By this means is Belgrade taken, Rhodes won, the King of Hungary ſlain in Battel, Germany twice harried and burnt, ſo that Charles, whom the Chriſtians would make equal to thy ſelf in power and valour, with the great aid almoſt of all the Chriſtian Nations, terrified with the noiſe of thy Army, ſhunned battel. But foraſmuch as Empires, be they never ſo large, or Victories be they never ſo glorious, can either ſatisfie the greatneſs of an heroical mind, or glut the ſame with glory; thou haſt therefore ſent before thee thy victorious Enſigns againſt the Perſians and Parthians, that thoſe Nations who have wickedly fallen from our Rites, purified as it were by thy ſacred Arms, may be again reclaimed to the antient Rites of our Religion. But be this unto thy greatneſs moſt honourable to attempt, and glorious to perform; let it only be lawful for me now grown an old man in the midſt of Arms and dangers, to declare what is expedient, and briefly to open ſuch things as I have by long experience learned to concern the augmenting of thy Fame and Empire elſewhere. Neither would I have you to take this as preſumptuouſly ſpoken of me; for Fortune hath enough, yea more than enough favoured my deſigns, whom from a poor cottage and bare hope, ſhe hath promoted to glorious Victories, great Riches, yea unto the Title and Majeſty of a King. But unto theſe things the Gods could could give me nothing better, than to be called for of thee, and ſent for, in Counſel to diſcourſe of matters of greateſt importance; wherefore my advice ſhall be unto thee faithful, and with experience confirmed; which although it be all that it ſeemeth old men can do, yet in my ſound Body remaineth ſuch ſtrength, that I dare both promiſe and perform unto thee my good ſervice at all aſſaies both by Sea and Land. For unto this only courſe have I bent my ſelf day and night from my youth, following the purpoſe and counſel of my valiant Brother Horruccius (who to extend the bounds of our Religion, perſecuted the Chriſtians both by Sea and Land) deſiring nothing more, than that thy Fleet and Power might once be joyned with my Forces and direction, and ſo under thy good hap, to be either a Commander, or elſe commanded; foraſmuch as it grieveth me not to be commanded by my betters. Of which my deſires if the Gods ſhall make me partaker, the Spaniards ſhall ſhortly be driven quite out of Africk, thou ſhalt hear that the Moors are gone over into Spain, to repoſſeſs the Kingdom of Granado; that Tunes and Numidia are at thy command; and not to ſpeak of Sardinia and Corcyca, that Sicilia is ours; which once taken, we ſhall ſtarve up Italy, and on every ſide diſtreſs it with our Fleet being now weak and brought low by the diſcord of the Princes, and that part thereof both towards Sicilia and Macedonia ready to ſubmit it ſelf upon any condition, ſo it might caſt off the Spaniſh yoak. Think not, that either that Strength or Unity is now in Italy, which was when thy great Grandfather Mahomet having taken Hydruntum brought a great fear, not upon Italy only, but upon other the Chriſtian Nations alſo; for by the good ſucceſs of that War, which all the Chriſtian Princes could hardly withſtand, he had undoubtedly taken the City of Rome, and ſo according to right and reaſon, again united the Empire of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, as they were before in their ancient glory. But he ſuddainly left the World, rapt to Heaven, that he might leave to thee (according to the appoinment of the fatal Deſtinies, and revolutions of the Heavens) this work of abſolute perfection. And yet my purpoſe is not, by putting thee in hope of ſo great and rare a Triumph, to interrupt or hinder thee for turning thy power into the Eaſt, againſt thy old and irreligious Enemies, deſerving all extremities; for thy Navy ſhall be ſufficient for me, whereof thou ſhalt have no need in thy Wars ſo far within Land; that whilſt thou art conquering Aſia, Africa the third part of the World may in the mean time be brought under thy ſubjection alſo. Where before all other things, Muleaſſes is to be driven out of Tunes; a man of inſatiable Covetouſneſs, unſtaied Luſt, horrible Cruelty, hated both of God and Man; who having by Treachery ſlain eighteen of his Brethren, or that which worſe is, cruelly burnt out their Eyes, doth ſo reign alone, that he hath left him neither Kinſman nor Friend. For being as unthankful as perfideous, he hath murdred all his Fathers Friends, who with great travel had preferred him to the Kingdom, ſo to make ſhort payment for ſo great deſert. With this Beaſt we muſt have to do, whom whilſt no man loveth, all men wiſh to periſh. The Numidians trouble him with dayly invaſions, whoſe injuries the infamous Coward endureth with ſuch ſhame and reproach, that it ſhould ſeem he had rather to ſuffer them than revenge them. And yet this effeminate Daſtard holdeth in Chains many valiant Turks, and acknowledgeth not your Imperial Name, whereunto all men on every ſide ſue for grace; and which is not to be ſuffered, exceedingly favoureth the Spaniards of Tripolis, to the intent that Agis and Moſes, two valiant Turkiſh Captains, may be driven out of the City. This wild Beaſt diſarmed of his Claws and Teeth, we ſhall eaſily deſtroy, if it be but for that we have with us Roſeetes his Brother, whom the Numidians wiſh and long for; him muſt we uſe, if it be but for a ſhew, ſo ſhall the thing we deſire, be without Blood effected, as ſoon as we ſhall but preſent our ſelves before the Gates of Tunes. Then ſhall it be at your pleaſure, to appoint whom you will have to govern the Numidian Kingdom; it ſhall be unto me glory enough, when the greateſt part of Africk conquered, ſhall be peceably delivered into your hands at your return with the Triumphs of Perſia. But by the way as I return, I aſſure you upon mine own repute, ſo to uſe the matter, that the Chriſtians ſhall alſo have good cauſe to bewail their calamities; and if I hap to meet with Auria, he ſhall have ſmall cauſe to rejoyce of the miſchief he hath done; for him alone I challenge to perſecute, as my proper and peculiar Enemy, both for the remembrance of the harms we have received at his hands, and for the deſpight I have at his fame; who once taken out of the way, the Seas ſhall be open only to you and your Fleets. And believe me, he that ſhall be able to command the Seas, ſhall eaſily alſo ſubdue the Kingdoms by Land.

But Solyman, who after the manner of wiſe Princes, uſed well to conſider, and afterwards with ripe Judgment to reſolve of ſuch matters as he had with attentive ear hearkned unto; commending Barbaruſſa for his forwardneſs in his ſervice, for that time brake up the Counſel. Not long after, a Decree was made, according to Abraham the great Baſſaes advice, That Barbaruſſa ſhould be joyned as fourth with the other three chief Baſſaes of Solymans Counſel, and be made great Admiral; ſo that all the Iſlands, Ports, and People all alongſt the Sea Coaſt through out Solymans Empire ſhould be at his command, and that it ſhould be lawful for him to take up ſuch Mariners and Souldiers for ſervice at Sea, as pleaſed him in what place ſoever. This being ſolemnly proclaimed, Solyman with his own hand delivered him a Scepter and a Sword, willing him, by worthy deeds to perform what he had promiſed. After which, Ajax and Caſſimes the two great Baſſaes, with the Captain of the Janizaries, brought him with exceeding Pomp, from the Court to the Navy; at which time was carried before him all the tokens of his new obtained honour. And towards the maintenance of that War at Sea, he had delivered unto him out of Solymans Treaſures, eight hundred thouſand Ducats, and eight hundred Janizaries.

Barbaruſſa is made Solymans great Admiral.

Barbaruſſa ſped of that he deſired, ſtaid not long after at Conſtantinople, but departing out of Heleſpontus with eighty Gallies and certain Galliots, ſhaped his courſe towards Italy, leaving Amurathes (a Sea Captain) with twelve Gallies to tranſport Solyman and his Army, ready to ſet forward againſt the Perſian, over that narrow Sea into Aſia. Who after he had ſo done, overtook Barbaruſſa at Methone, who holding on his courſe to Africk, and ſuddainly paſſing the Strait betwixt Italy and Cicily, brought a great fear upon both the Countries; but paſſing by the Bay of Hippona alongſt the Coaſt of the lower Calabria, he ſet upon the Town of Saint Lucidius called in ancient time Tempſa; which although it ſtood upon a Rock and was reaſonably well walled; yet ſuch was the violence of the Turks Aſſault, that it could not be defended but was taken, with ſo much more hurt to the Inhabitants, for that the Maior of the Town, to keep the People from flying away, had lockt up the Gates on the other ſide of the City, from the Enemy. From thence he with rich Spoil and many Priſoners went to Citarium, where he had learned of his Priſoners, a Fleet of Gallies was in building. This Town forſaken of the Inhabitants for fear, he took without reſiſtance, ranſacked it, and burnt it, where he alſo fired ſeven Gallies not yet altogether finiſhed. But after he was come with his Fleet as far as the Iſland Capri, within the ſight of Naples, ſuch a terror was ſtruck into the minds of all that dwelt alongſt that Coaſt, That it was thought, if he had landed and gone directly to Naples, the Neapolitans would for fear have abandoned the City. But holding on his courſe, he came to Prochita, which he took and rifled; ſo paſſing by the Port of Cajeta, (which he might eaſily have taken) he came to Spelunca, a Town in the hithermoſt part of the Kingdom of Naples. They of the Town diſmaied with the ſuddain arrival of ſo great a Fleet, yielded the ſame without reſiſtance. The Enemy entring the Town, took twelve hundred Priſoners. Pelegrinus a chief man amongſt them of Spelunca, was fled into the Caſtle; him Barbaruſſa commanded to yield, which if he would preſently do, he promiſed to let him go free; but if he ſhould ſtand upon his defence, he threatned in ſhort time to make him repent his fooliſh hardineſs, with the utter deſtruction both of himſelf and the Town. The fearful Gentleman without delay came out of the Caſtle, and fell down at his feet; who according to his promiſe gave him his liberty, and with rare courteſie reſtored to him his Wife, his Son and Niece, whom he had taken Priſoners; who received them with many tears falling from their Eyes for joy.

The Romans afraid of Barbaruſſa.

The ſame night alſo two thouſand Turks came from the Fleet, through the rough and buſhy Mountains, to the City Fundi, ten miles diſtant from Spelunca, in the uttermoſt Borders of the Kingdom of Naples, conducted as was thought by certain Italians of that Country; who a few years before taken at Sea, and overwearied with the heavy burthen of the Turkiſh Slavery, had revolted to the Mahometan Religion. But ſuch was the ſuddainneſs of their coming, and their celerity in entring the City, that Julia Gonzaga the Paragon of Italy, and the chief prize which they ſought after, had ſcarce time to get to Horſe half naked, and ſo with much difficulty to eſcape into the Mountains. It is reported, that Barbaruſſa (which thing he himſelf afterwards ſeemed not to deny) moved with the fame of her incomparable Beauty and wonderful perfection, deſired exceedingly to have taken her as a Preſent for Solyman. The Citizens were for moſt part either ſlain or taken Priſoners by the Turks, who loaded with the Spoil of the City, returned again to the Fleet. Another part of Barbaruſſa's Fleet came to Tarracina, which the Turks took forſaken of the Inhabitants, who for fear were all fled into the Mountains, except ſome which for age or ſickneſs could not ſhift for themſelves, whom the Turks ſlew, and ſpoiled the Churches. Barbaruſſa thus ſcouring along the Coaſt of Italy, and news thereof daily brought to the City of Rome, ſtruck ſuch an exceeding terror into the minds of the Citizens, that it was verily thought if he had come a little further to Oſtia, they would generally have forſaken the City. But he having well performed his promiſe made to Solyman for vexing the Chriſtians, and before reſolved of a greater matter he had to do; when he had watred at Pontia, paſſed over into Africk with ſuch celerity, that he was arrived there before it was thought that he was departed from the Coaſt of Italy. For Barbaruſſa to deceive Muleaſſes King of Tunes, and to take him unprovided, had given it out, that he would burn and ſpoil the Coaſts of the Chriſtian Countries, eſpecially of Italy, Liguria, and Spain, in revenge of the harm done by Auria at Corone and Patras. Which thing Muleaſſes the rather believed underſtanding his proceedings upon the Coaſt of Italy. The Venetians having alſo at the ſame time at great charges prepared a great Fleet, did in ſome part leſſen Muleaſſes fear, That Barbaruſſa would imploy his Forces for Africk; for then what ſhould the Venetians have needed to have made ſo great and chargeable a preparation? But that which above all other things brought him into ſecurity, was for that he had by ſecret Eſpials certainly learned, that his Brother Roſcetes was kept at Conſtantinople, as a Priſoner at large, under ſafe keeping; which made him to think, that Barbaruſſa's Forces were not prepared againſt him; for he knew that he could not be impugned, or his State more indangered by any other means, than by producing the competitor of his Kingdom, to whom his guilty Conſcience doubted, that both the Citizens of Tunes and the Numidians were for moſt part well affected.

Muleaſſes King of Tunes.

This Muleaſſes of whom we now ſpeak, and whom hereafter we ſhall by occaſion often remember, was lineally deſcended of the ancient King of Tunes; who without interruption of diſcent, or mixture of forreign Blood, had by the ſpace of nine hundred fifty four years mightily ruled the great Kingdom of Tunes, from Tripolis to Bugia, almoſt eight hundred miles alongſt the Mediterranean, and into the Main as far as the Mount Atlas; and for the long continuance of their State, and largeneſs of their Kingdom, were worthily accounted the moſt reverend and mighty amongſt the Mahometan Kings of Africk. His Father Mahometes, when he had with much glory, and more pleaſure, reigned two and thirty years, perceiving the end of his life to approach, had purpoſed to have appointed Maimo his eldeſt Son (whom for his haſty aſpiring he then held in durance) to ſucceed him in his Kingdom; but overcome with the importunity of Lentigeſia his Wife, a Woman of a haughty ſpirit, who had by reward made a ſtrong faction in the Court for her Son Muleaſſes, he altered his former purpoſe, and appointed him his Succeſſor; by whom (as it was thought) the ſmall remainder of his own old years was ſhortned; Maimo the right Heir of the Kingdom in Priſon, preſently murthred; ſeventeen of his other Brethren unmercifully executed: and three other, Barcha, Beleth, and Saeth, with more than barbarous cruelty with a hot Iron of their ſight deprived; only Roſcetes the ſecond Brother, and Abdemelech, eſcaping the hands of their unatural Brother, fled to Morbabitus a great Prince amongſt the Numidians; whither alſo their Brothers malice perſecuted them, ſeeking by many practiſes to have taken them away, and at laſt for a great ſum of Mony to have had them delivered into his hands. Which Mony the Numidian received, but ſuffered the diſtreſſed Princes, as if they had eſcaped againſt his Will, to flie further to another Numidian Prince a Friend of his, called Benticſes; where Muleaſſes by like practiſes as before, ſought to have deſtroyed them, or to have got them into his own power. Thus chaſed by their Brothers endleſs malice, from Prince to Prince, and place to place, they for their more ſafety fled at laſt to the City of Biſcaris, far into the main Land; where Abdemelech as one weary of the World gave over all, and betook himſelf to a ſolitary life, and became a melancholy Mahometan Monk. But Roſcetes courteouſly entertained by Abdalla Prince of that City, found ſuch favour in his ſight, that he gave him his Daughter in marriage, and long time honourably maintained him as his Son in Law, with ſuch carefulneſs, that for fear of Muleaſſes practiſes, he was ſeldom permitted to eat any other Meat but ſuch as the Prince or his Wife had before taſted of. Muleaſſes thus reigning and raging, and yet not contented with the death of ſo many of his Brethren, proceeded further, and murdred divers of their Children alſo.

The ingratitude of Muleaſſes.

He cauſed alſo the Manifet and Meſuar, men of greateſt Authority in all the Kingdom, his Fathers grave Counſellors, and his chief Friends, by whoſe means eſpecially he had aſpired unto the Kingdom, to be cruelly tortured to death, fearing their Greatneſs; or rather as ſome thought, grieving to ſee them live, to whom he was ſo much beholden, and therefore rewarded them with ſuch ſharp payment. And by the inſtigation of Lenteſia his Mother, cauſed divers of his Fathers other Wives and Concubines to be ſhamefully murdred, enveighing oftentimes againſt his Father, that as an effeminate Prince, had for his pleaſure maintained two hundred Wives and Concubines in his Houſes of delight, by whom he had begot ſo many Sons Competitors of the Kingdom, that he had left him (as he ſaid) a laborious and endleſs piece of work, to deſtroy ſo great a brood.

Roſcetes riſeth againſt his brother Muleaſſes.

Roſcetes aided by his Father in Law and the other Numidian Princes, to whom the name of Muleaſſes, both for his cruelty againſt his own Blood, and injurious dealing againſt his Neighbours, was become odious; paſſing over the River Bragada with a great Army, near unto Tunes met with Muleaſſes his Army, conducted by Dorax a valiant Captain, Brother to Lentigeſia; where in a ſharp conflict he overthrew his Brothers Army, and enforced Dorax with them that were eſcaped out of the Battel, for ſafeguard of their lives to flie into Tunes. Roſcetes purſuing the Victory, came and preſented his Army before the Gates of the City, in hope that the Citizens (whom he knew for the moſt part to hate the uſurping Tyrant) would upon the ſight of him, in right their King, with ſo great an Army, raiſe ſome tumult in the City, and let him in. There he lay by the ſpace of twenty days, ſtill expecting ſome innovation; in which time the more to alienate the minds of the People from Muleaſſes, and to ſhew how unable he was to protect them, he burnt and deſtroyed all the Olive and Fruit Trees, which grew moſt plentifully and pleaſantly all alongſt the Country, from the ruines of old Carthage, to the Walls of Tunes; which was unto the Citizens, whoſe greateſt Poſſeſſions lay there, a moſt heavy and lamentable ſpectacle. But Muleaſſes had ſo attempered their minds with fair ſpeeches and large promiſes of recompenſing every man to the full, for all ſuch harm as they ſhould ſuſtain for his Brothers fury in the Country; and beſide that, had the City in ſuch ſtrong poſſeſſion by reaſon of his Souldiers, that the Citizens either would not or could not revolt to Roſcetes.

Forſaken of the Numidian Princes, he flieth to Barbaruſſa.

The Numidian Princes weary of that long and vain expectation, according to the levity of that Nation, accounting it no ſhame after Victory once gotten to depart, began one after another to ſhrink away to their own dwellings, perſwading Roſcetes alſo to provide for himſelf whilſt he had time, and to attend his better fortune. Wherefore he fearing to be betraied by the Numidians, or circumvented by his cruel Brother, fled to Barbaruſſa, then reigning at Algiers in great glory, where he was honourably entertained; and there remained until ſuch time as by his perſwaſion he went with him as is aforeſaid to Conſtantinople, to crave help of Solyman, by whom he was detained in ſafe cuſtody; although it was in policy given out by Barbaruſſa, that he was in the Fleet, and that he ſhould by Solymans power be reſtored to his Fathers Kingdom at Tunes.

Barbaruſſa landeth at Biſerta.

This was the ſtate of the Kingdom of Tunes, at ſuch time as Barbaruſſa with Solymans great Fleet, contrary to all mens expectation, ſuddainly departing from the Coaſt of Italy, landed in Africk at Biſerta, a famous Port of the Kingdom of Tunes.

Biſerta yielded.

They of Biſerta weary of the government of Muleaſſes, and of themſelves deſirous of change, as ſoon as they heard the name of Roſcetes, forthwith drave out their Governor, and received the Turks into the Town. For Barbaruſſa had before ſent certain of Roſcetes his familiar Friends aſhore, which bare the People in hand, that he was in the Fleet, but not able to come yet on ſhore, for that he was (as they ſaid) Sea-ſick, and troubled with an Ague. Biſerta thus poſſeſſed by Barbaruſſa, he preſently departed thence, and ſayling by Utica, thirty miles diſtant from Biſerta, and ſo keeping alongſt the Coaſt, and paſſing the Promontory of Carthage, came before Guletta, a ſtrong Caſtle within the Bay of Tunes, ſo placed upon a Strait, that it commandeth all the paſſage by Sea unto the City of Tunes.

Barbaruſſa cometh to Guletta.

Before this Caſtle, Barbaruſſa in token of Friendſhip, diſcharged all his great Ordnance, which they of the Caſtle anſwered with like; but being required to deliver it up to Roſcetes, they ſaid it ſhould be alwaies at his command that ruled in the City of Tunes. The News of Roſcetes his ſuppoſed coming, flying ſwiftly by land from Biſerta to Tunes, and the great Fleet once diſcovered, ſet all the City on an uprore; for the Citizens were in great expectation of their new King, both for the love of Roſcetes, who had alwaies ſhewed himſelf to be of a mild and bountiful nature; and alſo for the hatred of Muleaſſes, whoſe tyrannous and covetous Government they thought they had too long endured. Neither was he ignorant what report ran of himſelf, and how he had loſt the hearts of his Subjects; which was evidently to be ſeen in the eyes and countenances of the chief men of the City. And that which more increaſed their hatred, was for that he had not according to his promiſe to them in time of diſtreſs, made them any recompence for their goodly Houſes and Olive Gardens, deſtroyed in the Country by Roſcetes in the former Wars; wherefore at ſuch time as he came now out of the Caſtle, and in the greateſt Aſſembly of his People, began to perſwade them to play the Men, and to continue conſtant in their obedience, promiſing unto them ſuch reward as they knew he was never able to perform, they all departed, and left him alone; yea ſome of them under the colour of Friendſhip, and amongſt them Abdabar, then Meſuar (which was chief Officer next unto the King) perſwaded him to give place to his hard fortune, and forthwith to flie, for by chance at the ſame inſtant it was in every mans mouth, that the Turks were even at hand; which thing cauſed Muleaſſes, forſaken of his Subjects, of himſelf fearful, and worthily doubting to be betraied, to flie in ſuch haſt out of the City, that he left behind him both his Treaſure and Jewels, which afterwards came into the hands of his Enemies. The firſt that revolted was Abezes, a man of great Authority; and Fetuches, Captain of the Caſtle; both renegate Spaniards. Fetuches preſently after the flight of Muleaſſes, brought out Roſcetes Wife and Children, whom Muleaſſes had long time kept in priſon, and to welcome their Father, placed them in the Kings Royal Seat. Abezes alſo forthwith advertiſed Barbaruſſa of Muleaſſes departure, and with what longing the People exepected their deſired King; wiſhing him without delay to repair unto the City; and for a Preſent ſent him a goodly Barbarian Horſe, richly furniſhed, and divers others for his other chief Captains. Hereupon Barbaruſſa without longer ſtay ſet forward with five thouſand Turks, which he had already landed, and coming to the City, was of the Citizens joyfully received. But after long looking, when they could no where deſcry Roſcetes their ſuppoſed King, and heard nothing but the name of Solyman and Barbaruſſa, doubled and redoubled by the Turks in their Military acclamations, as they marched through the City towards the Caſtle; they began to diſtruſt, as the truth was, that in ſtead of their new King whom they ſo much deſired, they had received the Turkiſh Government, which they utterly deteſted. Which ſuſpicion once confirmed by certain of Roſcetes his Friends (whom Barbaruſſa had brought with him of purpoſe to delude the People) who grieved to ſee the ruin of their native Country, ſpared not for fear of the preſent danger to tell their Friends and Acquaintance as they went, That they did in vain look for Roſcetes, whom they had left in bonds at Conſtantinople; it was a wonder to ſee, how ſuddainly the minds of the People were changed, how ſpeedily they ran to their Weapons, and how furiouſly they aſſailed the Turks, now fearing no ſuch matter, and were not as yet all got into the Caſtle. The chief Leader of the Citizens in this tumult, was Abdahar the Meſuar; who but a little before upon the coming of the Turks, by augmenting the danger, and the unfaithfulneſs of his Subjects, had perſwaded Muleaſſes to flie; but now perceiving himſelf deceived of his expectation for the coming of Roſcets, and repenting of that he had done, ſought by all means to drive out the Turks, and to recal Muleaſſes. And the more to animate the People, as he ſtood on high, from whence he might beſt be heard, he cried unto them with a loud voice:

Muleaſſes flieth out of Tunes.

The Citizens deceived of their expectation, riſe againſt the Turks.

We are moſt villanouſly betraied (worthy Citizens) for Roſcetes, whom we expected for our lawful King, lamenteth his miſery in Chains, in Priſon at Conſtantinople; and we, except we preſently play the men, and valiantly fight for our Liberty, ſhall for ever ſerve as Slaves to theſe foreign and merciles Pyrats. The preſent danger of our Eſtate telleth us, that we muſt preſently and without delay take the occaſion offered. Wherefore let all men that mean not to ſerve as Slaves, and to be bought and ſold as Beaſts, take up Arms againſt the faithleſs Turks. I my ſelf will be your Leader; let us therefore all with one conſent, with heart and hand revenge this ſhameful Treachery, defend our Country and Liberty with the ancient honour and liberty of the Numidians.

There was now no time to ſtay, every man had betaken himſelf to his Weapons; Muleaſſes was again ſent for, who yet ſtaid in the Suburbs, expecting what ſhould happen; many of the Turks were ſlain before they were aware, or feared any thing; all the City was filled with outcries and clattering of Weapons; the number of the Citizens was ſuch, as might eaſily have expulſed the Turks, had they been but reaſonably armed, or well conducted, which in a matter ſo ſuddain, and with men altogether ignorant of ſervice, was not poſſible. Yet they, armed with fury, and encouraged with the multitude of themſelves, ſwarmed up as thick as was poſſible one of the Bulwarks of the Caſtle, which they knew was eaſieſt to be gained, where the Turks had ſet up one of their Enſigns; and with the multitude of their Darts and Arrows ſo overwhelmed the Turks, that they were glad to forſake the place, and to retire farther into the Caſtle to a place of more ſtrength; from whence and all alongſt the curtain of the Wall, they without intermiſſion diſcharged their great Artillery and ſmall Shot amongſt the thickeſt of the naked Moors, making of them a wonderful Slaughter. Barbaruſſa although he was a man of an invincible courage and great experience, all his life time well acquainted with deſperate dangers (the dreadful ſteps of aſpiring minds) yet ſurpriſed with the ſuddainneſs of the Aſſault, ſhut up in a place whereof he yet knew not the ſtrength, and not provided of Victual for three days, was with the due conſideration of theſe difficulties, not a little troubled; which his care was by the diſordered fury of his Enemies, and known valour of his own Souldiers greatly diminiſhed; eſpecially when he ſaw his own men ſtill fighting, as men full of hope and courage, and the Moors as men half diſmaied with the wounds and ſlaughter of their Friends, ready to retire. Howbeit, by the coming in of Muleaſſes and Dorax, the Aſſault twice before given over, was again at both times renewed, with no leſs deſperate Fury than at the firſt, and the Turks hardly charged. In this dangerous Aſſault Halis of Maliga, a Renegate Spaniard, but a moſt expert Souldier, turning himſelf to Barbaruſſa, ſaid, Muleaſſes returned into the City.

If thou wilt ſave thine honour, and hold this Fort, we muſt ſally out upon this Enemy, which having never ſeen a ſet battel, but only acquainted with light skirmiſhes, will not be able to endure our charge at hand, but ſhall in a moment know the price of their fooliſh hardineſs; who as Brain-ſick men could neither indure the government of their cruel King, ne yet thankfully receive the authors of their deliverance and liberty.

This motion of the Spaniard, confirmed by the general approbation of the chiefeſt Captains, Barbaruſſa commanded Halis the Author of that Counſel, with certain other Captains and their Companions, at one inſtant to ſally out at two Ports of the Caſtle; which they ſo reſolutely performed, that in ſhort time a wonderful number of the naked Moors lay dead upon the ground.

The Citizens of Tunes diſcomfited by the Turks.

Abdahar the Meſuar himſelf, was there ſhot through with a Bullet and ſlain; whereupon the Aſſault was quite given over, the Moors retiring by Companies back into the City, and the Turks ſtill purſuing them; where in the Streets for certain hours, was fought a moſt cruel and bloody Battel. At laſt the Citizens overcome, forſook the open Streets, and betook them to the refuge of their Houſes; not ſo careful of their King, as of themſelves, their Wives and Children. And Halis with the reſt, wearied with the ſlaughter of his Enemies, and overcome with labour, heat, and thirſt, returned with Victory unto the Caſtle. It is reported that there was above 3000 of the Citizens ſlain that day, and thrice as many hurt. Muleaſſes thus diſcouraged, and utterly deſpairing to recover the City, hardly eſcaped his Enemies hands, by the good help of his Uncle Dorax, with whom he fled over the River Bagrada, and came in ſafety to Conſtantina (called of old time Cyrtha) the ancient Seat of the Numidian Kings, but then a part of Dorax his Dominion; where he was honourably maintained and protected until the coming of Charles the Emperor into Africk. The night enſuing this Battel, and the flight of the King, was reſtleſs both to the Citizens and the Turks, each of them for fear of other ſtanding upon their ſtrongeſt Guard.

Muleaſſes flieth.

The Citizens of Tunes yield themſelves to Barbaruſſa.

The next day, the Citizens diſcouraged with the loſs of ſo many of their Kinſmen and Friends, and having no King now for whom they ſhould fight, craved pardon of Barbaruſſa for their raſh attempt, excuſing it by the name of Loyalty to their ancient Kings; offering to ſubmit themſelves unto him with all faithfulneſs. Which their offer he willingly accepted, knowing that he was not able to keep that place with his Souldiers three days, for lack of Victual; ſo that all his hope and Victory gotten, might eaſily be overthrown and brought to nought, if the Citizens moved either with deſperation or deſire of Revenge, ſhould joyn with the other Numidian Princes, and beſiege him in the Caſtle. Whereupon a general Peace was granted, and by ſolemn Oath on both ſides confirmed, whereby the Citizens expreſly bound themſelves to the Obedience of Solyman, and to Barbaruſſa as his Lieutenant. All things thus ſet in order in the City of Tunes, and new Magiſtrates and Officers by him made, he laboured by all means to win unto him the Numidian Princes; which when he had eaſily brought to paſs by Gifts and Rewards with thoſe needy Princes, of themſelves prone enough upon light occaſions to make or break the Bonds of Friendſhip, he ſent Aſan-aga an Eunuch, and Halis the Spaniard, with the Janizaries, and certain pieces of great Ordnance, to take in the other Cities of the Kingdom of Tunes; which they in ſhort time performed, being in all places peaceably received, only the City of Carvenna held out a while, yet afterwards for fear of further harm received the Turks Garriſon. But to leave Barbaruſſa King of Algiers and Solymans great Admiral, thus poſſeſſed of the Kingdom of Tunes; and Muleaſſes in exile at Conſtantina, until he be again reſtored unto his Kingdom by Charles the Emperor, as ſhall be hereafter declared; let us again return to the Wars at the ſelf ſame time undertaken by Solyman in Perſon himſelf in Perſia, perſwaded thereunto (as we have before ſaid) by Abraham the great Baſſa. Of whom a few words, that they which ſhall hereafter live, may in him as in others, ſee in what ſlippery place they ſtand, and what ſmall aſſurance they have, which forſaking God, run headlong after theſe worldly vanities, and ſwelling with the Favours of great Princes, are in a moment when they leaſt fear any ſuch fall, ſuddenly overthrown, and become the miſerable Spectacles of mans fragility in the height of their ſuppoſed bliſs.

The deſcription of Abraham the Baſſa.

This great Baſſa called of the Turks Ibrahim, of us Abraham, was born in a poor Country Village near unto Perga, a Town in that part of Epirus which was called Buthrotia; who in his Childhood was taken from his Chriſtian Parents, by ſuch as by Authority did take up the Tribute-Children of the Chriſtians for the Turkiſh Emperor. A Tribute of all Tributes moſt grievous. He was of Countenance amiable, of Feature comely, active of Body, well ſpoken, pleaſantly conceited, and ſharp of Wit; ſo that he in ſhorter time than was thought poſſible, to the admiration of many, learned both to ſpeak and write the Arabian-Tongue, and other Languages uſed in the Turks Court, and could ſkilfully play upon ſundry kinds of Inſtruments. And being yet a Boy, ſerved Scanderbaſſa, a man of great Authority and Power, in the time of Selymus the Emperor, in whoſe Service he was inſtructed in the Mahometan Religion; but giving himſelf to all manner of curioſity and neatneſs, he was wonderfully favoured by the great Lady his Miſtreſs, and by her commended to her Husband Scanderbaſſa, as a fit Page to temper his melancholy and wayward diſpoſition, with his pleaſant conceits and devices; wherein the Tetrical Baſſa finding him to excel, gave him as a rare Gift to Solyman the Son of Selymus, his Grandfather Bazajet yet living; who took in him ſuch pleaſure, that the old Emperor cauſed him to be brought up in the Court, in all Princely Qualities with Solyman (who was of like years unto him) as his Companion and Playfellow. Where he ſo framed himſelf unto the young Princes diſpoſition in all points, that he was of him always exceedingly beloved, and afterwards promoted to all the Honours of the Court, and made one of the Baſſaes; giving unto him in Marriage the only Daughter and Heir of Scanderbaſſa his Maſter, then dead, with an exceeding great Dowry. And after that made him Governor of Caire; where he had not long remained, but he was again ſent for to the Court, as the man which gave thereunto life, without whoſe Company Solyman was as one half dead. At length he made him Viſier, which is the chief of all the Baſſaes, and Preſident of his Council, the greateſt Honour in the Turkiſh Empire next unto the Emperor himſelf. And to honour him yet more, he delivered him his private Signet, wherewith the Turkiſh Emperors never uſed to truſt any but themſelves; he might at his pleaſure grace and diſgrace whom he would, in Court or elſewhere. What he commanded was done, and whatſoever he did was taken for well done. He might without the Emperors knowledge give any Office, yea the Government of whole Countries and Provinces unto his Favorites; his credit with the Emperor was ſo great, that he did what he liſt, and no man durſt preſume to ask any reaſon why. And to ſay all at once, he wanted nothing of the Majeſty of an Emperor, but the name only; in ſtead whereof, he was commonly called the great Commander of all the Emperors Forces. His houſe in Conſtantinople was of all other moſt ſtately, wherein was daily to be ſeen ſuch a multitude of his gallant Followers, and ſuch a world of Wealth and Royal Furniture, as that it might be worthily compared with the Palace of a great Prince. Neither was he partaker of Solymans Counſels in his weighty matters of State only, but of his ſecret Delights and pleaſures alſo; if he were preſent, all was well; if he were away, nothing pleaſed; to be ſhort, he ſo poſſeſſed this great Emperor, that men commonly ſaid, The Soul of Solyman lived in Abraham. Whereat many of the great Men of the Court ſecretly repined; but eſpecially Solymans Mother, and Roxolana his fair Concubine, whom of all Women he held deareſt.

His bringing up in the Court.

His great credit with Solyman.

Abraham Baſſa perſwadeth Solyman to make war upon the Perſians.

This great Commander, which might at all times be bold to ſpeak what he thought unto Solyman, ſought many times in his private Diſcourſes betwixt them two, to perſwade him to forbear to uſe his Forces any farther againſt the Chriſtians, over whom he had ſufficiently already triumphed, and to turn them upon the Perſians, by whom he was daily injured. Alledging to him, that the Germans were a ſtrong and Warlike people; who as they both in Language and Manners differed from the Hungarians, ſo were they always at variance with them, and therefore much cared not though they were by him ſubdued; but if he ſhould begin to invade any part of their Country, he ſhould then ſoon ſee that invincible Nation with their United Forces up in Arms, ready to make ſtrong Reſiſtance. And to provoke Charles the Emperor (of all the Chriſtian Princes the mightieſt) were not good, who of himſelf was able to bring into the field moſt puiſſant Armies of valiant Souldiers out of his own Dominions; beſides the wonderful Concourſe of moſt reſolute Men out of all parts of Chriſtendom, which would not ſpare to lay down their lives at his Feet in that War; which was of them accounted moſt Religious. Yea what ſtrength both of Horſe and Foot might be raiſed and brought to the battel by the two Brethren Charles and Ferdinand, only might (as he ſaid) even then be plainly perceived, when as they valiantly defended Vienna, beſieged by us with great Power. Neither did Charles afterward, as it ſeemed, and as the Chriſtians commonly vaunt, fear to have adventured the fortune of a main battel with you; who although I doubt not but he ſhould have been overcome by you ſo great a Monarch with ſo puiſſant an Army, a thing peculiar to your own good Fortune; yet I cannot deny, but that the Victory againſt ſuch expert and reſolute Souldiers, ſo ſtrongly armed as their manner is, muſt have been bought with a great deal of our blood. Theſe things in my opinion may reaſonably perſwade you to let the Chriſtians alone, by Civil Wars to weaken one another, that ſo afterwards they may become a prey unto us without any danger of ours. So that in my judgment the Perſian War is to be taken in hand, rather than the Wars in Germany, and eſpecially for that you have ſufficiently enlarged the bounds of your Empire Weſtward, which you have extended even unto Nations very far diſtant. So that it is now a great matter to defend ſo much as you have already gotten; and therefore partly for the difficulty for the defending thereof, and partly upon an honourable contempt, according to the infinite bounty of your heroical Inclination, have thought good to beſtow whole Kingdoms upon ſtrangers, yea half your Enemies. Wherefore how much more glorious ſhall it be now upon juſt occaſion to ſeek for that which joyneth unto your own Confines; and may therefore eaſily be united unto your own Empire: if you according to the example of your Grandfather and Father ſhall force your ſelf to drive that accurſed and abominable Race of Iſmael out of Aſia. For it ſhall be a great glory unto the name of the Othoman Kings for ever, if you ſhall after your wonted manner zealouſly reſpect the cauſe of Religion; a Work of incomparable Fame, if the Authors of a moſt deteſtable Superſtition ſhall by you be chaſed quite out of Aſia. For what more juſt or honourable cauſe can there be to make War, than to profeſs your ſelf the Defender of the Divine Precepts of our great Prophet Mahomet, againſt the wicked and irreligious Impugners thereof? And by the way to revenge and utterly to deſtroy the Capital Enemies of your Anceſtors; which was the laſt prayer of your Father Selymus. Can you endure them which Rule ſo inſolently, that they account every one that is near them their Enemies and Prey, and dare alſo with their pilfering Invaſions provoke your Self, living contented within the bounds of your own Empire, in peace both in Europe and Aſia? and they (forſooth) ſuch as have by moſt horrible wrong crept into the Royal-Seat of the moſt lawful and noble Kings deſcended of the blood of Uſun-Caſſanes? who after their wonted manner ſtill live by Rapine and Robbery? Believe me, Noble Emperor, if you ſhall upon a zeal to your Religion with your Victorious hand take away this ſtain and plague of Aſia, there ſhall undoubtedly be erected unto you ſo glorious and magnificent a Trophy in the midſt of Perſia, as may be compared, yea preferred before the Triumphs of your Victorious Father Selymus. For it is not ſo much to have deſtroyed the Mamalukes (by condition Slaves) and the proud Sultans of Egypt and Syria, as to have ſubdued the Perſians, famous in antient time for their Martial Prowes, who ſo oftentimes vanquiſhed by Alexander of Macedon, gave unto him the name of Great. Solyman, prickt forward with many ſuch Diſcourſes, daily ſounded in his ears by the Baſſa, began to yield to his perſwaſion. Whereof Abraham himſelf greatly rejoyced; for it was thought of many, that he did never in heart renounce the Chriſtian Religion, but was only in outward ſhew a Turk, and in heart a Chriſtian. Which was the rather conjectured, for that he marvellouſly favoured and protected the Chriſtian Merchants, furthered by all means the Leagues of the Chriſtian Princes with Solyman, and laboured always to turn his Forces from them upon the Perſians. And the more to whet him forward, the Baſſa had cunningly inſinuated into his acquaintance one Mulearbe of Damaſco, a man in that time famous in Conſtantinople, for the opinion the people had generally conceived of his Holineſs and Profound Knowledge in the ſecret cauſes of things, and the Art of Magick; uſing him as a Prophet to fill the ambitious mind of Solyman, with aſſured hope of proſperous Succeſs, which thing the hypocritical Wiſard, after the manner of ſuch Deceivers, ſlily performed, propheſying unto him all happineſs in ſo Religious a War, and ſo much (as he ſaid) pleaſing God. This the Baſſaes purpoſe was much furthered alſo by Ulemus a noble and valiant Perſian, who having married the great Perſian King Tamas his Siſter, was revolted from him to Solyman, fearing to be called to account for the Extortion wherewith he had grievouſly oppreſſed the Countries whereof he had the Government; and being wonderfully countenanced in Solymans Court by the great Baſſa, did after the manner of diſloyal Fugitives perſwade Solyman by all means he could to take that War in hand, diſcovering unto him the Power, State, and Strength of the Perſian Kingdom (which he could well do) and plotting unto him the eaſieſt way for the conquering thereof, offering alſo unto him the uttermoſt of his devoir. So Solyman filled with the vain hope of the Conqueſt of Perſia, yielded fully unto the perſwaſions of the great Baſſa, and gave out his Commiſſions into all parts of his Empire, for the raiſing of a mighty Army for the performance of ſo great an Enterprize; commanding all his Captains and Men of War to be ready at the City of Nice in Bithynia at a certain day appointed. Which his purpoſe, although it was mightily impugned by his Mother, and fair Roxolana his beſt beloved, as that which altogether proceeded from the Baſſa; the one alledging, with what evil ſucceſs his Grandfather and Father had before him attempted that ſame War; the other aſſailing him with her paſſionate affections; but both of them indeed repining at the credit of the Baſſa, and in their hearts diſdaining, that ſo great a Monarch ſhould at the pleaſure of his Servant be led up and down the World ſo far from their Company; for which cauſe they did what in them lay to have overthrown the purpoſe of Abraham, and to have altered Solymans former determination. But ſo ſtrong was the Baſſaes credit with his great Lord and Maſter, that all theſe great Ladies Devices and Prayers were as Womens affectionate paſſions rejected, and the Baſſaes counſel (to their no ſmall grief) in all things regarded.

Solyman reſolveth to go againſt the Perſians.

Abrahams credit maligned by Solymans mother and Roxolana.

Abraham Baſſa ſent before with an Army into Syria.

The time appointed being come, and all things in readineſs, Solyman ſent Abraham the Baſſa, and Ulemas the Perſian, before him into Syria with a ſtrong Army, to be ready with the firſt of the Spring to invade the Perſian King. Which thing the Baſſa gladly took upon him, and coming into Syria, wintered with his Army at Aleppo; whither Barbaruſſa came unto him for his Letters of Credence to Solyman, as is before declared. The Spring now approaching, Abraham ſent Ulemas the Fugitive Perſian Prince before him with the light Horſemen, the forerunners of his Army, into Meſopotamia as his Guid, becauſe the Country was unto him beſt known; following not far after himſelf with all his Army. And marching ſtill forward in that manner, came at length without reſiſtance unto the famous City of Tauris in Armenia the greater, called in ancient time Ecbathana, as is probably by ſome conjectured; a great and rich City, but unwalled and of no ſtrength; where the Perſian Kings, for the pleaſantneſs of the place, and freſhneſs of the Air, uſed commonly to be reſiant in the heat of the year. From whence Tamas the Perſian King was as then abſent, buſied in Wars with Kezien-baſſa, a Prince of the Coraſine Hircanians; ſo that the Citizens of Tauris deſtitute of all help, yielded themſelves and the City unto the Baſſa at his firſt coming. Tamas the Perſian King underſtanding what had hapned at Tauris, drew near with his Power, warily expecting to have taken the Turks at ſome advantage, and ſo by policy to have defeated his Enemies, whom he was too weak to meet with in plain battel. Which thing the wary Baſſa well perceiving, for more aſſurance by ſpeedy Courriers advertiſed Solyman of the taking of Tauris, and of the Enemies purpoſe, requeſting him with all ſpeed to repair with his Army to Tauris. Solyman was then come far on his way with a great Army, not by the way of Ancyra, Sebaſtia, Amaſia, the borders of Trapezond, and ſo over Euphrates at Arſenga, into Armenia, as his Father Selymus had done before him, becauſe that way was thought longer and more troubleſome; but quite another way, on the right hand from Nice in Bithynia, to Iconium, and by Cæſaria to Malathia, where is the notable paſſage over the River Euphrates, burſting out by the Vallies of the Mountain Antitaurus, from whence the Plains of Meſopotamia (then part of the Perſian Kingdom) begin to open themſelves; through which Country Solyman marched peaceably with his Army, paying the poor Country people for whatſoever he took; and ſo in four and fifty days march, came from Nice in Bithynia, to the City of Coim in Armenia the greater, which is ſuppoſed to be built in the ruines of the famous and ancient City of Artaxata. But hearing ſuch News as is aforeſaid from the Baſſa, he doubled his march, and ſo in ſhort time after came and joyned his Forces with the Baſſa at Tauris. Tamas (who yet daily expected the coming of the Georgian light Horſemen) underſtanding that Solyman was coming againſt him with a World of men, thought it not good to abide the coming of ſo puiſſant an Enemy, but with delay to weary him out, that drew ſuch a multitude of people after him; and by taking of him at all advantages, to cut off his people, ſpent with long travel, wanting Victual, and falling into divers Diſeaſes; as it commonly chanceth to populous Armies in ſtrange Countries, where the change of the Air, with the inevitable neceſſity always attending upon a great Army, moſt times cauſeth grievous and contagious Diſeaſes. Wherefore Tamas to ſhun the coming of Solyman, retired further off into Sultania, about ſix days journey from Tauris. Whereof Solyman having knowledge, departed from that rich City without doing any harm therein; following after Tamas into Sultania, to joyn battel with him if he could poſſible; leaving behind him for haſt, a great part of his Carriages and Baggage, with five hundred Janizaries, and three of his Sanzacks with their Companies. The City of Sultania was in ancient time one of the Royal Seats of the Perſian Kings, but ruinated by the Scythian Tamerlane, retained no ſhew of the ancient Majeſty, but only in the Churches by him ſpared. Near unto this City Solyman lay incamped many days, expecting that the Perſian King (in revenge of the injuries to him done, and for the ſafeguard of his Honour) ſhould at length come out of the Mountains, and ſhew himſelf in plain Field, and give him battel. Which was a thing ſo far from Tamas his reſolution, upon the due comparing of his own ſtrength with his Enemies, that he retired in ſuch ſort, that Solyman could by no means learn what was become of him, or which way to follow him.

The City of Tauris yielded unto the Baſſa.

Solyman cometh to Tauris.

Solyman followeth Tamas the Perſian King into Sultania.

Solymans Army diſtreſſed with tempeſt.

The Country near unto the City of Sultania, wherein Solyman lay incamped at large, is on every ſide invironed with huge Mountains, whoſe tops are to be ſeen afar off, always covered with deep Snow; theſe Mountains were in ancient time called Nyphates, Caſpius, Coathras, and Zagrus, taking their beginning no doubt from Caucaſus the Father of Mountains; and joyning one to another, ſome one way, ſome another, do divide moſt large and wide Countries. Whilſt Solyman in thoſe vaſt and plain Fields moſt fit to fight a battel in, expected the coming of Tamas, ſuch a horrible and cruel Tempeſt (as the like whereof the Perſians had never before ſeen at that time of the year) fell down from thoſe Mountains (which was ſo much the more ſtrange, for that it fell in the beginning of September) with ſuch abundance of rain, which froze ſo eagerly as it fell, that it ſeemed the depth of Winter had even then of a ſudden been come in; for ſuch was the rage of the bluſtring Winds, ſtriving with themſelves as if it had been for Victory, that they ſwept the Snow from off the tops of thoſe high Mountains, and caſt it into the Plains in ſuch abundance, that the Turks lay as men buried alive in the deep Snow, moſt part of their Tents being overthrown and beaten down to the ground with the violence of the Tempeſt, and weight of the Snow; wherein a wonderful number of ſick Souldiers and others of the baſer ſort which followed the Camp, periſhed; and many others were ſo benummed, ſome their Hands, ſome their Feet, that they loſt the uſe of them for ever; moſt part of their Beaſts which they uſed for carriage, but eſpecially their Camels, were frozen to death. Yea Solyman himſelf was in great danger to have been overwhelmed in his Tent, all the Tents round about him being overthrown with the violence of the Tempeſt. Neither was there any remedy to be found for ſo great miſchiefs, by reaſon of the helliſh darkneſs of that tempeſtuous night, moſt of their fires being put out by the extremity of the Storm; which did not a little terrifie the ſuperſtitious Turks, as a thing accounted of them ominous. And that which troubled them no leſs than the miſeries of the Tempeſt, was the fear of the Enemy, whoſe ſudden coming they deadly feared; until that after ſo tedious a night, the Sun breaking out the next morning, with his chearful beams revived many, before ready to give up the ghoſt for cold, and gave comfort unto them all in general, by diſcovering the open Fields clear of their feared Enemies. It was a dreadful thing to have ſeen what miſery that one night had brought into the Turks Camp; the ground lay almoſt covered with Bodies of the dead, and many lived but ſo, as that they accounted the dead more happy than themſelves. Many of the Turks vainly thought, that horrible Tempeſt was brought upon them by the Charms and Inchantments of the Perſian Magicians; whereas it was undoubtedly by the Hand of him who bringeth the proud devices of Princes to naught.

Solyman troubled as well with the ſtrangeneſs of the accident, as the loſs he had received, after he had a little refreſhed his diſcouraged Souldiers, roſe with his Army, and took his way on the left hand into Aſſyria; Ulemas the Perſian perſwading him thereunto for many cauſes, but eſpecially by putting him in hope of the taking of Babylon; for that Mahometes, a Friend of his, was Governor thereof. But he when the matter came to proof, was not to be won either by Promiſe or Reward, to betray the City. Wherefore Solyman reſolved to take it by force; neither did his Fortune fail him therein; for as ſoon as Mahometes underſtood that Ulemas was at hand with the Forerunners of the Turks Army, and that Solyman with all his Power was coming after, (who as he thought would never have come ſo far;) he not provided to withſtand ſo mighty an Enemy, and not beloved of the Citizens, fled out of the City. Solyman coming, in ſhort time after was of the Babylonians received without reſiſtance. The City of Babylon, commonly called Bagdat, roſe out of the ruines of the old City of Babylon, ſo much ſpoken of in holy Writ; from whence it is not far diſtant, ſtanding upon the River Tygris, which not far beneath falleth into the River Euphrates. In this famous City is the Seat of the great Calyph, the chief Mahometan Prieſt, whom all the Mahometan Princes have in great Reverence, and hath an old Prerogative in the choice and confirmation of the Kings of Aſſyria and the Sultans of Egypt; of which Calyph, Solyman according to the old ſuperſtitious manner, received at his hands the Enſigns and Ornaments of the Aſſyrian Kings, and with great bounty won the hearts of the people; and thereupon reſolved to ſpend that Winter there, billiting his Army in divers places of that fertile Country. The other Cities of Aſſyria and Meſopotamia alſo, namely Caraemida, Meredinum, Orſa, and Aſanceſa, hearing that Solyman had without reſiſtance taken Babylon, yielded themſelves and received his Garriſons. Yet the fame thereof was ſo great, that Embaſſadors came unto him as far as Ormus, (a City in the mouth of Euphrates where it falleth into the Perſian Gulf, famous for the great Traffique out of India thither) ſuing unto him for Peace. Thus the ancient City of Babylon, with the great Countries of Aſſyria and Meſopotamia, ſometimes famous Kingdoms of themſelves, and lately part of the Perſian Kingdom, fell into the hands of the Turks, and became Provinces of the Turkiſh Empire, in the year, 1534. Where Solyman after he had ſpent that Winter in great Joy and Triumph, according to the manner of the Turkiſh Government, placed a great Commander, which they by a proud Name call the Beglerbeg, (which is as much as to ſay, the Lord of Lords) and under him divers others for the Government of theſe Countries, by parts, which they call Sanzacks, who are ever at the Command of the Beglerbeg. Whilſt he thus wintered at Babylon, he cauſed Aſhender Zelibi (which is to ſay, Alexander the Noble) his great Treaſurer for the Wars, to be hanged, for that he had unfaithfully dealt in his Office, and confiſcated all his Goods.

Babylon yielded to Solyman.

The Countries of Aſſyria and Meſopotamia poſſeſſed by the Turks.

Tamas hearing that Solyman was gone to Babylon, returned to Tauris; of whoſe ſpeedy coming the Janizaries and other Captains there left by Solyman underſtanding, fled in haſt out of the City, leaving all ſuch things as were committed to their cuſtody, for a prey unto the Perſian Souldiers.

Tamas comes to Tauris.

1535. Solymans Army being mightily increaſed by the coming unto him of the great Baſſa of Caire, with the Sanzacks of Alexandria, Judea, Syria, and Comagena; by the perſwaſion of Abraham and Ulemas, the Spring now well come on, departed from Babylon again towards Tauris, with purpoſe either to draw Tamas to battel, or elſe to his eternal infamy, before his face to ſack that his regal City. But Tamas advertiſed of his coming, and knowing himſelf too weak to give him battel, forſook the City, and fled into the Mountains of Hircania; deſtroying all the Country before him as he went, and carrying away the Inhabitants, leaving nothing to relieve the Turks Souldiers, if they ſhould purſue him. Solyman underſtanding that Tamas was again fled, ſent Ulemas with all the choice Horſemen of his Army to overtake him if it were poſſible, and to fight with him. But when he had followed him two or three days Journey, and ſtill found the Country deſolate as he went, yielding neither Forrage for his Horſes, nor Relief for his Men, and ſaw no hope to overtake the King; he began as a provident General, to forecaſt the extremities like to befal in his return through thoſe deſolate Countries with the Enemy at his heels; and thereupon in time retired back again to Solyman, declaring unto him what had hapned. Who fretting in his mind, that the Perſian King was not to be drawn to battel, marched forthwith to Tauris, entring it without reſiſtance, the Citizens ſubmitting themſelves unto him; whoſe lives ſpared, he gave that rich City for a prey to his Souldiers, who left neither Houſe nor corner thereof unranſacked, abuſing the poor Citizens with all manner of Inſolency; every common Souldier without controlment fitting himſelf with whatſoever beſt pleaſed his greedy deſire or filthy luſt. Tamas had in this City a moſt ſtately and Royal Palace; ſo had alſo moſt part of the Nobility their ſumptuous and rich Houſes, which by the commandment of Solyman were all raſed down to the ground, and the greateſt part of the beſt Citizens and beautiful Perſonages of all ſorts and condition, at his departure thence carried away Captives. Solyman contenting himſelf to have done the Perſian King this diſgrace, in ſpoiling this his rich and Royal City, returned again towards Meſopotamia, deſtroying the Countries all the way as he went, killing the very Beaſts and Cattel, thereby the more to impoveriſh the Perſians, wiſhing to leave nothing unto them but penury and miſery. He was ſcarcely paſt Coim and the Calderan Fields (famous for his Fathers Victory againſt Hiſmael) but that certain Troops of Perſian Horſemen were in the tail of his Army, and had taken away ſome of his Baggage, and ſlain divers of the ſick and ſtragling Souldiers, and with their often Skirmiſhes did not a little trouble his whole Army. Beſides that, it was noiſed through all his Camp, That Tamas himſelf was coming after him with a greater Power of Horſemen, taken up in Hiberia, Albania, Parthia, Media, and Armenia, and would be at their backs before they could get out of Armenia; for which cauſe he appointed the two great Baſſaes of Caire and Syria (for ſo they were called) and Ulemas the Perſian, with 18000 good Souldiers to follow him in the Rereward of his Army, to receive and repreſs the ſudden Aſſaults of the Perſians, if need ſhould require; and ſo ſtill kept on his March, until he was come to Amida, now called Caraemida, an ancient City of Meſopotamia. In the mean time Tamas the Perſian King was returned to Tauris with a mighty Army, in hope there to have ſuddenly ſurpriſed his Enemy, ſurcharged with with the pleaſures of ſo rich a City; but finding him gone, and beholding the miſerable ſpoil and deſolation he had made in the City; moved with Indignation, he reſolved to purſue him whither ſoever he were gone, and was now on his way as far as Coim. Where underſtanding that Solyman was gone ſo far before, that he was hardly to be overtaken; and finding the noble Gentlemen in his Army unwilling in their heavy Armor to undertake ſuch a purſuit, as could not be performed without the wonderful toil of themſelves, and moſt aſſured loſs of their goodly Horſes; alledging, that they were provided to fight a battel, and not to travel ſo long a Journey (all which, Tamas now that his choler was over, knew to ſtand with good reaſon) he changed his former determination, thinking it beſt there to ſtay and not to follow the purſuit of his Enemies any further; until that Delimenthes one of his Noblemen (always more forward than the reſt) offered with five thouſand choſen Horſemen to overtake ſome part of the Turks Army, and to do on them ſome good ſervice. Which his offer Tamas gladly accepted, commending him greatly for the ſame, promiſing him moſt honourable Reward; and ſo in haſt ſent him away.

Delimenthes with 5000 Perſians purſues the Turks.

Delimenthes aſſails the Turks Camp by night, and maketh a great ſlaughter.

He forthwith taking the well known and neareſt way, uſed ſuch Expedition, that he was in hope to overtake the Rereward of the Turks Army (marching not far now before him) about the foot of the Mountain Taurus, as in deed it fell out at a place called Bethlis. This Bethlis is a famous Town in the Confines of the Perſian Kingdom, where it bordereth upon Meſopotamia; ſtanding in a pleaſant Valley, by which runneth a little River falling out of the Mountain Antitaurus; and had a Caſtle kept with a Garriſon of Perſians. In this Valley the two Baſſaes of Caire and Syria (conducted by Ulemas) thinking they had now been paſt all danger of the Enemies purſuit, ſtaid with the Rereward of their Army to refreſh their wearied Souldiers, upon certain knowledge, that Solyman with the reſt of his Army was already come in ſafety to Amida in Meſopotamia. And therefore lay as men ſecure, without any ſuſpicion of the coming of the Perſians, whom they had not ſo much as heard any thing of in long time before. But Delimenthes uſing moſt faithful and diligent Eſpials of that Country people, by that time he was come within one days journey of Bethlis, underſtood certainly where the Turks lay, weary of their long travel, as men without fear, keeping little or no Watch in their Camp: Whereupon he determined in the dead time of the night following to aſſail them in their Camp; and by ſecret Meſſengers gave knowledge both of his coming, and of this his purpoſe, to the Captain of the Caſtle of Bethlis; requeſting him at an appointed hour upon ſign given, to be ready to ſally out with his Garriſon upon that ſide of the Turks Camp which was towards the Caſtle. Which his venturous deſignment was ſo furthered both by the darkneſs of the night, and the abundance of rain which fell at the ſame time, as if it had been wiſhed for; that he was got with all his reſolute Followers within the Turks Camp, before they were aware of his coming; where the Perſian Souldiers as Wolves amongſt Sheep, did ſuch ſpeedy execution amongſt the ſleepy Turks, that the two great Baſſaes and Ulemas had much ado to get to horſe and ſave themſelves by flight. And ſuch was the fury of the Perſians, and the greatneſs of the ſudden fear increaſed by the darkneſs of the night, that the Turks not knowing which way to turn themſelves, or what to do, were ſlain by thouſands, ſome ſleeping, ſome half waking, ſome making themſelves ready to fight, and ſome to fly, few of all that great Army eſcaped the Sword of the Perſians. Of the five great Sanzacks which were in the Army, three were ſlain, and one taken. Eight hundred Janizaries ſeeing themſelves forſaken of their Chieftains, laid down their Harquebuſies and other Weapons, and yielded themſelves upon Delimenthes his word. The fierce Mountain people alſo, who in former time had ſuffered great injuries of the Turks, after the death of Aladeules their King, had now joyned themſelves to the Perſians, and notably revenged their Wrongs; to whoſe ſhare all the Baggage of the Turks Camp fell for a prey. It might then well have been ſaid of the Turks, which the Poet ſpeaketh of the night wherein Troy was ſackt:

Quis cladem illius noctis, qui funera fando
Explicet? ———

The ſlaughter of that night was ſo great, that it is of the Turks until this day accounted amongſt their greateſt loſſes; and the Victory ſo welcome to the Perſians, that in Memorial thereof they kept that day (which was the thirteenth of October) as one of their Solemn Holidays for many years after. Delimenthes returning all bloody with the ſlaughter of the Turks, and loaded with their Spoils, was of Tamas joyfully received, and honourably rewarded.

Solyman diſcouraged.

This Overthrow reported to Solyman by the two great Baſſaes and Ulemas, as men that had hardly eſcaped Ship-wreck, ſo daunted his proud conceits, that he reſolved in himſelf to return home, and no further to proſecute that unfortunate War; the evil event whereof, his Mother (as he ſaid) had more truly preſaged, than had the cold Prophet Mulearabe; but ſecretly in mind diſpleaſed with Abraham the great Baſſa, by whoſe perſwaſion he had taken in hand that dangerous Expedition. By the way as he went he was met at Iconium by Barbaruſſa and Sinan Baſſa ſirnamed the Jew, a man for his skill at Sea in reputation next to Barbaruſſa. Theſe two great Perſonages lately come from Algiers to Conſtantinople with the remainder of his Fleet, met him ſo far by Land, to ſhew their joyfulneſs for the Conqueſt he had made of Meſopotamia and Aſſyria, and to excuſe themſelves for the loſs of the Kingdom of Tunes; which won by Barbaruſſa in the beginning of the Perſian War, was before the ending thereof again wrung out of his hands by Charles the Emperor, and reſtored to Muleaſſes, as ſhall be hereafter declared. They with great humility declared unto him the whole proceſs of that War, and with what Succeſs they had endured the force of Charles the Emperor himſelf in Perſon; ſhewing plainly unto him, that there wanted neither valour in the Souldiers, nor direction in them the Commanders, but only Fortune, which as it mightily reigneth in all mens actions, ſo eſpecially in matters of War. Solyman graciouſly accepted of their excuſe, and courteouſly took them up, proſtrate at his Feet, commending them for their valour in their evil haps, in a Plot ſo well by them laid, more than he did the Victory of others, got by good Fortune, not grounded upon any good reaſon; willing them to be of good chear, ſaying, That that he would in ſhort time find occaſion for them to recompence that diſgrace, and again to ſhew their approved valour. After long travel he came to the Strait of Boſphorus, where Abraham the Baſſa going before him, had in token of Triumph cauſed the Shore all along the place where he ſhould go aboord the Gally provided for his Tranſportation, to be covered with Perſian ſilk for him to tread upon; from whence he paſſed with much Triumph over to his Palace to Conſtantinople.

Abraham the great Baſſa in diſgrace with Solyman.

Envy, the fatal and cruel Companion of Princes immoderate favours, had with her prying Eyes quickly diſcovered in Court Solymans changed countenance upon the great Baſſa, and began now to ſhew her gaſtly Face. They which before were moſt ready to do him all Honour poſſible, yea to have laid their hands under his Feet, ſought now by all ſecret means to work his Diſgrace and Confuſion. But of all others, the two great Ladies, Solymans Mother and the fair Roxolana, ceaſed not by daily Complaints to incenſe Solyman againſt him; the Mother, for that he had by his perſwaſion, contrary to her mind and her ſuperſtitious Obſervations, drawn her Son into the dangers of the Perſian War; and Roxolana, for that he moſt honoured and ſought the Preferment of Muſtapha, Solymans eldeſt Son by another Woman; whereas ſhe above all things laboured by all ſubtil means to prefer Bajazet her own Son to the Empire, after the death of Solyman his Father; which her deſignment ſhe perceived to be much croſſed by the Credit which the Baſſa had with her Solyman, and therefore did what ſhe might, both to bring him out of Favour, and to work his Deſtruction. But that which moſt impared his credit with Solyman, was the common report raiſed of him by his Enemies, That he being in heart a Chriſtian, did in all things favour the Chriſtians, (a thing moſt odious among the Turks) and had for that cauſe craftily perſwaded Solyman to take in hand the unfortunate Perſian War. And that which more increaſed the ſuſpition, was, That he about that time had cauſed one Mark Nicholas a Venetian Merchant (who had not without ſuſpicion of ſome, oftentimes come unto him with Letters and ſecret Meſſages whilſt he lay at Babylon) to be taken in the night, and murdred at Conſtantinople, and caſt into the Sea, becauſe he ſhould not diſcover any thing that might be hurtful unto him. Abraham thus brought in diſgrace with Solyman, was (after the manner of the Turkiſh Tyranny) bid to a Solemn Supper in the Court about the fourteenth of March, after which time he was never more ſeen. It is reported, That after Supper Solyman fell into a great rage with him, charging him bitterly, That he had miſgoverned the State, inverted his Treaſures to his own private uſe, and as a Traytor, had ſecret Intelligence with the Chriſtian Princes his Enemies; for proof whereof, Solyman with ſtern Countenance ſhewed him his own Letters, which had by chance been intercepted; oftentimes asking him in furious manner, If he knew not that Hand, if he knew not that Seal. All which, the Baſſa lying proſtrate at his Feet humbly confeſſed, and with many Tears craved of him pardon. But his hard heart was not by any prayers to be moved; for the ſame night as he was ſlumbring upon a Palate in the Court, overcome with heavineſs, an Eunuch cut his Throat with a crooked Knife, which Solyman for that purpoſe had delivered unto him with his own hand. He was murdred ſleeping, becauſe Solyman had in former time of his favour ſolemnly ſworn unto him, That he would never kill him whilſt he lived. By which Oath, the great Mahometan Prieſt ſaid, He was not ſo bound, but that he might kill him ſleeping, for as much as men by ſleep deprived of ſenſe, are for that time not to be accounted as living, but as dead, mans life conſiſting altogether (as he ſaid) in lively actions. It is reported, that after Solyman had looked upon the dead body, and bitterly curſed the ſame, he cauſed a great weight to be tied unto it, and ſo caſt it into the Sea. His Treaſure and Goods, which were almoſt infinite, were the next day all ſeiſed upon for the Emperor, and a ſmall portion thereof appointed for his poor Wife to live upon. His death was no ſooner known, but that the vulgar people deviſed of him infamous Songs, and ſlanderous Reports, as of a Traytor moſt juſtly condemned; and in further deſpight, with mire and ſtones defaced the Trophies of the Hungarian Victory, which he had in a ſtately manner erected before his ſumptuous Houſe in Conſtantinople. This was the woful end of Abraham the great Baſſa, who whilſt he ſtood in favour with his Prince, was of all others accounted moſt fortunate, wanting nothing but the name of the great Sultan; but after falling into diſgrace, became the ſcorn of Fortune, and the lamentable Spectacle of mans fragility. He was murdred the fifteenth day of March, in the year 1536.

The cauſes that moved Charles the Emperor to invade Tunes.

How the Kingdom of Tunes was by Barbaruſſa (the Turks great Admiral) taken from Muleaſſes, we have already told; but how the ſame was again taken from him by Charles the Emperor a little before the return of Solyman out of Perſia, remaineth now to be declared. It was commonly reported, and not without juſt cauſe feared, that Barbaruſſa, poſſeſſed of the Kingdom of Tunes, and ſupported by the Power of Solyman, would the next Summer, not content himſelf with the Spoil of the Coaſts of Spain, Sardinia, and Italy, as he had in former time, but with all his Forces invade Sicilia, the Granary and Storehouſe of Italy, and from thence attempt to Conquer the Kingdom of Naples, which it was thought he in his immoderate deſires had longed much after. To repreſs this his barbarous Inſolency, and to work the ſafety of the Frontiers of the Chriſtian Kingdoms (much ſubject to the Rapines of the Turkiſh Pirates) Charles the Emperor reſolved in Perſon himſelf with a puiſſant Army to paſs over into Africk, whilſt Solyman was yet buried in the Perſian Wars, and by force of Arms to diſpoſſeſs the Tyrant of his new gotten Kingdom of Tunes. For the accompliſhment whereof, he cauſed Souldiers to be levied in all parts of Spain, and came down to Barcelona with eight thouſand Footmen and ſeven hundred Horſemen, far ſooner than was by any man expected; amongſt whom were many of the Nobility of Spain, with their Followers moſt gallantly appointed; but eſpecially Ferdinand of Toledo, Duke of Alva; whoſe forwardneſs in that honourable Action, with the deſire he had to revenge the death of his Father Garzias, ſlain before by the Moors at Girapolis, gave great hope even then unto his Country-men, That he would in time prove a worthy Chieftain, as indeed he afterward did.

The Emperors great Preparations for the invaſion of Tunes.

Andrew Aurla the Emperors Admiral.

In the mean time Andrew Auria the great Admiral, unto whom only for his approved fidelity and long experience the Emperor had fully communicated what he had with himſelf before purpoſed, had with wonderful diligence and celerity rigged up a great Fleet of Ships and Gallies ſo furniſhed with all manner of Warlike Proviſion, as might well have ſufficed a great Army; whereunto he joyned alſo his own Fleet of ſeventeen Gallies and three Galleaſſes, wherein he had imbarked the Flower of Genoa and Liguria, who with exceeding chearfulneſs had voluntarily offered themſelves to follow him their old General in that Sacred Expedition.

With this great Preparation Auria came to the Emperor at Barcelona. Thither came alſo Lewis the King of Portugals Brother (whoſe Siſter Iſabel, Charles the Emperor had married) with 25 Caravels, Ships which the Portugals uſed in their Indian Voyages, amongſt whom was alſo one huge Galeon; all Ships well appointed and fit for Service, wherein were embarked 2000 Portugals, beſide Mariners; there alſo arrived ſixty Sail of tall Ships ſent out of Flanders and the Low-Countries; wherein were a great number of condemned perſons, whoſe lives were ſpared that they might ſerve in the Gallies. Unto this War Paulus the Third of that Name, then Biſhop of Rome, ſent ten Gallies under the Conduct of Virginius Urſinus; the great Maſter of Malta ſent thither his Fleet alſo. At the ſame time that all this preparation was in making in other places, that worthy Chieftain Alphonſus D'aualus Vaſtius, whom the Emperor had appointed General of all his Forces at Land, had by the Emperors Commandment taken up five thouſand new Souldiers in Italy, which were led by Hieronimus Tutavilla, Count of Sarne, Frederick, Caracte, and Auguſtine Spinula, all famous Captains. The old Spaniſh Garriſons which lay in Lombardy, the Emperor commanded to be ſtraitly looked unto, that none of them ſhould leave their places to go into this new Expedition, but to remain there ſtill under their General Antonius Leva; which worthy Captain although he would fain have had him with him, as of all his great Commanders the beſt; yet he thought it good to ſpare him, both for that he was much troubled with the Gout, and alſo for that it was neceſſary (as he thought) to leave ſuch a valiant Captain with his Garriſons in the Country, ſo near unto the French and Swiſſers, whom he durſt not ſo well truſt as to disfurniſh that Country either of ſo great a Commander, or of the wonted Garriſons. At the ſame time Maximilian Eberſtein, an old Commander, came to Vaſtius with eight thouſand Germans, over the Tridentine Alps to Millain, and ſo to Genoa; amongſt whom were divers noble Gentlemen, who then as voluntary men ſerved of their own charges. With theſe Germans and the five thouſand Italians, Vaſtius embarked himſelf at the Port called Portus Veneris, in Liguria; having before perſwaded them, with patience to indure the tedíouſneſs of the Sea, and to comfort themſelves with the hope of the Victory in Africk; where they ſhould fight in the Quarrel of God, and for the Emperor, who did never forget his religious and valiant Souldiers. So ſailing alongſt the Coaſt of Italy, he came to Naples, where the Vice-Roy and divers other of the Nobility had of their own charges, every man according to his devotion or ability, built or furniſhed ſome one Gally, ſome more, for that Service. It was a wonder to ſee with what chearfulneſs the Gallants and luſty Youths of Naples, and all that part of Italy, came and offered themſelves unto Vaſtius; ſo that it ſeemed there was none left behind in Naples; for he had with ſingular courteſie ſo won the hearts of the old Souldiers and luſty Youths of that Kingdom, that both the one and the other thought it a moſt honourable thing to adorn, the one their before deſerved Penſions, and other their firſt entrance into Martial Affairs, with the participation of ſo notable a Victory. But whilſt every man was thus buſied in ſetting forward, certain mutinous Souldiers (weary of the Sea, and fearing the dangers of ſo long a Voyage) began to caſt many Perils, to find fault with their ſmall Wages, and to diſcourage the multitude, perſwading them with ſeditious Speeches to forſake their Colours, and to run away; for redreſs whereof, Vaſtius cauſed the Authors of that Mutiny to be taken and thruſt into Sacks, and in the ſight of the whole Fleet to be caſt into the Sea. So Vaſtius departing with his Fleet from Naples, came in few days to Palermo in Sicily. The Emperor alſo looſing from Barcelona, came to the Port of Mago in the Iſland of Minorca, and from thence to Caralis in Sardinia, whether Alphonſus Vaſtius was a little before come with all his Fleet out of Sicily. Not long after, the Emperor, now that all his Forces were come together, paſſed over from Sardinia into Africk, and with a fair Weſterly Wind put into the Port of Utica, which is of the Seafaring men called Farina. In the entring whereof, the Admiral Gally, wherein the Emperor himſelf was, by great miſchance ſtruck upon a Sand, and there ſtuck faſt; which ſo much troubled the Emperor, for that his Father Philip had by like miſhap been like to have been caſt away upon the Coaſt of England, as he was ſailing out of the Low-Countries into Spain; howbeit, by the good direction of Auria ſhe was quickly got off the Sand again, and entred with the reſt, to the great rejoycing of the whole Fleet. So preſently departing again from Utica, and ſailing alongſt the Coaſt, he doubled the Promontory of Carthage, yet famous for the ruines of that proud City, and came to Anchor before a Caſtle, which of a Well beneath it, is called by the name of Aquaria, or the Water-Caſtle. The Moors, who from the Hills of Utica, or their Watch-Towers, had taken view of the Chriſtian Fleet, and of the Courſe it held, advertiſed Barbaruſſa, That the Chriſtians were coming againſt him with an innumerable Fleet; for there was of one ſort and other almoſt 700 Sail, whereof 82 were great Streamers, which gallantly garniſhed with Flags and Gallies, made a ſhew of more than indeed they were, and wonderfully terrified the Enemy. But that troubled Barbaruſſa moſt, that he was by Meſſenger upon Meſſenger certainly informed, that the moſt mighty Chriſtian Emperor Charles was in Perſon himſelf in the Fleet, with ſuch a world of people, that it ſhould ſeem he had left none in Spain and Italy that were able to bear Arms. Which News was brought by certain Mahometan Slaves, who getting looſe in the Gallies, had in the night ſwome aſhore, and reported the certainty of the Emperors coming; for the proud Turk, a great Contemner of the Chriſtian Forces, never thought that the Emperor would have adventured his Perſon unto the dangers of the Sea, and chances of War, eſpecially in an unknown, barren and ſcorching Country, but would rather have attempted to do ſomething by his Lieutenants; or elſe by Auria his Admiral ſeek to ſurprize ſome baſe places alongſt the Sea-coaſt, but not to come directly for the regal City of Tunes; in which opinion he was chiefly confirmed by Aloyſius Præſenda, a Gentleman of Genoa, who taken at Sea, was kept as Priſoner at large in Tunes; of whom Barbaruſſa had learned many things concerning the State of Italy, the manner of the Chriſtians, and ſtrength of the Emperor; craftily feeding him with the hope of liberty, if he would truly declare unto him ſuch things as he deſired to know. Wherefore now in his rage he cauſed him to be brought before him; charging him bitterly, that he had craftily and perfidiouſly told him lyes for truth, concerning the Emperor, and therefore commanded him to be forthwith executed. When he had thus with the unworty death of a guiltleſs Chriſtian, ſomewhat mitigated the grief of his light belief, he forthwith began to caſt with himſelf how he might beſt withſtand his puiſſant Enemy. And firſt of all calling to counſel his Sea-Captains, in whom for their approved valour he repoſed moſt confidence, he ſhewed unto them, that they as valiant men, acquainted with the dangers attending upon honourable Actions, were not to doubt of the Victory, forſomuch as he ſaw it as good as already gained; for the ſame reaſons for which he had before perſwaded himſelf, that the Emperor (if he had not been half mad) would not have undertaken ſo deſperate and doubtful a War.

Barbaruſſa encourageth his Souldiers.

For who is there (ſaid he) that knoweth this Country (not to ſpeak of our own Forces) which would not reaſonably think our Enemies ſhould in ſhort time know the price of their ambitious deſire and raſh attempt? which in a moſt unſeaſonable time of the year, the days being now at the longeſt, and the Sun in his greateſt ſtrength, are come to fight in a Country ſcortched with heat, and altogether without water; where the very ſand which riſeth with every blaſt of Wind, flying into their Eyes and Faces, ſhall no leſs trouble them than their Enemies? Shall we think that they, which as I hear for moſt part are freſh-water Souldiers, and ſurcharged with heavy Armor, can eaſily march forward, or retire, or yet keep their ground, as the divers occaſions of battel ſhall require; when as the deep and hollow burning ſand up to the mid leg, will not ſuffer them to keep any order of Array? How ſhall they be able by any means to abide the force of our Turkiſh footmen, or the often charging of the nimble Numidian Horſemen? And if they be ſo many of them as they ſay there is, where can they get Victual to feed ſuch a multitude, if we do but protract the War? Aſſuredly (moſt valiant and couragious Chieftains) we ſhall erect a moſt rare and incomparable Trophy in this Country of Africk; when as Charles the rich and great Emperor of the Chriſtians ſhall either here be ſlain in battel, or elſe fall into our hands as a moſt rich prey. For mine own part, I will notably provide, that you ſhall want neither Weapons, Victual, or Aid, during the time of this War: I will open the old Armories, broach my Store, and bring forth my Treaſures. The Numidian Princes now our Friends, I will without delay entertain with great pay, and ſuch Preſents as ſhall be to them moſt welcome. As for the Citizens of Tunes, you know how eaſily they are to be kept in Obedience, and brought on againſt the Enemy for a ſmall pay, and hope of reward. But this one thing is it that I moſt earneſtly require of your approved valour, That you moſt valiantly defend the ſtrong Caſtle of Guletta, as the moſt aſſured defence not of this City only, but of the whole Kingdom; and eſpecially of our Navy which there lieth in ſafe Harbor; for that piece will our Enemies with all their Forces firſt aſſail. Wherefore, as worthy Men never to be vanquiſhed, keep that for Solyman and me; ſo that it being vainly attempted by our Enemies, and reſolutely defended by you, the Chriſtian Emperor there failing of his purpoſe, and ſhamefully foiled; ſhall now begin to deſpair, not of the taking of the City of Tunes, but of his own return and ſafety.

Barbaruſſa his chief Captains.

The ſituation of Guletta.

The Chriſtian Army landeth at Guletta.

When he had thus ſaid, the Sea-Captains anſwered with one conſent, That they would moſt willingly and chearfully perform whatſoever it ſhould pleaſe him to command; and in confirmation thereof, promiſed him not to do any thing which beſeemed not moſt valiant and reſolute Men. Amongſt theſe Sea-Captains, Sinan of Smirna a Jew, who had loſt his right Eye, was both for his age and long experience in Military Affairs, of greateſt account; next unto him was Haidinus of Cilicia, for his furiouſneſs in fight ſirnamed of the Italians Cacciadiabolo, and Salec of Ionia, which two had before in a great Battel at Sea, ſlain Rodericus Portendus great Admiral of Spain, and taken his Son John Priſoner, and ſeven great Gallies; after theſe, was Tabacches of Laodicea, and Giaffer, a valiant Captain of the Janizaries; all which were notable Pyrats, and then Men of great fame. The ſtrong Caſtle of Guletta ſtandeth in the bottom of the Bay of Carthage, upon a point of the Land, where the Sea by a narrow Strait runneth on the Eaſt ſide of the Caſtle into the Lake of Tunes, which being in a manner round, is about twelve Italian miles over. But now that Caſtle is parted from the Main on the Weſt ſide alſo, by the Sea that way let in; which chargeable Work was by Barbaruſſa begun, but given over again by him; perſwaded by ſome, That the Sea coming in that way, would in ſhort time fill up the Lake with ſand; but was afterwards for all that, perfected by others. So that now it ſtandeth in the manner of an Iſland, in the mouth of the Lake, divided from the firm Land by two narrow ſtrait paſſages; the one on the Eaſt, and the other on the Weſt; yet ſo, that it commandeth both. This Caſtle Barbaruſſa had before ſtrongly fortified both with Men and Munition, as the Key of that Kingdom, but now upon the coming of the Emperor, he put into it his moſt expert and reſolute Captains before named; well foreſeeing, that in the defence thereof reſted the ſafety of his Navy which then lay within the Lake, as in a moſt ſure Harbour; and alſo the greateſt hope he had for the holding of the City of Tunes, whereon depended the whole State of that Kingdom. The Emperor lying at Anchor with all his Fleet near unto the ſhore, gave general Commandment, That his Souldiers ſhould with as much ſpeed as was poſſible be landed with the long Boats; which was ſo orderly done, that the Moors terrified with the hideous cry of the Souldiers, making toward Land, and not able to abide the ſhowers of ſmall Shot, were eaſily beaten from the ſhore, whither they were come down in great multitudes, and ſo ſuffered the Chriſtian Souldiers to land quietly. The firſt that landed were the Spaniſh Companies, after them the Italians, and laſt of all the Germans, whom Vaſtius General of the Army cauſed preſently to encamp themſelves; ſtraitly commanding, that no man ſhould ſtraggle from the Camp farther into the Land, until the Horſemen and great Artillery were all landed. The Emperor himſelf bearing Victory in the chearfulneſs of his Countenance, landed alſo. In the mean time certain Companies were ſent out by the General, to view the places nigh hand, and to ſeek out the Ciſterns and Fountains of freſh Waters thereabout, which ſometime ſerved the famous City of Carthage, with whom the Moors, but eſpecially the Numidian Horſemen, a ſwift, ſubtle, and painful kind of Souldiers, oftentimes and in many places ſuddenly skirmiſhed; and though they were but naked men, yet taking all the advantages they could of the places to them well known, with their Arrows and Darts furiouſly aſſailed them unawares, and overloaded with Armor, ſparing no mans life that fell into their hands. Among whom was Hieronimus Spinula a Ligurian Captain, who overthrown by a Numidian Horſeman, had his Head cut off, and carried away by the ſame nimble Horſeman, before he could be reſcued. The like miſhap befel Fredericus Carectus a noble Gentleman, who going with Vaſtius to view the places thereabouts, was faſt by his ſide ſuddenly ſlain with a ſmall ſhot. All which nimbleneſs and fierceneſs of the Enemy, could not for all that ſtay the Emperor, but that he would needs with a ſmall Troop of Horſemen, in Perſon himſelf take view of the places thereabouts, even in the ſight of the Numidian Horſemen, which were in every place to be ſeen pricking up and down the Country in Troops; although he was many times requeſted by his grave Counſellors, to leave that Service for his inferior Captains, and not to expoſe himſelf to ſo great danger both of his Perſon and of the common ſafety. Vaſtius had now brought on the Army near unto the Caſtle of Guletta, ſtill caſting up a rolling Trench as he came nearer thereunto, thereby to keep his men out of the danger of the Enemies ſhot; which work was not done only by the Pioneers and Gally-Slaves, but by Souldiers of all ſorts; yea many of the Captains themſelves laid their hands to the Spade and Mattock; for why, the Emperor was there a continual Beholder, and chearful Commender of every mans labour and forwardneſs, and the buſie Enemy was ever ready to take the advantage, if any thing were by negligence omitted, oftentimes ſallying out even unto the very Trenches of the Chriſtians, there giving unto them proud words of defiance. When the Army was to be martialled, and every Commander to be appointed to the place of his Charge in this Siege of Guletta; the Count of Sarne (a man famous both for the honour of his houſe, and for the good Service he had lately done againſt the Turks at Corone) requeſted of Vaſtius the General, to have the charge of the Mount neareſt unto the Caſtle; which as it was a place of moſt danger, ſo was it alſo of greateſt honour. Whereat the old Spaniards (after the manner of their proud nature) much repined. Upon the top of this Mount, the Count ſet up his rich Tent in the eye of the Enemy, and there lay with the Italian Companies over whom he commanded. He had not there lien long, but Salec, one of the Turks famous Pirats, with certain Companies of the Garriſon-Souldiers, ſallied out of the Caſtle directly upon the Mount whereon the Count lay; and by making ſhew as if he would deſperately have aſſailed the ſame, raiſing a great Alarm againſt the Italians; yet ſo as after certain Vollies of Shot diſcharged on both ſides, he began to retire as if he had been thereto conſtrained. Which thing the Count perceiving, being a man of greater courage than direction, in great rage with bitter words reproved certain of the Captains, whom he perceived not ſo forward in purſuit of the Enemy as he would have had them; and in his fury ran down from the Mount, the reſt for ſhame following him, and overtaking the Enemies ſlew divers of them. The crafty Pirat now ſeeing the Count drawn out of his ſtrength into the plain ground, and perceiving himſelf ſtrong enough to encounter him, ſuddenly turning himſelf about, ſaid unto his Souldiers; The advantage you wiſhed to have of your Enemies is now offered, they are now in your danger; wherefore now ſhew your ſelves valiant men, and ſuffer not one of theſe proud freſh-water Souldiers to eſcape alive or unwounded. Which he had no ſooner ſaid, but they preſently made a ſtand, and ſo hardly charged them from whom they but even now ſeemed to fly, that the Italians not able longer to indure the fight, betook themſelves to flight. The Count himſelf with Belingerus his Kinſman, fighting valiantly in the foremoſt of his Companies, was ſlain; many others indured the ſame fortune; others flying back again to the Mount, were ſlain there by the Turks; who reſolutely entred into the Trenches with them ſo far, that they carried away with them the Plate and Riches of the Counts Tent. Neither was there any of the Spaniards which lay neareſt unto them, and might eaſily have reſcued them, that would once ſtir out of their places to help them; for it is reported, that they were nothing ſorry for the overthrow of the Italians, foraſmuch as the Count had ſo arrogantly craved of the General the moſt honourable place, which he ſo evil held. His head and right hand were cut off, and ſent by Salec to Barbaruſſa. This Overthrow much grieved the Italians, whom Vaſtius comforted with chearful Speeches; imputing all that loſs, neither to the valour of the Enemy, or cowardiſe of the Italians; but only to the raſhneſs of the Count, whom he ſaid worthily to have paid the price of his inconſiderate forwardneſs. But the Spaniards he ſharply reproved as mercileſs men, which upon ſo light an occaſion had given cauſe for the Italians to have them in diſtruſt. The Turks in the mean time by the often ſhooting off their great Ordnance, ſhewed the joy they conceived of this Victory.

Salec ſallieth out upon the Count and the Italians.

The Count ſlain, and his Head and right Hand ſent to Barbaruſſa.

It oftentimes ſo falleth out, that whilſt men laugh at their Neighbours harms, their own is not far off; and ſo it fell out with the Spaniards; for Tabacches another of the piratical Captains, ſhortly after ſallying ſuddenly out of the Caſtle in the dawning of the day, was got up to the top of the Trenches wherein the Spaniards lay, before they were aware of his coming, and there ſlew ſome as they lay aſleep, ſome idly ſitting fearing no harm, others, as they were arming themſelves; and with their ſudden Cry, cauſed the reſt which lay near unto that place, ſhamefully for fear to fly out of their Trenches; where the Turks taking ſuch traſh as they there found, and having ſlain and wounded many, amongſt whom was one Mendoſa a Captain, and carrying away with them the Enſign of Sarmentus which ſtood upon the top of the Trench, returned with Victory. The alarm raiſed in the Army was ſuch, as that the Emperor himſelf came running to the place in his Armor, ſeverely reproving them of cowardiſe, which had forſaken the place, and grievouſly offended with them which had kept ſuch negligent watch againſt ſuch an Enemy, as was not for wilineſs, agility, and courage, to be ſlightly regarded of the beſt and moſt expert Souldiers. This diſgrace of the Spaniards well comforted the Italians, to ſee the old Souldiers no leſs overtaken in their neglience, than they had been in their unadviſed forwardneſs.

This Tumult appeaſed, Vaſtius called into his Tent the Colonels and chief Captains of the Spaniards, and ſpake unto them in this manner:

Friends (ſaid he) elſewhere always valiant, who together with me, have by your invincible proweſs gained unto our Emperor many moſt glorious Victories; you ſeem unto me at this time to have need to be called upon, and to be put in remembrance of your wonted and approved valour; for as far as I can ſee, the remembrance of your ancient Fame, is in you grown altogether cold, your hands are become faint for fear; and that which I am ſorry and aſhamed to ſay, you are grown I know not how, altogether out of order, and heartleſs, ſhewing no courage for the ſubduing of theſe naked Pirats. Yeſterday (as many ſay) you ſmiled at the unskilful and unfortunate forwardneſs of your friends, which they bought dear; but to day they worthily laugh at your degenerate careleſs negligence; ſo that it concerneth you in Honour, to blot out this ſo foul and publick a diſgrace, by ſome notable and worthy Exploit. Wherefore I exhort you, and

and I ſtraightly charge and command you, that with all ſpeed you prepare both your minds and weapons for the atchievement of ſome new honour; ſo that if the proud Enemy ſhall again preſume to come forth and aſſail your Trenches, you ſhall forthwith break out upon him, and beat him back again even to the Gates of Guletta. Perhaps good fortune will ſo attend your valiant and reſolute purſuit, that you may together with their diſordered men, enter ſome of their Rampiers, wherein we ſee their whole hope conſiſteth; which if it ſhall otherwiſe fall out than is hoped for, yet ſhall you by this your notable devoir wonderfully content the Emperor your Soveraign, and me your General, and withal, cover your late diſhonour.

Whereunto they all anſwered, That they would ſo bear themſelves againſt the Enemy, as that he ſhould not deſire greater courage or contempt of danger in men deſirous of honour and commendation.

The Turks ſally again out of Guletta.

It was not long, but that the Turks incouraged with their former ſucceſs, after their wonted manner ſallied out again, conducted by Giaffer Captain of the Janizaries, a man of exceeding Courage and Strength of Body; who with the Janizaries and certain Companies of Mooriſh Archers, about the noon time of the day iſſuing out of the Caſtle, aſſailed the uttermoſt Trenches, hoping in that broiling heat to find the Chriſtians in their Stations negligent and unprepared; wherein he was nothing deceived; for the Spaniards that burning hot time of the day, kept ſuch negligent Watch, that Giaffer with his Janizaries and Archers, was got up to the top of the Rampiers, and there diſcharged their Shot and Arrows upon the Chriſtians in their Trenches, before they were well aware of his coming. But upon the ſtriking up of the Drum, certain Companies of Harquebuſiers brake out upon them in two places at one inſtant, as Vaſtius had before commanded; whom he ſeconded with a Company of Halbadiers, keeping in readineſs his Squadrons to reſcue his Harquebuſiers, if they ſhould be inforced by the Enemy to retire; and in that order expected the event of the skirmiſh, which was moſt valiantly maintained on both ſides. For the Janizaries, although they were inforced to give ground, yet (as men not uſed to flie, and ſtanding upon the honour of their order) withſtood the Chriſtians with no leſs reſolution than they were by them charged; until that Giaffer their Leader, deſperately fighting among the foremoſt of the Janizaries, was at once ſhot in with two Bullets, and ſlain; whoſe dead Body the Janizaries labouring to carry away, indured a moſt cruel Fight, many being on both ſides ſlain upon his dead Carkaſs; yet at length they were inforced to flie, and ſo fiercely followed by the Spaniards, that they of Guletta, when they had received in the foremoſt, ſhut out almoſt a fourth part of their own men, for fear the Chriſtians ſhould together with them have entred the Caſtle. Didacus Abila, one of the Spaniſh Enſign-bearers, advanced his Enſign upon the top of one of the Enemies Rampiers, and was there ſlain, but his Enſign ſaved by one of the Souldiers of the ſame Band. The Chriſtians received more loſs in their Retreat, than they had in all the Fight; for the Turks from their Rampiers then diſchaged their Shot as faſt as they could upon them, which they could not before do, without the like danger to their own men mingled amongſt them. This days work well abated the pride of the Turks, and gave good hope to the Chriſtians, that the Caſtle would without any great loſs be gained; for being near unto it, they perceived it not to be ſo ſtrong as they had ſuppoſed.

Giaffer Captain of the Janizaries ſlain.

The Emperor having ſpent a few days in conſultation about his farther proceeding, and preparing of things for the Siege, reſolved without further delay with all his Forces to aſſault the Caſtle, perſwaded thereunto by many reaſons; firſt, by the chearfulneſs of his own Souldiers, and the Courage of his Enemies ſore daunted in the laſt skirmiſh, which he was loath they ſhould again recover by the coming of new Supplies; beſides that, he was informed, that divers Companies of the Numidians were coming to Tunes, entertained by Barbaruſſa, whoſe ſtrength was like dayly to encreaſe; but that which moved him moſt to haſten the matter, was, for that his men began to grow ſickly in his Camp, being all the day time ſcorched as it were with the fervent heat of the Sun, and well near ſtarved in the night with cold and exceeding Dews wherewith they were commonly wet to the skin; neither was there either good Water, or freſh Victual by any means to be had in that ſandy and barren Soil, for the relief of the ſick, other than that was brought out of the Fleet; for all the Water thereabout was moſt unpleaſant and exceeding brackiſh, ſo that both ſick and whole were glad when they could get a Crab to quench their extream Thirſt; although the Emperor did what he might to remedy theſe extremities, and much relief was in good time ſent both from Sicilia and Naples; the Bisket alſo in the Ships, eſpecially in the Spaniſh Gallies, was grown hoary and unwholeſome. Wherefore he began to place his Battery about the fifteenth of July, which was defended all alongſt with Gabions, and Casks filled with Sand, for that the Country Soil in that place yielded neither Earth nor Turf to do it. Auria appointed to batter the Caſtle by ſea, divided his Gallies into three Squadrons which orderly ſucceeding one another, ſhould by turns beat the ſame: his great Ships rid at Anchor, and out of their Forcaſtles thundred with their great Ordnance. And Vaſtius at Land had divided the Army into three Battels; Spaniards, Italians, and Germans, every ſtation by themſelves, in ſuch ſort, as that they might indifferently be partakers both of the danger of the Aſſault, and of the glory of the Victory. There was never ſtrong place in the memory of man (ſince Guns, that fatal Engin were firſt invented for the deſtruction of mankind) aſſailed with greater force, greater preparation, or induſtry. The great Ordnance in manner of a great Earthquake, ſo terribly roared and thundred, that the Earth ſeemed not only to tremble and quake under mens Feet, but even by and by to rent in ſunder and ſwallow them up; and the Sea which was even now quiet and calm, began to riſe aloft, and to rage and fome as if it had been in a great Storm; at which time the Air became thick, and the Skie darkned with the ſmoke of the great Artillery; from the break of the day until Noon, the roaring Cannon and Culverin never ceaſed; ſo that the Vamures were beaten down, the Caſtle made aſſaultable, and the Walls ſo ſhaken, that in many places the Turks Cannoniers, together with their Cannon lay buried in the ruins thereof. Which thing perceived, they which were before appointed to give the firſt Aſſault, upon ſignal given by the Emperor, preſently upon the ceaſing of the great Artillery aſſailed the Breach, and others with their ſcaling Ladders ſcaled the Walls; which was done with ſuch Courage and reſolution, that the Turks when they had done what they poſſibly could for the defence of the place, by caſting down Darts, Wild-Fire, and ſuch like things upon the Chriſtians as they were climbing up; at length as men deſpairing longer to hold the the place, and overcome with a greater Fortune, turned their Backs and fled. Sinan and the reſt of the Captains by a wooden Bridge, fled out at the further ſide of the Caſtle, into the Main, and ſo alongſt the left ſide of the Lake by Land to Tunes, not looking behind them for haſte; which way moſt part of his men followed him alſo. The reſt were either ſlain or driven into the Lake, where ſeeking to ſave their lives by ſwiming, they were either ſlain in coming to Land, by the Spaniſh Horſemen, or elſe in their ſwiming ſhot at pleaſure by the Harquebuſiers, ſo that all the Lake was as it were covered with the dead bodies of the Turks and Moors. The Emperor with ſmall Shot thus gained the Caſtle of Guletta, with all the warlike Proviſion therein, and with it all Barbaruſſa his great Fleet and ſtrength at Sea, which he for the more ſafety had before put into the Lake; which as it was unto the Emperor a thing moſt pleaſant, ſo was it unto Barbaruſſa and his Pyrats the greateſt grief and loſs poſſible, having at once loſt all their power at Sea, which but a little before was no ſmall terror to all the Frontiers of the Chriſtian Countries and Iſlands in the Mediterranean.

Barbaruſſa rageth.

Barbaruſſa troubled and terrified with ſo great a loſs, with a ſtern and ſcornful Countenance received the Jew and the reſt of the Captains fled from Guletta, reviling them bitterly in his rage, and calling them faint-hearted Cowards, which had in ſo ſhort a time given over ſo ſtrong a place. Whereunto Sinan anſwered for them all, in this ſort:

The ſhort anſwer of Sinan the Jew unto Barbaruſſa.

Hairadin (ſaid he) ſo long as we were to fight with armed men, we did as thou well knoweſt, and our Enemies cannot deny, what well beſeemed us and thy magnificent Fortune. But when we are to withſtand the Divel and his infernal Furies, which came againſt us with Flames of Fire, and Earthquakes, things of extream terror and danger; it ought not to ſeem ſtrange unto thee, if we ſought to eſcape the uncouth Fury of the immortal Enemies of mankind, to do thee ſervice in thy better Fortune, in defence of this thy City and Kingdom. Neither do we account it any diſgrace to have eſcaped that danger, as men that mind again to fight; out of which thou, a moſt ancient and expert Commander (if I may frankly ſpeak unto thee the truth) if thou hadſt been there preſent, wouldſt have accounted it no diſhonour, but very good diſcretion to have eſcaped in ſafety.

Barbaruſſa repreſſing his fury, began in a more temperate manner to requeſt them every one particularly, as valiant and couragious men to ſtand faſt unto him in that War againſt their Enemies the Chriſtians; telling them, that he well hoped, that after the great ſupply of the Mooriſh Footmen and Numidian Horſemen were once come (which were now at hand) the Enemy ſhould not long rejoyce of the taking of Guletta. After that, he forthwith converted all his ſtudy and endeavour, to prepare ſuch things as were needful for the War, bringing forth his Treaſures, and bountifully beſtowing the ſame amongſt the Moors and Numidians, thereby to confirm the Friendſhip of ſuch as well affected him, and with his new bounty to win the hearts of ſuch as yet ſtood doubtful.

Muleaſſes cometh to the Emperor.

In the mean time Muleaſſes the exiled King, with a ſmall retinue of his Friends and Followers came from the fartheſt part of Numidia, into the Emperors Camp; the Emperor ſitting in a Royal Seat in the midſt of his Pavilion, whereunto Muleaſſes was admitted, with a Mitre upon his head, in a Garment of green and blew changeable Silk; he was of a tall and manly Stature, of Colour tawny, but ſo Squint-eyed, that he ſeemed ſpitefully to look upon them whom he beheld; whom after he had kiſſed the Emperors right hand, and had ſet himſelf down with his Legs gathered cloſe under him, upon a Carpet ſpred upon the bare ground, after the manner of his Country, he by an Interpreter ſpake unto the Emperor as followeth:

The Oration of Muleaſſes unto Charles the Emperor.

Thou art come in Arms into this Country, and art now almoſt Conqueror of the ſame (thrice mighty Emperor) provoked thereunto not by any deſert of mine, for that our different Religion ſo required; yet as I verily think, not without the appointment of the moſt high God, whom both thou and I do with like Devotion worſhip, to take revenge of the moſt perfidious and cruel Tyrant and Pyrat, the mortal Enemy of mankind; whom I foreſee as good as already vanquiſhed, now that Guletta is taken, and his Navy ſurpriſed. So that I hope he ſhall in ſhort time by thy revenging hand, at once receive the juſt Guerdon of all his former Villanies; which ſhall be ſo much the more to my comfort, for that I hope the Fruit of thy rare Felicity and glorious Victory will redound in great part to me, being reſtored by thee into my Fathers Kingdom; which I as a poor exiled Prince moſt humbly requeſt of thy Juſtice and Bounty. For it ſhall be unto thee a thing moſt honourable and profitable, if thou ſhalt receive into thy protection me, a King Royally deſcended of a moſt ancient Progeny, ſtrengthned with the great Allyance of the Numidians and Moors. Neither do I refuſe either to pay thee Tribute therefore, or to acknowledge my ſelf Vaſſal unto thee the Chriſtian Emperor. Of which my Fidelity there can be no greater aſſurance, than the thankful remembrance of ſo great a benefit received; which ſhall never remain unforgotten of me and my Poſterity, even for that eſpecially, that I deteſt and abhor the name of an unthankful man; and do well by experience find, how much my ſtate may be confirmed, and the minds of my People to me aſſured, by thy Garriſons ſo near at hand in Sicilia and Sardinia.

The Emperors anſwer to Muleaſſes.

Whereunto the Emperor anſwered, That he was come over into Africk to be revenged of the injuries which Barbaruſſa had many times done upon the Frontiers of his Dominions, and to root out the Pyrats, of all others moſt miſchievous; which his good purpoſe had by the goodneſs of Chriſt his Saviour taken ſo good effect, that he doubted not in ſhort time by the taking of Tunes to obtain a perfect Victory; which once gained, he would then kindly grant him all things which ſhould ſtand with the convenience of his Affairs, and the uſe of his Victory; ſo that he would not falſifie his Faith, which he might juſtly ſuſpect, if he repoſed not a ſpecial truſt, that the remembrance of ſuch a benefit would for ever remain in his heroical mind; and was further aſſured, that the ſame power which ſhould reſtore him his Kingdom of courteſie, could alſo take it from him again, if his unthankfulneſs ſhould ſo deſerve.

The behavior of Muleaſſes.

Muleaſſes in the preſence of the Emperor uſed ſuch a gravity and grace in his ſpeech and geſture, as well declared, that he had nothing forgotten his former eſtate; but towards the General and the other great Captains he uſed all manner of Courteſie, ſo that he rid up and down with them gallantly mounted, mannaging his Horſe, and charging and diſcharging his Launce with ſuch agility and skill, as ſhewed him to be a very good Horſeman, and of great activity. At other vacant times he would ſubtilly reaſon with learned men, after the manner of Averois, of the nature of things, of the Motion of Heaven, and Power of the Stars. By the Emperors commandment he had a Tent appointed for him, and honourable allowance for his Diet. Vaſtius and the reſt of the chief Commanders of the Army uſed him with all honour, and at ſuch time as he was deſirous to ſee the Camp, courteouſly brought him into all places of it, that he might himſelf ſee what Mounts they had in ſhort time caſt, what abundance there was of great Artillery, what ſtrong Watch and Ward was kept, what a number there was of brave and warlike Souldiers of divers Nations, differing much one from another in Language, Countenance and manner of Furniture; and further demanded, Whether that puiſſant Army which the Emperor had brought over to his great good, were in his Judgment ſufficient to ſubdue the Enemy? Where above all things Muleaſſes wondred at the number and order of the great Ordnance; and next unto that, at the wonderful plenty of things to be bought and ſold in the Market place, and at the modeſt quietneſs of the Souldiers in buying the ſame. Not long after, the expert Captains by diligent enquiry learned of him many things well ſerving for their better proceeding in that War, eſpecially of the diſpoſition and ſtrength of them of Tunes, of the ſituation of the City, of the nature of the Walls, and fortification of the Caſtle, of the Wells and Ciſterns in the Suburbs, and what Strength the Moors and Numidians were of, which Barbaruſſa had entertained. In concluſion, he aſſured them (as afterwards it fell out) that Barbaruſſa would never truſt to the ſtrength of the Walls, which would eaſily be overthrown with the great Artillery; but would in a great bravery with Enſigns diſplaied bring all his Forces into the Field, of purpoſe to terrifie the Chriſtians with the ſight of the multitude of his raſcal Souldiers, and to break their array with his Numidian Horſemen, who with hideous and terrible cries, after the manner of that Nation, would not fail to aſſail them; and yet for all that would never bring into the Battel his Turkiſh Footmen (in whom he repoſed his greateſt confidence, and whom he deſired moſt to ſpare) but would as a crafty and ſubtil Turk, by oppoſing of the Moors, whom he held in ſmall regard, trie by their blood what might be done without the danger of his own men. But as he told them, nothing could be more ſtrange unto the Moors his Countrymen, or that they were more afraid of, than in a ſet battel to fight with that Enemy, whoſe Squadrons coming orderly on in gliſtering Armor with long Pikes, might ſcorn and eaſily overthrow the naked Archers of the Moors, and the unarmed Numidian Horſemen; and that our men ſhould find nothing more grievous or troubleſome, than the ſcorching heat of the Sun, and the Thirſt riſing thereof; which might eaſily be remedied by plenty of Water, which by Slaves and ſmall Boats might eaſily be brought in Caſks and Bottels from the Fleet alongſt the Lake, and ſo diſtributed amongſt the Army; although not far from the Walls of the City were certain old conduit Heads which would yield them great Plenty of Water, if the malicious Enemy did not to his own hurt and others, poyſon the ſame. Theſe things orderly reported to the Emperor, confirmed the hope he had before conceived of the deſired Victory; ſo that wholly bent thereupon, and carefully forecaſting all things, he reſolved forthwith to depart from Guletta, and with all his power to beſiege Tunes.

His opinion and counſel concerning the preſent war.

But whilſt he was preparing things neceſſary, ordering his Souldiers, and diſcovering the Enemies purpoſes, his Souldiers had dayly divers skirmiſhes with the Numidians; ſo that once the skirmiſh was like to have come to a juſt Battel; which began in this ſort; The Moors had planted certain Field-Pieces amongſt the Olive-Gardens, wherewith they ſhot continually into the Camp; for removing whereof, the Emperor leaving the Italians, with certain Companies of the old German and Spaniſh Souldiers, for the keeping of his Camp and Trenches, went forth with his Horſemen and the reſt of his Army; ſending before him Montegius, General of the Spaniſh Horſemen, who for moſt part were but raw Souldiers, ſuch as were of the Noblemens ordinary Servants and Followers, not before acquainted with the Wars. Theſe light Horſemen with divers Fortune skirmiſhed a while with the Enemy; but when they ſaw themſelves to be hardly charged, and Montegius their General grievouſly wounded, they turned their Backs, and in the ſight of the Emperor ſhamefully fled to the Men at Arms, which were coming after them. The manner of the Enemies Fight was, to give at the firſt a fierce and deſperate Charge, and upon the encounter given, of purpoſe to retire, avoiding thereby the ſuddain force of their Enemies, and by and by to turn again upon them with a freſh charge. The Emperor ſeeing the Flight of his light Horſemen, came on couragiouſly with his Men at Arms; by whoſe coming in and valiant encounter the Turks and Moors were put to flight, and the Field-Pieces wherewith they had before annoyed the Camp, taken. In this Skirmiſh the Emperor in perſon, as he ſtood foremoſt in his armed Troops, gave the ſign of Battel himſelf, by crying with a loud voice, Saint James, Saint James, whom the Spaniards take for their Patron; and ſo charging the Enemy, performed the part not only of a couragious Chieftain, but of a reſolute and valiant Souldier alſo; reſcuing with his own hand Andreas Pontius a noble Gentleman of Granado, whom unhorſed and ſore wounded, the Enemy was ready preſently to have ſlain, had not the Emperor by his coming in ſaved him; deſerving thereby the Oken Garland, which the Romans by the name of Civica Corona, gave as an honour to ſuch as had in Battel ſaved a Citizen.

The Spaniſh light Horſemen put to flight.

The Emperor reſtoreth the Battel, and with his own hand reſcueth Andreas Pontius of Granado.

About the ſame time it fortuned, that thirty thouſand Moors came upon the ſuddain to have ſurpriſed a little Tower ſtanding upon a Hill near unto the ruins of old Carthage; wherein the Emperor had placed certain Souldiers for the keeping thereof, becauſe it was near unto his Camp. Before theſe Moors went a Numidian Prieſt, who bellowing out certain ſuperſtitious Charms, caſt divers Scrols of Paper on each ſide the way, wherein he curſed and banned the Chriſtians; and now they had with Fire and Smoke brought the Chriſtians in that Tower to great extremity, when the Emperor himſelf coming to their reſcue with certain Companies of Horſemen and Footmen, ſlew the conjuring Prieſt, with others, and put the reſt to flight. The diſcomfiture of the Spaniſh Horſemen cauſed many men to think, that if the Emperor ſhould come to a ſet Battel with the Enemy, he ſhould find his Horſemen too weak, both for that they were but few in number, and not to be compared with the Numidians. For which cauſe, and divers others, certain of the Emperors grave Counſellors, but none of the beſt Souldiers, wiſhed him not to proceed further in that dangerous War, but with ſpeed to return out of Africk, for as much as he had won honour enough by the taking of Geuletta, and the ſurpriſing of the Enemies Fleet; whereby he had to his immortal praiſe, and the common good of Chriſtendom, delivered all the Frontiers of the Chriſtian Countries in the Mediterranean, from the danger and fear of thoſe moſt cruel Pyrats; beſides that, the Flix began to rage in his Camp, whereof many of his Souldiers fell ſick and died dayly. Whereas on the contrary part, the mighty Numidian Princes, ſuch as were Muleaſſes old Enemies, were reported to come in dayly to the aid of Barbaruſſa. Theſe unſeaſonable Speeches the Emperor thought good to repreſs betime; reaſoning againſt the authors thereof with great gravity, as againſt men who with more fear doubted of the ſucceſs of things, and the event of the Victory, than beſeemed them, whom for their conſtant reſolution, and good opinion conceived of their diſcretion, he had choſen to be of his moſt ſecret Counſel.

The reſolute anſwer of the Emperor.

Saying, That he deſired not of them that their needleſs and diſhonourable labour, wherein they ſhould ſhew themſelves more careful of his perſon than of his honour; foraſmuch as thoſe things which they now alledged ſhould have been ſaid before the War was taken in hand, now by good hap half ended; before he ever paſſed over into Africk. For he might (as he ſaid) have reſted quietly in Spain, and have eaſily neglected and rejected the injuries done upon the Sea Coaſts, and the complaints of his Subjects; but he was (as they well knew) for moſt urgent cauſes come thither; whereas he was reſolved to ſatisfie the expectation of the world with a notable Victory; or if God ſhould otherwiſe appoint, there to end his days with honour. Wherefore he willed them to ceaſe further to flatter him that was no way diſmaid, or to poſſeſs the minds of his valiant Souldiers with a vain forboding fear, and with reſolute minds, together with him their Chieftain, againſt the next day to expect what the fortune of the Field ſhould appoint for the full accompliſhment of that War. For he was (as he ſaid) ſet down to give the Enemy Battel; or if he refuſed the ſame, to batter the Walls of Tunes, not doubting but that God would ſtand on his ſide in ſo good and ſo godly a quarrel.

The Emperor marcheth toward Tunes.

The Emperor leaving a ſufficient Garriſon in the Caſtle of Guletta, commanded the Breaches to be repaired, and the great Ordnance there taken to be laid upon Carriages, which before after the old rude Sea faſhion lay bound in great unweldy pieces of Timber, with Iron Rings faſtned thereunto, and could not handſomely be handled or removed to or fro. After that, when he had cauſed the Country to be viewed all about, which betwixt the Olive Groves and the right ſide of the Lake giveth a direct paſſage unto the City of Tunes; he ſet forward with his Army in ſo good order, that he ſtill marched as ready to fight, for fear of the Policies and ſuddain Aſſaults of the Enemy. On the left hand marched the Italians next unto the Lake; on the right hand the Spaniards near unto the Olive-Groves, which in the manner of a great Wood ran alongſt the Country, from the ruins of Carthage, almoſt to the Walls of Tunes; in the midſt betwixt both marched the Germans; next unto them followed the great Ordnance; and after it, the Carriages of all the Army. In the Vaungard was Vaſtius, whom the Emperor had made General of the Army, and eſpecially for that day; in the Rearward was the Duke of Alva with certain Troops of choſen Horſemen; in the middle of the main Battel was the Emperor, and by his ſide Lewis his Brother in Law the King of Portugals Brother. The Italians were conducted by the Prince of Salerne, the Spaniards by Alarco an ancient Captain, and the Germans by Maximilian Eberſtein. But the Emperor in his Armor ceaſed not to ride from Squadron to Squadron, with chearful countenance and full of hope, recounting unto them the former Victories which they had gotten for him; and telling them, that he did that day expect of them a moſt honourable days ſervice, foraſmuch as they were to fight againſt the naked Enemies of the Chriſtian Religion; wherefore they ſhould with reſolute minds ſet down themſelves to endure the Weight of their Armor, the painfulneſs of the March, the heat of the Sun and Sand, and the tedіouſneſs of the Thirſt ariſing thereof; until they might joyn Battel with their Enemies, where they ſhould undoubtedly by the goodneſs of God (in whoſe quarrel they fought) obtain the Victory; in the mean time they ſhould with patience overcome all difficulties, comforting themſelves with the undoubted hope of a moſt rich Prey, which they were to expect of the Spoil of a rich City. Whereunto every Squadron anſwered with a great ſhout, that he ſhould not trouble himſelf with thoſe matters which he had before rehearſed, but to aſſure himſelf, that they his Souldiers would moſt patiently endure all extremities, and not deceive the expectation he had conceived of their wonted valour, but by valiant Fight to make him Emperor, not of Africk but of Aſia alſo.

Now Vaſtius had withdrawn two Companies of Harquebuſiers out of the Spaniſh Squadron, to skirmiſh with the Moors who continually followed in the tail of the Army; whom, by thoſe Harquebuſiers and certain Troops of Horſemen deputed to that purpoſe, the Duke of Alva notably repulſed in the Rearward.

The Souldiers for greedineſs of water diſorder their march.

The Army was now come unto the Ciſterns of freſh Water, which Muleaſſes and others which well knew the Country, had before told them of, which as ſoon as the Souldiers almoſt fainting under the weight of their Armor, with the ſcorching heat of the Sun, and extremity of Thirſt, deſcried afar off; they for deſire they had to quench their Thirſt, forthwith forſook their Colours, and diſorderly ran as faſt as they could to thoſe Ciſterns; Vaſtius the General, to the uttermoſt of his power labouring in vain both by fair means and foul to have ſtaid them; who ſaw by that diſordredneſs of the Souldiers, a great advantage offred unto the Enemy, which then was not far off. But when the General could neither with words or blows prevail any thing with them, the Emperor himſelf was glad to haſt thither, with his Preſence and Authority to have kept them in order; yet ſuch was the force of their intollerable Thirſt, that neither the ſight of the Emperor, nor all that he could do, could remedy the diſorder; ſome fainting in the Sand for lack of Drink, and ſome other for greedineſs ready to burſt their Bellies at the Fountains; ſo that the Emperor was fain with his Truncheon to beat them away. Amongſt the reſt, one Sullius Cicero of Arpinas, a famous Captain, died at the Ciſtern ſide with drinking too much. This extremity for want of Water ſeemed juſtly to have hapned unto them, foraſmuch as Vaſtius the day before had by general Proclamation through the Camp, commanded that every Souldier ſhould carry with him a Bottle of Wine or Water at his Girdle; although he cauſed ſo much Water as he conveniently could, to be carried in great Caſks for the common relief of the Army, whereof the Germans had the greateſt part; ſome almoſt ready to give over for Thirſt, were glad to get a draught of cold Water of their Fellows which had it, for two Ducats.

A draught of water ſold for two Ducats.

Barbaruſſa in Field againſt the Emperor.

This diſorder being with as much ſpeed as was poſſible reformed, and the Army again brought into order, the Emperor held on his march towards the Enemy; for Barbaruſſa with a wonderful multitude of Horſemen and Footmen, and a number of Enſigns (the inſtruments of vain fear and fooliſh bravery) gallantly diſplaied after the manner of the Moors, was come about three miles from the City, and with certain Field-Pieces (as Muleaſſes had foretold) went about to have broken the Battel of the Chriſtians; which Pieces although they were oftentimes diſcharged, yet did they but little or no harm by reaſon of the unskilfulneſs of the Cannoniers. Vaſtius in like manner, and for like purpoſe had commanded the great Ordnance to be brought into the Front of the Battel; but perceiving what time and toil it required to have it done (for that it was drawn but by ſtrength of men, and the Wheels of the Carriages ſunk deep in the devouring Sand, and the Shot and Powder which the Mariners and Gally-Slaves carried altogether upon their Shoulders, came but ſoftly on) he ſuddainly changed his purpoſe, and told the Emperor, That he thought it not beſt to ſtay for the great Artillery in that chearfulneſs of his Army when every man deſired Battel, but to commit all to the Valour of his reſolute Men, and his own good Fortune, which ever favoured his noble attempts; leſt whilſt we ſtay (ſaid he) too long upon our great Ordnance (which do not always ſerve to great purpoſe in ſuddain Battels) our Enemies gather Courage in the time of this our unneceſſary delay; and this exceeding chearfulneſs of our Souldiers (the moſt ſure token of undoubted Victory) by deferring of time grow cold. Whereunto the Emperor, deſirous of Battel, and filled with good hope, joyfully anſwered; Vaſtius, if thou ſo think it good (which I alſo like well of) in Gods name give the ſignal. That ſhall I by and by do (ſaid he) but firſt it is reaſon that you which ſway and command a great part of the World, learn at this time to obey him, whom to his great charge and ſhame, you, laying aſide the Imperial Majeſty of your ſelf, have for this day made General and Commander of ſo mighty an Army; wherefore (ſaid Vaſtius) I will now uſe my Authority, and command you, ſith I may not ſo requeſt you, to depart from this place, and to get you into the midſt of the Battel near unto the Enſigns; leſt by ſome unlucky Shot, the whole eſtate of the Army be brought into extream peril by the danger of one mans life. Whereat the Emperor ſmiling, willed him to fear no ſuch thing; ſaying moreover, That never Emperor was yet ſlain with a Gun. For all that, he departed out of the place as he was commanded, and went into the middle of the Battel. Whereupon the ſignal of Battel was by the ſound of the Trumpet, and ſtriking up of the Drum, preſently given, and the Enemy (with more haſte than the extream heat of the day required) furiouſly charged by the Emperors Horſemen, who to avoid the danger of the great Artillery, made all the haſte they could to come to handy blows. In the foremoſt of theſe Horſemen was Ferdinand Gonzaga, a moſt valiant Nobleman, who then ſerved the Emperor without charge; he being ſomewhat before the reſt, at the firſt onſet ſlew with his Launce a great Captain of the Moors, and preſently with his Sword ſo troubled them that were next, that he opened a way for them that followed him, to break into the Enemies Battel. The Harquebuſiers alſo diſcharged ſo faſt upon the Enemy, that three hundred of them lay dead upon the ground before the joyning of the Battel; which the reſt of the Footmen ſeeing, forſook their great Ordnance and fled back to Barbaruſſa. Who long endured not the force or ſight of the Chriſtians; but grinding his Teeth for ſorrow and grief of mind, turned his Horſe, and with his Turks retired into Tunes. For now that his deſigns had in the beginning taken ſo evil ſucceſs, he thought it not beſt to adventure all in one Battel; knowing right well, that the Emperors Army could not long endure the inconveniences of the intollerable heat and want of many things, eſpecially of freſh Water; which fed him with hope, that he ſhould out of theſe his Enemies diſtreſſes pick ſome fit occaſion of advantage, if he could but a while defend the City of Tunes. The Numidians and Moors, who in great Troops and Companies had alwaies hovered about the Emperors Army, without doing any thing worth reporting, retired themſelves into the Suburbs, Gardens, and other places near unto the City.

Vaſtius commandeth the Emperor.

Barbaruſſa flieth to Tunes.

The Emperor glad of the flight of his Enemies, which were thought to have been in number an hundred thouſand, encamped with his Army that night in the ſame place where they before lay; determining the next day to batter the Walls of Tunes. In the mean time Barbaruſſa, ſurpriſed with an exceeding fear, and diſtracted with many cares, and now become more cruel than himſelf, had in his mind purpoſed a fact full of exceeding and inhuman Cruelty; which was at once to have killed all the Chriſtian Captives in the Caſtle of Tunes; fully reſolved to put the ſame in execution, had not Sinan the Jew diſſwaded him from that moſt execrable fact; proteſting ſuch a practiſe to be unſeemly for a man of his Valor, famous for his many Victories, and carrying with him the Majeſty of a King; whereas he would ſhortly after wonderfully repent him for doing ſo ſhameful a fact; the doing whereof, What was it elſe (as the Jew ſaid) but a manifeſt demonſtration of his extream fear and deſperation? which two things were moſt dangerous to him, that was to maintain ſo doubtful a War, and would much deface the glory of his former life; wherefore he ſhould do well to beware, that by the fame of ſuch a moſt horrible fact, he did not provoke Solymans heavy diſpleaſure againſt him; who devoid of all human Cruelty, had uſed both to deteſt and revenge ſuch outrages. Wherefore he ſhould ſuffer the Chriſtian Captives to live bound in their fatal Chains, ſo long as it were their Fortunes; who being well kept, and unarmed, might ſhortly after ſerve him to good purpoſe, and could no way without moſt certain danger move themſelves, if they ſhould unadviſedly luſt after their unlucky Liberty; for by them, the expected Victory could neither be given to the Enemy, nor taken from him, or yet ſo much as hindred. At which ſpeech the Tyrant was aſhamed, and ſo ſparing the lives of the poor Wretches, went out of the Caſtle, into the greateſt Church of Tunes, whither he had cauſed to aſſemble all the chief men of the City, to tell them what he would have done for the defence of the City, and now by perſwaſion to encourage them to fight; from whom, as men by him holden in diſtruſt, he had but a little before the coming of the Chriſtians, taken all manner of Armor and Weapons.

Barbaruſſa in mind to kill all the Chriſtian Captives, is diſſwaded by Sinan the Jew.

Whilſt Barbaruſſa was thus buſied, the moſt joyful and happy day appeared to thoſe miſerable Captives, by fortunes change no leſs black and diſmal to the Turks and Moors. For that hainous purpoſe of the cruel Tyrant could not long be covered or kept ſecret; ſo that a conſtant report of a danger ſo imminent, was run through the whole Caſtle, even into deep Dungeons; by the compaſſion of certain manumiſed Slaves, who deteſting the ſavage Cruelty of Barbaruſſa their Maſter, and touched with Devotion, had in Heart returned to their old and true Chriſtian Religion; incouraging by ſecret Speeches the chief of the Captives with whom they were acquainted, The Chriſtian Captives break priſon, and drive the Turks out of the Caſtle of Tunes.

to lay hand now upon their liberty. Amongſt theſe well minded Men was one Francis a Spaniard, whom Barbaruſſa had from his youth brought up as his Minion, having him always in great eſteem by the name of Memis; and another called Vincentius Catereus of Dalmatia an Eunuch. Theſe two adventuring a moſt memorable and godly attempt, ſet open the Priſon doors, and gave Inſtruments unto the poor Priſoners, ready to take the occaſion offered; who boldly ſtarting up, brake off their Chains and Gyves, and ſo by the great goodneſs and mercy of God, about ſix thouſand poor naked Chriſtians, armed with that came firſt in hand, but eſpecially with ſtones, brake forth ſuddainly upon the Turks that were in the Caſtle. Ramadas a renegate Spaniard Captain of the Caſtle, ſtirred up with unexpected and terrible noiſe of ſo many Priſoners breaking their Irons, with a few Souldiers whom he had ſuddainly called unto him, ran to the Caſtle Gate, where one of the Priſoners (a luſty young Man of Sicilia) had with one of the Bars of the Gate ſtruck down one or two of the Warders, and having bolted the Gate, was become Maſter thereof; him Ramadas ſlew, and opening the Gate, made way for himſelf and his few followers, with whom he went to Barbaruſſa, to carry him the news of that his hard miſchance. But the Chriſtians now looſed from their Bands, and having ſuddainly ſlain divers of the Turks, poſſeſſed themſelves of all the Caſtle, brake open the Armory, and ſo ſeiſing upon the Kings Treaſure, Armor, and Proviſion, from a high Turret gave ſigns of Victory to the Chriſtian Army by ſmoke and falſe fires made with Gunpowder; and laſtly by diſplaying of Sarmentus his Enſign, which (as we have before declared) was by Tabacches taken from the top of the Trenches at the Siege of Guletta. Theſe ſigns although the Chriſtians in the Army could not well perceive, as being too far off; yet by the Fugitives which came oftentimes out of Tunes to the Emperor and Muleaſſes, they were both perſwaded, that ſome great Tumult was riſen amongſt the Enemies. Wherefore the Emperor ſent two of his Captains with their Companies, who going as near as they could to the City and the Caſtle, ſhould diſcover what the matter was, In the mean time, Barbaruſſa almoſt mad for anger, in his fury blaſpheming his vain Gods, and bitterly curſing and banning the Jew, for diſſwading him from killing the Captives, came to the Caſtle Gate, with tears ſtanding in his Eies pitifully requeſting the late Chriſtian Captives (which then ſtood upon the top of the Walls and the Gate, with Weapons in their hands) that they would forthwith let him in, faithfully promiſing them their liberty, with a general and free Pardon for all that they had done. But they mindful both of their former and preſent Fortune, and moved with juſt hatred, caſt ſtones at him, and with many opprobrious words rejected his requeſt; ſo that he inraged with ſorrow and madneſs, ſhot at them with his own hand, and ſeeing all paſt remedy, and the City not poſſible now to be kept, ſhamefully betook himſelf to flight. After him followed the Turks, in number ſeven thouſand, with purpoſe to flie to the City Hippona, now called Bona, famous for the Biſhoprick of that reverend Father and great Divine Auguſtine. For there (as in a moſt ſure Harbour) had Barbaruſſa left fourteen Gallies in the Lake near unto the City, to ſerve his turn whatſoever miſchance ſhould happen; but the Tackling, Sails, Oars, and Ordnance, he had laid up in the Caſtle faſt by, which were kept with a Garriſon of his own.

Tunes yielded to the Emperor.

The Emperor underſtanding that Barbaruſſa with his Turks was fled, came with all his Army unto the Gates of Tunes, where the Magiſtrates of the City were ready to ſubmit themſelves unto him, and to deliver him the Keys of the City; only requeſting of him, that he would keep his Souldiers incamped without the City, and not to ſeek the utter ſpoil and ruin thereof; promiſing, that the Souldiers ſhould want nothing that was there to be had. Muleaſſes alſo careful of the ſafety thereof, earneſtly intreated the Emperor in the Citizens behalf. But he, although he was of his own honourable diſpoſition ready enough to have granted what they requeſted; yet for that he did, not without cauſe, doubt of the Moors Fidelity, and that the payment of the Mony which they of Tunes had by Muleaſſes promiſed for the payment of the Souldiers wages, was by them craftily delaied, expecting ſtill the uttermoſt devoir of Barbaruſſa, he could not by any means be perſwaded to promiſe them any certainty of their ſafety; moved alſo ſo to do by the diſcontented Speeches of his Souldiers, who ſpared not to ſay, That they ſhould be hardly and unkindly dealt withal, if after ſo long travel and ſo much pains taken both by Sea and Land, they ſhould be defrauded of the reward of the Victory, ſith nothing but only the hope of the preſent ſpoil did relieve and feed them, being poor and miſerable, having ſcarce Clothes to cover their nakedneſs, and their Bodies ſpent with long labour and thirſt; ſo that the Moors of Tunes, Enemies of the Chriſtian Religion, and the perpetual receivers of moſt horrible Pyrats, might worthily rejoyce of the Chriſtian Victory; and the Conquerors themſelves for ever bewail their own calamities and miſeries. Whilſt the Emperor ſtood thus in doubt what to reſolve upon, Vaſtius with a ſmall Company came to the Caſtle Gate, and was with wonderful joy received by the Chriſtian Captives. But as he was viewing the Wealth and Proviſion laid up in the Caſtle, a Ligurian Captain diſcovered unto him where certain Treaſure lay hid; for Barbaruſſa had there caſt into a Well thirty thouſand Ducats ſowed up in Bags, which Vaſtius getting eaſily out, obtained them of the Emperor of Gift, as he whoſe good ſervice had well deſerved them. The Caſtle thus won by a moſt rare chance, and the Captives taking the ſpoil thereof, the Souldiers could no longer be ſtayed, but that they entred into the City by heaps, running after the ſpoil into every part thereof; the Citizens fearing no ſuch matter, and calling in vain upon the faith of Muleaſſes; the old Souldiers at the firſt entrance ſlew many. The Spaniards and the Italians ſought moſt after the ſpoil; but the Germans deſiring more to glut themſelves with the Mahometan Blood, filled all places with dead Bodies, without regard of Sex or Age, ſo that the prophane Temples of their vain Prophet, ſwam with the Blood of them that were fled into them. Which furious execution continued until ſuch time as the Emperor moved with the pitiful requeſt of Muleaſſes, cauſed proclamation to be made, That no Man ſhould upon pain of Death hurt any Citizen, or take any Priſoners; yet for all that, it could not otherwiſe be, but that many young Men and Women were by the Mariners (which were come to the ſpoil of the City) carried away to the Fleet.

Muleaſſes for a little Mony redeemed divers which he knew, out of the hands of ſuch as had them Priſoners; amongſt others, one of his Wives, whom he ſometime held deareſt, was ranſomed for two Ducats. The Emperor entring into the Caſtle, commended the Captives, who were the occaſion of that ſpeedy Victory; and giving to every one of them Mony, ſet them at liberty, promiſing unto them Shipping and Proviſion to bring them home every Man into his own Country. Unto the two manumiſed Servants of Barbaruſſa, which were the Authors of breaking the Priſon, he gave Mony and Apparel, and afterwards learned of them many things concerning Barbaruſſa his purpoſes, and ſecret diſpoſition. In the ſpoil of the Caſtle, Muleaſſes lamented the loſs of three things eſpecially; firſt, the ancient Arabian Books containing the interpretation of the Mahometan Law, and the Acts of the Kings his Predeceſſors; the loſs whereof, Muleaſſes (in the hearing of P. Jovius, out of whom this Hiſtory is taken) ſaid (as he reporteth) that he would moſt gladly, if it had been poſſible, have redeemed with the price of a City: Then the precious Ointments and Perfumes, with the wonderful ſtore of Ambergrize, Muſk, and Civet, worth much Gold; all which, Barbaruſſa as a rude and rough Man had made no reckoning of. And laſt of all, the rare and rich Colours for Painting, which lying by heaps, were by the ignorant Souldiers, ſeeking for that might yield them preſent Mony, fooliſhly neglected and troden underfoot, ſerving no Man to good. In this Caſtle were found divers Head-pieces and other Armor of the Chriſtians, namely of the French, who with Lewis their King, had about three Hundred years before beſieged that Caſtle; which Armor had been until that time there kept by the Moors in remembrance of that Victory againſt the Chriſtians.

Barbaruſſa flieth to Hippona, and there comforteth his Souldiers.

Auria ſendeth certain Gallies to intercept Barbaruſſa.

Barbaruſſa eſcapeth to Algiers.

Barbaruſſa in the mean time was come to the River of Bagrada, which the Moors call Maiordech, which he eaſily paſſed over, though he was purſued by certain Numidian Horſemen, whom Muleaſſes had raiſed of his old Friends, and of the Followers of his Uncle Dorax, and ſent them to purſue the Turks; but Barbaruſſa ſo marched with his Harquebuſiers and Archers placed in the rereward, that the Numidian Horſemen durſt not come near him, and ſo in ſafety came to Hippona, as he had before purpoſed. Yet in paſſing the River Bagrada, he loſt Haydin of Smirna, that famous Pyrat; who being a fat Man, and wearied with the heat of the Sun and painfulneſs of the Journey, drank ſo much, that he died preſently upon the bank of the River. When Barbaruſſa was come to Hippona, he reſted his Men two days; then calling them together again, he comforted them with good words; perſwading them, that whatſoever miſchance had happned, they ſhould impute it not to the valour of the Enemy, but to the treachery of the Slaves; exhorting them, as valiant Men patiently to endure that frown of Fortune, and by ſome notable exploit to win again her Favour; for he was again determined to put to Sea with the Fleet he had, and to go preſently from thence to Algiers, where after he had with new Supplies encreaſed his Power, and augmented his Fleet, and better adviſed himſelf, he would take an attempt in hand anſwerable to their deſires, and not unbeſeeming his own credit and eſtimation. It is reported, that never vanquiſhed and beaten Captain was with a more chearful acclamation anſwered by his Souldiers, than he was at that preſent; they all with one conſent moſt willingly requeſting him to command whatſoever pleaſed him, which they would never refuſe to undertake, were it never ſo heavy or dangerous, ſo that they might be brought to ſome notable exploit. Barbaruſſa uſing this exceeding chearfulneſs and forwardneſs of his Souldiers, did with wonderful celerity weigh up the fourteen Gallies which he had ſunk in the Lake, and forthwith rigged them up, and furniſhed them for all aſſaies; and upon the very brink of the Lake caſt up a Mount of earth, whereon he placed certain pieces of Artillery for defence of the Harbour, not vainly conjecturing, that the Chriſtian Fleet would in ſhort time come thither to impeach his going out; pointing therein as it were at the purpoſe of the Emperor and Auria his Admiral, who were of opinion, that by ſending part of the Fleet thither, thoſe Gallies might be drown'd in the Harbour with the great Ordnance, before they could be rigged and made ready. Unto this piece of ſervice Auria appointed one Adam, a Captain of Genoa, a Man of no great ſkill in matters at Sea, but yet of great wealth and credit, and the Admirals nigh Kinſman; he with certain Galliots and fourteen Gallies, ſet forward towards Hippona, promiſing unto himſelf a moſt certain and eaſie Victory, hoping to purchaſe unto himſelf great Honour of the unprovided Enemy; for that he thought to have taken Barbaruſſa buſie in ſetting forth of his Fleet. But after he was paſt Biſerta, and come near to Hippona, he was certainly advertiſed, that Barbaruſſa had with incredible celerity rigged up his Gallies, and fortified the Harbour, by planting great Ordnance upon the Mount he had there raiſed. With which news he wonderfully troubled, changed his purpoſe, perſwaded by the other Captains of the Gallies, in no caſe to adventure to fight with him, becauſe the Spaniſh, Sicilian, and Neapolitan Gallies were but weakly manned, many of the Souldiers being for greedineſs of the Spoil gone aſhore without leave at Tunes; ſo that he ſhould at great diſadvantage fight with the Turks, being more in number and deſperately bent. Wherefore he upon good advice preſently changed his former courſe, and returned to the Fleet for more Aid. Barbaruſſa (as it was afterwards known) ſtood a good while in doubt, whether he ſhould in hope of Victory purſue thoſe Gallies, foraſmuch as they were in number no more than his own, or elſe to perſiſt in his former purpoſe of going to Algiers. Unto which opinion all the under Captains inclined, being altogether ignorant of the weakneſs of the Chriſtians; and ſo letting ſlip a fair occaſion, leaving a ſmall Garriſon of Turks in the Caſtle, he departed from Hippona and ſailed alongſt the Coaſt to Algiers. When Adam was returned again to the Fleet, and had done nothing, many of the Chriſtian Princes were wonderfully offended, that by the negligence of ſome who were hardly to be commanded, and by the unrulineſs of others who without leave were gone aſhore, ſo fair an occaſion of the deſired Victory, was neglected. For this thing only wanted unto the Emperors rare felicity in that War; for if thoſe few Gallies had been taken from the cruel Enemy, or ſunk in the Sea, there had been no means for him to have eſcaped; being verily thought, that the Numidians in number infinite, and deadly Enemies unto the Turks, would with often Skirmiſhes out of their known places of advantage, have ſo cut him off in his long and painful travel by Land, that they would altogether have made an end both of him and his followers before he could have come to Algiers. Auria angry both with himſelf and thoſe whom he had put in truſt, and yet not out of hope to overtake his Enemy, with his own Gallies and ſome other of the beſt Ships went to Hippona; but finding Barbaruſſa gone, he took the City, and overthrew the Walls thereof; but in the Caſtle which he by force took from the Turks, he placed Alvarus Gometius with a ſufficient Garriſon, and ſo returned unto the Emperor. This Gometius, although he was a moſt valiant Captain, yet became ſo infamous for his avaritious dealing both with the Enemy and his Friends, that for fear how to anſwer ſuch things as he knew would be laid to his charge, he became the infamous Executioner of himſelf. The Caſtle was afterwards by the commandment of the Emperor, raſed down to the ground, for that it was not without a marvelous charge to be kept. After that, a Counſel was holden concerning Muleaſſes, whom the Emperor placed again in the Kingdom of Tunes, there to Reign as his Anceſtors had done before him; paying him yearly by the name of Tribute, two Faulcons, and two Numidian Courſers; with condition, that he ſhould for ever honour the Emperor, and be a Friend unto all Chriſtians, and an utter Enemy unto the Turks. Beſides that, That he ſhould from time to time defray the charges of a thouſand Spaniards and more, to be left in Garriſon in the Caſtle of Guletta; by holding whereof, the Emperor kept as it were the Keys of that Kingdom at his Girdle. The Emperor having thus honourably driven Barbaruſſa and the Turks Pyrats out of Tunes, taken from their them Gallies, delivered the Chriſtian Countries (all along the Sea Coaſt into the Mediterranean) of a great fear, and reſtored Muleaſſes again to his Kingdom, ſailed into Sicilia, where he was in great Triumph received at Panormus and Meſſina, from whence he paſſed over to Rhegium in Italy, and from thence by Land to Naples. Thus was the Kingdom of Tunes taken by Barbaruſſa and the Turks; and by Charles the Emperor recovered again out of their hands the ſelf-ſame time that Solyman was in Perſon himſelf in Wars againſt the Perſian; whom Barbaruſſa accompanied with Sinan the Jew, after this overthrow met at Iconium in his return out of Perſia, well accepting of their excuſe, as is before declared.

1537. Solyman as well of his own ambitious diſpoſition, as following the manner of the Othoman Kings, deſirous by all means to encreaſe the glory of his Name, and to enlarge his Empire, determined with himſelf to take away from the Portugals all their Traffick into the Eaſt Indies. It grieved him to hear, that the Chriſtian Religion ſhould begin to take root amongſt thoſe Pagan Kings, which had not long before received the Mahometan Religion; Beſides that, he was credibly enformed, that the Portugals in theſe late Wars he had againſt the Perſians, had aided them with certain Harquebuſiers, and alſo had ſent them Work-men to ſhew them both the making and uſe of great Artillery. But that which moved him moſt of all, was for that the Portugals by their Traffick into the Indies, had cut off all the Trade of Merchandiſe into the Gulf of Arabia, whereby the Riches of the Eaſt were wont to be tranſported unto Caire, and ſo to Alexandria, from whence they were afterwards by the Venetian Merchants and others diſperſed into all parts of Europe; but now were carried by the great Ocean into Portugal, and from thence conveied into all parts of Chriſtendom, to the great hindrance of his Tributes and Cuſtoms of Egypt. For theſe cauſes, and at the inſtance of Solyman Baſſa an Eunuch, born in Epirus, and then Governour of Epgypt; Solyman cauſed wonderful preparation to be made, for the building of a great Fleet in the Red Sea, to go againſt the Portugals. All the Timber whereof was cut down in the Mountains of Cilicia, and Shipped in the Bay of Attalia in the bottom of the Mediterranean, from whence it was by Sea tranſported to Peluſium, and ſo up the River of Nilus to Caire; where after it was framed and ready to be ſet together, it was with infinite labour, and no leſs charge, carried by Land with Camels through that hot and ſandy Country, from Caire to Suetia, a Port of the Red Sea, called in ancient time Arſinoe. From which place eighty miles diſtant from Caire, the ancient Kings of Egypt, ſeeking by vain and wonderful works to eterniſe the memory of themſelves, had with incredible charge cut through all that main Land; ſo that Veſſels of good burthen might come up the ſame from Arſinoe to Caire; which great Cut or Ditch, Seſoſtris the rich King of Egypt, and long after him Ptolomeus Philadelphus, purpoſed to have made a great deal wider and deeper, and thereby to have let the Red Sea into the Mediterranean, for the readier tranſportation of the Indian Merchandiſe to Caire and Alexandria. Which mad work, Seſoſtris prevented by death could not perform; and Ptolomeus otherwiſe perſwaded by skilful Men, in time gave over for fear leaſt by letting in the great South Sea into the Mediterranean, he ſhould thereby as it were with another general Deluge have drowned the greateſt part of Græcia, and many other goodly Countries in Aſia, and with exceeding charge, in ſtead of Honour, have purchaſed himſelf eternal Infamy. Yet by the ſingular induſtry of Solyman the Eunuch, who with ſevere commandent enforced all the people of the Countries thereabouts to the furtherance of the building of that Fleet; he had with wonderful celerity in ſhort time new built eighty tall Ships and Gallies at Arſinoe, and furniſhed them with Men, and all things elſe needful for ſo long a Voyage. At which time, he upon a quarrel pickt without cauſe, but not without the good liking of Solyman, moſt injuriouſly confiſcated the Goods of the Venetian Merchants at Alexandria and Caire, and thruſt the Mariners into his Gallies as Slaves. With which Fleet in moſt Warlike manner appointed, Solyman the Baſſa, accompanied with Aſſan-Beg, commonly called the Moor of Alexandria, a moſt famous Pyrat and an excellent Sea-man, ſet forward againſt the Portugals; and ſailing through the Red Sea, and ſo Eaſtward by the Gulf of Perſia, came at length as far as the great River Indus; where with all his power he Aſſaulted Dium a Caſtle of the Portugals, ſituate upon the mouth of that great River; but in concluſion, after he had many days beſieged the Caſtle both by Sea and Land, and tried the uttermoſt of his ſtrength, he was ſo repulſed by the Portugals, that he was glad to forſake the Siege, and leaving his great Ordnance behind him for haſt, returned back again to Aden, a City of great Trade in Arabia Fœlix; where diſcouraged with the evil ſucceſs he had againſt the Portugals, becauſe he would be thought to have done ſomething, he allured the King of that rich City to come unto him, upon his falſe Faith before given for his ſafe return; but as ſoon as he had him aboard, he like a perjured wretch hanged him up at the Yards-arm of his Admirals Galley, and ſo ſurpriſing the City, enriched himſelf with the ſpoil thereof. The like barbarous cruelty he uſed at Zibyth, another famous Port of Arabia, where the Pilgrims of the Eaſt do commonly Land when they after the manner of their ſuperſtition come to viſit the Temple of their falſe Prophet at Mecha; the King of which place together with all his Nobility he cruelly murthered, contrary to his Faith given; and ſo travelling himſelf by Land to Mecha, as if he had been ſome devout Pilgrim, ſent back his Fleet by the Moor to Suetia, having performed againſt the Portugals nothing at all.

The treacherous dealing of Solyman the Eunuch Baſſa with the Kings of Arabia.

At the ſame time Solyman by the perſwaſion of Lutzis and Aiax (the Baſſaes of greateſt authority about him, now that Abraham was dead) turned all his Forces from the Perſians, as Men agreeing with him in the chief points of his Mahometan Superſtition, with purpoſe to convert the ſame upon Italy; whereunto he was earneſtly ſolicited by John Forreſt the French Kings Embaſſador, then lying at Conſtantinople of purpoſe to incite Solyman againſt Charles the Emperor, aſſuring him that he was not of ſuch power, as at one time to defend Apulia againſt him, and the Dukedom of Millain againſt the French King, who (as he ſaid) was determined that Summer to invade that part of Italy. And to further the matter, about the ſame time one Troilus Pignatellus, a noble Gentleman, ſometime Commander in Charles the Emperors Army, but then exiled out of Naples, fled unto Solyman; and forſomuch as he was a Man of name, and like to do him great ſervice in the invaſion of Apulia, as one which knew the Country well and promiſed unto him good ſucceſs in that War, was by Solyman honourably entertained amongſt his Mutfaracas; which is a certain Company of Horſemen for their approved Valour, choſen out of all Nations; having the free exerciſe of their Religion whatſoever without controulment, and are only bound to attend upon the Perſon of the great Turk when he goeth to Wars. The cauſe of his revolt was, for that the Viceroy of Naples had executed Andrew his Brother, one of the Knights of the Rhodes. But being now grown into great favour with Solyman and the Baſſaes, and oftentimes called to counſel in the preparation of that War, caſting off all natural love of his Country, ceaſed not by all means to perſwade Solyman to invade the ſame; aſſuring him, that the People of Apulia and Salerne, oppreſſed with grievous Tribute and Exactions by the Emperors Officers, would at the firſt revolt, eſpecially if they ſaw any of the French Nation to cleave unto. And that which moved him more than all the reſt, the ancient Turks told him into what a fear all Italy was ſtrucken, at ſuch time as Achmetes the Baſſa having taken Hydruntum, had undoubtedly conquered not only the Kingdom of Naples, but the City of Rome alſo, and all the reſt of Italy, had not the untimely death of Mahomet his great Grandfather interrupted the courſe of that Victory. Which perſwaſions wrought ſuch effect in Solyman, that he, once fully reſolved for the Invaſion of Italy, made ſuch expedition both by Sea and Land, that he himſelf in Perſon was come with two hundred thouſand Men unto Aulona, the moſt convenient Port of Macedon for the tranſporting of his Army, before it was thought in Italy that he was ſet forward from Conſtantinople; where he had not long ſtaied, but Lutzis Baſſa his Admiral, accompanied with Barbaruſſa, ſailing alongſt the Coaſt of Peloponneſus and Epirus, and ſo paſſing by Corcyra, where Hieronimus Piſaurius, Admiral of the Venetian Fleet lay with his Gallies (after mutual ſalutation done after the manner at Sea, by ſhooting off their great Pieces in token of friendſhip) put into the Haven of Aulona alſo. Solyman not purpoſing to loſe any time, and having Italy now in his ſight, commanded Lutzis and Barbaruſſa to paſs over with the Fleet unto Otranto, and to prove the minds of the people; that if the firſt enterpriſe fell out well, he might preſently follow after with all his Army. With them went alſo Troilus Pignatellus, as forward to the deſtruction of his Country, as any of the reſt. He knowing that the great Cities of Hydruntum and Brunduſium were kept with ſtrong Garriſons of Charles the Emperor; leaving Hydruntum on the right hand, directed the Turks to a Town upon the Sea Coaſt, eight miles off, called Caſtrum, near unto which ſtandeth a Caſtle upon a Hill then belonging to Mercurinus Catinarius; who being a Man unacquainted with Wars, and terrified with the ſuddain coming of the Turks, and perſwaded by Troilus, yielded up his Caſtle, upon condition, that the Turks ſhould offer no violence or injury unto him or his, either in body or goods. Upon which condition the Town of Caſtrum was alſo delivered unto them. But the Turks, eſpecially the greedy Mariners, being got into the Caſtle and the Town, moved neither with the intreaty of Troilus, nor the commandment of Lutzis and Barbaruſſa, rifled the Town and Caſtle, and carried away with them Mercurinus himſelf, with all the flour of the people, to their Gallies as Priſoners. But Lutzis aſhamed of ſuch faithleſs dealing, preſently ſet Mercurinus at liberty again. At the ſame time alſo, Solyman had by night ſent over certain Troops of light Horſemen, in great Palenders; which running all alongſt the Sea Coaſt from Tarentum to Brunduſium, carried away with them both the People and Cattel, and whatſoever elſe came in their way by the ſpace of forty miles. So that all the Country of Salentinum, now called Otranto, was filled with fear and danger; and had not there ſtayed, but was like enough to have overwhelmed all Italy, by the coming over of Solyman with his whole Army, had not the raſhneſs of one Venetian Captain by unexpected chance turned that Tempeſt from the Italians upon the Venetians themſelves.

Alexander Contarenus, a valiant Captain of the Venetians, meeting with certain of the Turks Gallies, which would neither vail their top Sails, nor in token of reverence and friendſhip, diſcharge any of their great Ordnance, as of duty they ought to have done in thoſe Seas where the Venetians commanded; offended with their proud inſolency, fiercely aſſailed them, and in fight ſunk two of them; wherein Uſtamenes Governour of Calipolis, a Man of no ſmall reputation among the Turks, was reported to have periſhed. Which outrage done by Contarenus in a moſt unfit time (to the great hurt of the Venetian Eſtate, as it appeared afterward) was imputed to his own private grudge which he bare againſt the Turks, for that they intercepted a Ship of his as ſhe was coming out of the Eaſt Countries laden with rich Merchandiſe; ſo that it was thought, that he to pleaſe himſelf in revenging of his own private injury, regarded not what in that dangerous time might enſue thereof to the common State.

A little before the coming over of the Turks into Italy, Andreas Auria the Emperors Admiral lying at Meſſina in Sicilia, underſtanding that Solyman was come with his Army to Aulona, and that his Fleet was arrived there alſo, put to Sea, directing his courſe towards the Iſlands of Cephalenia and Zacynthus, hoping (indeed as it fell out) to meet with the tail of the Turks Fleet; for there according to his expectation he chanced upon divers of the Turks Victuallers, whom he eaſily took. The Mariners he chained in his own Gallies for Slaves, and furniſhing his Fleet with the Victual which was not for him provided, fired the Ships. Whilſt Auria was thus beating too and fro in the Ionian Sea, it fortuned that Solyman ſent Junusbeius his chief Interpreter, a Man whom he made no ſmall account of, with two Gallies on a Meſſage to Lutzis his Admiral. This proud Turk coming near unto Corcyra, where the Venetian Admiral lay with with his Fleet, offered ſcornfully to paſs without vailing; which his pride tending to the diſgrace of the Venetians, certain of the Venetian Captains not enduring, ſet upon him with ſuch fury, that the Turks were enforced to run both their Gallies on ſhore upon the Coaſt of Epirus, near unto the Mountains called Acroceraunij, where having eſcaped the danger at Sea, they fell almoſt all into the hands of the cruel Mountain pleople, living for the moſt part by Theft, and waiting for Wrecks, as Hawks for their prey; by theſe ſhavers the Turks were ſtript of all they had, and Junusbeius with much ado redeeming himſelf out of their hands, returned to Solyman. Auria ſailing alongſt the Sea Coaſt, chanced upon theſe Gallies, and finding them ſore bruſed, ſet fire on them.

For theſe unkind parts, the Turks were wonderfully offended with the Venetians, and grievouſly complained of them to Solyman; although the Venetian Admiral laboured by all means he could to appeaſe Junusbeius, and to excuſe the matter, as a thing done by great overſight on both ſides. Upon theſe ſmall occaſions, the Turks ſought to break off the League with the Venetians; which fell out ſo much the ſooner, for that about the ſame time Auria ſailing up and down the Ionian Sea, and diligently looking into every Habour to intercept ſuch as ſtragled from the Turks Fleet, hapned by night to light upon twelve of Solymans great Gallies near unto Corcyra, all filled with his Janizaries and choice Horſemen of the Court, the beſt Souldiers of the Turks, who had by Land ſent their Horſes to the Camp by their Lackies, and were coming themſelves with the Janizaries by Sea. Auria falling upon theſe Gallies, had with them a cruel and deadly Fight; for they as reſolute Men, wiſhing rather to die than to yield to their Enemies, with invincible courage maintained a moſt bloody Fight againſt Auria with his thirty Gallies excellently appointed, until ſuch time as moſt part of them were ſlain, and the reſt ſore wounded; who ſeeing no remedy, but that they muſt needs come into the hands of their Enemies, threw their Scimiters overboord, becauſe thoſe choice Weapons ſhould not come into the hands of the Chriſtians. In this conflict, Auria loſt alſo many of his beſt Souldiers; yet having got the Victory, and poſſeſſed of the Gallies, he anchored near unto Corcyra, there to take view of his own harms and the Enemies; but whilſt he rid there at Anchor, he was advertiſed, that Barbaruſſa was coming againſt him with eighty Gallies. Wherefore knowing himſelf too weak to encounter ſo ſtrong an Enemy, he departed thence, and returned again to Meſſina to repair his Fleet. Solyman thorowly chafed with the loſs of his Gallies and beſt Souldiers, and with the double injury done unto him by the Venetians, fell into ſuch a rage, that he curſed Barbaruſſa, as one who in theſe Wars had done him no good ſervice; and thundred out grievous threats againſt the Venetians, ſaying, He was under the colour of an ancient League, by them deceived and greatly abuſed, and that they were ſecretly confederated with Charles his Enemy, and had for that cauſe (as they had always) holpen Auria with intelligence, and all things neceſſary, receiving him into their Harbours, and by their Eſpials giving him knowledge of the order of his Fleet, that ſo he might at his own advantage ſurpriſe his Gallies, as he had already done. Unto which fire, Junusbeius his Interpreter, Barbaruſſa, and Aiax, laid new Coals, more and more incenſing the Tyrant, who was of himſelf ſufficiently inflamed; perſwading him by all means they could, to break the League with the Venetians. Wherein Junusbeius ſought to revenge his own private injuries; and the other two after their great profit and credit, gaping after the Spoil of the Iſlands near hand, eſpecially of Corcyra (now called Corfu) Zacynthus, and Cephalenia, all ſubject to the Venetian Seigniory; finding the Wars in Italy more dangerous and difficult than they had before imagined. For the French-King came not then into Italy, as was by them expected; and it was commonly reported, That Petrus Toletanus Viceroy of Naples, having put ſtrong Garriſons into the Towns all alongſt the Sea Coaſt, was coming himſelf with a great Army; beſide that, the Horſemen ſent over from Aulona, ranging about in the Country of Salentum for Spoil, were many times cut off by Scipio Sommeius a noble Gentleman, there Governour for the Emperor. Wherefore Solyman changing his purpoſe for the invaſion of Italy, in his mad mood proclaimed War againſt the Venetians; and riſing with his Army from Aulona, and marching alongſt the Sea Coaſt until he came over againſt Corcyra, he encamped near unto the Mountains called Acroceraunij, where the fierce and wild People inhabiting the high and rough Mountain of Chimera, a part of the Acroceraunian Mountains; by the inſtigation of one Damianus a notable Theef, and very perfect in the blind and difficult paſſages amongſt the Rocks, and Woods in thoſe deſolate Mountains, conſpired to attempt a moſt ſtrange and deſperate Exploit, which was, by night to ſpoil Solyman in his own Pavilion. Theſe beggarly wild Rogues living for moſt part by Murther and Robbery, altogether without Law or any manner of Religion, in hope of ſo great a prey, and to become famous in killing one of the greateſt Monarchs of the World in the midſt of his ſtrength, garded with ſo many thouſands of his Soulders; were not afraid of any danger, how great ſoever, hoping in the dead time of the night to ſteal into the Camp undiſcovered, and there ſo to oppreſs Solyman ſleeping in his Tent. Which (as was by many afterwards ſuppoſed) they were like enough to have performed, to the aſtoniſhment of the World, had it not been by chance diſcovered; for when they had put all things in readineſs for that purpoſe, Damianus ringleader of theſe deſperate ſavage People, by ſecret ways ſtealing down the broken Rocks of thoſe huge Mountains, and coming very near unto the Camp to view the ſtanding of Solymans Pavilion, with the order of the Turks Watch, was by the cracking of a Bough eſpied by the Janizaries, where he ſtood in a Tree prying all over the Camp; and being there taken, and afterward put to torture, and confeſſing what he had intended, was by the commandment of Solyman torn in pieces. Whereupon he forthwith ſent a great part of his Army up into the Mountains, which hunting after theſe wild People, as if they had been wild Beaſts, ſlew many of them, and by Solymans appointment did what they poſſibly could to have quite deſtroyed them, as an infamous People, Enemy to all Men.

Solyman in danger to have been ſlain in his Tent in the midſt of his Army.

When Solyman had thus fully revenged himſelf upon this barbarous Nation, he purpoſed to invade the Iſland of Corcyra, now called Corfu, part of the Venetian Seigniory; ſending before Barbaruſſa with his great Artillery, whom he had but a little before called out of Italy with his Forces. Piſaurius the Venetian Admiral in good time perceiving the Tyrants purpoſe, ſtrengthned the Garriſons in both the Caſtles of Corfu, with new ſupplies of good Souldiers ſent out of the Gallies; and knowing himſelf unable to encounter

Solyman invadeth the Iſland of Corcyra with the Turks great Fleet at Sea, withdrew himſelf farther off from the Iſland, into the Gulf of the Adriatick, to the intent to joyn his power with Joannes Veturius, who kept that Sea with another Fleet of the Venetian Gallies, and ſo with joyned Forces to defend the Venetian Coaſts againſt the Turks; whom he thought himſelf ſtrong enough without the help of Veturius and of Auria, whoſe coming was daily expected. Solyman ſending a great part of his Army out of the Main, into the Iſland, burnt and deſtroyed the Country Villages, leading away a wonderful number of poor Country People into moſt miſerable Captivity. Aiax the Baſſa, and Barbaruſſa, in two ſmall Pinnaces came as near unto the City of Corfu as they poſſibly could, to ſee which way they might moſt conveniently lay Siege unto it; but perceiving the great ſtrength thereof, being wonderfully Fortified and throughly Manned, they advertiſed Solyman, that it was a place impregnable. Aloyſius Ripa, and Symon Leonius, two Senators of Venice, were then Governours of Corfu; who not without cauſe ſtanding in doubt of the great ſtrength of the Turks both by Sea and Land, cauſed the City Suburbs (which were very great and ſumptuouſly Built) to be pluckt down, for fear that the Turks ſhrouding themſelves in them, ſhould more eaſily beſiege the Town. This was a woful and lamentable thing to behold, when as at the ſame time a Man might have ſeen the Magnificent houſes of the Venetian Merchants, built in time of long Peace, both for profit and for pleaſure in every place of the Iſland, ſet on fire by the Turks. But the regard of the publick State in ſo great a danger, made all thoſe goodly things which went ſo to wrack, to be lightly accounted of in compariſon of their lives and liberty; for as much as thoſe loſt things might with new charge be again in ſhort time recovered.

The two Venetian Governours aforeſaid, fearing a long Siege, and not provided of Victual to ſuffice ſuch a multitude as were got into the City, for any long time; uſed a heavy and ſharp remedy, by turning a great number of weak People and Children unable for ſervice, out of the City; of whom many, eſpecially Children, died in the Town-ditches in their Mothers arms, under the Walls of the City, not daring to go any farther for fear of the Enemy, who had faſt by, in places convenient caſt up great Mounts, and planted his Ordnance againſt the City. Only the Caſtle called St. Angelo, ſtanding in the middle of the Iſland, about fifteen miles from the City of Corfu, being valiantly defended by the Inhabitants againſt the Aſſaults of the Turks, happily ſaved above three thouſand poor People which fled thither from the fury of the Turks, who in all other places of the Iſland had made all deſolate. The Turks the more to terrifie them of Corfu, taking a Hill not far from the City, covered the ſame with their Tents, and from the Rock called Maripetrus, ſhot with their great Ordnance into the Town; ſome of them in the mean time ſtanding cloſe in the ruins of the Suburbs, did with their Harquebuſies kill or wound them which appeared upon the Walls. The Gallies alſo did oftentimes out of their Prows diſcharge their great Pieces againſt the City, to the greater terror than hurt of the Defendants. Solyman perceiving that he did but loſe his labour in beſieging the City (as he was told at the firſt by his great Captains, Lutzus, Aiax, and Barbaruſſa) determined now to raiſe his Siege, and to return to Conſtantinople, greatly aſhamed that he had no better ſped, neither in Italy, nor at the Siege of Corfu. But when he was about to have departed, it was told him how unfaithfully ſome of his Souldiers had dealt with them of Caſtrum in Italy, who yielding themſelves upon the Turks faith to them given for the ſafegard of their liberty and goods, were nevertheleſs moſt injuriouſly ſpoiled of all that they had, and carried away into bondage. Which fact, as tending to the diſhonour of his name, and the deterring of others from yielding, Solyman took in ſo evil part, that for amending thereof, he cauſed the Authors of that fact to be put to death, and the Captives of Caſtrum to be diligently ſought out, and ſent home again into their Country; well deſerving therein the commendation of a moſt juſt Prince. The Turks left the Siege of Corfu and departed out of the Iſland about the twelfth of September, in the year 1537, carrying away above ſixteen thouſand of the Iſland people into perpetual Captivity. So Solyman riſing with his Army, marching through Acarnania and Ætolia, returned through Macedonia to Conſtantinople; having in this his expedition done great harm both in Italy and Corcyra, but yet nothing encreaſed his Empire or honour.

Good Juſtice done by Solyman.

Before his departure, calling unto him Lutzus his Admiral, he commanded him alſo to return with his Fleet to Helleſpontus; who paſſing by Zacynthus, and landing ſome of his Men in the night, took divers of the Country people Priſoners. But underſtanding that the City it ſelf was both ſtrong and well manned, he departed thence to Cythera, where unfortunately attempting to have taken the Caſtle, and diſappointed of his purpoſe, he made what ſpoil he could upon that Iſland, and with eight hundred Priſoners returned into Ægium to Ægina, a rich and famous Iſland, and well peopled both with Mariners and other Inhabitants. Approaching the Iſland he by his Meſſengers ſent before unto the Governour of the City, attempted firſt by fair means, and afterwards by threats, to have had the City yielded unto him; and not ſo prevailing, but perceiving them to ſtand upon their defence, he landed his Men, and gave the ſignal of battel. Which they of the Iſland refuſed not, but manfully met him, and at the firſt encounter ſlew many of his Men. Wherewith the Admiral grievouſly offended, and ſtill landing freſh Men, even with his multitude oppreſſed them of the Iſland, being but in number few and weary of long fight; and ſo enforced them to retire into the City.

To be revenged of this injury, the Baſſa cauſed certain pieces of great Ordnance to be landed, and a Battery planted againſt the City; by force whereof he had in ſhort time in divers places opened the Walls, and then with all his power aſſaulting the Breaches, forthwith took the City, which after he had rifled, he burnt it down to the ground, raſed the Walls, and put the Men every Mothers Son to the Sword. As for the Women, he gave them without reſpect unto the luſt of his Souldiers and Mariners, whom afterwards together with the Boys and young Children he ſhipped into the Country near unto Athens, to be from thence conveyed unto Conſtantinople, into moſt miſerable ſervitude.

Ægina with other Iſlands of the Ægium ſpoiled.

Ægina thus utterly raſed, he with much like force and cruelty raged upon them of Paros and the other Iſlands thereabouts, killing the old Men and ſuch as made reſiſtance, and thruſting the reſt into his Gallies. Shortly after he came to the Iſle of Naxos, where all the Iſland people were for fear of his coming fled out of the Country into the City; where landing his Men, he made havock of whatſoever came to his hand. And in the mean time ſent a Meſſenger unto the Duke, to will him to yield himſelf and his City into the obedience of the Turkiſh Emperor Solyman.

Which Meſſenger admitted into the City, and brought before the Duke, in blunt and plain terms, without further circumſtance, delivered his Meſſage thus :

The blunt Speech of a Turk ſent by Lutzis Baſſa unto the Duke of Naxos.

If thou wilt without more ado, yield thy ſelf, thy City, and Territory, to the Conſtantinopolitan Emperor, thou ſhalt deſerve his favour, and ſo ſave thy ſelf with that thou haſt. But if thou, otherwiſe adviſed, ſhalt now refuſe this Grace, thou ſhalt never hereafter have the like offer, but for ever undo thy ſelf, thy Wife, and Children, thy Citizens, and Subjects in general. Here is preſent a moſt mighty Fleet, with moſt valiant and victorious Souldiers, furniſhed with all the habiliments of War requiſite for Battel or Siege. Be warned by them of Ægina, Paros, and other thy neighbour Princes of the Iſlands. Thy hap is good, if thou be not miſadviſed, and (warned by other Mens harms) wilfully refuſe to remedy thine own; and when thou mightſt be ſafe, wilfully caſt away thy ſelf.

Naxos becometh tributary unto the Turks.

Lutzis Baſſa diſgraced by Solyman and exiled

Thus ſaid, he was commanded by the Duke to ſtand aſide, and a while to expect his anſwer; who with the chief of his Subjects there preſent, but much troubled, and all full of heavineſs and ſorrow, conſulted what anſwer to make. But after they had according to the weightineſs of the cauſe, and neceſſity of time fully debated the matter, it was with general conſent agreed, That foraſmuch as they were not themſelves of power to withſtand ſo furious an Enemy, neither to expect help from others, they ſhould therefore yield unto the preſent neceſſity, which otherwiſe threatned unto them utter deſtruction, and reſerve themſelves unto better times. Whereupon anſwer was given unto the Meſſenger by the Duke, That he was ready to yield himſelf unto Solyman as his Vaſſal, and of him as of his Sovereign to hold his Seigniory for the yearly Tribute of five thouſand Ducats. Of which offer the Baſſa accepted, receiving in hand one years Tribute. So was that notable Iſland yielded unto the Turkiſh obeiſance the 11 of November, in the year 1537. from whence Lutzis the proud Baſſa, loaded with the rich Spoil of the Countries and Iſlands he had paſſed by, returned to Conſtantinople with his Fleet. Not long after, this great Baſſa (then in credit and authority next unto Solyman himſelf) fell at ods with his Wife, Solymans Siſter; for that he, after the unnatural manner of thoſe barbarous People, kept in his houſe a moſt delicate Youth, in whom he took more pleaſure than in his Wife. Which ſhe, being a Woman of great Spirit, not able to endure, and knowing her Husband by marrying of her, to have been from baſe degree advanced unto the higheſt Honours the Emperor her Brother could heap upon him; in great rage reproved him with moſt bitter words, ſaying, That ſhe had married him to be of him beloved, and uſed as his Wife, and not contemptuouſly abuſed by his Minions. Wherewith the Baſſa moved, gave her a Blow on the Ear, and cauſed her as a fooliſh and unquiet Woman to be ſhut up in her Chamber. But ſhe not brooking ſuch abuſe, came weeping to Solyman her Brother, and complaining of her Husband, requeſted to be Divorced from him who made no better reckoning of her. And with her complaint ſo incenſed Solyman, that he took from him his Seal, and thruſt him out of all his honourable Promotions; and had undoubtedly put him to death, had not the remembrance of his old love and friendſhip ſtaied his fury; yet having utterly diſgraced him, he baniſhed him the Court, into Macedonia, where he ſpent the remainder of his loathed life like a poor private Man; of whom Boiſardus thus writeth :

Quæ tibi cum molli res eſt pollute Cynedo:
Cum cubet in Thalamis regia nympha tuis?
Ex humili fortuna loco te evexit in altum
Ex alto major ſæpe ruina venit.

On dainty Boys, thou filthy Man, why do'ſt thou fix thine eye;
Whilſt Princely Dame of Royal Blood doth in thy Chamber lie?
From baſe eſtate, to honours height blind Fortune did thee call,
And ſet thee up with Princes great, to work thy greater fall.

The Turks ſpoil the Venetians, and the Venetians them likewiſe.

Solyman thus fallen out with the Venetians, as is aforeſaid, to intangle them at once with Wars in divers places, commanded his Lieutenants in every place bordering upon any part of the Venetian Seigniory, to vex and moleſt them with all Hoſtility, which they did accordingly. In Peloponneſſus, Caſſimes beſieged Mauplium and Epidaurus, two ſtrong Cities of the Venetians; Barbaruſſa landing his Men in Dalmatia, ſurpriſed the ancient City of Botrotus belonging to the Venetians, carried away the Citizens, and raſed the City; Obroatium another City of the Venetians in Dalmatia, called in ancient time Argirutum, with the Caſtle of Nadin, were taken by Uſtref, Solymans Lieutenant in Illyria. The Venetians thus invaded on every ſide, requited them again with the like; Piſaurius and Veturius the Venetian Admirals landing their Men, beſieged Scardona a City of the Turks in the borders of Dalmatia, which they took by force, put the Turks to the Sword, and overthrew the Walls of the City, becauſe it ſhould be no more a refuge unto the Turks; they alſo ſent one of their Captains called Gabriel Ribeus to beſige Obroatium; who upon the coming of Amurathes one of Uſtref his Captains, cowardly fled, and in flight loſt moſt of his Men; for which his Cowardiſe, Piſaurius cauſed his head to be ſtruck off aboord the Admiral Galley; And Camillus Urſinus, appointed by the Venetian State Governour of Jadera a ſtrong Town upon the Frontiers of their Territory in Dalmatia, took from the Turks the Town of Oſtrovizza, which he burnt down to the ground; he recovered alſo Obroatium, which was a little before loſt; which by the commandment of the Senate he utterly raſed, as a place not well to be kept againſt the Enemy.

The ſame Autumn that Solyman having waſted Corcyra, he returned to Conſtantinople, and the Venetians held Wars with the Turks for the Towns and Caſtles in Dalmatia; King Ferdinand received ſuch an overthrow at Exek by the Turks, as a greater or more ſhameful unto the Name of the Chriſtians was hardly in that Age ſeen; if the loſs of the choice Souldiers and Captains of four great Nations, with the ſhameful flight of the General be well conſidered. After the Battel of Mohahz, wherein King Lewis was loſt, the Turks having gotten the Victory, kept unto themſelves that part of Hungary which is called Poſſega, becauſe thereby they had a fit paſſage from Belgrade further into Hungary. The two great Rivers of Savus and Dravus running almoſt with equal diſtance from the Weſt, taking with them divers other ſmaller Rivers, before they fall into the great River of Danubius Eaſtward, do on both ſides incloſe this Country of Poſſega, being a rich and plentiful Country, and wonderful well peopled; it bordereth upon the Provinces of Croatia and Corbania, which in times paſt were at continual Wars with the Turks Garriſons there by in Illyria and alſo in Boſnia.

Mahometes Governour of Belgrade.

An evil aſſured Peace.

King Ferdinand breaketh his League with the Turks.

At that time one Mahometes a moſt valiant Captain of the Turks was Governour of Belgrade; to whom for his approved valour and wiſdom Solyman had committed the keeping of thoſe Frontiers, and the protection of the Kingdom of Hungary in the behalf of King John. He the year before had ſo uſed the matter, that what by force, what by policy, he had taken from the Chriſtians above thirty ſmall Caſtles in the Country, (which was ſometime part of the Patrimony of the Deſpot of Raſcia) and had joyned them to the Regiment of Boſna. One of theſe Caſtles amongſt the reſt called Exek, for the commodious ſituation thereof he ſtrongly fortified, as that which might give him paſſage over the River Dravus into Hungary; from whence he ſet infinite preys out of King Ferdinands Country near unto him. Yet was there at that time a certain League betwixt Solyman and Ferdinand, which notwithſtanding after the old cuſtom of thoſe Countries for the exerciſe of the Garriſon Souldiers, did bear with the taking of Booty, and light Skirmiſhes, without any Breach thereof; ſo that it were done without any great Power or Field-Pieces; which wrong named Peace, Mathias and other Kings of Hungary had of long time uſed with the Turks, doing them with their nimble light Horſemen no leſs harm than they received. But the Germans now uſing no ſuch light Horſemen, but ſerving upon great Horſes, and charged with heavy Armor, received great hurt by thoſe light Skirmiſhes; the Turks with their light Horſes eaſily ſhunning their charge, and again at their pleaſure charging them afreſh, when they ſaw the heavy German Horſes almoſt weary and ſpent; by which means the German Horſemen were oftentimes by the Turks light Horſemen overthrown, and ſo either ſlain or taken. King Ferdinand not well brooking theſe continual injuries, and grieved in mind at the League which Solyman had to his profit made with him at his going into Perſia; finding the ſame both unprofitable and hurtful to himſelf, determined to take up Arms, with purpoſe that if he could drive the Turks out of the Country of Poſſega, then forthwith to paſs over Dravus, and to go directly to Buda againſt King John. It ſtill ſtuck in his mind, how that Kingdom was taken from him by Solyman; and that more was, as it were in diſgrace of him and the Houſe of Auſtria, beſtowed upon a ſtranger, which had neither right thereto, nor was any way royally deſcended. Yet were there ſome which wiſhed him, not raſhly to enter into Arms againſt ſo mighty an Enemy, as was not to be vanquiſhed but by the united Forces of all the Chriſtian Princes of Europe. For they foreſaw, that Solyman ſo provoked, would not put it up, but for the hatred he bare againſt the Chriſtians, and for his honour, ſeek more cruel revenge; as he had of late done againſt the Venetians, with whom upon a light occaſion he had broken an ancient League, for ſinking one or two of his Gallies; for which he would admit no excuſe or ſatisfaction. All this Ferdinand knew to be true; yet all the People of his Dominions lay ſo earneſtly upon him to take that War in hand, that they ſaid plainly, they would never bear Arms more againſt the Turks, if he omitted that occaſion. For they of Carinthia, Stiria, Croatia, and Noricum, ſubject to the invaſion of the Turks, and daily receiving great harms, thought the Turks might eaſily be driven out of Poſſega, for as much as Mahometes had no great power, nor like to have any greater, Autumn now almoſt ſpent.

Cazzianer General of King Ferdinands Army.

Mahometes Governour of Belgrade, aided by the other Turks Captains.

So King Ferdinand, with the wonderful rejoycing of his Subjects, cauſed Souldiers to be taken up in all parts of his Kingdom, ſending for moſt of his Nobility and beſt Captains, as to a religious War, and in a very ſhort ſpace had raiſed a good Army, yet ſuppoſed of greater ſtrength than number, as conſiſting moſt of ſelect Men. The Footmen were for moſt part Germans, to whom were joyned as Wings certain Companies of Italians, Harquebuſiers, whom Lewis Lodronius, a valiant Captain, and General of the Footmen, had raiſed in Rhetia and thoſe parts of Italy which lie near unto the Alps. The Horſemen were of Bohemia, Sileſia, Moravia, Stiria, Carinthia, and ſome alſo out of Hungary, all conducted by their ſeveral Captains; all theſe Horſemen were in number eight thouſand, but the Footmen were ſixteen thouſand ſtrong, with great ſtore of Artillery of all ſorts. This Army for the expertneſs and valour of the Souldiers, was thought ſufficient to have met the greateſt Army of the Turks in Field, if it had been conducted by a politick General, and (as he had at other times been) fortunate; which was one John Cazzianer, a Nobleman of Croatia, whom as one of great experience, and famous for the late defence of Vienna, King Ferdinand had made General of his Army. For Ferdinand by the advice of his beſt Friends never uſed to adventure his Perſon unto the danger of any Battel, eſpecially againſt the Turks, by whom many Chriſtian Kings had in former time been vanquiſhed and ſlain; but performed all his Wars by his Lieutenants; which he was thought to do, not ſo much for want of courage, as moved with the fatal miſhap of ſo many Chriſtian Kings. Mahometes Governour of Belgrade underſtanding of this preparation made againſt him, ſent for divers Companies of the Garriſon Souldiers which lay upon the borders near hand; he required aid of the Governours of the Turks Province thereabouts; and was eſpecially holden by Uſtref Governour of Boſna, who of all Solymans Lieutenants in Europe, was able to bring into the Field moſt good Horſemen; he ſent him Amurathes a famous Captain with a great Company of gallant Horſemen, unto whom were joyned certain Companies of Footmen of the wild and mountain People of Dalmatia, entertained for pay; which rough and rude kind of People were governed and kept in order by certain Companies of Janizaries drawn out of the Garriſon Towns as far as Belgrade and Samandria; after whom followed many out of Servia and Raſcia, ſome for pay, ſome for prey. The Turks Receiver liberally paying to ſuch as were willing to ſerve, two months pay before hand. Neither wanted he aid of the Hungarians from Buda; ſo that the Turkiſh Governours on every ſide putting to their helping hands, Mahometes had in ſhort time gathered ſuch an Army, as for number and ſtrength was not much inferior to King Ferdinands, and reſolved to expect the coming of his Enemies at Exek. Cazzianer was now come as far on his way as Caprunza, a Town upon the River Dravus; having before well and conveniently provided for the victualling of his Army, if they whom he put in truſt, and had taken the matter upon them, had with like ſpeed and diligence performed their charge; for they were the chief Men of all the Country, who all followed the direction of Simon Biſhop of Zagrabia; who inflamed with zeal above meaſure, or elſe for want of judgment deceived, had promiſed to ſerve the whole Camp with plenty of Victuals, at a very low rate. Which thing the Country people which were to bring in the Victual, ſome by Waggon, ſome by Boats alongſt the Rivers, many difficulties now ariſing, were not able to perform; which was not to be remedied by reaſon of the nearneſs of the Enemy; and alſo for that Mahometes with ſmall Gallies in both Rivers, and his Troops of Horſemen pricking up and down the Country, did either ſtay the Country people from bringing of Victual, or elſe allured them for a greater price to bring it to his own Camp, where they received ready Mony. Cazzianer ſetting forward from Caprunza, hardly came in ten days to the Caſtle of Verucza, which is about forty miles diſtant from Caprunza; being enforced to make ſhort marches, by reaſon of the troubleſome carriage of ſome great Pieces of Artillery for battery. The wiſer ſort began even then to miſdoubt the want of Victual, both for the reaſons before alledged, and for that ſuch Victual as was looked for, came not, although they marched very ſoftly; ſo that they were then enforced to ſpend ſuch Victual as they had provided, not for the beginning, but for the difficulties of a long protracted War. Wherefore Cazzianer wrote ſharply to the Biſhop and the other which had taken upon them the charge of providing Victual for the Army; commanding them to uſe all poſſible diligence and ſpeed, and not to let the hope of a notable Victory to be loſt through their negligence, for want of Victual, rather than the valour of the Enemy. In the mean time Cazzianer thought good there to ſtay, and to expect the coming of the Victual, ſending before him Paulus Bachitius with a thouſand Hungarian light Horſemen and certain Companies of Italian Harquebuſiers, as far as the Caſtle of Zopia, to the intent that he might of ſuch Priſoners as he could take, learn ſomething of the Enemies purpoſe. The Turks in the Caſtle of Zopia deſcrying the coming of Bachitius, and thinking the whole Army of the Chriſtians had been at hand, ſet fire on the Caſtle, which they thought they could not keep, and by Boats fled down the River Dravus. Yet for all their haſt, Bachitius took ſome of them in their flight; of whom Cazzianer learned that which he before knew by his own Eſpials, how that Mahometes and the Turks lay encamped at Exek, with a full reſolution to give him Battel. Cazzianer ſetting forward again, ſtill keeping along the River Dravus, came in eight days to the Caſtle of Walpo; where by the way he was glad to ſtay ſeven days at the River Craſſus, which falleth into Dravus, until ſuch time as a Bridge was made for the tranſporting of his Army, for that the River was not to be waded over; in which time Cazzianer entred oftentimes into counſel with the other Captains, what courſe to hold for the better proceeding in that War. Where divers Men were of divers opinions; ſome ſaid, It was better to leave Exek, and to beſiege a Caſtle of the Enemies there by, called Villach; others more wary than the reſt, were of opinion, That it were better there to ſtay until the reſt of the Aid and Victual, which they daily expected, were come. But the greater number, which alſo prevailed, urged the firſt determination, of going directly to the Enemy at Exek, for that longer delay would but breed further danger; and there was in the Camp (as they ſaid) both ſtrength and Victual ſufficient for obtaining of the Victory, if they would make an end of their needleſs Conſultations, and not protract the War until Winter were come on; where they did nothing elſe, but cauſe the Souldiers to think that they were afraid to meet the Enemy, and ſecretly to ſteal away back again into their Countries; whereas if they would like reſolute Men march on forward againſt the Enemy, who at other times truſting moſt unto his multitudes, and now having no great power, would never abide the ſight of the Chriſtian Army, bringing with it ſo much Artillery; but would forthwith forſake the place, and never ſhew his face; foraſmuch as the Chriſtian Men at Arms would (as they ſaid) eaſily break through and overthrow the naked Turkiſh Horſemen, if they durſt abide the Field. The young Souldiers, who as yet had never made proof of the Turks manner of fight, did with ſuch chearfulneſs like of this reſolution, that they thought two days ſtaying, a long delay of ſo ready and eaſie a Victory. Wherefore it was reſolved upon, preſently to ſet forward, and thereupon the Army was Muſtered; where, upon view taken, there was found to be ten thouſand Horſemen (for divers Troops of Germans were come to the Camp, after the time of the firſt ſetting forward of the Army;) a more gallant Company of Horſemen, both for the ſtrength of their Horſes, and goodly furniture of the Men, had ſeldom been ſeen in an Army ſo ſuddainly raiſed. But the Footmen, ſelected out of all the Provinces, were greatly diminiſhed, being now in number ſcarce eight thouſand ſtrong; for many were ſick in the Camp, others weary of the long Journy, lingering behind, were ſtoln away; and generally all they which were left, moyled with dirt and mire, by reaſon of the deepneſs of the rotten way, wet through with Rain, and almoſt ſtarved with Cold, and thereto pincht with Hunger, were thought ſcarce able to endure the hardneſs of the preſent War. After that commandment was given, That every Souldier ſhould carry with him three days Victual; and proclamation made, That no Man ſhould upon pain of death take any Turk Priſoner, although he yielded himſelf, or charge himſelf with any ſpoil before the Battel were fully ended; foraſmuch as the Captains would afterwards divide the Spoil of the Enemy among the Souldiers. This proclamation thus made through the Camp, they ſet forward towards Exek; and the third day they came to a certain Valley, about three miles from Exek, where they encamped. The next day a Company of Turks ſhewed themſelves, which was by the great Ordnance repulſed. The day following, the Enemy ſallied out of the Town and skirmiſhed oftentimes with the Chriſtians; in which Skirmiſhes many were ſlain on both ſides, but more wounded of the Chriſtians, for that the Turks had politickly mingled certain Janizaries, Harquebuſiers, and Archers, with their Horſemen; who, uſed to that manner of fight, ſore gauled the Chriſtian Horſemen. For which cauſe the General forbad all ſuch light Skirmiſhes, as purpoſing to keep his ſtrength whole againſt the general day of Battel; commanding his Canoniers ſo to place the great Ordnance as might moſt annoy the Enemy, if he ſhould ſhew himſelf by Troops within the danger of the Shot; which was ſo well performed, that the Turks ſallying forth, received thereby great hurt, the deadly ſhot flying through the midſt of their Companies. The ſame day Symon Biſhop of Zagrabia came into the Camp with his Horſemen, and a certain proviſion of Victual, whereby the fear of the want before conceived, was well eaſed. Mahometes perceiving that the Chriſtians were not longer to be drawn to thoſe harmful Skirmiſhes, but that he muſt bring his Men in danger of the great Shot; to annoy them by another means, ſent many ſmall Boats, manned with Harquebuſiers and ſmall Pieces of Ordnance, into the Lake near unto the Camp, ſo to keep the Chriſtians from watering there, and with thoſe ſmall Pieces ſhot oftentimes into the Camp. Near unto the Valley where the Chriſtians lay, was a Hill, whereupon ſtood a Village, wherein were placed certain Companies of Turks, to Skirmiſh as occaſion ſhould ſerve with the Chriſtians; for placing of whom the whole Army was put in order of Battel, and the great Artillery bent upon them, that they ſhould not with their light Skirmiſhes, after the manner of the Turkiſh fight, trouble the order of the Army. Which thing the Turks perceiving, and that they were not able to hold the place, ſet fire on the Town, and ſo retired to Exek. The Chriſtians keeping on their march, came to the top of the Hill, from whence they might ſee Exek ſtand about two miles off in a fair Plain, near unto the Bank of Dravus; all which low ground betwixt the Hill and Exek, was ſo ſubject to the Caſtle, that it was thought a matter too full of danger, to attempt that way to batter the Caſtle, and expoſe the Army to the inevitable fury of the Enemies ſhot. Wherefore deſcrying a riſing ground on the further ſide of the City equal with the top of the Walls, they thought it beſt to remove their Camp thither, and on that ſide to plant their Battery againſt the City. But to come to that place was thought a matter of no ſmall trouble; for they muſt fet a compaſs three miles on the right hand through a Forreſt by a foul and troubleſome way, before they could come to the place they deſired; for the Army was not ſo great, as to beſiege the City round; wherein were not (as is reported) above ſixteen thouſand Men; neither was there ſuch ſtore of Victuals in the Camp, but that the Army was like ſoon to feel the want thereof, without a continual ſupply, which would hardly be had, the Enemy ſtill beſetting every paſſage, and with their light Horſemen ſcouring about all the Country, of purpoſe to keep them from Victual. For which cauſe, ſome were of opinion, That it were beſt for them there to ſtay where they were, until ſuch time as both more Aid and better ſtore of Victuals were come unto them; but others of contrary mind, ſaid the Enemy was but barely ſtored with Victual himſelf, and therefore could not long hold out; which they ſaid they underſtood by certain Chriſtian Fugitives; and that Mahometes had put his chief ſubſtance into certain Boats, to be conveyed down the River, as purpoſing to flie, and would not hold out the Siege above three days; as for the Forreſt, they thought it would well enough be paſſed through, if they would couragiouſly ſet forward; beſide that, the time of the year ſuffered no delay, Winter coming ſo faſt on, that except ſome notable thing were done quickly, they ſhould be enforced by the very time of the year to return with ſhame, without doing any thing. This opinion was beſt liked of, as more honourable and better beſeeming Men of Valour, than to lie ſtill in one place; whereupon the next day the Army removed, and in good order marched through the Forreſt. Which thing Mahometes quickly perceiving, preſently ſent forth a thouſand light Horſemen, and certain Companies of the Janizaries and Harquebuſiers, to trouble the Chriſtians in their paſſage; who by a nearer and well known way overtaking the Army, ſuddainly charged the Rereward, wherein the Italians and Bohemians marched. The Bohemians quickly fled, and the Italians with much ado endured the charge; but being relieved by the Carinthian Men at Arms, they notably repulſed the Turks, and put them to flight. So the Army with ſmall loſs paſſed the Forreſt, and came to the place they deſired; where, after they had encamped themſelves, and in good order placed all things needful for the Siege, they in ſeemly order offered unto the Enemy Battel; but he keeping himſelf within the Town, ſhot at the Chriſtians with his great Ordnance; and they to requite him, with two great Pieces which they had placed upon the riſing of a Hill, ſhot through both the Walls of the Town and the Bulwark alſo, to the great terror of the Defendants. The Chriſtians in the mean time having ſtood almoſt all the day in order of Battel in ſight of the Enemy, vainly expecting when he ſhould come forth to give them Battel, returned at night into their Camp; for Mahometes upon great conſideration kept in his Souldiers, although they were moſt deſirous to fight; underſtanding right well of the want of Victual in the Chriſtian Camp; and beſide that (as the Fugitives reported) being ſtraitly commanded by Letters from Solyman, that he ſhould not upon pain of a moſt ſhameful death forſake the place, but to defend it to the laſt. Now the Chriſtians deſirous of Battel, being thus delayed and deceived of their expectation, had in a few days ſpent the ſmall ſtore of Victual they had, and began to feel a general want; neither was there any apparent means how they ſhould be relieved, ſo that every Man began to fear ſome general miſchief to enſue. When Balthazer Pamphilus, a noble Hungarian, and a Captain of great experience, ſitting in Counſel with the reſt, entred into this Speech.

Balthazer Pamphilus his counſel for relief of the Army.

Captains (ſaid he) we do all that we do, unadviſedly; For whilſt we conſult at large how we may overcome our Enemies, the ſtrength of our Army is in the mean time ſo weakned for want of Victual, that the Souldiers are neither well able to ſtand on their Legs, nor to hold their Weapons in their feeble Hands; and generally, even they which are of greateſt courage begin now to quail, and deſpairing of Battel, ſee that they muſt miſerably and ſhamefully periſh for want: Wherefore in my opinion, we ought firſt and above all things moſt ſpeedily to provide for this want, which ſo grievouſly pincheth us; and preſently to remove hence unto the Caſtle of Hermande, that with the proviſion thereof, which is not like to be little, we may refreſh our whole Army; and ſo relieved, to proceed further as occaſion ſhall require.

Balthazer taketh the Town of Hermande

The Caſtle of Hermande yielded unto the Chriſtians.

This Caſtle was about ten miles diſtant from Exek; whereinto many of the Turks had conveied their Wives and Children, and chiefeſt ſubſtance, being kept with a ſmall Garriſon of twenty Turks. Faſt by the Caſtle was a pretty little walled Town, without Flankers, after the manner of the old fortifying; which Town and Caſtle Balthazer ſaid would eaſily be taken. This his Counſel was well liked of all Men, and he himſelf ſent with certain Companies of Souldiers to take the Town Wherein fortune ſo favoured him, that it was at his firſt coming ſurrendred unto him; but when he had it, he found not therein any ſuch ſtore of Corn or Victual as he had hoped for; yet he took there certain Veſſels of Wine, to the great relief of the weak Souldiers. Upon the news of the taking of this Town, the Camp removed from Exek about ten a Clock in the night, but ſo diſorderly, that the Souldiers ſcarce knowing their own Enſigns, ſeemed rather to have fled for fear, than marched for ſpoil; yet the Turks for all that moved not out of Exek, miſdoubting ſome deceit, and loth to attempt any thing raſhly in the night. When the Army was come to the Town, the Captains took order, that the Victual there found, was equally divided amongſt the Souldiers, and the next morning Battery laied againſt the Caſtle; which thoſe few Turks valiantly defended half a day, and then by compoſition yielded it. But when the Caſtle was taken, there was found in it but two Barrels of Meal, and other two of Millet. Then might a Man have ſeen the Captains themſelves hanging their Heads, as men ſtrucken with a ſuddain fear, who inſtead of a great Prey and Victual to have ſerved many days, found nothing but a few Women and Children, and ſcarce ſo much Victual both in the Town and Caſtle, as would ſerve the Army two days. Yet they diſſembled the matter, and fed the Souldiers with hope of better ſtore, after the Bridge were once repaired, that they might paſs the River of Bodrog, which ran by the Town; which Bridge the Turks had before (for defence of themſelves) broken, by plucking up of certain Piles, and taking away of the Planks; wherefore the Carpenters being ſet on work, and every man putting too his helping hand, the Bridge was with continual labour in three days repaired. The fourth day, the Waggons and ſmaller Pieces of Ordnance paſſed over the Bridge, and after them ſix of the great Pieces for Battery; but the Bridge overcharged with the ſeventh, which was of wonderful weight, and much greater than the reſt, began to break; ſo that the Captains were inforced to break that fair Piece of Ordnance, and ſo by pieces to carry it away, that the Enemy ſhould not get ſo great a Spoil. All things being thus well paſſed over, the Piles were again cut down, and the Planks ſtruck off, to the intent the Enemy ſhould not that way purſue them; and other way there was none, but to fetch a compaſs about the great Lake which was many miles about. Here the Captains began to conſult, whether it were beſt to break the great Pieces of Ordnance, that ſo they might more ſpeedily march away, or not. Of which opinion was Cazzianer himſelf, promiſing of his own charge to new caſt them. As for the ſcaling Ladders, and other ſuch like things provided for the Siege, they burnt, becauſe they ſhould not come into the Enemies hand, or trouble themſelves in their march. But moſt of the Captains were of opinion, that it was not beſt ſo diſhonourably to break thoſe goodly Pieces, the greateſt ornament and defence of their Country; but to hold on their march through Poſſega, until they came to Juvancha, where they ſhould find great ſtore both of Corn and Wine; which Town with the Caſtle of Gara faſt by it, ſtored with all kind of Proviſion, they ſaid would eaſily be taken before the Turks could poſſibly come ſo far about the Lake from Exek; and that it were a great ſhame, ſo to return without doing any thing. Cazzianer thus perſwaded, ſet forward, and with great toil (by reaſon of the deepneſs of the way and heavineſs of the great Ordnance) came by night to Juvancha, which was but three miles off; where the Turks having with incredible celerity paſſed a long journey, arrived at the ſame time alſo. Near unto this Caſtle was a little Town, out of which all the Turks were fled; the Townſmen being Chriſtians, opened the Gates and received in the Souldiers; who there filled themſelves abundantly with Wine, and could hardly be driven out thence by their Captains to the Camp. The ſame night the Turks burnt the ſame Town, and whatſoever the Chriſtians had therein left; and every man betook him to his Armor in the Camp, for the Enemy was now at hand; and in the dawning of the day began hotly to skirmiſh in divers places with the Chriſtians, but eſpecially in that quarter of the Camp where the Bohemians lay. Wherewith Petrus Raſchinius General of the Bohemians, being grieved, ſet upon them with a Troop of his beſt Horſemen, and enforced them to flie; but the Turks after the manner of their Fight, quickly returning again, and relieved by the coming in of their Fellows, beſet the Bohemians on every ſide, and ſlew many of them. Raſchinius the General fighting moſt valiantly, was there ſlain with his Followers. The Chriſtian Captains purpoſing to retire home, placed on each ſide of the Army four Ranks of Wagons for defence on both ſides; in the Vauward were placed the weak and ſick men, yet ſo, that in the Front of the Army were certain Companies of luſty tall Souldiers; but in the Rearward was placed the greateſt ſtrength both of Horſe and Foot. The Army thus marching as it were on both ſides intrenched, as it oftentimes met with woody Hills hindring their way, ſo did the ſame fitly ſerve the Chriſtians, that the Turks could not well aſſail them in their march, both before and behind. Which thing Mahometes perceiving, ſent before certain Companies of Janizaries and nimble Footmen, which knew the Country and the paſſages well, with certain Faulcons and other ſmall Pieces to take the Straits whereby the Army was to paſs, and ſo to gaul them in their paſſage, and when they could keep the place no longer, to flie back to another; and ſo from place to place; and in the open places he had his Troops of light Horſemen, which were ever buſie in one place or another of the Army: By which means the Chriſtians in their March received much harm, which grieved them the more, for that no great power of the Turks was any where to be ſeen together, but ſtragling Companies; which as they were commanded, ſometime would come on with a fierce charge, and by and by retire again, and with their Arrows and Falcon Shot, from places of advantage aſſail them. At one of theſe Straits ſomewhat bigger than the reſt, Paulus Bachitius one of the Hungarian Captains, in whom the Souldiers generally repoſed their greateſt truſt, was ſlain with a Faulcon Shot, with divers other of the valiant Hungarians; who ſeeing there a greater number of the Turks than they had ſeen in other places, thought to have done ſome good ſervice upon them; his death brought a general fear upon the whole Army, foraſmuch as both then and at other times, without him they never had any good ſucceſs againſt the Turks. Yet in that skirmiſh, the Hungarians, to revenge the death of their Captain, did with ſuch force repulſe the Enemy, that they cauſed him after he had loſt many of his men, to run away and leave his ſmall Field-Pieces behind him. But ſuch was was the weakneſs or cowardiſe of the Chriſtian Footmen, and the agility of the Turks, eſpecially the Janizaries, that they with their ſhot out of the Woods, ſtaid the Hungarian Horſemen from the purſuit of their Fellows, and recovered their ſmall Field-Pieces before they could be carried away by the Chriſtian Footmen; wherewith they did again forerun the Army, and ſtill trouble it as before. The Chriſtians beſet with theſe dangers, and almoſt ſpent for want of Victual, ſeeing no means to relieve their weak Bodies, nor any hope to comfort their fainting Spirits, did generally fear ſome extream calamity to enſue; and ſo much the more, for that it was reported, that Mahometes ſtill expected freſh ſupplies from Belgrade, Samandria, and Nicopolis; and many of the Hungarian light Horſemen ſtole away from them, as careful of their own ſafety; neither did they ſee any comfort in the diſmaid Captains, who at other times were wont with chearful and couragious words to relieve the Souldiers, if they ſaw them any thing diſcouraged. But when they were come into a fair open Field near unto a Town called Gara, they were advertiſed, That the Enemy had in the Woods before them, whereby they were to paſs, cut down great Trees croſs the waies, ſo that neither their great Ordnance nor Waggons, nor yet their Horſemen could Cazzianer to retire with more haſte, would have broken his great Ordnance.

A general fear in the Chriſtians Camp.

poſſibly paſs that way but that they muſt needs break their order.

The fearful reſolution of the Chriſtians to get from the Turks.

This once bruted through the Army, filled them with all heavineſs and deſperation, and ſo much the more, for that Ladiſlaus Moreus, and others which knew the Country well, ſaid there was but two ways to eſcape; the one through the Woods about ten miles ſpace to Walpo, which by reaſon of the Trees cut down croſs the ways by the Turks was not to be paſſed, but they muſt needs leave behind them their great Ordnance and Carriages; the other towards the Caſtle of Zenthuerzebeth, which was in Ladiſlaus Moreus his Country, certain miles diſtant from Gara; by taking of which way, the Enemy by reaſon of the ſtraightneſs of the paſſage, muſt of neceſſity be inforced to give over his purſuit. Yet for all that, it was in Counſel reſolved upon, to take the way through the Woods of Walpo, for that there was Victual enough, and in the Caſtle of Walpo was kept Mony ſent from King Ferdinand, ſufficient to pay the Souldiers for all that Winter. And ſo leaving the great Ordnance behind them, and burning the Powder and whatſoever elſe could not well be carried on Horſeback, to ſet forward with all ſpeed: As for the Trees they ſaid, they would be well enough removed, and the way opened by the Pioniers and Waggoners; wherefore every Captain was commanded to have his Souldiers in readineſs to ſet forward upon the ſign given, which was by the ſound of a Shalm or Hoboy; which when it ſhould be given, was referred to the diſcretion of the General. There were many which wonderfully diſliked of this reſolution, and ſaid openly, that the Enemy was fewer in number than their Horſemen, and pinched almoſt with like want of Victual; beſides, that the Turks durſt never in juſt Fight encounter with the Chriſtian men at Arms, but like Theeves aſſail them upon a ſuddain at ſome advantage, and by and by be gone again; and that the Town of Gara where the Enemy lay encamped, was not ſo ſtrong but that it might be won; wherefore all things were to be proved, and ſome great matter to be attempted of valiant men, pinched with wants; for that to run away, would not only be a diſhonour unto the Captains themſelves, who ought always to prefer their honour before their Lives, but alſo dangerous unto them, which reſpected nothing but Life. And if they ſhould ſet forward in the night, many would be loſt in the Woods; and Valor in the dark could not be known from Cowardiſe; beſides that, the Turks (as they ſaid) lay ſo nigh, that it was not poſſible to depart without their knowledge, eſpecially if they ſhould burn the Powder, or break their great Ordnance. For which cauſes, they thought it better to fight a Battel with them, and not to believe the falſe reports of new Supplies come unto them, and that God would undoubtedly give them aid, which were ready to lay down their Lives for their Religion and Glory of the Chriſtian Name. After all this, they began to conſult what was now to be done with the ſick and wounded Souldiers, which were before carried in Waggons or among other Baggage of the Army; for it was like that ſo great a multitude of ſick and wounded men, underſtanding what was decreed concerning the departure of the Army, would as miſerable forſaken men, fill the Camp with lamentation and mourning; which it was thought would be alſo increaſed by the weeping and wailing of them which ſhould never afterwards ſee their Brethren, Kinſmen, Fellows, or Friends, ſo miſerably and ſhamefully left behind and forſaken; the noiſe whereof, muſt needs come to the ears of the Turks, which lay within a ſmall Gun-ſhot. Wherefore it was determined, that theſe ſick and wounded Souldiers ſhould be carried upon the Waggon and Cart-Horſes; and that ſuch as were not able to ſtay themſelves, ſhould be holden up by other of more ſtrength riding behind them upon the Buttocks of the Horſe. In fine, to colour the matter, they which were ſo deſirous to go, ſaid that this their manner of departure grounded upon good reaſon, was not to be accounted a ſhameful Flight (as ſome would term it) but a right honeſt and neceſſary manner of retiring; foraſmuch as they were ſtronger than their Enemies in Horſemen, and equal alſo (if not ſtronger) in Footmen, although they were ſore weakned with Sickneſs. Whilſt theſe things were in Council diverſly diſcourſed, and the reſolution ſet down as is before ſaid, the matter was brought to this paſs, that every Captain with troubled judgment conceived in himſelf ſecret cogitations, far from the common good; and without regard of Shame and Diſhonour, bethought himſelf how he might betake himſelf to flight, the uncertain hope of deſired life. On the contrary part, Mahometes uſing moſt certain Spies, and advertiſed every hour of all the diſtreſſes of the Chriſtians, and thereby preſaging his future Victory; did by moſt diligent Watch and Troops of Horſemen, beſetting the paſſages far and near, moſt vigilantly attend every motion in the Chriſtian Camp; of purpoſe, that when the Army ſhould riſe and ſet forwards he after his wonted manner might in the Straits (fit for his purpoſe) ſet upon them being divided and diſperſed one from another, as they muſt needs in thoſe troubleſome paſſages; for he had placed his Horſemen and Footmen in the known Tracts of thoſe Woods, that he had ſhut up the Chriſtians as it were in a Toil. It was now almoſt midnight, and the Army taking no reſt, ſo carefully expected the ſign of ſetting forward, that every little delay ſeemed to moſt men both tedious and dangerous; ſo that many great Captains upon a cowardly conceit would ſtay no longer, but haſted to depart, and to go before the reſt, without any leave of the General. The beginning of this miſchievous departure, is reported to have been begun by the common Hungarian Horſemen, which knowing the paſſages and ways through the Woods, made moſt haſte to Walpo. Ladiſlaus Moreus diſhonourably following their example, went the other way to his Caſtle Zenthuerzebeth. After them followed in great haſte the Stirian Horſemen, without regard of ſhame, led by John Hunganot their General, who was appointed to have guarded the Rearward. Symon Biſhop of Zagrabia fled in like manner, known by his great Lanthorn wandring in the Wood; yet with leſs ſhame than the reſt, becauſe he being a Clergy man, thought it not to belong to his vocation to put on Arms, or to go into Battel. In the mean time it was fearfully told told to Cazzianer, That the Hungarian Horſemen were fled, and that Ladiſlaus and Hunganot, with the Stirian Troops were gone alſo; and that all the reſt of the Army not expecting the appointed ſignal, were in like manner upon flying; with which report, the cowardly and diſmaid General was ſo terrified, that he preſently got to Horſe, quite forgetting the ſignal he ſhould have given (for that he thought all the reſt, as he afterwards ſaid, to have been gone before) and as he was unarmed, betook himſelf to flight, leaving behind him for haſte his Tent ſtored with Plate and other rich Furniture. In this Tumult of them which ſo diſorderly fled, Lodronius that famous Captain was called up, and told by his Servants, that the General was fled and gone; to whom he anſwered again, Without doubt it cannot be ſo, that I ſhould be ſo ſhamefully and perfideouſly betraied of him; and ſo as a man meagred with long Watching and painful Labour, laid himſelf down again to ſleep. Not long after, Mahometes hearing the ſtir that was in the Camp, roſe with his Turks to aſſail his Enemies; yet to be better aſſured what the Enemy did, he thought it good to ſtay for day light, cauſing his men to ſtand ſtill in order of Battel, and with wonderful ſilence to expect the ſign of ſetting forward, which was given by the ſoft ſound of a Horſemans Drum paſſing through every Company. For the old Captain acquainted with many Battels againſt the Chriſtians, doubting of their feigned Flight, would not unadviſedly be drawn into Battel, but in a place commodious for his Souldiers; as one before fully ſet down (after his wonted manner) to perform that ſervice, not by the hazard of one ſet Battel, but by dallying off the time with often skirmiſhes, when he could take the Enemy at advantage. The day appearing, Lodronius again awaking, heard a certain confuſed noiſe of the Turks, and withal ſaw himſelf forſaken of the greateſt part of the Horſemen; whereupon he complained in vain, that he was betraied; yet for all that, he was nothing diſcouraged, but cheared up the Footmen, exhorting them to remember their former Valor, and to reſolve with themſelves only with Courage to overcome the danger, which hard Fortune had at that time brought them into; for that valiant men were rather to think of an honourable Death, than ſhameful Flight, whereby whether they ſhould eſcape with Life or not, was uncertain. As for himſelf, who had been their happy General in many Battels, he ſaid he was reſolutely ſet down by repulſing the Enemy to bring them into a place of ſafety, or elſe valiantly fighting together with them to end his days. As Lodronius was yet thus encouraging the Footmen, the Horſemen of Carinthia, Saxony, Auſtria and Bohemia, who mindful of their duty, had in vain expected the appointed ſignal from their General, came unto Lodronius, as unto the moſt valiant Captain, beſeeching him inſtead of their treacherous General, to take upon him the place; promiſing to do whatſoever he commanded, and to fight as men againſt thoſe Infidels for their Religion and King, ſo long as they were able to hold up their Weapons. Lodronius would in no caſe accept of that honour ſo frankly offered, modeſtly proteſting himſelf unworthy thereof; yet as a man of Courage, and moved with the hard eſtate of ſuch an Army, he with a ſolemn proteſtation promiſed to execute the place in the beſt manner he could, and ſo did as long as his Fortune gave him leave.

Lodronius encourageth the Footmen.

It is reported, that as Lodronius was encouraging the Footmen, and earneſtly inveighing againſt ſhameful flight, an old German Souldier was ſo bold, as bluntly, yet ſharply to ſay unto him; Worthy Lodronius, thou canſt never be thought to fly ſhamefully, with a Horſe of ſuch a prize under thee. Lodronius perceiving the old Souldiers meaning, alighted, and with his Sword hoxed his Horſe; ſaying aloud, This day, valiant Souldiers, ſhall you have me both your General and Fellow Souldier, fighting on foot as one of your ſelves; ſee now that you deceive not my expectation, but let us either with glorious Victory or honourable Death end this War together; yet ſo, as that we die not unrevenged. All his other Horſes he gave away unto ſuch ſick and wounded Souldiers as he beſt knew; amongſt whom was one Piecnard of Cremona, a Captain who was then in an extream Fit of an Ague, and had hardly eſcaped the hands of the Enemy. The firſt Troops of Horſemen and Bands of Footmen, were ſcarcely out of the Camp with their Enſigns; but the Turks coming with a hideous cry, aſſailed them on every ſide, and many ſharp skirmiſhes were given unto the Horſemen as they marched, with ſuch event that the Chriſtians ſometime valiantly receiving the Enemies charge, and ſometime charging them again, repulſed the proud Enemy ſtill buſie with them. In theſe continual skirmiſhes, Antius Macer Fuchſtat, General of the Carinthian Horſemen, fighting valiantly was ſlain, being, for his brave Armor ſuppoſed by the Turks to have been the General of the Field. And by like miſhap four and twenty Horſemen of great fame were alſo ſlain, and their Guidon taken; amongſt theſe were three Noblemen, Andreas Reſchius, Chriſtopherus Hernaus, and Georgius Himelbergus. In another place was made a moſt cruel skirmiſh with the Saxon Horſemen, and them of Miſnia, Thuringia and Franconia, who followed the Saxons Enſign; of theſe, fighting moſt valiantly, was ſlain above ſix and thirty worthy Captains, Lieutenants, or Ancients; and Chuenricus a principal Captain of the Saxons taken, who afterwards died in Bonds amongſt the Turks. Amongſt them which were ſlain, Sebaſtianaus Metheſcus, and Jacobus Scullemburgh were of greateſt Nobility. In like manner the Horſemen of Auſtria couragiouſly reſiſting the Enemy for a ſpace, were in the end overthrown; where amongſt them was ſlain two valiant Noblemen, Fettaius and Hoſchirchius, with divers other men of great place and reputation both in their own Country and abroad. But the greateſt ſlaughter was made amongſt the Bohemian Horſemen, upon whom (being diſordered by the Janizaries Harquebuſiers) the Turkiſh Troops of the old Garriſon Souldiers breaking in with their Scimeters and heavy Iron Maces, made a moſt bloody execution. The Battel of Footmen being ſore gauled and almoſt diſordered in their march by certain Companies of Janizaries and Archers of the Aſpi (who from a woody Bank of a Mariſh diſcharged their ſhot and arrows continually upon them, yet never coming to handy Blows) was on the other ſide ſo hardly charged by Amurathes with his Troops of Horſemen of Boſna, that being not able longer to keep order, it was at laſt by him broken and cut in pieces; where the Turks with their Swords and Hatchets ſlew the poor Chriſtians without mercy. Lodronius himſelf carried away with the breaking in and force of the Horſemen, was driven into a Mariſh; where after that he being ſore wounded, and almoſt faſt in the deep Mud, had done the uttermoſt of that his laſt endeavour; he by the fair entreaty of the Turks, perſwading him rather to yield, than there to be ſlain, ſo yielded himſelf, that he with three Companies which were with him, after they had laid down their Weapons, were all ſaved as valiant Souldiers; for now the mercileſs Turks, imbrued with the Chriſtian Blood, were weary of ſlaughter, and began greedily to ſeek after the Spoil, hunting after them (who flying diſperſedly, thought themſelves to have eſcaped the Enemies hands) with ſuch ſucceſs, that a great number of them was taken and led away for Slaves; few of the Footmen eſcaped, and almoſt all the reſt which were not fled before the Battel, were to be ſeen dead upon the ground.

An old German Souldier jeſteth at Lodronius.

The Horſemen diſcomfited by the Turks.

The Chriſtian Footmen overthrown.

This ſhameful Overthrow at Exek was reported to have exceeded the moſt grievous Overthrows that the Chriſtians had received in any former time; for the Flower both of Horſe and Foot there loſt by the raſhneſs and fault of an unlucky General, rather than by the Valour of the Enemy, ruthfully periſhed; ſo that many Provinces were filled with heavineſs and mourning. For it never chanced before (as was to be ſeen by the unfortunate Battels of Sigiſmund the Emperor, and King Ladiſlaus) that the Turks got ſuch a Victory without ſome loſs; ſo that they which fell almoſt unrevenged at Exek, may ſeem to have augmented that loſs by the great infamy thereof. Mahometes having thus almoſt without the Blood of his Souldiers, obtained ſo great a Victory, and taking the Spoil of the Chriſtian Camp, pitched his Tents in a little Meadow, being cleanſed of the dead Bodies, and after he had merrily feaſted with his Captains, commanded the chief Priſoners, the goodly Spoils, and faireſt Enſigns to be brought unto him; and openly commending the Captains who had that day done any good ſervice, commanding divers Bags of Mony to be brought unto him by the Receivers, he with his own hand rewarded the Souldiers, ſome with Gold, ſome with Silver, according to their deſerts; And cauſing all the Priſoners which were not common Souldiers to be brought forth, he diligently viewed them, and preſently cauſed every one of their names, and the office they bare, to be inrolled by his Clerks; and unto ſuch as brought in the Heads, Ears, or Hands of the Chriſtians with Rings upon them, he forthwith cauſed one Reward or another to be given. Lodronius, when as by reaſon of his deadly Wounds he was thought unable to endure travel, or to be brought alive with the other Priſoners to Conſtantinople, was ſlain by his Keepers, and his Head afterwards ſent thither. For as many noble Gentlemen (and amongſt others, Laurentius Streiperg and Dietmarus Loſeſtaine) have reported, (who ranſomed afterwards, returned home again to their Wives and Children) amongſt the Priſoners which were together with the fair Enſigns and other gallant warlike Furniture (eſpecially gilt Armor and Headpieces) preſented by Mahometes his Meſſengers to Solyman, three of the greateſt Captains Heads were in a ſilver Baſon there ſeen and known; which were the Heads of Paulus Bachitius the valiant Hungarian Captain, Antius Macer General of the Carinthian Horſemen, and Lodronius General of the Footmen; which after the Tyrant had looked aſquint upon, as abhorring that loathſome ſight, he with ſtern countenance commanded all the Priſoners to be ſlain. But upon the interceſſion of the Janizaries (who entreated for them, as valiant men, to whom they had at the time of their taking paſt their Faith, and might afterwards do him good ſervice) he changed his countenance, and ſaved many of them. But Cazzianer flying to his own Caſtle, was of all men accuſed as a wicked forſaker of his own Camp and Enſigns, and commonly railed upon, as the eternal infamy of his Country, and Author of the publick calamity; ſo that it was reported, that he durſt neither go abroad, nor ſhew his Face for ſhame. He was ſo generally hated, that infamous Libels, made againſt him and the other Captains which ſhamefully fled as he did, were commonly ſung in the Streets by Boys in all places of Germany. Wherewith he was ſo much grieved, that he requeſted of King Ferdinand, that he might ſafely come to the Court, to anſwer whatſoever could be laid againſt him; which his requeſt the King eaſily granted, and when he came to the Court, received him with doubtful countenance. But when the hearing of his cauſe was by the King ſomewhat longer protracted than he would have had it, and he in the mean time kept under ſafe cuſtody; impatient of ſuch delay, and half doubtful whether he he ſhould be quitted or condemned, thought it better to flie, than to abide the Trial. So feigning himſelf ſick, and ſcraping up by little and little with his Knife a brick pavement under his Bed, and ſo in the night getting out one Brick firſt, and then another, at length brake through the Vault, and with his Sheets letting himſelf down, eſcaped, having Poſt Horſes ready for him without the Caſtle. Not long after, as he was a man of an haſty and unconſtant nature, deſpairing of his eſtate, he fled to the Turks; Mahometes gladly receiving him, and beſides his great entertainment, promiſing him the Government of all Croatia in manner of a Tributary King, if he would faithfully ſerve Solyman, and help him in the ſubduing of the Cities of Auſtria. After he had agreed upon all the conditions of his revolt, that he might return to Mahometes with ſome more credit, he began boldly to deal with Nicholaus Sirenus a Nobleman of Croatia, and his dear Friend, as he ſuppoſed, to revolt with him; aſſuring him, that Solyman would deal as kindly with them both, as he had before with King John in the Kingdom of Hungary. Sirenus promiſed him he would, or at leaſt made as if he promiſed to do what he deſired, and ſo agreed as it were upon the matter, promiſing to go over with him to the Turk with a Troop of his beſt and moſt truſty Horſemen. But Sirenus conſidering with himſelf the hainouſneſs and impiety of ſo great an offence, changing his purpoſe, choſe rather to deal treacherouſly with his old Friend, fearing no ſuch thing in his Houſe, than to offend both againſt God and his Prince. Wherefore after he had well feaſted Cazzianer in his Houſe, he as a moſt cruel Hoaſt, cauſed him to be ſlain, and ſent his Head to King Ferdinand; in reward whereof he recieved of the Kings Gift Cazzianer his Caſtle, with all his Subſtance.

The Emperor, the Venetians, and the Biſhop of Rome, enter into a Confederation againſt the Turks.

In the mean time the Venetians, provoked by the Turks with divers injuries both by Sea and Land (when as Solyman but a little before hardly beſieging Corcyra, and with moſt barbarous Cruelty waſting the Iſland, had broken the League, and even then by his Lieutenant Caſſimes Baſſa beſieged Epidaurus and Nauplium, two of their Cities in Peloponneſus) reſolved without delay to make Wars likewiſe upon him, who for a ſmall Treſpas would admit of no Excuſe or Recompence. Whereunto they were all animated both by Charles the Emperor, and Paulus the Biſhop; who warned by the late and dangerous attempts of Solyman and Barbaruſſa, thought it more for the ſafety of their Eſtates, by giving aid to the Venetians, to keep the Turks buſied further off, than to ſuffer them to acquaint themſelves too much with the Ports of Italy and Sicilia. Wherefore all the Winter following they laboured by their Embaſſadors, to ſet down what number and what manner of Ships, what Souldiers, what Mony was to be provided, and how to be according to their Eſtates apportioned, for the ſetting forth of a ſtrong Fleet againſt the next Summer, to be ſent into Græcia againſt the Turks. At laſt it was agreed amongſt theſe confederate Princes, by their Embaſſadors at Rome, That the Emperor ſhould furniſh and ſet forth eighty two Gallies, the Venetians the like number, and the Biſhop thirty ſix, to make up the number of two hundred Gallies; that the Venetians ſhould lend unto the Biſhop, ſo many Gallies ready rigged, as he ſhould deſire, to be furniſhed by him with Mariners and Souldiers; and that the Emperor and the State of Genoa ſhould find ſufficient ſhipping for the tranſportation of the Land Forces and Victual. The Generals alſo of this great Fleet to be ſet forth, were at the ſame time appointed; Andreas Auria for the Emperor, Vincentius Capellus for the Venetians, and Marcus Grimmanus Patriarch of Aquilea for the Biſhop; to whom was joyned Paulus Juſtinianus one of the chief Senators, a man of great experience in Sea matters. It was alſo agreed, that Ferdinand Gonzaga Viceroy of Sicily, ſhould have the commanding of the Land Forces; and that whatſoever was got from the Turks in that Expedition in Græcia, the Iſlands, or Dalmatia, ſhould be all faithfully delivered to the Venetians, who had received ſo many injuries from the Turks. The Emperor alſo of his Liberality promiſed unto the other Confederates, that they ſhould for reaſonable price have as much Wheat as they would out of Sicilia, without paying any Cuſtom.

Solyman underſtanding of this confederation and preparation made againſt him by theſe Chriſtian Princes, commanded Barbaruſſa his Admiral to make ready his Fleet to go againſt theſe Enemies, and to do all the harm he could upon the Iſlands ſubject to the Venetian State. Which thing Barbaruſſa with great care and diligence in ſhort time performed; and ſo with an hundred and thirty Gallies in moſt warlike manner appointed, with the firſt of the Spring, in the year 1538. departed from Helleſpontus directly to Crete; where having paſſed the Promontory of Gyamus, which at this day is called Sparta, he undaviſedly landed moſt part of his men, to have ſurpriſed the City Canea, which was in ancient time called Sydonia. But Grittus one of the Venetian Senators then kept the City with a ſtrong Garriſon; who from the Walls and Bulwarks thereof ſo plagued the Turks with great and ſmall Shot, and the ſallying out of two Companies of Italians, that Barbaruſſa having loſt many of his men, was fain to retire again to his Fleet in ſuch haſt, that he left behind him a thouſand of his Turks, which were gone further into the Iſland after Booty, who were afterwards all ſlain by them of Crete. After that, he attempted to have taken divers places in the Iſland, and was every where notably repulſed. With the City of Candia, whereof the Iſland now taketh name, and was in ancient time called Cytheum, he durſt not meddle; but ſailing almoſt round about the Iſland, took only Cecilia, a little Town before forſaken of the Inhabitants, which he ſet on fire, and ſo departed from Crete; for he was advertiſed, That Vicentius Capellius the Venetian Admiral, who was now come to Corcyra, would in ſhort time come to relieve them of Crete. Auria, Admiral of the Emperors Fleet, paſſing the Strait of Meſſina, came to Corcyra alſo, and there joyned with the Venetians. The Chriſtian Fleet was then ſo great that it was thought the Turks durſt not meet it at Sea, but by all means ſhun to give Battel. For Barbaruſſa than lay with the Turks Fleet in the Bay of Ambracia, expecting when the Chriſtians ſhould enter the ſtrait entrance thereof, where he had on both ſides placed divers Pieces of great Ordnance, to have ſunk them in their coming in; for Grimmanus the Patriarch, a little before departing from Corcyra, had with the great Biſhops Gallies begun to beſiege Preveſa, a Town upon the Promontory of Auctium faſt by that Strait; and landing ſome of his Souldiers, with three great Pieces of Artillery ſo battered the Caſtle of Preveſa, that he was like enough to have taken it, had not the Turks from Ætolia come to relieve it with a ſtrong Power both of Horſe and Foot. Wherefore the Patriarch ſhipping again his Men and Ordnance, returned to the Fleet at Corcyra, not repenting him of his journey, for that he had well viewed the Straits of that Bay, and all the Enemies Fleet riding at Anchor within it. Upon the return of the Patriarch, and relation made, what he had both done and ſeen, the great Commanders of the Chriſtian Fleet entred into Counſel, what courſe were beſt to take for their better proceeding in that great action. Gonzaga the Viceroy, General of the Land Forces, was of opinion, That it were beſt to land the Souldiers and great Ordnance, and with all their Force to aſſault the Caſtle of Preveſa; which once taken, and their Ordnance there planted, the Enemies Fleet might in the Bay, be utterly defeated, for all that paſſage to Sea might eaſily be taken from them, by ſinking of one of the great Ships in the mouth of the Strait, and by moaring there of three great Galleons full of Artillery; ſo that if Barbaruſſa would deſperately adventure to come out, he muſt needs be ſunk in the mouth of the Bay. Whereunto Auria replied, That Gonzaga his Counſel was in words and ſhew glorious, but to put in execution moſt dangerous; for that firſt to land the Souldiers and great Artillery, he ſaid was a thing too too full of hazard and peril; for it was to be thought, that the Turks in Ætolia would as they had before done, come with ſpeed with their Horſemen to relieve the beſieged in the Caſtle; whoſe Force the Chriſtian Footmen could hardly abide. Beſides that, if the Fleet ſhould by force of Weather be conſtrained to leave that Coaſt, (as it well might, Autumn now coming faſt on) after the Souldiers were landed; From whence ſhould they then get Victual in the Enemies Country? or what relief ſhould they hope for, if they ſhould hap to be diſtreſſed; being on every ſide beſet with their Enemies, and their Friends by Tempeſt driven from them? Wherefore he thought it beſt, if the Enemy could not be drawn out of the Bay to Battel, to go directly into the Bay of Naupactum, and to take that Town which was not greatly fortified, and to ranſack and ſpoil all the Towns, even to the bottom of the Bay of Corinth. Which the Grecians in the Fleet, ſaid might eaſily be done; by taking of which courſe it might ſo fall out, that Barbaruſſa moved with the danger of his Friends, would for ſhame come out and joyn with them in Battel. This Counſel of Auria was beſt liked both of Capellius and the Patriarch, being far more deſirous to fight with their Enemies at Sea, than at Land.

Auria having put in order his Fleet, came to Preveſa, and ſo to the Strait of the Bay of Ambracia, where he ſo placed the whole Fleet, which was in number two hundred and fifty Sail, that it might eaſily of the Enemy be numbred. Which ſight (as it was reported) wonderfully troubled Barbaruſſa; who although he was of a couragious diſpoſition, and ſuch a man as greatly feared not either the Valour or Martial Diſcipline of the Chriſtians, yet was he exceedingly moved with the ſight of ſo great a Fleet ſo well appointed; for a greater had not of long time been ſeen in the Ionian Sea. So that an Eunuch of Solymans Court, ſent by him as Barbaruſſa his Companion, ſeeing him to delay the time as a man half diſcouraged, did with moſt uncivil and proud words take him up, becauſe he would not forthwith go out of the Bay and fight with the Chriſtians which lay at the mouth thereof daring of them: wherein he was not (as he ſaid) to regard his own ſafety (who as a Coward could not Endure ſight of the Enemy) but the honour of Solyman his Soveraign, who would not take it well, to have the glory of his name ſtained with ſo ſhameful a delay: For if he were a valiant and martial man, as he profeſſed himſelf to be, he ought never to deſpair of Victory; and if it ſhould ſo fall out, that Fortune ſhould frown upon them, and not anſwer to their deſires, yet ſhould not Solyman therefore want Captains and Souldiers better than they, if they were overcome; and the Woods of Pontus would afford him Timber enough to build twice ſo great and ſtrong a Fleet. And for a concluſion, the inſolent Eunuch willed Barbaruſſa to beware, that whilſt he feared a moſt honourable death (which was uncertain, though the Battel were loſt) he drew not upon himſelf the certain danger of a moſt ſhameful death by the diſpleaſure of Solyman.

Barbaruſſa his anſwer to Salec concerning the Eunuchs ſpeech.

At which Speech Barbaruſſa turning himſelf about to Salec, one of the Arch-Pyrats, a famous Seaman, ſaid unto him, We muſt for ought that I can ſee, moſt valiant and faithful Captain, adventure this Battel, although it be at too much diſadvantage; leſt haply we periſh by the complaints of this barking demy-man. And ſo preſently commanded all his Fleet to weigh Anchor, at the ſame time that Auria had hoiſed ſail, and was on his way toward the Bay of Naupactus, thinking that the Enemy durſt not for fear have come out of the Bay of Ambracia. Auria keeping on his Courſe, was come to Leucade, when the Enemies Fleet was deſcried out of the top of Bondelmerius Galleon, to be come out of the Bay, and to make towards them, keeping cloſe by the Shore; which manner of Courſe the crafty Turk, miſdoubting his own ſtrength, held of purpoſe, that if he ſhould chance to be overmatched by the Chriſtians, he might turn the Prow of his Gallies upon them, and running the Poops aground, ſo to land his men and great Ordnance, and from Land as he might defend his Fleet; accounting it a leſs loſs (if the worſt ſhould chance) to loſe the Gallies, than the Men.

Barbaruſſa putteth out of the Bay of Ambracia and followeth Auria.

Auria ſomewhat troubled with this ſuddain coming out of the Enemy, as with a thing which he then leaſt expected, yet notably ſtaid himſelf, and commanded all the Fleet to prepare themſelves to Battel, and to follow his Admiral Gally. Now all the Turks Fleet was come into the open Sea in ſuch order, that Barbaruſſa himſelf was in the middle Battel; where his Admiral Gally was to be ſeen with many purple Flags and Streamers flying gallantly in the Wind; on his right hand was Tabaches, and Salec on the left, both men of great fame, every one of them having almoſt like number of Gallies, which were in all an hundred and fifty. Unto the middle Battel were joyned two Wings in ſuch order, that which way ſoever the Admiral turned, they turning alſo, ſtill repreſented the form of a flying Eagle; ſo that (as Auria himſelf afterward confeſſed) a more firm or orderly Fleet could not have been brought out by any expert Captain. Before the Fleet, came about twenty nimble Gallies conducted by Drogut (or Dragut) an Arch Pyrat, famous afterwards for the great harm he did unto the Chriſtians. Capellius the Venetian Admiral came in his long Boat to Auria, requeſting him, That he with his Gallies might give the firſt charge upon the Enemy; to whom Auria gave great thanks, and praiſing his forwardneſs, requeſted him to follow him, to whom he would in good time give a ſign what he would have done. The foremoſt of the Turks light Gallies was now come to the great Galleon of Bondelmerius, which was the foremoſt of the Chriſtian Fleet, whereunto were ſent alſo certain Gallies from Salec, to help to aſſail that tall Ship; which ſhooting afar off, did no harm, neither Bondelmerius them; who would not ſuffer one Piece to be diſcharged; for he being an expert Seaman, and loath to ſhoot in vain, expected that they ſhould come nearer unto him, and then upon the ſuddain to diſcharge all his great Ordnance upon them. Neither was he deceived in that his expectation, for the Turks coming near unto him, were ſo overwhelmed with the great and ſmall Shot out of the Galleon, that they were glad to ſtay their Courſe, and retire. In the mean time Auria called back again the Ships which were gone before, and cauſed his Galleon to be towed out, and by Boats on purpoſe ſent out, charged the Captains of the Gallies to make themſelves ready to fight, upon ſignal given by the ſound of the Trumpet, and diſplaying of the Admirals Enſign; yet was not Auria of mind to fight with his Gallies without his Ships. Which thing the crafty Enemy well perceived, and therefore ſought by all means to joyn Battel with the Gallies, before the coming in of the tall Ships, which were as Caſtles in reſpect of the Gallies; for it was then ſuch a calm, that the Ships were not able to keep way with the Gallies, and the ſmooth Water ſeemed to offer a fit opportunity for Battel; which ſo well pleaſed the Patriarch, that many heard him crying aloud to Auria to give the ſignal; and marvelled much why he deferred to give Battel. For he fetching a great compaſs, and hovering about his Ships, with his Gallies kept ſuch a Courſe, that many thought he would upon a ſuddain have done ſome ſtrange and unexpected exploit upon the Enemy; but Auria held that ſtrange Courſe of purpoſe to have drawn the Enemies Gallies within the danger of his great Ships, who thundering amongſt them with their great Ordnance, might have eaſily ſore beaten and diſordered them, and opened a way unto his Gallies to have gotten a moſt certain Victory. But the crafty old Turk doubting by the ſtrangeneſs of Auria's Courſe, to be circumvented with ſome fineneſs, changed his Courſe, and lay ſtill with his own Squadron of Gallies, warily expecting to what purpoſe that ſtrange Courſe of the Enemy tended. In the mean time, both the Wings of his Fleet had a little before Sun-ſet, begun in divers places to encounter with the Chriſtians; ſome were in vain ſtill aſſailing Bondelmerius his great Galleon; others with their great Ordnance had ſo ſore beaten two tall Ships (wherein Buccanigra and Mongaia, two Spaniſh Captains were imbarked with their Companies) that they were given for loſt, many of the Souldiers and Mariners being ſlain. Two other Ships loaded with Victual, the one of Venice, the other of Dalmatia, were burnt by the Turks, and ſome few of the men ſaved by their Ship-boats, and by ſwiming to the Ships neareſt unto them. In the ſhutting in of the Evening Salec took two Gallies ſtragling behind the reſt of the Fleet, whereof Mozenicus a Venetian, and Bibiena a Florentine, were Captains. After theſe Gallies, was taken alſo the Ship of Aloyſius Figaroa a Spaniard, although his Souldiers had for a time fought moſt valiantly. In this Ship, with Figaroa the Father, was taken his Son, a young Gentleman, and beautified with all the good gifts of Nature; who afterwards preſented to Solyman, turned Turk; and growing in Credit in Solymans Chamber, after three years miſerable impriſonment, obtained his poor Fathers Liberty, and ſent him well rewarded home again into Spain. Whilſt both the Fleets were thus expecting how they might to their moſt advantage joyn Battel, ſuddainly aroſe a great Tempeſt of Thunder, Lightning, and Rain, with a freſh Gale of Eaſterly Wind; whereupon the Chriſtians ſeeing the Turks hoiſing up their ſmall Sails, without delay hoiſed up both ſmall and great to clear themſelves of the Enemy, and with that fair Wind returned again to Corcyra; ſo diſorderly and in ſuch haſte, ſparing neither neither Sail nor Oar, that it ſeemed rather a ſhameful Flight; than an orderly Retreat. So that Auria, a man of ſo great fame at Sea, as that he was called a ſecond Neptune, was that day accounted no Captain. It is reported, that Barbaruſſa with the ſame Wind purſued the Chriſtians a while, and being not able longer to ſee what Courſe they held, by reaſon of the darkneſs of the night, to have ſtaid his Courſe; for the Admirals had cauſed their Lights which they uſed to carry in the Poops of their Gallies, to be put out. Whereat Barbaruſſa heartily laughing, ſaid oftentimes in the Spaniſh Tongue; Auria hath therefore put out his light, the better in the dark to hide his Flight; noting him in ſuch a fear, as that he without regard of honour, ſought only how by Flight to eſcape. When they were come to Corcyra, they were all generally of opinion, That by the benefit of that ſuddain Storm they had avoided a great danger. The Imperials, eſpecially the Genoways, to excuſe Auria, imputed the cauſe of ſo ſhameful a Flight unto the Venetians, who would not from the beginning receive any Spaniſh Souldiers into their Gallies, the better to have withſtood the Enemy; and that Auria therefore doubting of the Venetians, refrained from joyning Battel; and the rather, becauſe that upon the coming forth of the Turks Fleet, they had hoiſed up their Sails tied up to the Yards with ſmall Lines, which they might at their pleaſure eaſily cut, and ſet Sail to flie which way they would. Shortly after came Barbaruſſa with all his Fleet to the Iſland of Paxus, about four Leagues from Corcyra Eaſtwards, braving the Chriſtians as if he would have fought with them, if they durſt come out. Whereat Gonzaga the Viceroy fretting, went to every one of the three great Commanders, requeſting them for the honour of the Chriſtians, to repreſs that proud Turks inſolency. At laſt the matter was brought to that paſs, that the Venetians having taken in certain Companies of Spaniards, the Fleet ſhould be divided into four Squadrons, and ſo to give Battel. But this conſultation was ſo long protracted, that Barbaruſſa fearing the tempeſtuous Autumn Weather, hoiſed ſail, and about the ſeventh of October returned again into the Bay of Ambracia. After the departure of Barbaruſſa, the Generals of the Chriſtian Fleet directed their Courſe into the Bay called Sinus Rizonicus, to beſiege Caſtronovum, or New-Caſtle, a ſtrong Town of the Turks ſtanding in that Bay, and bordering upon the Venetian Senators. The Inhabitants were part Dalmatians, part Epirots, which had renounced the Chriſtian Religion, and ſome Turks, living moſt part by Merchandiſe. Unto this Town the Chriſtians laid Siege, and in ſhort time won it, where they had a great Prey, and a wonderful number of Captives of all ſorts. Three days after the taking of the Town, the Caſtle was alſo yielded by the Turks Garriſon; covenanting in vain to depart with Life and Liberty.

This Town taken by common force, ought of right by the Covenants of the League to have been delivered to the Venetians; yet was it for all that by Auria and Gonzaga reſerved for the Emperor, and Franciſcus Sarmentus with four thouſand Spaniards all old Souldiers, left there in Garriſon; Capellius the Venetian Admiral urging in vain the right of the Venetians. Which thing ſo much greived the Senate, (who ever had the ambitious Spaniard in ſuſpition, and now aſſured of him as an evil Neighbour to their Town of Catarum) that repenting themſelves of the League with the Emperor, they decreed to ſue to Solyman for Peace; which they afterwards eaſily obtained, for a ſhort ſpace, by Laurentius Grittus their Dukes Son, and by the help of Antonius Rincus the French Kings Embaſſador; who then lying at Conſtantinople, in good time told the great Baſſa's, that the League the Venetians had made with the Emperor, was made without the conſent of the greateſt part of the Senate, and that War taken in hand againſt moſt of their Wills.

Auria neglecting to purſue Barbaruſſa, returns into Italy, to the grief of the Venetian Admiral.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Barbaruſſa put to Sea again to have relieved Caſtronovum; but being at Sea, many of his Gallies were by the violence of a ſuddain Tempeſt driven upon the Acroceraunian Rocks, and there caſt away. It is reported that he loſt there twenty thouſand men, which with the broken pieces of his Gallies were found almoſt all alongſt the Coaſt of Dalmatia. This Shipwrack being certainly known, Capellius would have perſwaded Auria to have preſently purſued Barbaruſſa ſo diſtreſſed; which motion Gonzaga well liked, as a man deſirous by ſome notable exploit to recompence the diſgrace before received at Leucade. But Auria for divers cauſes not liking of the matter, was ſo ſet down upon his return to Italy, that he preſently hoiſed ſail, leaving the Venetian Admiral in ſuch a rage, that he deteſted himſelf, for ſubmitting himſelf to another mans power; and wiſhed the Captains there preſent never to ſubject themſelves to the command of a Stranger, foraſmuch as that Genoway, either upon cowardiſe or malicious mind, as an old Enemy to the Venetian State, would not proſecute ſo manifeſt a Victory, but put up ſo ſhameful a diſgrace as he had before received. But of all this Auria made ſmall reckoning, referring all that he both ſaid and did, ſo far unto the Emperors commodity, that Valerius Urſinus a Noble Gentleman then ſerving in the Venetian Pay, merrily ſaid, That Auria had done nothing but wiſely and politiquely, in ſetting the Venetians together by the Ears with the Turks, and opening a Gate for a long War, whether the Venetians would or not; ſo as the Emperor himſelf could not have better wiſhed, and that without the loſs of one Gally. For it was thought by many, that the long Wars betwixt the Turks and the Venetians, would ſort to the great good of the Emperor; when as the Venetians worn out and ſpent with thoſe long and chargeable Wars againſt ſo mighty an Enemy, ſhould be ſtripped of their Lands and Territories either by force, or ſome hard compoſition wrung from them by neceſſity.

Barbaruſſa ſent by Solyman to beſiege Caſtronovum.

Caſtronovum thus taken, and Sarmentus with a Garriſon of four thouſand Spaniards there placed, as is aforeſaid, and the Chriſtian Fleet diſſolved, Solyman took the matter ſo grievouſly, that he determined to beſiege it again both by Sea and Land; and in his fury, cauſed Nauplium and Epidaurus, two of the Venetian Cities in the Country of Peloponneſus, to be ſtraitly beſieged. Yet took he ſingular pleaſure, that Barbaruſſa his Admiral, in all reſpects worſe furniſhed, had driven out of the Sea the great Fleet of the Chriſtians, which he before that time had made too great account of. Wherefore in the beginning of the Spring, which was in the year 1539, Barbaruſſa by his commandment repaired again his Fleet, and notably furniſhed it with all manner of warlike Proviſion; manning his Gallies for the moſt part with Janizaries and other ſuch ſelect Souldiers. With this Fleet Barbaruſſa (Summer well now come on) departed out of Helleſpontus, and came to the Bay Rizonicus; at which time alſo Ulames the Perſian then Governor of Boſna, ſhewed himſelf with his Forces upon the Mountains, as he had in charge from Solyman. Barbaruſſa before he entred the Straits of the Bay, ſent before him Dragut and Corſetus, two notable Pyrats, with thirty Galliots, who landing their Men near unto Caſtronovum (as they were commanded) were valiantly encountred by Sarmentus with his Spaniards, and forced again to their Galliots, many of the Turks being ſlain and taken Ptiſoners. After that came Barbaruſſa with ninety Gallies, and three tall Ships which carried the Artillery for Battery and other neceſſary proviſion for the Camp; where he ſpent three days in landing his great Ordnance and caſting up Trenches, which could not be done but by night by reaſon of the continual ſhot out of the Town; wherewith the Spaniards had in that three days ſpace ſlain above a thouſand Turks; amongſt whom was Agus Hariadenus, who had made himſelf as it were a King at Taiorea, a City near Tripolis in Africa; whoſe death much grieved Barbaruſſa, as one of his moſt ancient and beſt Friends. At length Barbaruſſa having caſt up his Trenches, landed four and fifty great Pieces of Artillery for Battery; whereof he gave a fourth part to Ulames to batter the Town on the North ſide, whilſt he in the mean time, in three divers places battered the Eaſt ſide, and Salec from Sea with ten Gallies, did morning and evening batter another part of the Wall. Whilſt Sarmentus was thus in ſo many places aſſailed, and did what was poſſible to have repaired the Braches; the Turks by force took one of the Towers, where after they had diſplaied their Enſigns, they from thence with their ſhot ſore troubled the Spaniards. At the ſame time alſo, Ulames had made a Breach, and was ready on the other ſide of the City to enter. In which extremities, Sarmentus ſeeing no means longer to defend the City, commanded the hurt Souldiers to get them into the Caſtle below, and the reſt with him to take the Market-place, there to die together like Men; where the Turks ſtraight way breaking in on every ſide upon them, made a moſt cruel and bloody Fight, wherein the Spaniards overwhelmed with ſhot, and the multitude of their Enemies, were ſlain almoſt every Man. Sarmentus wounded in the Face with three Arrows, and wearied with long fight, ſeeing Sancius Fria a Captain ready to flie, ſharply reproved him, and catching him by the hand, made him there to tarry by it, until they were both together ſlain. Many valiant Captains were there loſt, whoſe names for brevity I omit. Aloyſius Arius, and certain other Captains, who together with the wounded Souldiers were got into the Caſtle, ſeeing no means to defend the place, yielded themſelves; whom Barbaruſſa according to his promiſe, took to mercy in ſparing their lives, yet carried them away into Captivity to Conſtantinople. The dead Body of Sarmentus could not be known amongſt ſo many heaps of the dead, although Barbaruſſa had cauſed moſt diligent ſearch to be made for it, and offered great ſums of Mony and liberty alſo, to whoſoever could recover it; being deſirous to have ſent his Head for a Preſent to Solyman. Barbaruſſa proud of this Victory, began forthwith to gape after Cattarus a City of the Venetians in the bottom of the ſame Bay; and thereupon writ threatning Letters to Joannes Bembus one of the Venetian Senators then Governour of the City, preſently to deliver the City; which he would (as he ſaid) otherwiſe aſſault by force. Whereunto Bembus anſwered again by Letters, that in ſo doing he ſhould violate the League lately made with Solyman, and that he ſhould find him ready by force to repel his Forces. Wherewith Barbaruſſa diſpleaſed ſent certain Gallies into the bottom of the Bay; who diſcharging certain great Pieces at the City, made ſhew as if they had come to beſiege it. At whom Bembus a Man of good courage cauſed as many more like Pieces to be diſcharged, and ſhewed his Men upon the Walls: Which thing Barbaruſſa perceiving ſtaid his courſe, and calling back his Gallies, returned to Caſtronovum, from whence (better appeaſed with Preſents afterwards ſent from Bembus) he departed out of that Bay.

The long Wars betwixt Charles the Emperor and Francis the French King, were now well pacified, and ſuch friendſhip (at leaſtwiſe in ſhew) now grown betwixt theſe two great Princes, that moſt Men thought that all other quarrels laid aſide, they would now at length with united Forces go againſt the great and dangerous Enemy of Chriſtendom; which opinion not altogether of the wiſer ſort believed, was yet at this time wonderfully confirmed by many extraordinary and rare courteſies then paſſing betwixt them, which concern not this Hiſtory; as alſo, in that two of their moſt famous Captains, Alphonſus Vaſtius, and Hanebald, were as it were with one conſent by them both ſent Embaſſadors to Venice, to have drawn the Venetians into the Confederation of that War againſt the Turk. Which two renowned Captains coming to Venice, moſt gallantly accompanied, were by Landus the Duke, and the whole State, with great magnificence received, the people after their wonted manner flocking together in every place to behold them ſo noble Captains ſent from ſuch mighty Princes; but eſpecially Vaſtius, whoſe Fame having many times before filled their Ears, made them now the more deſirous to ſatisfie their Eies alſo with the beholding of his tall and comely Perſon. Which two famous Captains admitted into the Senate, for that purpoſe fully aſſembled, and Audience given; Vaſtius ariſing from the Dukes ſide, in theſe or like words delivered their Embaſſage.

Alphonſus Vaſtius and Hanebaldus ſent Embaſſadors from the Emperor and the French King to the State of Venice.

Vaſtius his Oration to the Venetian Senate.

It is come to paſs (as I ſuppoſe) by the great providence of Almighty God, and of all the Divine Powers (moſt noble Duke and honourable Senators) that two of the moſt mighty Kings of Europe, who of late had of long time made mortal Wars one upon another, touched with the Zeal of Religion, are become great Friends; undoubtedly to that purpoſe only, that having made a firm Peace, they may bring ſuch a general quietneſs to the long troubled and afflicted State of Chriſtendom, as beſt beſeemeth their greatneſs; and taking in hand a ſacred War, to revenge ſo many calamities received from the Infidel. That this might be made known unto you (moſt noble Venetians) theſe mighty Monarchs have ſent us hither in good time to kindle in you the like Zeal, wherewith it is well known you have always for the honour of your State been enflamed; for you of all others, which are of ſuch power and valour at Sea, they wiſh for, as their Fellows and Confederates in this ſacred War and hoped Victory, and think you worthy, which ſhould enjoy the eſpecial fruit of all that labour. Foraſmuch as the Chriſtian Forces once renewed, and ſo great and ſtrong a Fleet once aſſembled, every Man ſeeth that the Turks muſt needs be too weak; although they brag, that they carried away the Victory of late at Actium, when as they then eſcaped the victorious hands of our Men, not by their own Valour, but by the unexpected hap of a ſuddain Storm. For all the powers of Heaven and Earth, and of the Sea alſo, will be propitious unto us, uniting ſo great Forces, in regard of our ſacred Religion; and will ſo take away the Hearts of the Infidels, that they ſhall learn to be overcome. As for our land Forces, we are to hope nothing but well, foraſmuch as unto thoſe which the Emperor of late brought into the Field at Vienna, and cauſed the Turkiſh Emperor to flie, ſhall be joyned not only all the Horſemen and Infantry of France (a wonderful ſtrength,) but Sigiſmund alſo King of Polonia will without delay bring forth his Armies, wherewith he hath been uſed in the quarrel of the Chriſtian Religion happily to fight againſt the Infidels; ſo that it is not to be doubted of a moſt certain and aſſured Victory. Wherefore the victorious Emperor and moſt Chriſtian King Francis moſt inſtantly requeſt you to enter into the like godly Cogitations, conceived for the general good of the Chriſtian Name, and religiouſly to embrace the hope of a moſt true and glorious Victory; and further exhort you, by a wholeſome Decree to avert your religious and couragious Hearts from the friendſhip of the Infidels; for it may worthily ſeem unto your moſt honourable minds, a moſt foul and ſhameful thing, to have renewed your League, and to have preferred an infamous and uncertain Peace, before a moſt religious and juſt War. Neither doth it beſeem this moſt wealthy State to be terrified from that which is good and right, with any Charges of War, be they never ſo great; for if we ſhall once overcome, which is incident to this preſent and long wiſhed occaſion, we ſhall by the profit of one Victory, either by Sea or Land, to your incomparable praiſe recompence all the Loſſes by us in former times received.

The anſwer of the Duke to Vaſtius.

Whereunto the Duke in the name of the whole State anſwered, That there never happened any thing at any time unto the Venetian Senate more honourable, for the manner of the Embaſſage, or for the publick ſecurity of their State, more to be deſired than the hope of ſuch a Peace; after that two moſt mighty Kings by two ſuch famous Captains their Embaſſadors, did certifie them of their attonement and aſſured Peace, moſt glorious to themſelves, to their eternal praiſe, wholeſome alſo to the Venetian State, beſet with ſo many dangers, and wonderfully to be wiſhed for of all the other Princes of Chriſtendom, if they would ſincerely and religiouſly with their Forces by common conſent united, reſolve upon that ſacred War; for then would not the Venetians be wanting to themſelves or the Chriſtian Common-weal, but end the League they had with the Turk, not with a diſhonourable Peace, but with Arms and Victory. Wherefore it was to be requeſted of Almighty God by Prayer, That thoſe puiſſant Kings would with religious and happy event ſpeedily and ſeriouſly fulfil all that hope of Peace, which they had by their mutual diſcourſes and embracings in ſhew promiſed unto the World.

In few days after, certain of the ſelect Senators ſitting in Council, after the manner of that State, called the Embaſſadors unto them, and asked them, Whether they knew any thing of the Articles and Capitulations wherein that League and Confederation was to be concluded? And by the way, Whether they thought the Emperor in regard of that Peace would give unto the French Kings Son the Dukedom of Millain, as was reported? Whereunto Hanebald the French Embaſſador anſwering nothing, Vaſtius ſaid, that he knew nothing more, but that the two great Princes had agreed of betwixt themſelves, and that the Emperor had deſired the Peace, as one willing to help the afflicted and declining State of the Chriſtian Common-weal; which thing any Man might ſee could not be effected or brought to paſs, but that the Emperor muſt in many things yield to the requeſts of the French King, and redeem his good will; for his noble mind (ſaid he) worthy Senators, can eaſily make light of the greateſt loſs of his own things, when he foreſeeth a large way opened thereby to eternal Fame and Glory. Theſe words were very glorious and gracious to the Hearers; but they, as Men of great experience, could not let it ſink in their minds, that the Emperor whom they had often deeply ſounded, would ever part with the Dukedom of Millain, which only thing the French King required, and had for the recovering thereof unfortunately ſtriven almoſt twenty years, to the trouble and diſquiet of a great part of the World. The Nobility and Authority of this Embaſſage more moved the Senate than did the other former Embaſſadors, Didaco Mendoza, a Spaniard, and Gulielmus Pellicerius, a French-man, then both preſent; yet was it much ſuſpected by the Venetians, becauſe it contained no certain reſolution, but only the bare hope of a future Peace; ſo that it was by many Men ſuppoſed to be but a matter deviſed to deceive others, and to ſerve the Emperors turn to his great profit. Yet all the cunning ſeemed to reſt in this Point, That the Venetians led on with the hope of this Leage, ſhould neglect the renewing of the League they had the year before taken with Solyman, which was now almoſt expired. Upon which uncertainty of other Mens reſolutions, the grave Senators thought too dangerous a matter to depend.

The Venetian Senators diverſly affected towards the confederation with the Emperor and the French King, againſt Solyman.

Upon this queſtion of this new League and Confederation to be made with theſe Chriſtian Princes againſt the Turk, the Senate was wonderfully divided; ſome favouring the Emperors requeſt, enveighing againſt the renewing of that ſhameful League with the Infidels, which they ſaid was nothing elſe, but as much as in them lay to betray unto them the other parts of Chriſtendom, and eſpecially Italy, deſtitute of their help, and yet not to be obtained without great charge; and with many reaſons urged the honourable Confederation with theſe Chriſtian Princes; others of a deeper reach, conſidering what infinite harms they had from time to time received by falling out with the Turks, and ſuſpecting alſo the Emperors drift; and joyning thereunto the conſideration of the great Dearth then reigning in the City, which was not to be relieved but out of Macedonia and Græcia, the Turks Countries; the Emperor having at that time as it were of purpoſe impoſed ſo great a Cuſtom upon all Corn to be tranſported out of Sicily, that the very Cuſtom came to as much as both the price of the Corn and the Fraight together; all which miſchiefs they ſaid were to be prevented by renewing the League with Solyman. This matter was with great heat debated in the Senate too and fro, either part having great Fautors; ſo that the Senators ſpent almoſt whole Winter nights in the Court, diſcourſing and conſulting what were beſt to be done; but whatſoever was there ſaid or decreed, was forthwith by one of the Factions or other made known, not only to the Embaſſadors preſent in the City, but by Letters alſo diſcovered into Provinces far off; a thing never before in that State known, which had ever uſed as it were with a religious ſilence to keep ſecret whatſoever was there decreed. Which thing Marcus Foſcarus, an old Senator and a Man of great wiſdom perceiving, ſaid openly, That the State was betrayed by the multitude, and corruption of voices, and muſt needs ſhortly periſh, if it were not ſpeedily committed to the grave and faithful judgment of ſome few; for there was almoſt two hundred of them which gave voices, reducing the Multitude to the number of fifty, who for their experience and love towards their Country, were holden of Men of greateſt gravity and ſecrecy; ſo was the madneſs of many ſtayed by the diſcretion of a few. But Foſcarus ſhortly after fell into ſuch hatred of the Multitude, grieving to be be as light headed Men without diſcretion, ſo excluded out of the Council; that he was by the voices of the Multitude firſt thruſt out of the Council himſelf; and by them kept a great while after from all the Preferments and Honours of the City; being indeed one of the graveſt Senators, and a Man of deepeſt judgment. Which diſgrace turned afterward to his great honour and credit, as one that had foreſeen much, after they were once found out and condemned which had traiterouſly revealed the Secrets of the State.

The Venetians ſent Aloyſius Badoerius their Embaſſador to Solyman, to conclude a Peace.

But this long conſultation concerning the Confederation, came to this end, That the Senators doubting the Union of thoſe two great Princes, and yet willing to expect the event, decreed forthwith to ſend three Embaſſadors; whereof two ſhould be ſent to the Emperor and the French King to diſcover their deſigns; and the third, which was Aloyſius Badoerius, a wiſe and well ſpoken Man, was with all ſpeed diſpatched away to Solyman, to prevent the fame of the diſtruſt to be conceived of the agreement of theſe great Chriſtian Princes; and if he could by any means, to ſpare for no Coſt, to ſave unto the Venetians their Cities of Nauplium and Epidaurus, which Solyman required of them before he would grant them Peace. Which if it could not be obtained of the proud and crafty Tyrant, then to yield unto neceſſity, and to conclude a Peace with him upon any conditions; which courſe the Decem-Viri thought to be moſt expedient for the State; yet concerning the yielding up of the Cities, they gave him ſecret inſtructions and warrant, fearing forſooth the force and tumult of the headſtrong Multitude, who if they had known any ſuch thing, would undoubtedly thereupon have taken occaſion to have croſſed and overthrown that moſt wholeſome Decree; for there was no doubt, that if they had delayed the matter, and ſought for Peace too late, but that Solyman would upon another Mans weakneſs and neceſſity have encreaſed his inſatiable deſire, and not granted them Peace, being brought low and forſaken, except they would deliver unto him the Iſlands of Cephalenia, Zacinthus, and Corcyra, a matter no leſs grievous than the deſtruction of the very City of Venice it ſelf. So that the great Embaſſadors Vaſtius and Hanebald, who came of purpoſe to have hindred the League with the Turk, by their great diligence wrought nothing more effectually, than that the Venetians the better foreſeeing the danger of their State, ſhould as they did, make haſte to conclude the ſame; for it falleth out in Mens purpoſes and Actions, That a good and happy ſucceſs otherwiſe well hoped for, is oftentimes marred with too much diligence and care. Neither was it any doubt, but that Hanebald was ſent by the French King but for faſhion ſake, and ſecretly underhand by Pellicerius the old Embaſſador, perſwaded the Venetians to haſten the concluſion of Peace with Solyman.

The moſt ſecret decree of the Vetian Senate made known to Solyman.

Which as Badoerius their Embaſſador was carefully ſoliciting the matter at Conſtantinople, and being loath to yield the ſtrong Cities which Solyman required, offering unto him inſtead of them a great ſum of Mony; Solyman took him up with threatning words as a ſhameleſs Diſſembler, earneſtly proteſting, That he would never grant him Peace, without the yielding of thoſe Cities, rehearſing unto him the moſt ſecret points of his Embaſſage, and how that he was authorized from the Decem-Viri to yield them unto him; which thing the Embaſſador little thought Solyman had known. Wherefore Badoerius ſo ſhamefully reproved, and ſtanding in doubt of his life, ſeeing the greateſt ſecrets of his Embaſſage revealed to Solyman and his Baſſaes, was glad to accept of Peace, by yielding unto him Nauplium and Epidaurus, two Cities in Peloponneſus, and with them Nadinum and Labrania, two Caſtles of Dalmatia, to the great grief of the whole Senate; for granting whereof the Common people ignorant of the ſecret Decree of the Decem-Viri, and ſuppoſing that Badoerius had given away that which he had no authority to give, were ſo inraged againſt him at his return, that there was much ado to ſave the guiltleſs Man from exile, and his Goods from confiſcation, although the Traitors were then known which had diſcovered the Secrets of the State unto the Turks. Theſe were Mapheus Leonius a Senator, and Conſtantinus Cobatius, Secretary to the Colledge of the Decem-Viri, and Franciſcus Valerius, one of the Senators baſe Sons, the Traiterous diſperſer of the Turks Mony for the corruption of others; who with other his Complices were for the ſame Fact hanged in the Market-place, when as Leonius and Cobatius were a little before fled into France.

A Peace concluded betwixt the Venetians and Solyman.

The Traitors which revealed the ſecrets of the Venetian ſtate to Solyman executed.

About the ſame time, which was in the Year of our Lord 1540, died Joannes Sepuſius King of Hungary, Solymans Tributary; after whoſe death enſued great Wars in Hungary, and the lamentable ſubverſion of that flouriſhing Kingdom; for the better conceiving whereof, it ſhall not be amiſs with as much brevity as the plainneſs of the Hiſtory will permit, to open the cauſes and grounds of the endleſs calamities which afterwards enſued, and never took end, until that warlike Kingdom was to the great weakning of of Chriſtendom utterly ſubverted.

King Ferdinand and this tributary King John, had with like deſire of Peace and quietneſs, made between them a League; profitable to them both as their Eſtates then ſtood, rather than honourable; yet moſt welcome to the Hungarians, who divided into Faction, and having followed ſome the one King and ſome the other, enjoyed nevertheleſs their Lands and Goods by the benefit of this Peace; the Towns and Caſtles being ſtill kept by them in whoſe poſſeſſion they then were at the making of the Peace. In the capitulations of which Peace, it was compriſed, That Ferdinand ſhould from thenceforth call John by the Name of a King; whereas before he had both in his common Talk and Letters called him by the Name of the Vayvod only: It was alſo expreſly ſet down in the ſame Articles of Peace, and ſubſcribed by the Hands of divers of the Nobility of Hungary, That if King John ſhould die, King Ferdinand ſhould ſucceed him in the whole Kingdom of Hungary; which condition was ſuppreſſed and kept very ſecret for fear of Solyman, who accounted of that Kingdom as of his own, gotten by Law of Arms, and beſtowed upon King John as upon his Vaſſal; neither was it to have been thought, that if he ſhould have known thereof (being of a haughty mind by nature, and not able to endure an injury) he would have ſuffered that Kingdom, got and defended with ſo great danger and coſt, to be by the Will of an unthankful Man, transferred unto his Enemy.

The ſecret confederation betwixt King Ferdinand and King John revealed.

This matter of ſo great importance, was (as it is reported) by Hieronimus Laſcus Embaſſador for King Ferdinand to Conſtantinople, revealed unto Solyman and the Baſſaes, to bring King John into hatred. So much did this noble Gentleman, for his rare Vertues otherwiſe greatly to have been commended, yield unto his grief, and deſire of revenge; when after the death of Aloyſius Grittus, he fell from the friendſhip of King John, being (as is before declared) by him committed to Priſon, and hardly afterwards enlarged, at the requeſt of King Sigiſmund. Whereupon Solyman being exceedingly angry with King John, called him unthankful Churl, and turning himſelf about to Lutzis Baſſa his Brother in Law, ſaid, How unworthily do theſe two Chriſtian Kings wear their Crowns upon their faithleſs Heads; who as ſhameful deceivers are not afraid, either for worldly ſhame or fear of God, for their profit to falſifie their Faith? But King John underſtanding thereof, and wonderfully fearing his own Eſtate, did by good Friends and rich Preſents, pacifie Solyman again, laying all the blame upon King Ferdinand, as better able to bear it. Not long after, King John having ſet his Kingdom in good order, and ſtrongly fortified the City of Buda; being now far ſtricken in years, at the earneſt requeſt of moſt of the Nobility of Hungary, and other his beſt Friends, married Iſablla the Daughter of Sigiſmund King of Polonia, a gracious Lady and of great Spirit; which King Sigiſmund, had long before married Barbara King Johns Siſter, after whoſe death he married the Lady Bona Sfortia, the Daughter of Joannes Galeacius Duke of Millain, by whom he had this Lady Iſabella whom King John now married. Which Marriage Solyman liked well of, having many times by way of talk before condemned the ſingle life of the King; but King Ferdinand liked thereof nothing at all, plainly foreſeeing, that the Hungarians (if the King ſhould chance to have a Son) would forthwith look upon him as their natural King, and reject himſelf as but a Stranger.

The Queen with Child

This young Queen in ſhort time (as he had feared) conceived with Child, and was now very big; when King John was enforced to make an expedition in perſon himſelf againſt Maylat (famous for the death of Aloyſius Grittus) and Balas, both Governours of Tranſylvania; whereof Maylat not contented with the Name of Vayvod or Governour, ſought to make himſelf King. But Solyman deteſting the impudent Arrogancy of the faithleſs Man, and hating him for the death of Grittus, and the Turks ſlain with him, advertiſed King John of all the matter, wiſhing him to be more circumſpect, whom he truſted with the Government of ſo great and rich a Country. So Maylat ſhamefully rejected of Solyman, and out of hope of a Kingdom, fearing alſo to be thruſt quite out of his Government by King John, thought it beſt for his own ſafety to raiſe up all the Province into Rebellion, and to take part with King Ferdinand; which thing Ferdinand by his divers Agents ſecretly furthered to the uttermoſt. For theſe two Kings, although they were at Peace the one with the other, and in words and ſhew made ſemblance of Friendſhip, yet in heart they envyed and hated each other, as if they ſhould preſently have waged War. At that ſame time King John exacted of his Subjects, and eſpecially of them of Tranſylvania, a great ſum of Mony, to pay the Turks his Tribute, then two years behind: Which thing ſerved Maylat and his Complices, as a fit occaſion to raiſe the People into Rebellion, perſwading them, that there was no reaſon to pay unto the Turk ſuch a Tribute, as would ſerve well to wage ten years honourable War againſt him; ſo that by that, and ſuch like perſwaſion, all the Province was in an Uproar, little differing from maniſeſt Rebellion. To appeaſe theſe dangerous troubles thus ariſing, King John ſent certain of his chief Nobility and beſt Captains with a great power into Tranſylvania, following after himſelf in his Chariot, not yet well recovered of his late Sickneſs. Theſe Noblemen entring in two places into Tranſylvania, and ſcouting up and down the Country, had in ſhort time ſo uſed the matter, that what by force, what by policy, the Tumult was well pacified, and divers of the chief Offenders worthily executed. Maylat the ambitious Author of this ſedition, not able to hold the Field againſt the King, and ſeeing himſelf beſet on every ſide with his Enemies, retired himſelf with all his Wealth into a Town called Fogaras, a place of great ſtrength, which the Kings power ſhortly after hardly beſieged; the King himſelf then lying at Sibynium, the chief City of Tranſylvania, and about a mile diſtant from Fogaras, ſick of an Ague, whereinto he was again fallen through too much care and pains taken in travelling in that hot time of the Year, the days being then at the longeſt. Whilſt he thus lay ſick at Sibynium, and his Army faſt by at the Siege of Fogaras, News was brought unto him from the Court, That the Queen his Wife was delivered of a fair young Son; which was no ſooner bruted abroad, but the Hungarians as Men overjoyed, came flocking to the Court where the King lay, diſcharging their Pieces in triumph, with all other ſigns of joy and mirth they could poſſibly deviſe; the Noblemen came from the Camp to rejoyce with the King, and all the Army was filled with gladneſs. And for the greater ſolemnity of this ſo common a Joy, a royal Feaſt was prepared, which the Noblemen would needs have the King to honour with his preſence, though he were thereto unwilling, being as yet but a little recovered; howbeit yielding to their importunity, he ſuffered himſelf to be overruled and brought to the Feaſt by them, which was unto him the merrieſt and the laſt that ever he made; for willing to ſhew his inward joy, and to content his Nobility there preſent, he forgot himſelf, and eat and drank more liberally than was for the health of his weak Body; whereby the Fever which had but a little before left him, was again renewed, in ſuch ſort, as that he well perceived he could not longer endure. Wherefore feeling his end to draw faſt on, he made his Will, appointing his young Son to be his Heir, whom he committed to the Tuition of George, Biſhop of Veradium, and Peter Vicche a noble Gentleman and his near Kinſman, until he came to Age; requeſting the reſt of the Noblemen to prefer his Son in the ſucceſſion of the Kingdom, before a Stranger; telling them, That Solyman would undoubtedly take upon him the protection both of the Kingdom and of his Son, if they would in time ſend Embaſſadors unto him with Preſents, and promiſe for his Son, that he ſhould raign as his Tributary as he had done before; and ſo preſently after died.

Queen Iſabella delivered of a Son.

The death of King John.

This King was of a courteous and gentle nature, bountiful, and in all his doings juſt, of no fierce and rough diſpoſition, as the Hungarians commonly are, but of a moſt civil behavior, garniſhed with good letters, and throughly ſchooled in the divers chances of both Fortunes, not meaſuring his actions by the ſtrength of his power, but by the exact rule of deſcretion; for in time of buſineſs no Man was more circumſpect, or vigilant than he, nor in time of recreation any Man more courteous or pleaſant. He uſed oftentimes to ſay, That the favour and love of valiant Men gotten by bounty and courteſie, was the beſt Treaſure of a Prince; for that courteous and thankful Men, did oftentimes in ſome one worthy piece of ſervice, plentifully repay whatſoever had been beſtowed upon them; as for ſuch as were unthankful, they did to their ſhame bear the teſtimony of another Mans vertue.

The honourable ſaying of King John.

The Kings death was kept ſecret until ſuch time as the Noblemen had agreed with Maylat that he ſhould take an Oath of his faithful Allegeance to the King, and his Son his lawful Heir, and ſo ſtill to enjoy his former place and Government; which offer Maylat gladly accepted Then calling together the Council, it was decreed to ſend the ſame Embaſſage to Solyman, which was appointed, the old King yet living. So were preſently diſpatched away two moſt honourable Embaſſadors, Joannes Exechius Biſhop of Quinque Eccleſiæ, and Stephanus Verbetius the Chancellor, a Man of great years, carrying with them ten Bowls of pure Gold couriouſly wrote, ſix hundred of Silver, gilt and engraven; forty pieces of purple Silk and Cloath of Gold for Turks Gowns, and 50 l. of coined Gold to be paid in the name of two years Tribute. Which Embaſſadors paſſing directly from Sibinium over Danubius into Servia, and ſo travelling through Thracia, came to Conſtantinople. In the mean time, the dead Body of the King was with much heavineſs carried from Sibinium to Alba Regalis, moſt part of the Army following it, and there with great ſolemnity Buried. After this, the young Child was Chriſtened and called Stephen, and there preſently Crowned with the ancient Crown of King Stephen, who firſt erected that Kingdom, and without which the Hungarians never accounted their Kings lawfully Crowned. Yet the Royal Dignity was by the common conſent of the Nobility given unto the Queen, with condition, that in all publick Writings, the Names of the Son and of the Mother ſhould be joyned, and the Kings Mony coined with the ſame Inſcription; but the chiefeſt Authority reſted in George the Biſhop; for he was Treaſurer, and had at his command the Caſtles and ſtrong Holds; yet were the Souldiers with their Enſigns and Furniture, at the devotion of Valentinus Thuracus: In the middle between theſe two was placed Peter Vicche the Kings Kinſman, and by the old King appointed for one of the Tutors of his young Son, ſuſpected of neither part, honoured with the name of High Conſtable. But becauſe the name of this George the Biſhop was moſt famous in this woful War which we were about to write, I thought it worth the labour to ſpeak ſomething of his nature and diſpoſition, that it may be known to all poſterity, by what policy this War was managed, and how this flouriſhing Kingdom by the madneſs of the Hungarians came into the hands of the Turks.

Embaſſadors ſent out of Hungary to Solyman.

A young Child Crowned. King of Hungary.

George Biſhop of Veradium one of the Kings Tutors, a notable Man.

This George was born in Croatia, and brought up from his youth in the Houſe of King John, where vertue and induſtry never wanted relief; when as he unadviſedly before had entred into the Orders of a Monaſtical life, and weary too late of the ſtraitneſs thereof, had forſaken his profeſſion. Wherefore being of a very pleaſing nature, and ſtill following King John driven out of his Kingdom, and long living in exile, he won ſuch credit and commendation for his Fidelity, Integrity, and ready Counſel in the Kings moſt doubtful and dangerous Affairs, that after Sibacchus that worthy Biſhop was by the treachery of Aloyſius Grittus ſlain at Baxovia, he obtained the great Biſhoprick of Veradium. After that, when he had ſtrengthned his credit with great Wealth, he always as a faithful Counſellor ſwaid and happily ruled both the Court and Kingdom, to the profit of the King. But he was of ſuch a diverſe and pliant Nature, that performing in all actions all the parts of a moſt ready and excellent Man, he ſeemed to be made of contrary qualities, and born to do any thing; for in ſaying of his Princely Service, and performing the other Ceremonies of the Chriſtian Religion, he ſhewed, or at leaſtwiſe counterfeited ſuch a contrition in his devout Countenance and Speech, that a Man would not have thought it could poſſibly be the ſame Man, who in the moſt weighty Affairs both of War and Peace, did moſt ſtoutly ſhew the wonderful force of a moſt pregnant and couragious Wit; for he uſed to keep whole Companies of moſt excellent and ready Horſemen, and would oft-times come forth into the Battel armed; he would with often Banquets and Rewards win the Hearts of the Souldiers, and after the manner of great Chieftains, maintain the honour and credit of his Name, both with puniſhment and reward, as occaſion required. Beſides that, no Man looked into the Wealth of the Kingdom more diligently than he, no Man did to more profit let to farm the Cuſtoms, old Mines, Feedings, and Salt-Pits; no Man could deviſe finer means to raiſe Mony, of all others the readieſt way to credit; inſomuch that King John would confeſs himſelf to reign by the eſpecial induſtry of that one Man; And King Ferdinand would many times ſay, That he envied at King John for nothing he had, but for one hooded Fellow, which was better for the defence of a Kingdom than a thouſand with Helmets on their Heads. Wherefore this Biſhop having taken upon him the Tuition of the young King, was ſtill buſied in all the weighty cauſes of the Kingdom, both Civil and Martial; he laboured with great care, that the Hungarians ſhould agree together in Love and Unity; and did what he might, providently to foreſee, that no Tumult or Rebellion ſhould any where ariſe, whereby the beginning of the Kingdom, yet but weak, might any way be troubled. But King Ferdinand hearing of the death of King John, thought it now a fit time for him to recover again the Kingdom of Hungary, which he had ſo long deſired. Whereunto he was alſo the more prickt forward by the perſwaſion of Alexius Torſo, Ferentius Gnarus, Petrus Bachit, Balthazar Pamphilus, Francus Capolnates, Janus Caſtellamphus, and Caſparus Seredus, all Noblemen or Gentlemen of great account in Hungary, who in the former troubles followed the part of King Ferdinand againſt King John, and lived now in Exile; theſe all with one conſent told King Ferdinand, That now or never was the time when they might be again reſtored unto their Country with honour, and that the War might that Autumn be diſpatched, if he would make haſte, for as much as Winter coming faſt on, would ſtay the coming of the Turks, and ſuch Noblemen of Hungary as took part with the Queen, did not very well agree together, being unwilling to be commanded by George the Apoſtate Monk, who (as they ſaid) with great cunning and diſſimulation ſeducing the Queen, and poſſeſſing the Treaſure, enjoyed all alone the power of a King; and that they, which for taking part with the right, had long lived as baniſhed Men, might now ſafely return into their Country, and be honourably preferred by the Queen; the Biſhop (which commanded all) aſſuring them thereof, if they would return unto the young Kings Court, unto their Friends and ancient Houſes. But they had (as they ſaid) before given their Faith unto him, as to a vertuous and faithful Prince, whom they had preferred before one that was an Hungarian born; wherefore he ſhould do both unadviſedly and unkindly, if letting ſlip the occaſion preſented, he ſhould defer to make War. For, what could be more diſhonourable to him ſo great a King, and alſo Emperor elect, than by ſhameful delay to forſake them, being noble and valiant Gentlemen, which had followed his part, and were then ready with ſtrong Troops of Horſemen to do him the beſt ſervice they could.

The German Captains in like manner perſwaded him to take the matter in hand; who as Martial Men, expecting ſome one preferment, ſome another, in the Army, were deſirous of Honour, Pay, and Prey, the chief comforts of their travel and peril.

Laſchus diſſwadeth King Ferdinand from ſeeking for the Kingdom of Hungary by force, perſwading him rather to requeſt it of courteſie of Solyman.

But Laſchus the Polonian (who in matters concerning Peace and War ſaw more than all they; as he that knew the diſpoſitions of many Princes, and had ſeen the Manners and Faſhions of divers Nations, having travelled through a great part of the World, and oftentimes been Embaſſador in the Courts of the greateſt Princes) was of a contrary opinion, and told King Ferdinand plainly, That the Kingdom of Hungary was to be obtained rather by policy than by force, by craving it at Solymans Hand, to hold it of him by Tribute, as King John had done.

For (ſaid he) that may by petition and fair entreaty be eaſily obtained of that Heroical Prince (who in his vain humor oftentimes fondly ſeeketh after honour) which will never be got from him by force of Arms. I throughly know (ſaid he) Solymans haughty mind, and the proud diſpoſition of his Baſſa's; he contemneth Wealth, and is cloyed with ſo many Kingdoms; but they, upon their inſatiable covetouſneſs and exceeding pride, deſire nothing, nor perſwade him to nothing more than War. Wherefore it is good to beware, that with the noyſe of this ſuddain War you ſtir not up the Turks, which lie ready as it were expecting ſuch an occaſion, which cannot be withſtood but by the United Forces of the Chriſtian Princes; which might by their general conſent be done, but that their Eies blinded with fatal darkneſs cannot ſee it, and the Unity of the Chriſtians now deſperate, ſeemeth by God reſerved to ſome better time; ſeeing that of late the Chriſtian Kings are fallen off, and cannot agree upon the long expected Peace. Is not (ſaid he) the French King deceived of his hope; and as he would have it thought, greatly diſhonoured with his late unkindneſs? Which renewing his old wound, will revive in him an endleſs hatred. Away with all diſſimulations, Enemy to grave Councils, and let plain truth, although unpleaſant unto Princes ears, prevent flattery. Undoubtedly, he being a Prince of no baſe Courage (as it oftentimes falleth out with Men throughly grieved) will in his anger, as an Enemy pour forth his Gold, whereof he hath great ſtore, to croſs the Emperors deſigns, to trouble the Aſſemblies of the States of Germany, to withdraw the minds of the Princes, and with bounty to gain them to himſelf; who envying mightily at the Imperial Dignity, wont to be indifferently given to them that beſt deſerved the ſame, to be as it were inveſted in the Houſe of Auſtria, which in this perpetual ſucceſſion of ſo many Emperors, hath as it were got a right by long cuſtom. Wherefore they will ſecretly conſpire together, and as notable lingerers by nature, will either give no help at all, or elſe too late; at ſuch time as the Turks Garriſons ſhall come flying to the ſuccor of the young King. Neither is there any cauſe why any Man ſhould think that the Governours of the Turks Countries near at hand, will for the approach of Winter be ſlack in this cauſe; for they undoubtedly, making an honeſt and honourable ſhew, will take upon them to defend the Fatherleſs Child and Widow, of purpoſe to make an entrance to the ſecret deſire they have to gain the Kingdom to themſelves; for if you ſhall once joyn with them in Battel, if the beſt happen, and fortune favour our firſt attempts, truly you ſhall have War without end, with ſuch an Enemy, which will bring with him Wealth that will never be ſpent, power not to be overcome, and couragious Souldiers ſworn to our deſtruction: So will it come to paſs, and I pray God I be a falſe Prophet, that in ſeeking for the Kingdom of Hungary by War, you ſhall at length be glad to fight for Auſtria it ſelf, and your own Kingdom alſo.

Laſchus ſent Embaſſador from King Ferdinand to Solyman.

This Speech ſo moved King Ferdinand, that although he purpoſed to go on with the War, yet he thought it good by an honourable Embaſſage to prove Solymans mind and purpoſe alſo; which to do, no Man was thought fitter than Laſchus himſelf, Author of that Council, being unto him very well known, and familiarly acquainted with all the great Baſſa's of the Court. Which ſervice Laſchus refuſed not, but being furniſhed with all things needful for ſuch an Embaſſage, departed from Vienna towards Conſtantinople.

King Ferdinand ſendeth an Embaſſador to the Queen, to demand of her the Kingdom of Hungary.

Yet for all that, King Ferdinand perſiſting in his former purpoſe, made withal preparation for Wars, truſting upon the aid of the Emperor his Brother, and the coming over of the Hungarians, who ever thought it cauſe honeſt enough for them to revolt, if it ſo ſtood with their preſent profit. But before he would enter into open Wars, he ſent Nicholas Count of Salma to the Queen, to ſhew her the Inſtruments of the laſt League betwixt the King her late Husband and him, and to exhort her to yield up the Kingdom, which by the late League was another Mans right; and not by delaying of the matter, to hurt both her Self and her Son; for King Ferdinand offered to give unto the Child the Province of Sepuſia, as was before agreed betwixt the two Kings expreſly in the League; and to the Queen a greater Revenue, and whatſoever elſe ſhe had in Dowry. But if ſhe would forget that lawful League, he threatned, that neither the Emperor Charles his Brother, nor he, wanted force wherewith to recover by ſtrong hand the Kingdom, annexed to the Houſe of Auſtria both by ancient right and the new conſent of moſt of the Hungarian Nobility. The Count of Salma being received at Buda, hardly obtained to be admitted to the preſence of the Queen; for George the Biſhop, and Vicche, miſtruſting her Woman-like Courage, ſaid, ſhe was not to be ſpoken withal, by reaſon ſhe was ſo full of heavineſs and ſorrow; and that they were of Authority, as the Kings Tutors, and ready to give him both audience and anſwer. Which opinion of her weakneſs and want of judgment, the Queen, being a Woman of an heroical and royal Spirit, took as tending ſo much to her diſgrace, that ſhe ſaid ſhe would kill her ſelf, if the Embaſſadors were not permitted to come into her Chamber (which was a dark Room hung with Black, as the manner is;) and ſhe ſitting upon a low Pallet negligently attired, as one that had no care of her ſelf, wan and pale Coloured, but as then ſhedding no Tears, yet with voice and countenance ſo heavy, as might ſhew her Tears to be rather dried up with long Mourning, than that her ſorrow was any thing abated; for the deſire of bearing rule had now ſo poſſeſſed her mind, that ſhe contemned all the dangers of imminent War, and for defence of her Sovereignty reſolved with her ſelf to call in the Turks. After the Count admitted to her preſence, had with due reverence and great proteſtation delivered his Meſſage, ſhe demurely anſwered. That ſuch was the Fortune of her Sex and Years, that being bereft of the King her Husband, and perplexed with the daily griefs both of Body and Mind, ſhe could neither give nor take Council, but purpoſed poſed in ſo weighty a Cauſe to uſe the advice of Sigiſmund her Father, whoſe Integrity and Juſtice was ſuch, as King Ferdinand need no other Judge or Arbitrator to end that Controverſie: Wherefore ſhe requeſted a convenient time and ſpace wherein ſhe might ask Counſel of her Father; to whoſe juſt judgment ſhe ſaid ſhe would ſtand, as ſhe thought the Nobility of Hungary would alſo. Which ſmall time of delay if it ſhould be denied, and that they would needs forthwith make War upon her; ſhe ſaid, that the Emperor and King Ferdinand his Brother ſhould ſurely win no great Honour, if they ſhould come to oppugn her a Widow conſumed with Tears, and a young Child yet crying in his Cradle. The Count ſo ſent away, when he was returned to King Ferdinand, told him, That the Queen was altogether in the power of the Biſhop, and could neither ſay nor do any thing, but what ſhe had before received from him; for he only (as he ſaid) commanded all; as for the reſt of the Nobility, they ſhared amongſt them the Honours and Preferments of the Realm, and as Men deſirous of credit and gain, had rather be the Governours of the young Prince, than the Servants and Waiters of a great and mighty Foreign King; all which, he ſaid he had both heard and ſeen. Wherefore all the hope was in War, wherein ſuch ſpeed was to be uſed, as that the Queen with her Son unprovided, and expecting the event of their Embaſſage from Conſtantinople, might be driven out of Buda before they could take up Arms, or well adviſe themſelves what to do; and that the Queen ſought delay but to make her ſelf the ſtronger, and in the mean time to call in the Turk, and ſo to make a more dangerous War. Wherefore if ever he purpoſed to Reign in Hungary, he ſhould forthwith caſt off all other Cogitations, and make ready his Forces with all ſpeed poſſible.

Hereupon King Ferdinand furniſhed with Mony from Charles the Emperor, without delay raiſed a great Army, which he ſent down the River Danubius to Strigonium, which City had all the Reign of Kign John, continued faithful to King Ferdinand. The General of his Army was Leonardus Velſius, a Nobleman of Rhetia; who for many cauſes, thought it expedient firſt to open the way to Buda; for almoſt in the middle of the way ſtood Vicegrade, with a goodly Caſtle upon the top of an Hill by the River; which Town (but not the Caſtle) Velſius after nine-days Siege took with the loſs of about two hundred of his Men, all the Garriſon Souldiors therein being either ſlain or taken Priſoners, with Valentinus Litteratus their Captain. From Vicegrade he paſſed over the River Danubius to Peſth, which he took, being forſaken of the Enemy. With like ſucceſs he took the City of Vachia without loſs; and removing thence, and croſſing again the River with his Fleet, came and encamped before Buda, ſo to terrifie the Citizens, and to diſcover as far as he could the purpoſe of the Queen. Where Perenus, Stephanus Raſcaius, and Franciſcus Francopanes Biſhop of Agria, all Men of great Nobility amongſt the Hungarians, revolted from the Queen to King Ferdinand; the Biſhop was reputed for a Man of great Integrity, and upon meer conſcience to have gone ove to Ferdinand; yet was he by Letters from George the Kings Tutor, challenged to have revolted, in hope by means of Charles the Emperor to be made a Cardinal. Velſius lay with his Army at the hot Baths, about a mile and a half from the City, as if he would rather beſiege it than aſſault it. The Germans lying there, did fetch in Booty round about the Country; which was taken in evil part by the Hungarians on their ſide, who ſeeing their own Cattel or their Friends driven away, the Villages burnt, and the poor Husbandmen bound and taken Priſoners, fell together by the Ears oftentimes with the Germans. On the other ſide they of Buda ſending out their Troops of Horſemen, skirmiſht with the Germans if they did but ſtir out of the Camp, and well defended the Villages from the injury of the Enemy; for Valentinus Thurracus General of the Queens power, had taken into the City a wonderful number of light Horſemen. Whilſt the Army lay thus encamped, it fortuned that Balthazar Pamphilus a noble Hungarian, ſtraying out of the Camp even unto the Gates of Buda, deſired the Warders at the Gate to give him leave to talk with Valentinus their General, for that he deſired to ſee his old Friend, and to confer with him of certain matters concerning the good of the Common State. Which thing being granted by the General, he was immediately received into the City with his Troop of Horſemen. Shortly after returning again into the Camp, he reported how he had been entertained by his old acquaintance in the City; where viewing the Garriſon, the great Artillery, and Fortification of the City, he perceived it was not to be taken without a greater power, and in a more ſeaſonable time of the year. Which thing ſo moved Velſius, by nature ſuſpicious, and doubtful of the fidelity of a Stranger, that he commanded him in anger to avoid the Camp, becauſe he had without his leave gone into the City, and upon his own private inſolency had conference with the Enemy, and by amplifying their ſtrength, to have diſcouraged the Army, by putting them out of hope of Victory. Wherefore Velſius never attempting to aſſault the City, returned again to Vicegrade to beſiege the higher Caſtle (wherein the ancient Crown of King Stephen, wherewith the Hungarian Kings were ever after him Crowned, was kept) which Caſtle he alſo took, with ſomething leſs loſs than he had done the lower Town. Not long after, he marched with his Army to Alba Regalis, the City where the Hungarian Kings were uſually Crowned and Buried; which by the means of Perenus was delivered unto him, and a Garriſon put into it for King Ferdinand. Theſe things thus done, Velſius retired again to Strigonium; which he did the rather, becauſe the Germans and Hungarians, two rough Nations, could by no means agree together, in ſo much as that Velſius the General in parting them was wounded in the Thigh, and Perenus hurt with a Stone; beſides that, Winter was now come far on, and the Souldiers cried out for Pay. For which cauſes, Velſius (being alſo ſick of the Stone) billeted his Souldiers for that Winter about the Country. Yet before that, he new fortified Peſth, and left therein a Garriſon; becauſe it was reported, that the Turks upon their Frontiers were making preparation to come to aid them of Buda.

King Ferdinands Army departs from Buda.

Alba Regalis yielded to King Ferdinand.

At ſuch time as King Ferdinand was levying his Forces for the invaſion of Hungary, the Queen by the Counſel of the Biſhop had in good time craved aid of the Turks Lieutenants in the Countries bordering upon Hungary, eſpecially of Uſtref Governour of Boſna (a very aged Man, and of great Honour, who had married one of the Daughters of Bajazet the old Emperor) as alſo of Mahometes Governour of Belgrade, and Amurathes who had the charge of the Frontiers of Dalmatia; from whom ſhe received one anſwer, That they might in no caſe without expreſs commandment from Solyman depart from the places committed to their charge. Beſides that Mahometes was by rewards overcome by Laſchus, as he paſſed by Belgrade to Conſtantinople, not to ſtir or aid the Queen. Wherefore ſhe, rejected by theſe great Captains, certified Solyman by her Embaſſadors, what danger her ſelf, her Son, and the Kingdom was in, craving his ſpeedy aid. Laſchus was not yet come to Conſtantinople, being faln ſick by the way, but had ſent before, Ptolomeus his Phyſician to the great Baſſaes, and eſpecially to Lutzis his old acquaintance, upon whom he had beſtowed great Gifts, and was in hope by him to have obtained what he deſired; but all in vain; for Solyman who thought it much for his honour to defend his own right, and that he had before given unto King John; thought alſo that it would redound both to his great profit and glory, if he ſhould as it were upon charity take upon him the protection of the Widow and Fatherleſs Child, in their ſo great diſtreſs and danger. Wherefore calling unto him the Embaſſadors, the three great Baſſaes ſtanding by, he ſaid, That he had of his meer bounty before given the Kingdom of Hungary unto King John, to deſcend to his poſterity, ſo long as they ſhould retain the kind remembrance of ſo great a benefit; wherefore to declare his conſtancy, inſeparable from his bounty, he ſaid he would take ſuch a courſe in the matter, as that the Germans his Enemies ſhould not long rejoyce of the Wars they had begun. And in token of friendſhip, and that he had taken upon him the protection of the young King, he cauſed to be delivered unto the Embaſſadors a royal Robe of Purple and Gold, a Buckler with the Boſs moſt curiouſly wrought, a Horſemans Mace with a handle of Gold, and a Scimiter with the Scabberd richly ſet with Stones; and afterwards wrote effectually to Uſtref and Mahometes his Lieutenants, That they ſhould without delay aid the Queen, and not to make excuſe becauſe it was Winter; threatning them, that if ſhe took any harm through their default and negligence, it ſhould coſt them their Heads. The Queens Embaſſadors glad of their good diſpatch, were ſcarce departed from the Turks Court, when Laſchus came to Conſtantinople; and underſtanding by his Phyſician the ſucceſs of the Hungarian Embaſſadors, proceeded for all that in his buſineſs, and delivered his Meſſage, and upon reaſonable conditions requeſted the Kingdom for King Ferdinand. But when he in ſpeaking had oftentimes made mention of Charles the Emperor, as if he would with all the power of Germany aid his Brother; Solyman was ſo moved therewith, that he was preſently taken away and committed to Priſon; the great Baſſaes, but eſpecially Ruſtan, Solymans Son in Law, a proud and furious young Man, chiding him and taking him up as worthy of death, for offending with his liberal Speech the Majeſty of ſo courteous a Prince, and as it were mocking the King of Kings; requiring friendſhip, when in the mean time his Maſter moſt impudently made Wars in Hungary.

Uſtref and Mahometes the Baſſaes aforeſaid, having received ſuch ſtrait commandment from Solyman, aſſembled their diſperſed Souldiers, and by ſhipping brought them down the Rivers Savus and Dravus, into Danubius; for it is a hard matter to perform any great thing by Wars in Hungary without the help of a great Fleet, for conveying of the great Ordnance, Victual, and other ſuch neceſſaries of the Army, frome one ſide of the great Rivers to the other, as occaſion requireth; but as then being the midſt of Winter, and the North Wind blowing hard, Danubius was ſo Frozen on both ſides, that the middle of the River was ſcarce open; ſo that the Turks not able to paſs for the extremity of the Weather, not daring to return for the ſtrait command of Solyman, were enforced in their Tents there to abide the hardneſs of Winter, to ſhew their readineſs. It is almoſt incredible to be ſpoken, with what patience and reſolution the Souldiers endured all the extremities of the time, in ſo bare a place, their Horſes, which of all other things they hold moſt dear, ſtarving for Cold and want of Meat.

The Queen joyneth her Forces with the Turks and burneth Vacia.

The Spring at length coming on, right welcome both to the Turks and the Queen, Mahometes with his Turks and wild Illyrians, and Uſtref with his Souldiers of Boſna, entred into Hungary, with whom Valentinus General of the Queens Forces, joyned alſo, with an Army of Hungarians brought from Buda. And the Queen to further the matter, ſent Preſents to the Turks Generals, victualled the Camp, and furniſhed them with great Ordnance for the beſieging of ſuch Cities as were holden by King Ferdinand her Enemy. They paſſing over Danubius, took the City of Vacia (being but badly defended for King Ferdinand) and putting many to the Sword, after the manner of their barbarous Cruelty, burnt the City. From thence they removed to Peſth, which was ſo valiantly defended by Barcocius and Fotiſcus, the one a Hungarian Captain, the other a German, that the Turks deſpairing of the winning of the City, and not well relieved with Victual by the Queen then, fearing future want, paſſed again over Danubius, and faithfully reſtoring the great Ordnance without any more doing, returned again into their own Countries; but in their retiring, the Hungarians by the leading of Ferentius Gnarus, ſlew many of them, amongſt whom was one Achomates one of their beſt and valianteſt Captains.

Peſth in vain beſieged by the Turks.

King Ferdinand ſendeth the Lord William Rogendorff with an Army into Hungary.

Rogendorff threatns the Queen.

King Ferdinand advertiſed of the Turks departure, returned again to his old hope of recovering the Kingdom; perſwading the Emperor his Brother, not to give over the War ſo fortunately begun, eſpecially now that the Turks having forſaken the Queen, were departed and gone. Wherefore the new Forces lately before raiſed in Auſtria, Bohemia, Sileſia, and Moravia, for the new ſupply of Velſius his Army, were preſently ſent into Hungary, under the leading of the Lord William Rogendorff Steward of the Kings Houſe, who was then gone as far as Poſſonium to have relieved them of Peſth; unto whom, as a more ancient and honourable General Velſius gave place. He, furniſhed with theſe new Supplies, three months Victuals, and great Artillery from Vienna, joyning with the old Army, marched directly to Buda, and beſieged it. Overagainſt the ſtately Caſtle of Buda, wherein the Queen lay, was a great Hill called St. Gerrards Mount, ſo high, that the middle thereof was equal with the higheſt place of the Caſtle, and from the top thereof they might look into the Streets of the City, betwixt which Hill and the Caſtle was a great Valley and a deep Ditch. Upon this Hill, Rogendorff to beat the Caſtle, and to terrifie the Queen, planted his Battery, and ſo ſhook a new built Tower thereof, that it was thought that it would have ſuddainly fallen; which if it had, yet was it ſuppoſed a dangerous matter to have aſſaulted it, becauſe it was walled about with a treble Wall. But the ſumptuous Turrets and the princely Galleries of the Kings Palace in the Caſtle, which every Man ſaw Rogendorff might have beaten down with his great Ordnance, he ſpared; but whether of himſelf, or elſe commanded by the King (as loath to deſtroy ſo goodly Buildings, as could not without great charges be in long time again repaired) was uncertain. Wherefore by divers Heralds ſent unto the Queen, he wiſhed her to break in ſunder thoſe Gyves and Fetters wherein the Biſhop under colour of protection, had faſt bound her Son and her, and to accept of King Ferdinands offer, who was ready to beſtow upon her a goodly Seigniory, wherein ſhe might moſt honourably live in quiet, and bring up her Son in ſafety. Which thing if ſhe, as a ſimple Woman, and ignorant of her own danger, ſhould refuſe, and obſtinately contemn the peril wherein ſhe ſtood, he would forthwith in moſt terrible manner beat down the Palace about her Ears. Whereunto the Biſhop in the Queens behalf anſwered, That ſhe was not ſuch a Fool to exchange the Kingdom of Hungary for the Principality of Sepuſia; and that ſhe thought Rogendorff a very doting and mad old Man, who being once before well beaten in thoſe Ditches, came now again like a Fool to receive his utter deſtruction in full guerdon of his raſh Folly; wherefore he ſhould ceaſe to terrifie valiant Men, fighting with diſcretion for their natural King and Country, againſt his drunken Company, for that they were nothing troubled with the noiſe of his great Shot; but yet he ſaid, that he would above all the reſt, by way of private courteſie, gently requeſt Rogendorff to diſcharge his Pieces with a little leſs noiſe, becauſe he had a Sow at home great with Pigs, which terrified with the thundring of his Guns, would farrow he doubted before her time, to the grief of his Gueſts. For the Biſhop was of a ſharp and taunting Spirit, and ſuch a contemner of the Germans, that when two of them were taken in the Kings Orchards burning certain Houſes, he in deriſion cauſed two Hogs to be hanged upon the ſame Gallows with them. Not long after, Rogendorff removed his Camp from St. Gerrards Mount, to a more convenient place for the battering of the City, called the Jews Graves, near unto the Gate called the Jews Gate. Which thing the Biſhop ſeeing, after his quipping manner requeſted of Rogendorff to pardon him, in that he had of late wrongfully called him a doting old Man; for that in removing his Camp into a more commodious place, he ſeemed to be a proper wiſe Man and of good diſcretion, now that he had pitched his Tents in a moſt fit place amongſt the dead, both for himſelf being an old Man and almoſt worn with vain labour; and for his Army there condemned to die with him. Rogendorff thus encamped, begun in two places to batter the Walls; Perenus and the Hungarians with the Bohemians near unto the Gate called Sabatina in one place, and he himſelf with the Germans betwixt the Jews Gate and the Caſtle in another; which was done with ſuch violence, that a great part of the Wall was beaten down, and another part thereof overcharged with Earth, which the Defendants had caſt up on the inner ſide for the ſtrengthning thereof, was at the ſame time born quite out and ſo fell down, to the wonderful diſmaying of all that were in the City. Which fair opportunity to have taken the City, Rogendorff let ſlip, either not well aware thereof by reaſon of the great ſmoke of the Artillery on both ſides, and the Duſt ariſing with the fall of the Wall which covered all; or elſe according to his natural diſpoſition, doing all things leaſurely and ſuſpitiouſly; ſo that a little delay bereft him of the preſent apprehenſion of ſo ſuddain a reſolution; and the Germans uſed more to ſtanding battels than to aſſaults, were not to be ſo eaſily brought on to aſſault the Breach upon the ſuddain, as were the Spaniards, Italians, or French. The Wall was opened in that place almoſt two hundred Paces in length, yet ſtanding almoſt the height of a Man, which might eaſily have been ſcaled with ſhort Ladders; but night was coming now faſt on, wherein the Germans would not willingly attempt any dangerous matter; ſo that the aſſault was deferred until the next morning. Whereas they of Buda in the mean time taking the advantage of the Enemies delay, with incredible diligence and labour in that night raiſed up a new Rampier in ſtead of the Wall that was fallen, every Man without exception putting his hand to the Work. In the morning the Germans coming to the Breach, gave ſuch a fierce aſſault unto the new made Rampier, that Otho Fotiſcus deſperately entred into a ſhattered Houſe, which joyned unto the Wall; and certain other Companies, one Souldier helping up another, had almoſt recovered the top of the Rampier, and were there ready to have ſet up their Enſigns; when they of Buda with wonderful conſtancy and reſolution withſtood the aſſailants, George the Biſhop encouraging them, and fighting amongſt them; who having laid aſide his Hood, was now to be ſeen with his Helmet on his Head, running too and fro as need required all alongſt the Rampier. At length the Germans ſeeing themſelves to ſtrive in vain againſt reſolute Men, were enforced to retire. In this aſſault Rogendorff loſt above eight hundred Men. Perenus was alſo in like manner, but with leſs loſs, repulſed at the other Breach he had made at the Gate Sabatina. After that, Rogendorff attempted by undermining to have taken the City, but was by Countermines diſappointed of his purpoſe. Yet for all this, they in the City began to feel the want of many things, ſo that it ſeemed they were not able to endure any longer Siege; the common People pinched with Hunger, crying openly out in mutinous ſort, that it was time to yield and make an end of thoſe common miſeries; but ſuch was the Authority of the Biſhop, with his provident foreſight of all urgent events, that once ſhewing himſelf in the Market-place as if he would have Preached, he could turn the peeviſh minded people which way he pleaſed.

The Biſhop his ſcornful anſwer to Rogendorff.

A great Breach in the Walls of Buda.

The Germans aſſaulting the Breach, are with loſs repulſed.

Bornemiſſa practiſeth to betray the City of Buda.

After all this, it miſſed but a little, but that this City which could not by Enemies force be won, had by ſhameful Treaſon been loſt; there was at that time in Buda one Bornemiſſa a Lawyer, who had in former time been Maior of the City; this Bornemiſſa exceedingly hated the Biſhop for taking part with a Bankrupt Jew againſt him, and being full of malice, and deſirous of revenge, promiſed to Revalius (Martial in the Enemies Camp) to deliver to him the blind Poſtern in St. Maries Church-yard, whereby he might enter the City; which Gate ſerved the Citizens in time of Peace to go through to the River. Rogendorff the General made acquainted with the matter, ſo liked thereof, that he in himſelf thought it not good, in a matter of ſo great importance, to uſe at all the ſervice of the Hungarians: Quite contrary to that Bornemiſſa had requeſted of Revalius, who deſirous to have the matter brought to paſs without the ſlaughter of ſo many guiltleſs People as was by him to be betraied, would have had it altogether performed by the Hungarians, who he was in good hope would ſhew mercy unto their Country-men and Kinſmen, and uſe their Victory with more moderation than the Germans, who provoked with many deſpights, and coming in by night, were like enough to make great effuſion of Blood. But Rogendorff after the manner of his Nation, to be counted politick, uſing to keep promiſe with no Man, and hoping by excluding the Hungarians, to have all the glory of the conceived Victory wholly to himſelf, made as if he would have uſed only the Hungarians, and glozed with Revalius, whoſe Son for the more aſſurance he took as a Pledge; For againſt the appointed hour, which was about midnight, having before given ſtraight charge that no Man ſhould ſtir in the Camp, he ſent four ſelect Companies of Germans with great ſilence unto the Poſtern; at which time his Son Condi ſtood with a ſtrong Troop of Horſemen, ready to have entred, at ſuch time as the Germans (received into the City) ſhould break open the great Gate, as was before agreed. Neither did Bornemiſſa fail to perform what he had as a Traitor promiſed; but opening the Poſtern we ſpake of, had with great ſilence received in moſt part of thoſe German Companies. But when he ſtill asked ſoftly of them as they came in, for Revalius, and heard them anſwer nothing but in the German Language; although he was otherwiſe a Man of a bold Spirit, yet then ſurpriſed with a ſuddain fear (as it oftentimes chanceth in ſuch actions to Men deceived of their expectation) he ſtood as a Man amazed that knew not what to do, and forgot to conduct the Germans, who altogether unacquainted with the City, knew not which way firſt to go; and ſtealing on ſoftly in the dark, went on with no great courage, for fear of Treaſon, ſtill asking of them that followed, for him that ſhould direct them. The Germans could not go ſo cloſely, but that they were by the clattering of their Armor and the light of their Matches, deſcried by the Watch; who asking for the Word, and they not giving it, preſently raiſed an Alarm; but now all too late, the City being as good as half taken, had the Germans well conducted, reſolutely gone on with the matter ſo well begun; but they ignorant of the way, and now deſcried and chaſed with their own fear, ran back again to the Poſtern, in ſuch haſt, that one of them miſerably wronged another, in ſtriving who ſhould get out firſt; and their paſſage out much letted by the Pikes and Weapons which they which fled firſt had caſt croſs the way to run the lighter into the Camp. The firſt that ſet upon the Germans was Bacianus, who had that night the charge of the Watch; and after him Vicche, who kept the Court of Guard in the Market-place; and hearing the Alarm, came thither with a ſtrong Company both of Horſemen and Footmen. Many of the moſt valiant Germans, who coming in firſt, were in flight become laſt, were ſlain or taken, and amongſt them many of Bornemiſſa his Familiars and Friends (as for himſelf, he was got out among the formoſt) from whom the Biſhop by exquiſite Torture wrung out the whole Plot of the Treaſon, and afterwards cauſed them to be ſeverally executed to the terror of others. Revalius in the mean time complaining in the Camp, That he was deceived by the General; and Bornemiſſa wofully lamenting, That having worthily got the name of an infamous Traitor, he had thereby loſt all his Subſtance and undone his Friends and Kindred. The General Rogendorff (condemned even of the common Souldiers, for his fooliſh Arrogancy and Pride) was hardly ſpoken of through all the Camp, as he that by too much inſolency had overthrown the faireſt occaſion of a moſt goodly Victory; wherefore from that time he attempted no great matter, but ſet himſelf down by long ſiege to tame his Enemies, and ſo to win the City.

Bornemiſſa receiveth in the Germans by a Poſtern ſuppoſing them to have been Hungarians.

The Germans not conducted, are diſcovered and diſcomfited.

Solyman underſtanding of the Queens diſtreſs in Hungary, and with what deſire Ferdinand (ſupported by the Emperor his Brother) thirſted after that Kingdom; conſulted with his Baſſaes, of the purpoſes and power of his Enemies, both there and elſewhere; and politickly reſolved at one time, with his divided Forces, to withſtand their attempts in divers places, and thoſe far diſtant one from another, whereby the greatneſs of his power is well to be perceived. Firſt, he ſent Solyman Baſſa an Eunuch to Babylon, to defend the Country of Meſopotamia, and the Frontiers of his Empire alongſt the River Tygris, againſt Tamas the Perſian King. Mahometes another of his great Baſſaes, he ſent into Hungary to relieve the beſieged Queen; and after him, Uſtref Baſſa, which was the fourth of his chief Baſſaes, with another Army to ſtay at Belgrade, in readineſs to aid the other Baſſa ſent before him, as occaſion ſhould require, if he ſhould find his Enemies too ſtrong. Unto Barbaruſſa he committed his Navy, for the defence of Grecia and Epirus againſt Autia, who but a little before, aided by the Gallies of Sicilia and Naples, had driven the Turks and Moors (which took part with the Turks) out of Clupea, Neapolis, Adramentum, Ruſpina, Tapſus, and all alongſt that Coaſt of Africk which the Moors call Mahomedia, except the City of Leptis, and cauſed thoſe Cities to ſubmit themſelves to the Government of Muleaſſes King of Tunes. Theſe Cities are at this day called Calabia; Suſa, Mahometa, Monaſterim, Sfaxia, and Africa. And becauſe Solyman underſtood, that Maylat the Vayvod of Tranſylvania took part with King Ferdinand, he ſent againſt him Achomates Governour of Nicopolis; and commanded Peter of Moldavia, Prince of Valachia, to aid him; who afterwards accordingly came unto him with thirty thouſand Horſemen. He himſelf alſo doubting the purpoſes of the Chriſtian Princes, and eſpecially of Charles the Emperor, more than he had need, came to Hadrinople, and in the Countries thereabouts raiſed a third Army, to aid the two Baſſaes ſent before into Hungary; keeping with him his Son in Law Ruſtan, whom he had made one of the four great Baſſaes of his Council, having thruſt out Luftibeius, whom the Turks call Luzis, his Brother in Law, and exiled him into Macedonia for evil entreating and ſtriking his Wife, which was Solymans Siſter, as is before ſaid, but was at this time done.

Solyman at one time maintaineth Wars in divers places of the world far diſtant.

Mahometes the Baſſa deſirous to do his great Maſter the beſt ſervice he could, entred into Hungary with his Army about the middle of June in the year 1541, taking with him in his way the other Mahometes Governour of Belgrade, who gave the ſhameful overthrow unto the Chriſtians at Exek; joyning alſo with him the power of Boſna, now commanded by Ulamas the Perſian, for that Uſtref the old Baſſa was lately dead. The Captains of the Chriſtian Army hearing of the coming of the Turks, entred into Counſel, Whether they ſhould continue the Siege, or elſe go and meet them by the way and give them Battel. But the Period of the Hungarian Kingdom drawing faſt on, and the inevitable Deſtiny thereof ſo requiring; the opinion of Rogendorff prevail'd againſt the reſt for the continuing of the Siege, he ſeeming more willing to die than to croſs over the River to Peſth, or to retire to Vicegrade or Strigonium, as divers would have perſwaded him; wherefore he removed from the place where he lay before, and encamped his Army on the further ſide of the City, at the foot of St. Gerrards Mount, where the Hill lying between Buda and the Camp, and departing from the River, leaveth a fair Plain toward the Eaſt; of purpoſe that the Turks (which he knew would not go far from the River and their Fleet) ſhould be enforced dangerouſly to paſs by the Mouth of his great Ordnance; which he had aptly placed upon the front of his Trenches; for ſuch was the nature of the place, that the Camp lay defended on the right hand with the ſteep Hill, on the left hand with the River, and behind toward the City with a ſtrong Bulwark. Upon the right hand, upon a little riſing ground, he placed the leſſer Camp, wherein were the Hungarians which favoured King Ferdinand, and then followed his Enſigns. He made alſo a Bridge from his Camp into a little Iſland which lay in the River, and with a Fort well planted with Ordnance commanded both the River and the Plain, ſo to beat the Enemies Fleet coming up the River, and themſelves alſo as they ſhould march alongſt the Plain. He was about alſo to have made a Bridge of Lighters and Boats quite over the River, from his Camp to Peſth, and in this order to expect the coming of new ſupplies from King Ferdinand, and to repel the Enemy who was coming, and with long Siege to weary them in Buda; for there was ſuch ſtore both of Victual and all other warlike Proviſion in Peſth, as would well have ſufficed his Army until Winter had been ſpent. As ſoon as the Turks were come nigh the City, Valentinus as an Embaſſador from the Queen, met them with two thouſand Horſe, and fully inſtructed both the Mahomets, what the Chriſtians did; what ſtrength they were of, and how they might moſt conveniently encamp their Army. Wherefore the Baſſa marching on boldly forward, came within half a mile of the Chriſtian Camp, where he quickly intrenched himſelf round with a ſtrong Trench, filling a great part of the Plain with his Tents. But the other Mahometes, Governour of Belgrade, a moſt politick Captain, took the higher ground towards the riſing of the Hill, nearer unto the Tents of the Hungarians than of the Germans. Unto theſe two Armies thus encamped, belonged alſo two Fleets; the Chriſtian Fleet conſiſted of four and twenty Galliots, about fourſcore ſmall Pinnaces, and little leſs than a hundred Ships of burden and other great Boats; whereas the Turks Fleet was not thought to be paſt half ſo great. Near unto the little Iſland, joyned as we have before ſaid by a Bridge to the Chriſtian Camp, beneath in the River had the Turks taken another Iſland called Cepellia, over againſt their own Camp; where caſting up a great Bulwark in the uppermoſt end thereof, and planting it with great Ordnance, they from thence ſhot at the Fort which the Chriſtians held in the little Iſland, and at their Veſſels paſſing to and fro in the River, as the Chriſtians did at them likewiſe. This Iſland of Cepellia lyeth ſomewhat more than forty miles in length in the River Danubius, full of Country Villages, ſo commodiouſly, that if Rogendorff had at the firſt taken it and fortified it, before the coming of the Turks, as the Hungarians perſwaded him to have done, the Turks could by no means have encamped in the Plain, but muſt needs have forſaken their Fleet, fetching a great compaſs about more toward the Weſt, further off from the River; which would have turned to the Turks great diſadvantage. But no Man is ſo wiſe as to foreſee all things, when as the very evil ſucceſs, be the Plot never ſo well laied, ſhall of it ſelf, beſide the loſs, leave unto the unfortunate Man the Note of the want of provident foreſight and diſcretion. But Rogendorff was not willing to divide his Forces, until he had ſome new ſupply from King Ferdinand. Whilſt the Armies lay thus near one to the other, there were ſome light skirmiſhes made every day, either by the Horſemen or the Footmen, and ſometime one brave Man challenging forth another hand to hand, whom he thought by his Armor or ſome other ſign of his worth, to be like to himſelf; which was ſo pleaſant a ſight to behold, that both the Armies upon a military courteſie, as if it had been ſo agreed, would many times for certain hours forbear to ſhoot any ſhot, of purpoſe to ſee thoſe Gallants, with true Proweſs to prove their Valour and Manhood one upon another with their Spears and Swords only. In which light skirmiſhes the German Horſemen were often times put to the worſt; who mounted upon great heavy Horſes, fitter for a ſet Battel, could neither ſo readily charge the Enemy, nor purſue him in his flight; as could the Turks with their nimble and ready light Horſes, ſo well acquainted with that manner of flying fight, that they would with wheeling about eaſily fruſtrate the firſt charge of the heavy Horſemen, and by and by come upon them again with a freſh charge, and ſo oft retire and come on again, until they had either wearied or overthrown them. But the Hungarians acquainted with that manner of fight as well as they, and alſo better armed, did eaſily encounter the Turks, and foil them, although they were in number more.

Skirmiſhes betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks.

There was amongſt the German Captains a Nobleman called Eckius Rayſchachius, whoſe Son (a valiant young Gentleman) being got out of the Army without his Fathers knowledge, bare himſelf ſo gallantly in fight againſt the Enemy in the ſight of his Father and of the Army, that he was highly commended of all Men, and eſpecially of his Father, who knew him not at all; yet before he could clear himſelf, he was compaſſed in of the Enemy, and valiantly fighting, ſlain. Rayſchachius exceedingly moved with the death of ſo brave a Man, ignorant how near it touched himſelf, turning about to the other Captains ſaid, This worthy Gentleman, whatſoever he be, is worthy of eternal commendation, and to be moſt honourably buried by the whole Army. As the reſt of the Captains were with like compaſſion approving his Speech, the dead Body of the unfortunate Son reſcued, was preſented to the moſt miſerable Father; which cauſed all them that were there preſent to ſhed Tears; but ſuch a ſuddain and inward grief ſurpriſed the aged Father, and ſtruck ſo to his Heart, that after he had ſtood a while Speechleſs, with his Eies ſet in his Head, he ſuddainly fell down dead. From that time the General commanded, That no Man ſhould upon pain of death go out of the Army to skirmiſh with the Enemy without leave; wherein he was ſo ſevere, that he hanged up one or two that preſumed to tranſgreſs his Commandment; which thing much diſcouraged his own Men, and ſo encouraged the Enemy, that they would ſometime brave the Chriſtians upon the top of their own Trenches.

Many days had now paſſed ſince the coming of the Baſſa, the Turks and they of Buda daily encreaſing both in ſtrength and courage; when on the other ſide, faint courage, weak ſtrength, troubled council, uncertain reſolution, the ominous ſigns of an undoubted overthrow, were eaſie to be ſeen; and hope it ſelf, the ſtay of all human Actions, eſpecially of Martial Affairs, almoſt loſt; the only things that held their fainting Hearts, was the often Letters of King Ferdinand, and the firm opinion they had conceived, That Charles the Emperor would not in ſo great a danger fail to aid his Brother, both with Men and Mony; and laſt of all, the firm reſolution of a General, which far paſſed all reaſon, the ſooner to draw him to his end. The Armies lying in this order, the Turks from the higher ground, and out of Cepellia, perceiving the Germans in the little Iſland as careleſs men to keep but negligent Watch, agreed amongſt themſelves at one inſtant out of both their Camps, to aſſail divers of their Forts; and ſo in the break of the day landed with their Fleet ſo cloſely and ſuddainly to the Iſland, that they had ſlain almoſt ſix hundred of the Germans, before they were throughly awake or could well arm themſelves; wherewith the reſt were put in ſuch a fear, that they fled to the Camp in ſuch haſte, that many of them fell beſide the Bridge and were drowned in the River. All the Camp was wonderfully troubled with the ſuddaineſs of the matter, the Turks with their hideous cries raiſing the Alarm in divers places at once; yet for all that, certain German Companies in one of the Forts neareſt unto the River, and the Souldiers in the Fleet, well declared their preſent reſolution and valiant courage, in recovering again of the Iſland. For Herbeſtulſus the Camp-Maſter, perſwading them not to ſuffer the Chriſtian Enſigns and great Ordnance to be ſo ſhamefully carried away of the Turks; and Marius the Admiral at the ſame time landing divers Companies in the Iſland with his Pinnaces and great Boats; they ſo couragiouſly charged the Turks, then buſied in the ſpoiling of the dead bodies and drawing away of the great Ordnance, that they drave them again into their Boats, leaving unto them as Victors, both the Iſland and the Ordnance, having before their departure, received no leſs loſs themſelves than had the Germans before.

It was reported, that the Turks Fleet might that day have been quite overthrown, if the Chriſtians uſing the Victory, and holpen with the courſe of that ſwift River, had couragiouſly purſued them and landed with them. But many things after a matter is done are eaſily ſeen, which in the very heat and hurl of the danger cannot be foreſeen; foraſmuch as ſuddain accidents attended with great peril, do oftentimes dazel the minds of right wiſe and valiant Captains; yet four of the Turks Pinnaces were ſunk, and three taken, and many of the Turks ſlain or drowned in the River. Shortly after, the Turks more and more encouraged with the multitude of themſelves, and the fearfulneſs they perceived in their Enemies, did at ſundry times ſo inſolently trouble and aſſail the Camp of the Chriſtians on every ſide, that they left them almoſt no time of reſt, one Company ſtill ſucceeding another, ſo that they were almoſt in deſpair, to be able long to defend their Camp, the Enemy ſtill growing both in Strength and Courage. For the Baſſa that lay at Belgrade, ſtill taking unto him the ſick and wounded Souldiers, ſent continually freſh men in their ſtead; and Valentius taking unto him a Company of the Turks Janizaries Harquebuſiers, had driven Perenus with the Hungarian Horſemen out of the upper Camp. So that they in the neither Camp were now hardly beſet with their Enemies on every ſide; yet were they well holpen by the great Artillery from Peſth, which much troubled Valentinus and his Horſemen in aſſailing the Camp on that ſide.

Valentinus General for the Queen in Buda, certifieth Perenus of the coming of Solyman.

Some report that Valentinus, not greatly angry with the Hungarian baniſhed men, but with the Germans, did by the way of private courteſie and Friendſhip, by a faithful Souldier wiſh Perenus ſpeedily to provide for the ſafety of himſelf and of the Hungarians with him; for that there was a great Beaſt coming, which would at one morſel devour them all. For Solyman advertiſed of the doings of the Emperor and King Ferdinand, thinking that they would have come down to Buda with a puiſſant Army, was reſolved to be preſent himſelf at ſo notable a Battel, and was therefore coming thither with his Army in all haſte. Wherefore Perenus thus forewarned, ſaid plainly to Rogendorff and the other Captains, That except they would preſently riſe with the Army and depart; he would now whiles he had yet time, make ſhift for himſelf and his Countrymen. Their opinions diverſly delivered, at laſt they all agreed, that it was beſt the next night to paſs over the River to Peſth; only the General upon a fatal obſtinacy ſaid, He would not without King Ferdinands commandment depart from Buda; and therefore ſent Count Salma with a ſwift Pinnace up the River to Vienna to know his pleaſure therein. In the mean time urged with fear, Perenus fretting at their long ſtay, it was reſolved upon, that they ſhould the next night after the Moon was down, paſs over the River in four Convoies to Peſth. In the firſt, were to paſs over the Hungarians, with their great Ordnance. In the ſecond, the German and Bohemian Horſemen; and in the other two, the Footmen, and the Baggage of the Army. For it was not ſo eaſie a matter to make a Bridge over Danubius, as they had at firſt ſuppoſed; for after they had begun it, and almoſt planked it, there roſe ſuch a Wind and Tempeſt, and the violent River became ſo rough, that the Timber wherewith the Bridge was faſtned together was broken, the Joynts unloſed, and many of the Boats whereof the Bridge was framed, their Cables being broken, were carried away by the force of the Stream. The firſt and the ſecond Convoy Fortune ſo favoured, that they well paſſed over; for although they of Buda and the Turks, ſeeing in the day time from their high places the Fleet drawing together into one place, might have ſome ſuſpition of the matter, ſome gheſſing one thing and ſome another; yet could they foreſee nothing of the ſuddain departure of the Enemy: But that multitude of Ships and Boats now paſſing too and fro, could not long deceive the attentive and vigilant Enemy; and ſo much the leſs, for that two Fugitive Hungarians even then diſcovered to the Biſhop the Flight of the Germans; who preſently certified the Baſſa, and the other, Mahometes thereof, which without further delay came almoſt with all their power to aſſault the Chriſtians in their Camp; the great Ordnance was brought forth, and after the Janizaries and other Footmen, followed the Horſemen, diſmounted from their Horſes to do the better ſervice; who all with a horrible cry aſſailed the Trenches. Then began the Germans to quail, their Flight being now diſcovered; yet did they with the Bohemians for a while notably reſiſt the Enemy. All the Camp was filled with tumult and confuſion, and eſpecially at the River ſide, every man in that great fear ſtriving to get aboard, without regard of order or ſhame; for the dead time of the night then covered with dark and thick Clouds, made all things more terrible, even unto them which were of beſt courage; the Authority of Rogendorff the General (in the darkneſs of the night, and ſo great clamor both of his own People and of the Enemy, and the thundring of the Ordnance) was as nothing; he (beſides that he was then ſick in mind) lay in his bed wounded, by a wonderful and fatal chance; for as he was writing Letters to the King, a Faulcon-Shot out of the Enemies Camp falling in his Tent, and ſtriking in ſunder a Cheſt which ſtood there, wounded him grievouſly in the left Shoulder with a Splinter of the ſame. The other Captains of the Footmen, envying that the Horſemen were ſo well eſcaped, ſtood as men more careful of themſelves than of the common danger, faintly reſiſting the Enemy. The uppermoſt Tents, wherein Perenus lay, were firſt taken by Mahometes of Belgrade, and Valentinus; and the German Footmen chaſed all over Saint Gerrards Mount. They of Buda alſo ſallied out, and entred the Camp on that ſide which was next unto the City, and with Wild-Fire burnt the Tents a little before forſaken by the Germans. And the Biſhop at the ſame time cauſed a great Stack of Straw ſtanding by the Kings Stables near unto the Rivers-ſide, to be ſet on fire; which gave ſuch a light, that a man might have ſeen all over Danubius unto the Walls of Peſth, as if it had been light day; whereby the great confuſion of the Chriſtian Army by Land, as well as the ſhameful flight by Water, was of the Turks plainly diſcovered. Then was the great Artillery from every place diſcharged upon the flying Fleet, as well from Buda as the Turks Camp. And to increaſe the fear, Caſon the Turks Admiral rowing with his light Boats againſt the Stream, ſet upon the Ships croſſing the River to Peſth, where he took certain Boats loaded with Souldiers, and with his great Ordnance ſunk divers others; ſo that the River was filled with dead Bodies, and the miſerable Company of Souldiers and Mariners laboured to ſave their Lives by ſwiming; for at ſuch time as the Janizaries having ſlain the firſt Companies, were broken into the lower Camp; and the reſt of the Germans flying over the Bridge into the little Iſland, were there ſlain without mercy, by the Turks purſuing them, many of them leaping into the River and there periſhed. Three hundred Sail of one ſort of Ships and other, were ſo confuſed and mingled together, that Danubius ſeemed that night to have been covered over, as if it had been with a great Bridge. But the Chriſtian Fleet ſeeing all loſt, cleared themſelves ſo ſoon as they could of the Turks; and ſo beating them back with their great Ordnance out of the Poups of their Ships, got up the River to Comora. The reſt of the Land Forces endured the ſame Fortune in the Camp, of whom the Bohemians died moſt honourably, ſlain by the Enemy in Fight. Many falling into the hands of them of Buda, were ſaved or ſlain, as was their Fortune to fall into the power of a merciful or mercileſs man. But the Sun riſing, plainly diſcovered the Slaughter of the Chriſtians, and the Victory of the Turks, not ſo well before known. There were about three thouſand men of one ſort and other, who in warlike manner had taken a little Hill by Saint Gerrards Church, and there ſtood upon their guard, until ſuch time as more than two thouſand of them were ſlain; the reſt caſting away their Weapons yielded in hope of life, and were reſerved for a ſpectacle more grievous than death it ſelf.

Peſth taken by Caſon, Admiral of the Turks Fleet.

At the ſame time Caſon with his victorious Fleet coming to the Shore of Peſth, brought ſuch a fear upon them that were eſcaped thither, and might eaſily have defended the Walls, (only with the cry of his Souldiers and the thundering of the Artillery) that the Horſemen for haſte to get out, were like to overrun one another. The Germans had at that time ſo much forgot their wonted Valour, and ſo trembled at the name of the Turks, that as ſoon as they ſaw their white Caps in their Ships, they ran away as men diſmaied, unarmed, leaving behind them their Plate, their Carriages, and whatſoever good thing they had elſe. Yet ſome of the Hungarian Horſemen more deſirous of the Spoil than afraid of death, ſtaid behind rifling the Merchant Shops; for Peſth was become a very rich Mart Town for all kind of Merchandiſe, Merchants reſorting thither from all other places of the troubled Country, as to a ſtrong and commodious City, and of more ſafety than the reſt. But Caſon now entring without reſiſtance, ſlew ſome of thoſe greedy Hungarians, and ran through the Town with ſuch barbarous Cruelty and Thirſt of the Chriſtian Blood, that he ſpared neither Man, Woman, nor Child, except ſome few, which either for their Beauty or Strength of Body were reſerved for the Turks beaſtly Luſt, or ſlaviſh Labor; ſo that in this War it is reported more than twenty thouſand Chriſtians were one way and other by divers chances ſlain. There was taken at Peſth, in the Camp and in the Iſland thirty ſix great Pieces for Battery, of wonderful Beauty; and of leſſer Field Pieces an hundred and fifty. As for Shot, Powder, Armour, Weapons, and Victual provided for Winter, ſuch ſtore was found, that the Turks accounted it for the greateſt part of their Victory. Rogendorff the unfortunate General, at ſuch time as the Turks having won the Trenches, were fighting in the midſt of his Camp, deſiring rather to be ſlain in his Tent, than to live after ſo great an overthrow, was againſt his Will by ſtrong hand carried aboard a little Pinnace by his Phyſician and Chamberlain, which would not leave him as he lay, and was ſo conveyed up the River to the Iſland of Comora; where he ſhortly after, partly for the painfulneſs of his Wound, but more for grief of mind, died in a little Country Village called Samarium, leaving unto the Germans a woful remembrance of his accurſed obſtinacy and pride. Solyman ſtill doubting the coming of Charles the Emperor and King Ferdinand to Buda, was coming with his Army from Hadrianople in ſuch haſte, that he cauſed the Janizaries, his beſt Footmen, contrary to their manner, to march as faſt as his Horſemen; but underſtanding by the way, of the late Victory obtained by his Captains, he took more leaſure, and came with a great power to Buda in Auguſt, and there incamped on the other ſide of the City, to avoid the noiſome ſavour of the dead Bodies, which lay yet unburied. Where calling unto him the other Army, and making one huge Camp of both, he highly commended all his Captains, but eſpecially the two Mahometes. And underſtanding that the Victory was eſpecially gotten by the means of Mahometes Governor of Belgrade, he made him General of all his Europeian Horſemen, one of the moſt honourable Preferments of the Turkiſh Empire; the other Captains he rewarded according as they had deſerved, and withal augmented their Pay.

Turkiſh Cruelty.

After that, he cauſed the Priſoners, in number about eight hundred, to be brought out; who bound in long Ropes, were in deriſion led all along the Army, ranged in order of Battel, and afterward by his commandment ſlain by his young Souldiers; ſaying with ſevere countenance, that they were worthy of ſuch death, which by Embaſſadors diſſemblingly entreating of Peace, had in the mean time craftily waged War. Amongſt theſe Priſoners was one Souldier of Bavaria of an exceeding high Stature; him in deſpight of the German Nation he delivered to a little Dwarf (whom his Sons made great account of) to be ſlain, whoſe head was ſcarce ſo high as the Knees of the tall Captive; with that cruel ſpight to aggravate the indignity of his death; when as that goodly tall man, mangled about the Legs a long time by that apiſh Dwarf with his little Scimeter, as if it had been in diſport, fell down, and was with many feeble blows hardly at laſt ſlain by that Wretch, ſtill heartned on by others, to ſatisfie the Eyes of the Princes, beholding it as their Sport.

This barbarous and cruel execution done, Solyman ſent his Embaſſadors with Preſents to the young King, which were three beautiful Horſes, with their Bridles of Gold, and their Trappings richly ſet with precious Stones, and three Royal Robes of Cloth of Gold; and unto the chief of the Nobility he ſent rich Gowns and Chains of Gold. The Embaſſadors which brought theſe Preſents, in courteous manner requeſted of the Queen, to ſend the young King her Son, attended with his Nobility, into the Camp, and without all fear, to hope that all ſhould go well both with her and her Son; for that Solyman, who exceeded all other Kings, not in Power and Fortune only, but in Vertue and upright dealing alſo, was of ſuch an heroical Diſpoſition, that he would not only defend the Child, whom in the right of his Father he had once thought worthy his Protection and Favour, Victory confirming the ſame, but would alſo augment his Eſtate, with the largeſt Bounds of his ancient Kingdom. Wherefore he was deſirous to ſee the young King, and to behold in him the repreſentation of his Father, and with his own hand to deliver him to be imbraced of his Sons; that of his Protection renewed, ſo happily begun, might be grounded a firm and perpetual Friendſhip with the Othoman Kings; and that he would always account of her as of his Daughter. But the cauſe why he came not to ſee her, which he did in courteſie deſire, was for that by ancient cuſtom the Othoman Kings were forbidden that point of courteſie, to viſit other mens Wives in their Houſes. Beſides that, Solyman (they ſaid) was not ſo forgetful of his Modeſty and Honour, as to receive into his Pavillion the Daughter of a King his Friend and Ally, and ſhe the late Wife of a King his Friend and Tributary, and the fair young Mother of a Son, growing in the hope of like Regal Dignity, for fear he ſhould draw into any ſuſpition the inviolate name of her Chaſtity, which in Queens was to be guarded with an eſpecial and wonderful care. Whereunto the Queen (a manifeſt fear confounding the tender Senſes in her Motherly Affection) anſwered very doubtfully; but the Biſhop perſwading her, and inſtantly requeſting her, not to give the Turks occaſion to ſuſpect, that ſhe had them in diſtruſt, by her little and unprofitable delay; ſent her young Son in Princely ſwathing Clothes, in a rich Chariot, with his Nurſe and certain great Ladies unto the Camp, attended upon with almoſt all the Nobility to whom Solyman had ſent Preſents. In his coming to the Camp, he was for honours ſake met upon the way by certain gallant Troops of the Turks brave Horſemen; and all the way as he paſſed in the Camp, orderly ſtood the Janizaries of Solymans Guard. As ſoon as he was brought into the Camp, Solyman courteouſly looked upon him, and familiarly talked with the Nurſe, and commanded his Sons there preſent to take him in their Arms, and to kiſs him, in certain token of the love they would bear him, whom they were in time to have their Friend and Tributary, when he was grown to mans eſtate; theſe were Selymus and Bajazet, begotten of his fair Concubine Roxalana; bearing the Names, the one of his Grandfather, the other of his great Grandfather. As for Muſtapha his eldeſt Son by his Circaſſian Wife, he then lived in Magneſia a great way off; who though he was a Prince of ſo great hope, as never any of the Turkiſh Kings had a Son of greater, and was therefore exceedingly beloved of the Men of War; yet was he not ſo well liked of his Father, brought out of favour with him by Roxalana, as if he had traiterouſly gone about to take the Empire from him, yet living, as did Selymus his Grandfather from Bajazet; for which cauſe Solyman ſecretly purpoſed to take him away, as afterwards he did, and to appoint Selymus for his Succeſſor, as hereafter ſhall appear.

Solyman detaineth the Noblemen of Hungary in his Camp.

But Solyman at ſuch time as the Noblemen of Hungary were dining merrily with the Baſſaes, had commanded certain Companies (to whom he had before given inſtructions what he would have done) under the colour of ſeeing the City, to take one of the Gates called Sabatina, and the chief Streets; which was done ſo quietly and cunningly, that a wary Watchman ſtanding there and beholding the manner of the Turks coming and going too and fro, could hardly have perceived how the Gate was taken, until it was too late. For many of the Turks walking fair and ſoftly by great Companies into the City, as if it had been but for pleaſure, to have ſeen it; and other ſome to colour the matter, walking likewiſe back again, as if they had ſufficiently viewed the City; by that means they without any tumult or ſtir quickly took the appointed Gate, with the Market place and chief Streets of the City Which ſo finely done, the Captain of the Janizaries cauſed Proclamation to be made in all parts of the City, That the Citizens ſhould without fear keep themſelves within their Houſes, and forthwith, as they would have their Lives, Liberty, and Goods ſaved, to deliver all their Weapons; which they ſeeing no remedy, did; and having delivered their Arms, and taken the Turks Faith for their ſecurity, they received them into their Houſes as their unwelcome Gueſts. But ſuch was the quietneſs and modeſty of the Turks, by reaſon of the ſeverity of their Martial Diſcipline, that no Citizen which took them into their Houſes, was by them wronged by Word or Deed. Solyman underſtanding that the City was thus quietly and without reſiſtance taken, ſent the Child back again unto the Queen, although it was now almoſt night; but the chief Noblemen he retained ſtill with him; theſe were George the Biſhop and Treaſurer, Petrus Vicche the young Kings nigh Kinſman and one of his Tutors, Valentinus Turaccus General of the Queens Forces, Stephanus Verbetius Chancellor, and Bacianus Urbanus Governor of the City of Buda. This ſuddain and unexpected change exceedingly troubled all their minds, and ſo much the more, for that the great Baſſaes with changed countenance began to pick quarrels with them, and as it were ſtraightly and impudently to examine them, and to call them to account for all that they had done. The Queen ſeeing the City ſo craftily ſurpriſed, aud the Nobility injuriouſly detained in the Camp, troubled with fear and grief, by humble Letters requeſted Solyman not to forget the Faith he had long before given unto her, and even of late confirmed by his Embaſſadors; but mindful both thereof, and of his wonted Clemency, to ſend back unto her the Noblemen, who for their Fidelity and valiant Service had well deſerved both of him and her; this ſhe did by Ruſtemes Baſſa, whom ſhe had loaded with Gifts, and amongſt other things of great price, had ſent him a fair Coronet of her own, and a goodly Jewel ſet with rich Stones, to ſend unto his Wife (Solymans Daughter) for a Preſent.

The great Baſſaes of divers opinions for the diſpoſing of the Kingdom of Hungary.

After that, Solyman conſulted with his Baſſaes four days, what order to take concerning the Kingdom of Hungary; in diſcourſe whereof his great Baſſaes were of divers opinions. Mahometes adviſed him to carry away with him to Conſtantinople, both the young Child and all the Nobility, and to leave ſuch a Governor in Buda, as by his wiſe and moderate Government, rather than by rigour, might put the People out of fear of Servitude and Bondage, by defending them from wrong, and yet by little and little lay upon them the yoke of the Turkiſh Government. But Ruſtemes Baſſa (before corrupted, and a man in greater favour than the reſt, becauſe he was Solymans Son in Law, and therefore further from all ſuſpition of Flattery) ſtood altogether upon terms of honour; ſaying, That nothing could be more diſhonourable unto ſo great and mighty a Monarch, who never had at any time with any Spot or Stain blemiſhed the Glory of his Name, than after Victory, againſt all right and reaſon to break his Faith at once with a weak Woman and ſilly Infant, whom he had before taken upon him to protect and defend. On the other ſide, Mahometes Governor of Belgrade (an old mortal Enemy of the Chriſtians, of all the reſt beſt acquainted with the ſtate of Hungary, and for his great experience and approved Valour, then extraordinarily admitted by Solyman into Council among the great Baſſaes) diſliked of both the former opinions, as too full of Lenity; and being asked his own, delivered it in this miſchievous manner as followeth:

The Oration of Mahometes of Belgrade to Solyman, concerning the diſpoſing of the Kingdom of Hungary.

I know (ſaid he) moſt mighty Solyman; that he which in conſultation of matters of ſo great conſequence is to deliver his opinion laſt, ſhall if he diſſent from the reſt, be ſubject to envy and reprehenſion. And therefore it cannot be, but that I being of a quite contrary opinion to them that have before ſpoken, my ſpeech muſt be unto your Ears both unpleaſant and tedious. But I refuſe not to be counted by my ſelf, yea and preſumptuous, if you will ſo have it, rather than a ſmoother up of other mens ſayings, as one of no Judgment; whilſt I recount thoſe things, which as the preſent caſe ſtandeth, may wonderfully profit your deſigns and the Imperial State; for of right I may deſire you to yield a little to my years, and (if I may by your good favour ſo ſay) to that I have already done; when as I, now grown an old man in Wars againſt theſe Hungarians, have by experience learned thoſe things of the State and Strength of this Kingdom, and the diſpoſition of the People, which being here laid down, may much avail for your better determination of this ſo weighty a cauſe as admitteth no repentance if you ſhall now be overſeen therein. You have now within the ſpace of theſe twenty years come in Wars your ſelf in perſon five times into this Country, when I as no obſcure Captain or Souldier, was in all thoſe Wars and Battels ever preſent, of purpoſe, as I ſuppoſe, to revenge your Injuries, to enlarge your Empire, and in brief to aſſure you of a good Peace, which could never be but by force of Arms and Victory. And therefore you valiantly won Belgrade, the infamous dwelling place and receptacle of moſt outragious Theeves and Robbers, and in former time famous for the unfortunate attempts of your Anceſtors; when as from thence the Hungarians in time of Peace had at their pleaſure, whilſt your Father was then occupied in the Perſian War, ſpoiled the Borders of Servia and Illyria. The ſame Hungarians about five years after, for that they had in cruel manner ſlain your Embaſſadors, you overthrew in battel, and ſlew their King; and poſſeſſed of Buda, to manifeſt and make known by a notable demonſtration, the magnificence of your heroical mind, even unto the remoteſt Enemies of our name, did chooſe out of the reliques of that vanquiſhed Nation, one whom you might grace with the honour of the Regal Crown, although not born of Royal Blood, or unto you known for any other deſert, than that he was a little before, both your publique and private Enemy; and coming gainſt you with a ſtrong power out of Tranſilvania, he had in the mean time loſt his Brother, a better man than himſelf, ſlain with our Sword. After that, roſe up the Auſtrian King, a new Enemy, to expulſe this Hungarian, reigning by your courteſie, and ſo you took in hand the third War againſt the Germans, which you ſo effectually proſecuted, that having forthwith reſtored the King, you carried the terror of your ſelf not only to the Walls of Vienna, but into the very heart of Germany. But two years yet ſcarcely paſt, the ſame King (never long contented with Peace or Wars) ſupported by the power of his Brother Charles, and in vain beſieging Buda defended by your Garriſons, ſtirred you up again to revenge the Injury, Slaughter, and Spoil by his Souldiers done; for that you thought it to ſtand with your honour, to protect him with your power, whom you had of your rare Bounty made a King; and then deſired above all things, to fight a noble Battel with the two Brethren for the Empire of the Weſt. But they at ſuch time as you with Fire and Sword ran through their ancient Kingdoms, endured not the noiſe of your coming. After that, enſued a Peace between the Hungarians and the Germans, your Majeſty permitting and approving it, at ſuch time as you made haſte to go againſt the Perſians; but the German King ſo broke that Peace, that had not I in good time revenged his Treachery, by the overthrow of a great Army of his at Exek, you muſt of neceſſity have been ſent for from Babylon your ſelf, as but now you were glad to come in haſte, by long and painful journeys from Conſtantinople, to aid us in time, and as I verily hope, to make an end for all; that all things ſet in firm order in Hungary, the inconveniences of ſo many labours and ſo great charge, five times undertaken for another mans profit, might now at length take end; except (as I ſee ſome wiſh) you be in mind never to give over the protection of the Child and Widdow, a matter full of infinite labour and peril, not to be countervailed with that glorious ſhew of honour, which by theſe (in my opinion) too too wiſe men is pretended to your haughty mind, ever deſirous of Honour and Fame. But I as a blunt man underſtand not this high point of Wiſdom, abounding with Glory, which in the very courſe thereof cutteth in ſunder the ſinews of Victory, and is never by politique Generals admitted into their Camps. In which doing, as I wiſh you more fortunate than your Anceſtors, who have united eighteen Kingdoms to this your Empire, ſo would I not have you more wiſe than they; for what can be a more unwiſe part, than always to play the unwiſe man? that is to ſay, always to be careful of other mens Affairs, and in mean time oftentimes to endanger his own Eſtate, his Health, his Wealth, his Honour. You have ſatisfied, and that (in my opinion) plentifully the duty both of Charity, Fidelity, and if it muſt needs be ſo, of Honour and Glory alſo; if it be to be gotten rather by Courteſie, Clemency and Lenity, than by the invincible ſtrength of wiſe Policy, and the conſtant reſolution of a Martial Mind; for by thoſe inſtruments, and none other, have worthy Vertues always promoted and ſupported the Othoman Kings. Wherefore let thoſe vain ſhews (as ſeemeth unto me) of counterfeit honour delight the minds of idle and ſlothful Kings; aſſuredly they never pleaſed your armed Anceſtors, but after the Enemy was quite overthrown, the Triumph made, and the Trophies of Victory erected. But let this be as beſt pleaſeth your high Wiſdom and Judgment, whereunto the greateſt Wits gave place. Truly I (if I well foreſee the chances of War, and the aſſured events of things) will not follow that manner of Counſel which the pleaſure of my mind perſwadeth me unto; when as neceſſity, which ruleth all things, preſently forceth me and ſheweth me a far better Courſe. The Hungarians above all other things notably warn us not to truſt them, who infamous for their unconſtancy after Revolt and Treachery, are ſtill at variance amongſt themſelves; and their baniſhed men are continually ſetting on the Germans to invade the Country, and the weak power of the Queen and the Child is not ſuch as may withſtand ſo near and ſo mighty an Enemy; ſo that another mans Kingdom muſt of neceſſity be defended by our help, which may not be leſs than a ſtrong Army without our great peril. To be brief, every year to take in hand ſo long an expedition of ſo great labour and travel, with with an Army furniſhed with Horſemen, Footmen, Artillery, and a Fleet of Ships for defence of another man, as commonly we do, ſeemeth to me meer madneſs; neither do I think it to ſtand with the Majeſty of the Othoman Emperors, thus to be moved every year at the requeſt of a puling Woman, crying for help; except you think it more profitable and honourable to maintain a defenſive than invaſive War: Wherefore (in my opinion) it is beſt to turn this Kingdom (ſo often conquered and defended by Law of Arms) after the manner of your Anceſtors, into the form of a Province; the Queen I would have ſent to her Father, and the Boy her Son brought up in your Court at Conſtantinople, and there inſtructed in our Religion; the Nobility of the Country I wiſh to be ſlain, and their Caſtles raſed, and the notable Families which bare the braveſt minds, to be carried away out of all parts of the Country into Aſia; as for the baſe multitude, I would have kept under with good Garriſons, to till the ground, and inhabit the Cities. By this only means (mighty Solyman*) ſhall both the Hungarians perceive themſelves conquered, and the Germans glad to forbear coming into* Hungary, unleſs they will raſhly and unfortunately hazard both Styria and Auſtria.

Solyman entreth Buda the thirtieth of Auguſt 1541, and there firſt ſacrificeth after the Mahometan manner.

But Solyman thinking it good to do ſacrifice before he would reſolutely determine of ſo great a matter, entred into Buda with his two Sons, Selymus and Bajazet, the thirtieth of Auguſt in the year 1541. and there in the Cathedral Church dedicated to the Virgin Mary (being before by his Prieſts Purified after the manner of their Superſtition) ſacrificed the firſt Mahometan Sacrifice in Buda. Shortly after, he as it were moderating the opinions of his great Counſellors, provided out of them all both for his own ſecurity and honour, and publiſhed a Decree, the fatal Doom of that flouriſhing Kingdom, whereunder it yet groaneth at this day; That Buda ſhould from that day be kept with a Garriſon of Turks, and the Kingdom converted into a Province of the Turkiſh Empire; and the Queen with her young Son ſhould preſently depart the City, and live in Lippa, in a fertile and quiet Country beyond the River of Tibiſcus, which ſomething to comfort her, was near unto the Borders of her Father Sigiſmund his Kingdom, to be ſafely conducted thither with all her Wealth and Jewels by his Janizaries. Wherefore the Queen and her Son, according to this Decree, with Tears and Mourning, deteſting in her heart the Tyrants perfideous dealing (which neceſſity inforced her then to diſſemble) departed from Buda, conſtrained by the Turks to leave behind her all the Ordnance in the Caſtle and City, with all other the Warlike Proviſion and Store of Victual. The Noblemen went with her alſo, who although they went ſorrowful for this woful and unexpected change of things, yet were they very glad of their Liberty and Safety, whereof they had for the ſpace of three days deſpaired. Only Valentinus was kept in ſafe cuſtody in the Camp, becauſe he was a Martial Man of greateſt power amongſt the Hungarians; and beſides that, much hated of the Turks for the hard purſuit of Caſon and his Horſemen, ſlain at Storamberg in Auſtria. Thus the Royal City of Buda fell into the hands of the Turks, whereupon not long after enſued the final ruin of that Kingdom, ſometime the ſtrong Bulwark of Chriſtendom, but loſt to the great weakning of the Chriſtian Commonweal; which may juſtly be imputed to the Pride, Ambition, and Diſſention of the Hungarians amongſt themſelves, and the calling in of the common Enemy; the due conſideration of whoſe only coming, might well have ſufficed to have made them agreed.

The Doom of Hungary.

King Ferdinand ſendeth Embaſſadors and Preſents to Solyman.

Whilſt theſe things were doing at Buda, King Ferdinand expecting the event of this War at Vienna, and hearing of the ſhameful loſs of his Army, and that the General deadly wounded was fled to Comara, and that Solyman (Fame encreaſing the evil News) was coming towards Vienna; ſent Leonardus Velſius (who never liked of the Siege of Buda) to Comara, to ſtay the further Flight of the Souldiers, and to gather together ſo well as he could the diſperſed Reliques of the ſcattered Army, and to comfort again the diſcouraged men with the hope of new Supplies and of Pay. And ſomewhat to ſtay Solyman, who as it was thought would ſuddainly come to Vienna, he ſent Count Salma and Sigiſmund Litheſtain, a noble and grave Counſellor, his Embaſſadors, with Preſents and new Conditions of Peace to Solyman. The Preſents were a high ſtanding Cup of Gold after the German faſhion, curiouſly ſet with Stones; and a wonderful Globe of Silver of moſt rare and curious device, daily expreſſing the hourly paſſing of the Time, the motion of the Planets, the Change and Full of the Moon, the motion of the ſuperior Orbs, ever moving by certain Wheels and Weights curiouſly conveyed within the ſame, and exactly keeping due time and motion; lively expreſſing the wonderful motions and converſions of the Celeſtial Frame. A moſt curious and ſtrange piece of Work, deviſed and perfected by the moſt cunning Aſtronomers for Maximilian the Emperor, whoſe noble mind never ſpared for any Coſt to obtain things of rare and ſtrange device. The Embaſſadors paſſing down the River of Danubius, were at their landing firſt received by Caſon the Admiral of Solymans Fleet, and by him brought into a rich Tent, the ground under their Feet being all covered wich rich Carpets; to whom Ruſtan Baſſa ſent ſuch good chear as the Camp afforded, but eſpecially moſt excellent Wine, no leſs forbidden the Turks by their Law, than deſired of the Germans. The next day after, the great Baſſaes feaſted the Embaſſadors, Solyman himſelf dining not far off in his Pavillion; at which Feaſt the Baſſaes for the more courteſie dined with the Embaſſadors, not ſitting with their Legs gathered under them flat upon the ground, as their manner was, but ſitting in Chairs at a high Table, after the manner of the Chriſtians; only Mahometes Governor of Belgrade, for his Age and Valour, an extraordinary Gheſt, ſat down upon a Cuſſion beneath the Baſſaes. Their Chear was only Rice and Mutton, and that ſo plainly and ſparingly dreſſed, as if they had thereby noted our gormandiſe and exceſs; who meaſure not our Chear by that which Nature requireth, but that which greedy Appetite deſireth, as if therein conſiſted the greateſt Nobility; and the Drink for the great Baſſaes themſelves, right eaſie to be had, was fair Water out of the River Danubius. After Dinner the Embaſſadors were brought in unto Solyman, each of them led betwixt two Baſſaes holding them faſt by the Arms, as it had been for honours ſake, and ſo brought to kiſs his Hand. For the Turks ſuffer no Stranger otherwiſe to come unto the Preſence of their ſuſpicious Emperor, but firſt they ſearch him that he have no Weapon about him, and ſo claſping him by the Arms under the colour of doing him honour, diſſemblingly bereave him of the uſe of his Hands, leſt he ſhould offer him any violence; yet hath he always as he ſitteth in his Throne, lying at hand ready by him a Target, a Scimeter, an Iron-Mace, with Bow and Arrows.

The frugal Chear of the Turks.

The requeſt of the Embaſſadors in the behalf of King Ferdinand.

The great Globe was alſo brought in by twelve of the Embaſſadors Servants, which with the ſtrangeneſs thereof filled the mind of Solyman, and the Eyes of his Baſſaes with admiration; for Solyman was of ſo ſharp a Wit, that he was not learned only in ſuch Books as contained the Laws and Rites of the Mahometan Superſtition, but had alſo curiouſly ſtudied Aſtronomy, and eſpecially Coſmography, in which profitable and pleaſant ſtudy he much recreated himſelf as his leaſure ſerved. The Embaſſadors deſired that he would give the Kingdom of Hungary to King Ferdinand, almoſt upon the ſame conditions that Laſcus had before required it for him at Conſtantinople, paying him ſuch yearly Tribute as King John had uſually paid, and promiſing farther to draw Charles the Emperor his Brother into the ſame League; ſo that Solyman delivered of all fear that way, might at his pleaſure turn his Forces upon the Perſian, which it was thought he moſt deſired. Beſides that, they ſaid he ſhould deal neither honourably nor indifferently, if he ſhould prefer the young Child before King Ferdinand, who beſide his ancient Right unto that Kingdom, (which they were not now to urge, as oppreſſed by his happy Victories, but might in time be revived) had alſo a late intereſt by a League betwixt him and King John, wherein he had expreſly covenanted by the ſolemn conſent of the greateſt part of his Nobility, that King Ferdinand ſhould ſucceed him in the Kingdom. Whereby they excuſed him of the late War, as juſtly taken in hand againſt the Queen and her Son uſurping upon his Right; which King John knowing to be good, and moved with Conſcience, had by his ſolemn act acknowledged, though to the great offence and prejudice of Solyman his ſetter up and defender, as alſo to the touching of himſelf in honour, to have ſo unthankfully and fraudulently dealt with his Patron, to whom he was by the Oath of Obedience bound. Wherefore they requeſted, that ſith he being a Prince of all others moſt mighty and magnificent, ſtanding upon his upright dealing both in Peace and War, had ſo lightly regarded the ſlie dealing of ſo ungrateful a man; he would rather accept of King Ferdinand ſo many ways injured, as his Friend and Tributary, than to have him his perpetual Enemy. Concluding, That nothing could be unto him, for the good report of his Juſtice more commendable, or for the aſſurance of a perpetual Peace more profitable, or to the immortal praiſe of his Bounty more honourable, than to call a King of a moſt ancient Diſcent, famous for his Vertue and Fidelity, choſen for a King by the Bohemians, deſired for a King by the Hungarians, Emperor elect of the Roman Empire by the Germans, and the natural Brother of the great Emperor, his Tributary King of Hungary. Solyman with chearful countenance accepting and commending of the Preſents, anſwered them two days after by Ruſtan the Baſſa his Son in Law, that this was his reſolute condition of Peace and Friendſhip; If King Ferdinand would forthwith reſtore all the Cities, Towns, and Caſtles, which were before belonging to King Lewis, and for ever after abſtain from Hungary; and whereas he had been ſo often provoked by him to War, and had therein beſtowed ſo great charges, and taken ſo much Travel, he could for that be content with an eaſie pain (which ſhould be for his great honour) to impoſe an eaſie Tribute upon Auſtria; upon which Conditions he was content to enter into League with them; but if ſo be that thoſe Conditions ſeemed unto them too heavy, and that they would rather make choice of War than Peace, he would bring to paſs by continual War, that ſuch things as they had taken from the Kingdom of Hungary, ſhould be required with the deſtruction of Auſtria. But the Embaſſadors, although they were much moved at the proud Demand of Tribute for Auſtria, as that wherein the two Brethren of mighty power, Charles the Emperor and King Ferdinand were diſdainfully abuſed; to keep the beſt courſe of their Negotiation, and to win ſome time in ſo hard eſtate of things; required a Truce until ſuch time as King Ferdinand and the Emperor his Brother might be made acquainted with the matter. Which their requeſt the Turk (perceiving their drift and purpoſe) would in no caſe grant, for Winter was now faſt coming on. It was lawful for the Embaſſadors all the time they were in the Turks Camp, to view every part thereof, Ruſtan Baſſa conducting them from place to place; where above all things, they moſt wondred at the perpetual and dumb ſilence of ſo great a multitude, the Souldiers being ſo ready and attentive, that they were no otherwiſe commanded but by the becking of the Hand, or a Nod of their Commanders; they marvelled alſo at the exquiſite order and ſweetneſs of the Turks Camp, finding therein nothing diſordered or noyſom; ſo that it ſeemed not the Camp of ſuch a rude and barbarous Nation, but rather of them which were the Authors of Martial Diſcipline. The Embaſſadors being rewarded, and ſo ſent away, Solyman commanded the old Governor of Belgrade to ſpoil the Borders of Auſtria all alongſt Danubius; Caſon alſo General of the voluntary Horſemen, he ſent into Moravia for like purpoſe; who neither of them did any great harm, by reaſon of the ſuddain riſing of the great Rivers, with the abundance of Rain then falling in Autumn. After that, Solyman appointed one Solyman an Hungarian (who taken Priſoner in his youth by the Turks, had from that time followed the Mahometan Superſtition) Governor of Buda; who by the upright adminiſtration of Juſtice, and courteous uſing of the People, with Verbetius the old Chancellor, ſhould do what was poſſible to put the People in hope of long Peace and Tranquility. Which things done, after he had ſtaid about twenty days at Buda, he determined to return again into Thracia, becauſe the Rain of Autumn and the cold of Winter was now come in; and was alſo in doubt to be ſhut in with the riſing of the great Rivers, wherewith the Country of Hungary is in every place ſo watred, and on every ſide, ſo compaſſed, that it is an hard matter to paſs. By the way he ſet Laſcus, King Ferdinands Embaſſador, again at liberty, whom he had left in Priſon at Belgrade; but he long enjoyed not that benefit; for ſhortly after returning into Polonia, he died of the Flux; which cauſed many to ſuppoſe, that he was poiſoned by the Turks. A man for his Vertue and Learning famous worthy of a longer life, whoſe death the King himſelf much lamented.

The Turks Camp well ordered.

Laſcus ſet at liberty by Solyman, ſhortly after dieth.

As Solyman was returning into Thracia, and was come to the River Dravus, it was told him, That Stephen Maylat, Vayvod of Tranſilvania, who took King Ferdinand his part, a profeſſed Enemy of the Turks, was taken by the cunning of Peter of Moldavia, and Prince of Valachia; and that all the Country of Tranſylvania was well pacified, and yielded to his Obedience. Of which News Solyman was paſſing glad; for he exceedingly hated Maylat, a Martial man of a froward Nature, deſirous of rule, and ready upon any occaſion to revolt; foraſmuch as he remembred Grittus his Legate, and the Turks by him ſlain; and knew alſo, that the Tranſylvanians, an invincible People, born to trouble, and more delighting in uncertain War than aſſured Peace, was by him ſtirred up; whom he wiſhed rather by gentleneſs to appeaſe, than by force of Arms and ſtrong hand to ſubdue. But becauſe we have oftentimes before made mention of this Maylat, of whoſe taking Solyman ſo much rejoyced, it ſhall not be amiſs in few words to declare in what fineneſs he fell into the hands of this treacherous and bloody man, Peter of Moldavia.

Maylat the Vayvod not able to keep the Field againſt Achomates, and the Prince of Moldavia, flieth to Fogaras.

This Moldavian by the commandment of Solyman (as is aforeſaid) had joyned his Forces with Achomates, Governor of Nicopolis, againſt Maylat; which being united, were in number fifty thouſand Horſemen, beſide Footmen; which after the manner of thoſe Countries, were not many, every man almoſt in the Country, be he never ſo poor, keeping a Horſe to ſerve upon. Maylat beſet with the multitude of his Enemies, and finding himſelf too weak to encounter them, deſpairing alſo of aid from King Ferdinand, whom he knew to be buſied in a greater War, forſook the Field, and fled again into the ſtrong Town of Fogaras, as he had done the year before, when he was overcharged by King Johns Power; for there as in a moſt ſtrong place both by nature and fortification, he had laid up his greateſt Subſtance and Proviſion for the Wars, but eſpecially the rich Spoil he had long before taken from Grittus. Achomates coming thither with his power, and perceiving the place was not to be battered or taken by force, but with much labour and long time, thought it beſt, to aſſay if he could overcome him by craft and deceit. Wherefore he ſent a Meſſenger unto Maylat, to perſwade him to yield himſelf unto Solyman, and to make choice rather to be called of him his Friend, than to be judged his Enemy; of whom he might well hope of all goodneſs, which had given whole Kingdoms unto his Enemies; promiſing, that he would uſe the uttermoſt of his Credit, which was not ſmall, and labour for him as a Friend, that he might feel the fruit of his Clemency and Bounty, and ſtill enjoy the Government of Tranſylvania, paying him ſome ſmall yearly Tribute, as he had before requeſted; foraſmuch as he could take no courſe better, being beſet with ſo many Enemies, than to make his Peace upon reaſonable Conditions, and that with as much ſpeed as were poſſible; in which doing, beſides that he ſhould well provide for his own ſafety, he ſhould alſo ſave both his Wealth and Honour; for Solyman was coming (as he ſaid) with his victorious Army, who would with aſſured death revenge his vain hope of holding out the Siege, if he ſhould upon a ſtubborn and obſtinate mind then refuſe to obey his command. Whereunto Maylat, who foreſaw that it was better for him to make a certain Peace, than to endure an uncertain War, anſwered, That he could be content to conclude a Peace, ſo that it were not upon any bad conditions; and would not greatly refuſe Solymans command, which was wont to be both reaſonable and juſt; wherefore upon ſufficient Pledges he would come into the Camp, in preſence to agree upon the Conditions of the Peace and demanded to have Achomates his Son, a valiant young Gentleman, delivered in Hoſtage. Which thing Achomates denied, for that he had (as he ſaid) before given him to Solyman, as the manner was, and therefore had over him no more power; but he promiſed for him, that was but one, to give four of his beſt Captains. Which offer Maylat (miſdoubting no deceit) accepted, and with a great and gallant retinue attended upon, came into the Enemies Camp, where he was courteouſly and honourably received. But the Parly, as it could not be conveniently begun immediately after the firſt ſalutation, ſo could it by no means be then ended, but was deferred until the next day; to the intent, that the treacherous Moldavian might take his well acquainted and well known Gueſt, whom he had againſt that time invited to a ſolemn Banquet. By that means, the next day about the midſt of Dinner, Fortune ſo favoured the intended Treachery, that Maylat (who was of ſo proud and cholerick a nature, that he could not well brook the leaſt indignity) was by occaſion of ſome inſolent Speech, of purpoſe miniſtred by the Moldavian Gheſts, put into ſuch a fret, that laying his hand upon his Sword, he in a rage flung from the Table; at which time all the other Gheſts ſtarting up alſo, laid hands upon him and took him, fuming, and in vain crying out, that he was ſhamefully betrayed. His Followers were all forthwith ſtript of all their bravery by the needy Moldavians, and their Horſes and Armor taken from them. Whilſt Maylat was yet furiouſly exclaiming of this Treaſon, in came Achomates, who to ſeem guiltleſs of the matter, with deep diſſimulation ſharply reproved the falſe Moldavian, that he had in doing ſo foul a Fact ſhamefully violated the Laws of Hoſpitality, reverenced of all Nations, falſified the Faith which he had given him for his ſafety, and betraied the lives of ſuch notable Captains as lay in hoſtage for him. Whereunto the Moldavian (as if it had been in contempt) ſcornfully anſwered, that he had upon good cauſe taken Maylat Priſoner, and ſo would in ſafety keep him for Solyman, unto whom it only belonged to judge, whether he had juſtly or unjuſtly kept him.

Not long after, the ſtrong Town of Fogaras was delivered, with the Hoſtages, but whether by fear or corruption of Maylats Lieutenant, is uncertain. So Valentinus Turaccus, and Maylat, two of the greateſt Noblemen of Hungary, ſufficient of themſelves to have reſtored the Hungarian Kingdom (firſt rent in ſunder with civil Diſcord, and afterward with the invaſion of the Turks) fell into the hands of the Enemy, not vanquiſhed in Battel, but deceived by Treaſon. The Town being thus ſurrendred, almoſt all the Country of Tranſylvania was by Solymans conſent delivered to the young King, unto whom all the People moſt willingly ſubmitted themſelves, and took the Oath of Obedience, remembring that his Father had almoſt for thirty years ſpace with great Juſtice and quietneſs governed that Province; and with many Preſents honoured the young King lying in Lippa, with the Queen his Mother, and his two Tutors, the Biſhop, and Vicche.

Charles the Emperor returneth out of Germany to invade Africk.

At the ſame time, Charles the Emperor at the importunate ſuit of his Subjects of Spain, had prepared a great force both by Sea and Land for the conquering of Algiers; from whence the Turkiſh Pyrats did ſo infeſt all that Coaſt of the Country, from Gades to the Mountains Pyrenei, that the Spaniards (all Trade of Merchandiſe being ſet apart) were glad to keep a continul Watch and Ward all alongſt that Coaſt for defence of the Country. Wherefore although he well knew of the coming of the Turks to Buda, and how hardly he was by the Lantgrave and others ſpoken of, for leaving his Brother ſo hardly beſtead, to go againſt a ſort of Pirats in Africk, yet perſiſting in his former determination, he departed out of Germany into Italy, where by the way he met Octavius Farneſius his Son in Law, Alphonſus Vaſtius his Lieutenant, by the Venetian Embaſſadors, near to Verona, and ſo brought to Millain, where he was with great Solemnity joyfully received of the Citizens, and under a Canopy of Gold brought unto the Palace; he himſelf going in a plain black Cloke, and a homely Cap in mourning wiſe; when as the Women and vulgar People, upon a curious ſimplicity, expected to have ſeen ſo great an Emperor in his Royal Robes, gliſtering with Gold and precious Stones, and the Imperial Crown upon his Head. His heavy Countenance anſwerable alſo to his Attire was much noted, as preſaging the woful overthrow which was the day before received at Buda, but not yet known in Italy. From Millain he departed to Genoa, where he was advertiſed by Letters from his Brother King Ferdinand, of the overthrow of the Germans, of the Victory of the Turks, and the coming of Solyman. Upon which news, Vaſtius and Auria, his two chief Commanders, the one at Land, the other at Sea, would have perſwaded him to have deferred his intended expedition for Africa until the next Spring; and with ſuch power as he had already raiſed in Italy, and brought with him out of Germany, to ſtay ſtill in Italy, ſo to make ſhew unto the Turks as if he would have returned and holpen his Brother; and in the mean time to aſſure himſelf of his ſtate in Italy againſt the French, who (as it was thought) would be ready to take all occaſion of advantage, if any miſhap ſhould befal him, either by the force of the Enemy, or violence of Tempeſt. But he conſtant in his former reſolution, anſwered them as they ſat in Counſel, that they had perſwaded him for great reaſons to ſtay in Italy; but that he was for far greater to paſs into Africk; for if he ſhould then ſtay in Italy, it would be thought that he was for fear of the Turks fled out of Germany; which diſgrace could no otherwiſe be prevented, but by the preſent proſecuting of his former determination for Algiers, and ſatisfying the expectation of his Subjects of Spain; and ſo by Sea valiantly to prove their better Fortune, which had of late not ſo well favoured them at Land; in hope that Algiers might be won before the Seas ſhould grow rough and dangerous with Winter Tempeſts; which if it ſhould fall out according to his mind, he would not, as he ſaid, greatly care what the French could do. Yet was it thought, that the diſſembling Friendſhip betwixt the French King and him, would not long endure; and the rather, for that there was a new grudg riſen betwixt them about the death of Antonius Rinuo, who for certain years had lien Embaſſador for the French King at Conſtantinople, to Solyman, and was a few months before ſent back again by him into France to the King; but returning back again with new inſtructions from his Maſter, for the confirmation of a further League betwixt the Turkiſh Sultan and him, he was by certain Spaniards of the Emperors old Souldiers, who had knowledge of his coming, belaied upon the River Padus as he was going down to Venice, ſo to have paſſed into Epirus, and ſlain, together with Cæſar Fregotius; or as the common report went, firſt taken and tortured, to get from him the ſecrets of his negotiation, and afterwards ſlain. Which report ſo much touched Vaſtius in Credit, that in purgation of himſelf, he offered the Combat to any man of like quality to himſelf, that durſt charge him with the truth thereof. But many were of opinion, that he was well and worthily taken away, for undertaking ſo odious a Charge, as to ſtir up the Turks againſt the Chriſtians, and to ſhew unto them ſuch opportunities as might beſt ſerve their purpoſe, by diſcovering unto them the Emperors Deſigns, to the great hurt of the Chriſtian Common-Weal. But were it well, or were it evil, as Paulus the third of that name then Biſhop of Rome, meeting the Emperor at Luca as he came from Genoa, could not, or would determine, ſure it ſerved as no ſmall occaſion to ſet thoſe two great Princes again at ods, whereby the wiſhed Unity of the Chriſtian ſtate was ſore ſhaken, and a way opened for the Turk. The Emperor at his coming to Luca, was honourably received by the Cardinals and Biſhops, and lodged in the Court; the great Biſhop was before placed in the Biſhops Palace, whither the Emperor came thrice to talk with him, and the Biſhop to him once. But the Biſhop having nothing at all prevailed with the Emperor and the French Embaſſador, for the appeaſing of the troubles even then like to ariſe betwixt him and the French King; did what he might to perſwade him to employ ſuch Forces as he was about to paſs over with into Africk, againſt the Turks in defence of his Brother Ferdinand, and of the Country of Auſtria, if Solyman ſhould happily purſue his late obtained Victory at Buda. But he ſtill reſolute in that fatal determination of invading of Africk, rejected that the Biſhops requeſt alſo. So the great Biſhop having moved much, and prevailed little, in the greateſt matters which moſt concerned the common good, taking his leave of the Emperor, returned by eaſie journies to Rome.

The Emperor and the Biſhop of Rome meet at Luca.

The Emperor in the mean time with certain Bands of Italians, under the leading of Camillus Columna and Auguſtinus Spinola, and ſix thouſand Germans, came from Luca to the Port Lune, and there imbarking his Souldiers in certain Merchants Ships provided for the purpoſe, and five and thirty Gallies, departed thence, commanding the Maſters of the Ships to direct their Courſe to the Iſlands of Baleares; but after they had put to Sea, they were by force of Tempeſt ſuddainly ariſing, brought within ſight of Corſica; where after they had been toſſed too and fro two days in the rough Seas, and put out of their Courſe, the Wind ſomething falling, they put into the Haven of Syracuſa, now called Bonifacium. The diſperſed Fleet once come together into the Port of Syracuſa, and the rage of the Sea well appeaſed, he put to Sea again for the Iſlands Baleares, now called Majorca and Minorca; where in his Courſe he met with a Tempeſt from the Weſt, more terrible and dreadful than the firſt; wherein divers of the Gallies having loſt their Maſts and Sails, were glad with extream labour and peril in ſtriving againſt the rough Sea to get into a Harbor of the leſſer Iſland, taking name of Barchinus Mago the famous Carthaginenſian, whoſe name it retaineth until this day. From hence the Emperor with all his Fleet paſſed over to the greater Iſland, being wonderful glad that Ferdinand Gonſaga his Viceroy in Sicilia was in good time come with the Sicilian Gallies and Ships of Italy, in number an hundred and fifty Sail, wherein he had brought ſuch ſtore of Bisket and Victual as might have ſufficed for a long War. Mendoza was alſo expected to have come thither with his Fleet from Spain; but he by reaſon of contrary Winds being not able to hold that Courſe, altered his purpoſe according to the Tempeſt, and ſo happily cut over directly to Algiers. So the Emperor nothing miſdoubting the careful diligence of Mendoza, and thinking that which was indeed already chanced, and the Wind now ſerving fair, by the perſwaſion of Auria his Admiral hoiſed ſail, and in two days came before Algiers, and there in goodly order came to anchor before the City in the ſight of the Enemy. Whilſt the Fleet thus lay, two of the Pyrates which had been abroad at Sea, ſeeking for prize, returning to Algiers, not knowing any thing of the Fleet, fell fell into the Bay amongſt them before they were awar; the bigger whereof Viſcontes Cicada ſtemmed with his Gally and ſunk him, the other with wonderful celerity got into the Haven. In the mean time Mendoza with his Gallies had paſſed the Promontory of Apollo now called the Cape of Caſſineus, and in token of honour ſaluting the Emperor after the manner at Sea, with all his great Ordnance, gave him knowledg that the Spaniſh Fleet was not far behind. In this Fleet was above an hundred tall Ships of Biſcay and the Low Countries, and of other ſmaller Veſſels a far greater number. In theſe Ships, beſides the Footmen, were embarked a great number of brave Horſemen out of all parts of Spain; for many noble Gentlemen had voluntarily of their own Charge gallantly furniſhed themſelves with brave Armor and couragious Horſes, to ſerve their Prince and Country againſt the Infidels. Over theſe choice men commanded Ferdinand of Toledo, Duke of Alva, for his approved Valor then accounted a famous Captain. Theſe Ships going altogether with Sails, were not able to double the Cape as did Mendoza with his Gallies, for now it was a dead Calm; howbeit the Billows of the Sea went yet high, by reaſon of the rage of the late Tempeſt, and did ſo beat againſt the plain Shore, that it was not poſſible to land the Souldiers; but that they muſt needs be waſhed up to the middle; which thing the Emperor thought it not good to put them unto, and ſo to oppoſe them Sea-ſick and through wet againſt the ſuddain and deſperate Aſſaults of their fierce Enemies. He alſo ſtaied for the coming of the Spaniſh Ships for two cauſes; firſt that he might with his united Power more ſtrongly aſſault the City, and terrifie the Enemy; then, to communicate the whole glory of the action with the Spaniards, at whoſe requeſt and forwardneſs and greateſt Charge he had undertaken that War. Which fatal delay of two days, although it was grounded upon good reaſon, did not only diſturb an aſſured Victory, but to the notable hurt of the whole Army, opened a way to all the calamities which afterward enſued.

The Emperor ſendeth a Meſſenger to Aſſan-Aga Governor of Algiers for Barbaruſſa.

In the mean while the Emperor ſent a convenient Meſſenger to Aſanagas, otherwiſe and more truly called Aſſan-Aga, or Aſſan the Eunuch; who with a little Flag of Truce in his hand making ſign of a Parly, and anſwered by the Moors with like, as their manner is, went on ſhore, and was of them courteouſly received and brought to Aſſan. This Aſſan was an Eunuch, born in Sardinia, brought up from his youth in the Mahometan Superſtition by Barbaruſſa, a man both politick and valiant, and by him left for the keeping of his Kingdom of Algiers in his abſence with Solyman. This Meſſenger brought into his preſence, required him forthwith to deliver the City (firſt ſurpriſed by Force and Treachery by Horruccius, and afterwards to the deſtruction of mankind, fortified by Hariadenus Barbaruſſa his Brother) to Charles the mighty Emperor, come in perſon himſelf to be revenged on thoſe horrible Pyrats; which if he would do, it ſhould be lawful for the Turks to depart whether they would, and for the natural Moors to abide ſtill with their Goods and Religion wholly reſerved unto them untouched, as in former time; and for himſelf, he ſhould receive of the Emperor great Rewards both in time of Peace and Wars, ſo that he would remember himſelf, that he was born in Sardinia, and was once a Chriſtian; and accept of the faireſt occaſion which could poſſibly be offered for him to return again to the worſhipping of the true God, and to enjoy the favour and bounty of the moſt mighty Emperor, and withal to revenge himſelf of the cruel Tyrant Barbaruſſa, for the unnatural Villany done unto his perſon. But if he would needs dally on the time, and make proof of the ſtrength of ſo great preparation, he ſhould undoubtedly, with the reſt of his Followers, receive the ſame reward of his obſtinacy, which they had to the example of others, received at Tunes. Whereunto the ungracious Eunuch anſwered, That he thought him altogether mad, that would follow his Enemies Council; and with a grinning countenance askt him, Upon what hope the Emperor truſted to be able to win the City? the Meſſenger pointing with his finger directly to the Fleet, told him, That which you ſee, with his great Artillery, and Valour of his Souldiers, both Horſe and Foot; whereat the Eunuch ſcornfully laughing, replied, And we with like Force and Valour will defend this City, and make this place, already famous for your overthrows here twice, now the third time, of all others moſt famous by the Emperors diſcomfiture. It is reported, That there was in Algiers an old Witch, famous for her Predictions, who had (as it was ſaid) foretold the Shipwracks and miſery of Didaco Verra, and Hugo Moncada, to them of Algiers, and alſo prefixed a time when as the Chriſtian Emperor adventuring to beſiege that City, ſhould there receive great loſs both by Sea and Land. The fame of which blind Prophecy ſerving fitly to confirm the hope of good ſucceſs in the minds of the vulgar multitude, Aſſan ſo fed and augmented (although he himſelf being a crafty wiſe Fellow, believed no ſuch vanity) that he did therewith not only encourage his own Souldiers, but alſo ſtruck a terror into the minds of the weaker ſort of his Enemies, ſeeing themſelves caſt upon ſo dangerous a Coaſt upon the approach of Winter. There was in Garriſon in the City but eight hundred Turks, and moſt of them Horſemen, but ſuch, as whoſe Valour and reſolution far exceeded their number. For Aſſan had loſt many of his beſt men, ſome in fight againſt Mendoza, and otherſome at Sea, ſlain or taken by Auria in Corſica, and in other places by the Rhodian, Neapolitan, and Sicilian Gallies; but many more were by his leave gon to aid the Moors againſt the Portugals; the other multitude did ſcarce make up the number of five thouſand; which were partly natural Moors born in that Country, and partly ſuch as were born in Granado; to whom were joined many Fugitives out of the Iſlands of Majorca and Minorca, who in former time having entred into Rebellion, and fearing condign puniſhment, were fled to Algiers, and there revolted to the Mahometan Superſtition. But the Captains of the wild Numidians made up a great number both of Horſe and Foot, which lying ſtragling without the City in the open Fields, ſhould night and day vex and moleſt the Chriſtians, This brutiſh People, naturally Enemies unto the Chriſtians, had Aſſan with rewards and hope of a rich Spoil, allured out of the Countries thereabout to aid him; neither was it lawful for any man to carry his Wife or Children out of the City, into places of more ſafety farther off, or to ſhew any ſmall token of fear, pain of death being by the imperious Eunuch propoſed to whoſoever ſhould but look heavily for fear of danger, or ſpeak a word favouring of Cowardiſe. The Emperor by Auria making choice of a moſt convenient place for landing his men, laid his Gallies ſo cloſe unto his tall Ships, that his armed Souldiers might with eaſe come out of the high built Ships into them, and ſo out of them into the long Boats, to be forthwith ſet on ſhore. And ſuch was the ſpeedy diligence of them that had the charge of that matter, and the plenty of Boats ſtill ready to receive the Souldiers as faſt as they could come out of the Gallies, that the Footmen were in a very ſhort time all landed. The Emperor having a little reſted and refreſhed his Souldiers, divided his Army into three equal Battels; which was in number about twenty thouſand Footmen, beſides Horſemen and others, who of their own voluntary Will then followed the Emperors Fortune. Unto every Battel he appointed three Field-Pieces, to terrifie the Numidian Horſeman, which were ſtill pricking up and down about them, ready to charge if they could take them at any advantage. And ſo ſetting forward a few Furlongs, encamped in a ſtrong and convenient place, near unto the City, between two deep Ditches, which the Water falling from the Mountains had naturally worn ſo deep, that neither Horſeman nor Footman could well paſs over, but by Bridge; and faſt by upon the left hand was an Hill, from the top whereof it ſeemed the City might with great Ordnance well be battered.

The deſcription of Algiers.

The City of Algiers, ſometime the Royal Seat of the great King Juba, called of the Romans Julia Cæſarea, is in form of a Triangle, ſituate faſt by the Sea towards the North, having a Haven, but neither great, neither ſafe from the North-Wind. The Houſes farther off from the Sea, ſtand in ſeemly order upon the riſing of a ſteep Hill, as it were upon degrees; in ſuch ſort, that the Windows of one row ſtill overlooks the tops of the next beneath it, into the Sea, moſt beautiful to behold. The Emperor having divided his Camp into three parts, every Nation by themſelves, lying on the Eaſt ſide of the Town, was in great hope to win it; and the rather, for that whilſt he aſſaulted it on that ſide, his Ships and Gallies from the North ſide, might in time of the Aſſault with their great Ordnance beat the Enemy all alongſt the Wall; which ſtill riſing higher and higher according to the riſing of the ſteep Hill, could not conveniently be defended with one Bulwark, as we ſee it may in plain ground. Neareſt unto the riſing of the Hills, lay the Spaniards; in the midſt, the Germans with the Emperor; and in the Plain neareſt to the Sea, the Italians.

The Numidians skirmiſh with the Spaniards.

In the mean time whilſt the great Ordnance was landing, and the Horſes unſhipping, the Numidians with a hideous outcry ſhewed themſelves upon the tops of the Mountains above the Spaniards, and from thence eaſily gauled them with their Darts and Shot; for they nimbly running too and fro in the known parts of the rough Mountains, would ſuddainly and fiercely aſſail them, but after the manner of their Nation skirmiſhing afar off, rather than near at hand. In which manner of light skirmiſhes, all the day was ſpent until night, with ſmall danger but much trouble to the Spaniards. And when night was come, theſe wild People, one Company ſtill ſucceding another in the place they had before taken, never left ſhooting; for whereſoever they ſaw any Fire in the Spaniſh Camp, thither came Arrows, Darts, and Stones flying as thick as Hail; for remedy whereof, the Spaniards were glad to put out their Fires, and with ſilence to expect the day, that they might come nearer unto them.

The Spaniards put the Numidians to flight, and gain the Hills.

Wherefore as ſoon as the Sun was up, the Spaniards by the perſwaſion of Alvares Sandes, Maſter of the Camp, valiantly climbing up the high Mountains, repulſed and put to flight the Numidians, and took the top of the Hills, and there lay as it were encamped in the poor Shepherds Cottages. But the ſame day ſuch a multitude of the wild People was flockt about them, that they were compaſſed in round, and glad to fight on every ſide in a Ring. Yet this fierceneſs of this barbarous People, was by the Valour of the Sicilian Companies quickly repreſſed, whoſe Pikemen gliſtering in their bright Armor, made ſmall account of the Numidians Arrows and Darts, but orderly ſtepping forwards with their Pikes, and the Harquebuſiers cloſe by their ſides, eaſily repulſed their naked Enemies.

The deſcription of the Numidian Footmen and Horſemen.

The Numidian Footmen are for moſt part Youths half naked, with long hair not unlike the Iriſh, uſing no other Weapons but Darts; they fight mingled with their Horſemen, truſting the one to the other, and are of a wonderful ſwiftneſs and agility of Body. Their Horſemen uſe long Spears, armed at both ends, which they with a marvellous dexterity uſe, to the endangering of their Enemy purſuing them; they uſe alſo long and light Targets made of Leather, wherewith they ſo cunningly defend themſelves and their Horſes, both in their Charge and Retreat, that for a ſmall trifle, in reſpect of the danger, they will give a man leave to caſt ſeven Darts at one of them, which they will all moſt ſurely avoid either with the Spear, or receive them without harm into their Target. In the mean time, whilſt this wild People thus skirmiſhed all the day, at night a ſuddain miſchance overthrew all the Emperors hope; for as he ſtood beholding the unſhipping of his great Ordnance, his Horſes, Victual and other neceſſaries of the Army, a ſtorm of Wind and Rain began about ſix a clock in the Afternoon, holding on all the night without intermiſſion, with ſuch rage, as if Heaven and Earth ſhould have gone together; wherewith the whole Army at Land was wonderfully troubled, and a great part of the Fleet at Sea by force of Tempeſt driven aground, periſhed.

A marvellous Tempeſt.

That night three Companies of the Italians, by the appointment of their General, lay without the Trenches againſt the ſuddain Aſſault of ſo uncertain an Enemy, who when they had all the night endured the vehement Rain and extream cold, were ſo overcome with the extremity of the Weather, that neither were their minds able to relieve their weak bodies, neither their feeble bodies their daunted minds; for they could neither conveniently ſtand nor lie down, all the ground being ſo miry, that at every ſtep they ſunk up to the calf of the Leg. Upon theſe ſtarved Companies, the Turkiſh Horſemen and Moors Footmen, who diligently obſerved the Watch of the Chriſtians, perceiving their diſtreſſes, ſuddainly ſallied out in the dawning of the day; and ſo fiercely charged them, their Match and Powder being now ſo wet that they could not uſe their Pieces, that they all fled, except a few Pikemen, who made a ſtand, and were all quickly ſlain by the Turks; who ſo deſperatly purſued the reſt in chaſe, that they followed them over the Trench into the Camp. This Alarm being heard, Camillus Columna the Italian General came preſently thither, being ſent by the Emperor, who with certain Companies iſſued out over the Bridge againſt the Enemy; who now in ſhew diſcouraged with the coming out of this new Supply, did indeed, or at leaſtwiſe made as if they did diſorderly retire for fear. At which time Ferdinand Gonzaga, Viceroy of Sicilia, a man of greateſt account in the Army next unto the Emperor, coming in alſo, and angry with them which had before fled; perſwading them as valiant men, to recompence their ſhameful flight with a freſh Charge, by driving the Enemy home to his own door; which thing Columna ſaid could not be done without great peril, but Gonzaga being a man of a noble Courage, deſired to have the diſgrace which the Italians had received, ſalved ſome way, although it were with never ſo great danger; thinking alſo that it might happily fall out, that the Enemy being put to flight, and haſtily purſued, they might together with them enter the City, without danger of the Artillery. So without farther delay, the reſt of the Italian Companies were led forth of their Trenches with great chearfulneſs by Auguſtine Spinola, who ſo valiantly charged the Enemies, that they put them to flight, and purſued them ſo hard, that they came with them to the very Gates of the City; where many ſhut out for fear of letting in the Italians together with them, eſcaped by known ways, ſome to another Gate, and ſome into the Mountains. But then theſe barbarous People, with Darts and Shot from the Walls, began to overwhelm the Italians which were unadviſedly come within their danger, and with terrible outcries to terrifie them; and they which before were fled without the Walls, returned again to fight. They alſo which had ſhut the Gate, ſallied out again, and hardly charged the Italians, who already gauled with ſhot from the Walls, and rent in ſunder with the great Ordnance, fled moſt diſorderly; for why, they were but raw Souldiers taken up in haſt, little or nothing acquainted with the Wars. At which time Aſſan alſo ſallying out, who was eaſily known by his Countenance and rich Attire, purſued the chaſe with his Troops of Turks and Moors Footmen. Only certain Knights of the Rhodes fought valiantly, and retired orderly; and Spinola with ſome other Gentlemen making a ſtand at a little wooden Bridge, ſomewhat ſtaid the Enemy and ſaved the lives of many. So the Italians which firſt charged moſt valiantly, being in the flight become hindermoſt, the Enemy ſtriking them down as they fled, covered the Fields with their dead Bodies by the ſpace of half a mile, eſpecially they which fled towards the Sea; for there they were circumvented and ſlain by the mercileſs Numidians, who beholding the Shipwrack, were come down to the Sea ſide for prey. But the formoſt Companies of the Italians which firſt fled into the Camp, fled in ſo much haſt and ſo great fear, that none of the Leaders in ſo great and ſuddain a perplexity, remembred either the common ſafety, or performed the duty of an adviſed Captain; ſo that all ſeemed at once loſt both by Sea and Land. Only the Emperor, armed with an invincible courage againſt all the chances of fortune, and not to be diſmaid with any miſhap, was both unto himſelf and others that day the greateſt Captain; for when all was almoſt loſt, he in good time ſtaied the matter by coming on with the Squadron of Germans, whereof he ſent before three Enſigns to ſtay the flight, and with them as a ſure and freſh ſupply to guard his Camp beyond the Bridge which was over the Ditch, ſerving his Army for a Trench as we have before ſaid. But ſuch a fear had poſſeſſed the minds of the flying Italians, and ſuch was the fierce purſuit of the Enemy, that thoſe Germans (not before wont to turn their backs) as if they had been afraid of the Turks white Caps, or not able to abide their ſight, or to hold up weapon againſt them; by and by turned their backs, and ſhamefully fled for Company with the Italians. Then the Emperor galloping forth with his Horſe, and his Sword in his Hand drawn, reproving them of Cowardiſe that fled, ſet forward with the German Squadron, and with a ſtout and manly Courage ſpake to them theſe few words in their own Language: When will you (fellow Souldiers) ſhew your Faces to your proud Enemies, if now when you ſhould fight for the honour of the Chriſtian Name, for the glory of the German Nation, for the ſafegard of your own Lives, in the preſence of your Emperor, you fear a few diſordered and naked Barbarians? Immediately when he had thus ſaid, the Germans touched with ſhame, and diſdaining that it ſhould be thought they needed any exhortation to perform the parts of valiant Souldiers, iſſued out againſt the Enemy; who moved with their coming, and ſeeing the Italian battel again reſtored by the valour and travel of certain valiant and expert Captains, ſtood ſtill a while and began to retire; whether it were becauſed they feared the great Artillery and aſſault of the Germans, or that they thought they had done enough for that ſally; when as for the full accompliſhment of the Victory they ſaw the Chriſtian Fleet overcome with a moſt horrible Tempeſt, miſerably to periſh before their Faces; and many of their Men, eſpecially the Moors, haſted to the Sea ſide in hope of a more certain Prey, whereas no Enemy was to be feared. For the bluſtring Winds blowing from divers quarters, as if they had conſpired to raiſe a moſt horrible Tempeſt, had made ſuch a rough Sea, and the huge Billows went ſo high, that the Ships by the violence of the Weather, and rage of the Sea, put from their Anchors, fell foul one of another, and were ſo loſt; or elſe driven upon the Main, were there beaten in pieces in the ſight of the Army; ſo that all the Sea Coaſt Weſtward from Algiers to Cercello, lay full of dead Men and Horſes, and the Ribs of broken Ships. The Numidians beholding this miſerable Wreck, came down by great Companies from the Mountains, and without mercy ſlew all that came alive to Land. In the ſpace of a few hours was loſt about a hundred and forty Ships, and all the ſmall Boats and Carvels, which were in number many. Some of the Gallies, when they had from midnight to the next day at noon, by the painful labour of the Mariners, and ſkilfulneſs of the Maſters, rid it out; being no longer able to endure the rage of the Tempeſt, and fearing to be eaten up with the Sea, with Sails and Oars ran aground; but the Souldiers and Mariners ſwimming to Land in hope to ſave their Lives, and thinking that the greateſt danger had been now paſt, were by the Numidian Horſemen which ran up and down the Sea ſide, ſlain. There might a Man have ſeen Free-men of all ſorts, with Tears commending their lives and liberty to their own Gally-ſlaves, that by the ſpeech and entreaty of them, which by the ſuddain change of fortune had but even now ſhaken off their Irons, and with merry Hearts ſwam out to their liberty, they might be ſaved from the cruelty of the fierce Numidians. It was a moſt grievous and woful ſight for divers hard extremities, when as every Man according to the diſpoſition of his mind and ſkill in Swimming, ſtanding doubtful in moſt aſſured death, which to receive or refuſe, was by fatal Deſtiny drawn to his end, and either drowned in the Sea, or thruſt through with the Enemies Lance; yet moſt made voice to abide the danger of the Sea, and to expect the event of the Tempeſt, rather than to haſten their end by the Enemies mercileſs Hand. By that means it came to paſs, that that barbarous Cruelty of the Enemy (as a thing moſt feared of the Mariners and Souldiers) ſaved many Gallies, which by the appointment of the fearful Mariners and Paſſengers ſhould otherwiſe have been run on ground. But after that, a notable Galley wherein Jannettin Auria went, was ſeen to come near unto the Shore, and to be driven upon the Sands by force of Weather and the beating of other Gallies. The Emperor not enduring to ſee ſo valiant a young Gentleman, Captain of many Gallies, ſlain without help by the Moors in the ſight of Auria his Uncle; ſent by and by one of his Captains called

Antonius

An horrible Tempeſt.

The Chriſtian Fleet periſheth by Shipwrack.

A hard choice.

Many Gallies loſt by ſaving of one Man.

Antonius of Aragon, with three Bands of Italians to the Sea ſide; by whoſe coming the Moors were put to flight, and he with the reſt in the Galley ſaved; but ſo, that the ſaving of him was the loſs of divers other Gallies. For many delivered of the fear of the Numidians, and truſting to the reſcue of the Souldiers came down to the Sea ſide, deſiring to ſave themſelves from the rage of the Sea, ran their Gallies on ground; and had not ſome bold Captains (grieved to ſee ſo great a loſs) ran up and down the Banks with their drawn Swords in their Hands, and by threatning death unto the Galley-ſlaves and Mariners, ſtaied their rowing, moſt part of the Gallies had by the example of the others periſhed. Auria, not ſo angry at himſelf as at the Emperor (who, contrary to the obſervation of skilful Sea-men, could not be diſſwaded from taking in hand that great expedition in ſo ſuſpicious a time of the year) with an invincible courage ſtrove againſt the violence of the Tempeſt, and rage of the Sea; inſomuch, that being requeſted by ſome of his Friends to ſave himſelf, whatſoever became of the Galley; he was ſo angry thereat, that he commanded them to be beſtowed under Hatches. Four Gallies alſo of Virginius Urſinus Earl of Anguillaria, and as many of the Rhodians, after his example rid it out, the reputation of their honour exceeding the fear of death. Certain Gallies alſo of Sicilia, Naples, and Spain, happily endured all the rage of the Tempeſt; yet was there fifteen great Gallies caſt away; with the loſs whereof, beſides the loſs of ſo many Ships, the Tempeſt ſtill enduring, ſo great ſorrow and deſperation in the woful expectation of the Wreck of all, poſſeſſed the whole Army, that not only the young Souldiers regarding only their own lives, but even the moſt valiant Captains careful of the common Eſtate, were utterly diſcouraged; for never was Army in any memory overwhelmed with a greater concourſe of calamities, when as all their Victuals being loſt in three days, nothing was left to relieve them withal, and they wanted Tents wherein to ſhroud and reſt the Souldiers ſpent with labour, hunger, cold, and wounds, in ſuch perpetual Rain and ſo dirty a Country.

The miſery of the Chriſtian Army.

In which ſo great miſeries a wonderful care, heavier than the former fear, exceedingly troubled the minds of all Men, to think upon that horrid Wreck; when as having loſt ſo many Ships, and they poor Men landed in Africk, were in doubt however to return again into their native Countries. Yet the notable courage of the Emperor ſtill kept the diſtreſſed Men in hope, which never altogether forſaketh wretched Men in the midſt of their calamities; for he with a couragious heart and chearful countenance performed all the parts of a provident and courteous General.

The chearfulneſs of the Emperor comforteth the whole diſtreſſed Army.

For when he had again made ſure his Camp againſt the aſſaults of the Barbarians, he commanded the wearied Captains, eſpecially the Duke of Alva (wonderfully wearied in the late skirmiſh, and dung wet) to ſpare themſelves and take their reſt; he comforted the wounded Men, and cauſed them to be carried and cheriſhed in the Tents which by chance yet ſtood (for the tempeſtuous Wind had almoſt overthrown them all) and ſo not ſparing himſelf for any pains, being in his Armor and through wet, won the hearts of all his Souldiers the more. In this conflict he loſt about three thouſand Men, amongſt whom was five of his forward Captains, and three Knights of the Rhodes; but many more were hurt. The greateſt loſs was thought to be in loſs of the Ships and of the Mariners, which was alſo encreaſed by the loſs of a wonderful deal of great Ordnance, reckoned ſo much the greater, for that it would come into the hands of the Moors, to the common harm of the Chriſtians, ſo ſoon as the Sea would give them leave to dive for it. Shortly after, Auria (as he was to foreſee a Tempeſt, a wonderful obſerver of the Sea, of the Heavens, and of the Clouds) miſtruſting that place, departed with the remainder of the Fleet to the Cape called Metafuſium, becauſe it was a place of ſafer riding for his Gallies, and better for the taking in of the Souldiers; adviſing the Emperor to march thither by Land.

Horſes go to meat in the Emperors Army.

Which his Counſel the Emperor liking well of, to relieve the hunger of his Souldiers, commanded firſt all the draught-Horſes which were firſt unſhipped for the drawing of the great Ordnance, and after them the Horſes for ſervice, to be killed, and divided for Meat among the Souldiers. As for Wood to make Fire of, they had plenty of the Planks and Ribs of the broken Ships, Fortune as it were with that one poor benefit recompenſing ſo many calamities.

The Emperor departeth from Algiers.

The next day the Emperor departed from Algiers, with his Army divided into three Battels, the ſick and wounded Men being received into the middle; and when he had marched ſeven miles (the Enemies Horſemen ſtill hovering about him) he came to a heady Brook which the Moors call Alcaraz; which was grown ſo high with the abundant Rain and the check of the Wind and of the Sea, that being but a ſhallow thing before, it was not now to be paſſed over by a good Horſeman. Wherefore the Emperor of neceſſity there encamped, in ſuch ſort, that lying with his Army in form of a Triangle, two ſides of his Army was defended with the Sea and the Brook, and the other with a ſtrong Guard of armed Men, for he thought it not good to depart from the Sea, a ſure defence for his Army on the left hand, to ſeek a Foord farther off. Many adventuring to ſwim over, were by the violence of the Stream carried away and drowned. Wherefore the Emperor cauſed a Bridge to be made over it, of the Maſts and Sail-yards of the broken Ships, which were by chance there taken up, and ſo paſſed over the Italians and Germans. The Spaniards marching higher up the Brook, found a Foord whereby they paſſed over. After which time the Turks purſued them no further, being called back again by Aſſan their Governour; as for the Moors and Numidians which ſtill followed at hand always ready to skirmiſh, they were eaſily repulſed by the Harquebuſiers and Field-pieces appointed to every Nation; but upon ſuch ſick and wounded Men as were not able to keep way with the Army, they exerciſed all manner of cruelty; for there was none which in that ſmall hope, poſſeſſed with fear of their own ſafety, was greatly moved with the compaſſion of their Fellows miſery. The next day paſſing over another little River, which the Souldiers waded over up to their Breſts, they came in three days march to the Rode where the Fleet lay, and encamped in the Ruins of the old City Tipaſa near unto the Sea ſide, which ſerved them in ſtead of a Fortreſs againſt the Barbarians.

He embarketh his Army.

The Sea was now calm, the Wind laid, and the Weather ſo fair that all Men thought the Souldiers might now well be embarked and tranſported into Europe; wherefore the Emperor to the great joy of the whole Army commanded every Man to make himſelf ready to go aboord, in ſuch ſort, that firſt the Italians, next the Germans, and laſt of all the Spaniards ſhould be embarked; but ſo many Ships and Gallies, as is before ſaid, being loſt by Shipwreck, it was thought that thoſe which were left were not able to receive the whole Army, although it was crowded together as cloſe as were poſſible. Wherefore the Emperor commanded the Maſters and owners of the Ships to caſt all the Horſes overboord into the Sea, reputing it an unmerciful part, to prefer the ſafegard of thoſe Horſes (although they were of great worth) before the life of the baſeſt common Souldier or Horſe-boy in his Camp. Which thing much grieved the minds of the Noblemen and Owners of thoſe goodly Beaſts, not only for that they were (not without extream neceſſity) for the preſent deprived of ſuch an ineſtimable Treaſure, but ſhould for ever, as they ſaid, loſe the moſt notable race of Horſes in Spain; there with grief and vain compaſſion, was to be ſeen goodly Horſes of ſervice, bearing up their proud Heads, ſwimming all about the Sea unto the Ships neareſt unto them for ſafegard, as if it had been to the Shore, and in the end wearied with long ſwimming to be there drowned. But ſcarce half the Souldiers were yet embarked, when the Eaſt and North-Eaſt Wind, and ſtraitways after divers contrary Winds almoſt as great as the firſt, roſe; whereupon the Ships which had already taken in the Souldiers, not expecting any command, for fear of being driven upon the Rocks, directed their Courſe according as the Wind carried them, with full Sails alongſt the Coaſt; They were quickly out of ſight, and diſperſed with the Tempeſt, ſome into one Country, ſome into another, carrying the Fame of that Shipwreck, and the report that all was loſt, into the Iſlands of the Mediterranean and Ports of Italy. The force of this Tempeſt was ſo great, and the Billows went ſo high, that ſome of the Ships were in the ſight of their Fellows ſwallowed up of the Sea. But amongſt the reſt two Spaniſh Ships full of Souldiers were by wonderful miſhap by contrary Winds driven again to Algiers, and there ſet faſt upon that fatal Shore, where the Numidian Horſemen with a multitude of Moors following them, came running down to the Sea ſide to kill them as they ſhould come to Shore; for the barbarous People thirſting after Chriſtian Blood, would not receive them to mercy, although they were ready to yield themſelves, and covenanted nothing but the ſafegard of their lives. At which their cruelty the Spaniards diſdaining, with their Weapons in their hands got to Shore, and ſtanding cloſe together as deſperate Men, withſtood them who had with their multitude quickly compaſſed them in round; yet in deſpight of what that barbarous multitude (without regard of humanity or Law of Arms) could do, they made way through the midſt of them, from the place where they were caſt on Shore, unto the very Gates of the City. But ſeeing the Turks ſally out, they called unto them, offering to yield themſelves Priſoners to Aſſan without further reſiſtance, if they would aſſure them their lives, which they were in good hope of, for that he was born of Chriſtian Parents in Sardinia, and was attended upon with many Renegate Spaniards. So Aſſan coming forth of the City, gave them his Faith for their ſafety, and beating away the Moors and Numidians, courteouſly ſaved them all, wiſely making great account of ſo great a gain as would redound unto him by ſo many Priſoners, joyned with no ſmall commendation of his clemency in ſaving them. Of the Germans the third part never returned home, but were either loſt with Shipwreck, or elſe dead of the Sickneſs enſuing ſo great miſeries. The Emperor perſwaded (or rather overruled) by Auria, to avoid the violence of the Tempeſt, ſailed alongſt the Coaſt of Africk Eaſtward to Buzia; the Caſtle whereof was kept with a ſmall Garriſon of Spaniards; where the Emperor landing, found ſome freſh Victual, though not much, yet ſuch as did both him and the other Noblemen no ſmall pleaſure. Whilſt the Emperor lay at Buzia expecting fairer Weather, a great Ship of Genoa laded with Victual chanced to come into the Bay, to the great rejoycing of the hungry Souldiers; but ſuch was the violence of the Tempeſt, that her Anchors came home, and ſhe driven upon the Flats was caſt away; yet ſo, as that part of the Victual driven to Shore, and half ſpoiled with the Saltwater, well relieved the encreaſing want. In the mean time the Emperor when he had long looked for the aſſwaging of the Tempeſt, and was now out of hope of any new ſupply of Victual, ſent away Gonzaga with the Sicilian and Rhodian Gallies; for the Wind before at North was now come to Northweſt, and put them in hope to adventure again to Sea, rather than to ſtay there longer. So although with a troubleſome yet a proſperous Courſe, they came in ſhort time to the Port of Utica, now called Farinas; where Muleaſſes King of Tunes bountifully relieved Gonzaga and his Fleet with all kind of Victual and other neceſſaries. From whence they afterward departed, and landed all in ſafety at Drepanum in Sicilia. The bluſtring Winds were now at length weary of blowing, and the raging Sea became calm, ſo that the skilful Sea-men for fear of new dangers, and weary of thoſe that were paſt, thought it beſt to adventure again at Sea. Almoſt every hour they were reaſoning in Council, What Courſe they were for moſt ſafety beſt to take; when ſome were of opinion, that it was beſt to bear for Sardinia or Corſica; and otherſome would have had them to have kept alongſt the Coaſt of Africa, and ſo directly for Sicilia. But the Wind coming fair at Eaſt, the Emperor directed his Courſe to the Iſlands Baleares, and from thence at length arrived at the Port of New Carthage in Spain, greatly commended even of his Enemies, for the wonderful courage and conſtancy in paſſing through ſo many extremities, in ſuch ſort as if he had triumphed over the malice of fortune.

The Emperor arriveth in Spain.

The French King the more to trouble the Emperor, ſoliciteth Solyman to invade his Countries.

About this time the diſſembled friendſhip betwixt Charles the Emperor and Francis the French King brake out into open hatred. The King firſt thinking himſelf deluded by the Emperor, who had long time fed him with the vain hope of the reſtitution of the Duchy of Milan, when as he meant nothing leſs; and of late abuſed by the death of Rinco his Embaſſador, ſlain by the Spaniards in paſſing down the River Padus, as is before declared. In revenge whereof he raiſed a great power in France, and at ſuch time as moſt Men thought he would have invaded Italy, ſent Charles his Son with the one part of his Forces into the Low-Countries, which were then governed by Mary Queen of Hungary the Emperors Siſter; and Henry his other Son with the other part of his Forces to invade Spain; both young Princes, of great hope. And not ſo contented, but deſirous by all means to trouble and moleſt the Emperor, as he did in the Low-Countries by ſetting on the Duke of Cleve; ſo by Antonius Polinus his Embaſſador, a Man of great diſcretion, he earneſtly ſolicited Solyman the Great Turk, with whom he was then in League, to ſpoil the Borders of Spain with his Gallies, at the ſame time that Henry his Son was beſieging Perpenna in Spain. For which practice he was of moſt Men diſcommended, as too much favouring his own grief, and eſpecially by ſuch as affected the Emperor. But how this matter (which drew upon the French King no ſmall envy) was carried in the Turks Court, ſhall not (as I hope) be unto this Hiſtory impertinent to declare.

Polinus the French Embaſſador meeteth Solyman coming from Buda and offereth unto him Preſents from the French King.

After the death of Rinco ſlain by the Spaniards, Francis the French King ſent Antonius Polinus a Man of great dexterity, his Embaſſador to Solyman; who paſſing by many by-ways to Venice, and ſo over the Gulf to Sibinicum, croſſing over Illyria, met with Solyman in Miſia, as he was coming from Buda; and there firſt offered unto him the Preſent ſent from the King his Maſter (for with empty hands no Man might preſume to come to thoſe barbarous Kings of the Eaſt) which Preſent was a Cupboord of Plate curiouſly wrought, in weight ſix hundred Pounds; and five hundred rich Garments of all ſorts of Silk and Skarlet to be beſtowed upon the Baſſaes and other great Courtiers. Solyman after he had read the French Kings Letters, and heard what he had further to ſay, ſeemed to be greatly moved with the death of Rinco, and promiſed Polinus not to be wanting unto the French King, by Sea or Land to give him aid in his juſt Wars againſt Charles his Enemy, for breaking of the League, but foraſmuch as nothing could be well determined of ſuch matters in his Journy of ſo great haſt, he told him, that as ſoon as he was come to Conſtantinople, he ſhould then have anſwer by his Baſſaes of all his demands. The Embaſſador above all things deſired that he would ſend Hariadenus Barbaruſſa with his Fleet againſt the next Summer into Provence, there to be received into the French Harbors, and to be imployed againſt the Emperor as occaſion ſhould require; and further, That he would requeſt the Venetians, with whom he was able to do much, to joyn in League with the King his Maſter againſt Charles the Emperor, whoſe power began now to be dreadful to their Eſtate. Polinus was not ſlack in his buſineſs, but all the way as he went ſought to win the favour of the Baſſaes, ſtill giving them one Preſent or other, and filling their minds with the hope of greater. But when they were come to Conſtantinople, in the later end of December, Solyman promiſing what he had before ſaid, adviſed Polinus to return to France with his Letters, and to bring him certain word back again from the King, of the determinate time and full reſolution of taking thoſe Wars in hand; and that he would in the mean time ſend Junusbeius his Embaſſador to Venice, who had been there divers times before, and would provide to have ſuch a Fleet in readineſs as he deſired. Polinus exceeding glad of that anſwer, with great ſpeed returned back again to the King, bringing with him as Preſents from Solyman two goodly Turkiſh Horſes and a Sword richly ſet with Stones of great price. The French King having by his Embaſſador received Solymans Letters and Preſents, and three days together diſcourſed with him at large of the manner of his proceeding in the Turks Court, in ſhort time after ſent him back again to Solyman with full inſtructions both of the time and places, and other circumſtances of the intended War. Polinus coming to Venice, found not Junusbeius there, as he had well hoped; yet to loſe no time in expecting his coming, he with Pellicerius Embaſſador Lieger for the French King, and other of the French Faction, laboured the Senators in the behalf of the King. For it was thought like enough, that the Venetians ſtill meaſuring all their Councils by their profit, would eaſily conſent to that League, eſpecially being requeſted thereunto by Solyman, and put in hope to have the Port-Town Maranus delivered unto them in reward thereof; which otherwiſe the French, in whoſe poſſeſſion it was, threatned to deliver to the Turks, and to make them their evil Neighbours, rather than to have it taken from them by the Germans. Wherefore Polinus having audience given him in the Senate, notably pleaded the French Kings cauſe, grievouſly lamented the death of the Embaſſador ſlain by the Spaniards, and bitterly enveighed againſt the ambition of the Emperor, who as he ſaid aſpired to the whole Monarchy of Italy, not by true vertue and valour, but by meer craft and deceit, encroaching ſtill upon the liberties of the Free-States, and by little and little impoſing upon them the Yoke of Bondage; In confirmation whereof he produced many examples, to them well known, requeſting them as ancient Friends and Confederates of the French, to joyn their Forces with the Kings; in which doing, they ſhould aſſure themſelves of ſuch reward of the undoubted Victory, as they could not deſire greater. Whereas if they ſhould refuſe ſo to do, and would rather ſit ſtill and look on as neuters, they ſhould undoubtedly, Fortune having decided the quarrel, grievouſly offend both, and might worthily expect of the vanquiſhed, hatred; and of the conqueror, injury. Beſides that, in taking up of Arms they ſhould highly gratifie Solyman, who provoked with late injuries, had determined with a puiſſant Army to invade Hungary, and at the ſame time to ſend Barbaruſſa with a great Fleet againſt the Spaniards their common Enemies; for the imparting of which his deſigns he would ſhortly ſend unto them Junusbeius his Embaſſador: As for the event of the War they needed not to doubt, when as they of themſelves were ſtrong enough quickly to thruſt the Emperor out of the Duchy of Millan, being generally hated of the people, feeding his Souldiers with the ſpoil of the Country, and and on every ſide beſet both by Sea and Land by two of the greateſt Monarchs of the World. Whereunto the Senate delaying the time for certain days, that Junusbeius might in the mean time come thither, gravely anſwered, That the amity they held with King Francis, ought to be unto them an ornament, but no burden; the like alſo they held with the Emperor, whom they would in no caſe ſeem to caſt off, although they had been by him overwrought; Wherefore the Senators and all the Citizens in general were of opinion, to preſerve their Peace, as they which in the hard times of War had endured great extremities, which would hardly be recovered with long Peace: But if they did once ſee the Enſigns diſplaied, and the Wars begun, they would then take further advice, Whether it were good for them to thruſt themſelves into thoſe Wars or not, when as they were in League and Friendſhip with three of the greateſt Princes of the World. In the mean time Junusbeius arrived at Venice, and was there honourably received. He requeſted, That the League before made at Conſtantinople by Badoerius their Embaſſador, might by the authority of the Senate be confirmed; and ſo commended the French Kings cauſe to the Senate, that he requeſted no more, but that unto that amity which they already held with the French, they would joyn further courteſies, the rather for that Solyman had accounted him for his Brother, and had undertaken to aid him againſt Charles King of Spain; but as to joyn in League with him, or in his quarrel to take up Arms, he requeſted nothing. Which was quite beſide the expectation of Polinus and Pellicerius, who by urging of the matter, and by telling of all, had thought eaſily to have perſwaded the Senate to have granted what they requeſted, and therefore thought the Turk (who had ſo coldly ſpoken in the cauſe) to be ſome way corrupted. But as it afterward appeared, there was ſuch equity and modeſty in Solymans Letters (who was otherwiſe of a proud and inſolent nature) that he would not as then exact any thing of them, which ſhould not ſtand with the good of their Eſtate. Wherefore Polinus having in vain ſtaied certain days at Venice, was in one of their publick Gallies tranſported to Raguſium, and from thence travelled by Land to Conſtantinople, where he found all things more difficult than ever he dreamed of. For the great Baſſaes ſaid, There could no Fleet be ſet out that year, by reaſon that he was come too late to ſue for ſuch a matter, the Spring of the Year being now paſt, of all other times moſt fit for to take in hand ſo long a Voyage. So that Polinus was above meaſure vexed with care and grief, that he had ſo evil ſped, and was come ſo out of ſeaſon both at Venice and Conſtantinople. Dixius alſo, one of the Maſters of the Rhodian Gallies, was come to Conſtantinople, to carry news into France of the coming of the Turks Fleet; who told Polinus, That the Kings Sons were with ſtrong power far entred into the Low-Countries, and had already invaded Spain, expecting nothing more than the coming of the Turks Gallies. Wherefore Polinus (as it eaſily chanceth to Men deceived by truſt repoſed in any other Mens promiſes, and bewailing the evil ſucceſs of their vain travel) wonderfully tormented himſelf, curſed the froward and unconſtant manners of the Baſſaes, called upon the Faith of Solyman; and beſought the great Baſſaes one by one, that they would not contrary to their promiſe forſake the King, who upon the hope of the coming of the Turks Fleet, had now invaded both the Low-Countries and the Kingdom of Spain; foraſmuch as by that delay, which was unto them neither honourable nor profitable, was (as he ſaid) betraied the Majeſty of his King, and a moſt aſſured Victory now as good as gotten, quite marred. In which his obteſtations, he was ſo importunate and tedious, that he became unto thoſe proud Baſſaes rather loathſome than gracious; inſomuch that to end his ſute, they thought it beſt ſharply to take him up, and for that time to ſhake him off. And therefore ſending for him and the other French Gentlemen which followed him, to the Court, the great Baſſaes then ſitting in Council, and Barbaruſſa with them for the Honour of his place; as ſoon as they were come into the Council-Chamber, Solyman Baſſa the Eunuch turning himſelf about, ſpake unto them in this ſort.

Polinus coming to Conſtantinople, findeth not the Turk ſo ready to ſend his Fleet to aid the French King, as he had hoped.

The ſharp Oration of Solyman the Eunuch Baſſa to Polinus the French Embaſſador.

Frenchmen (ſaid he) this place for diſpatch of moſt weighty Affairs, appointed by the grave Judgment of our moſt mighty Emperor to us his faithful Servants, doth (as it beſt beſeemeth) receive us daily coming unto it, void of love and hatred; and withal doth notably put us in remembrance, to ſpeak our minds freely. Neither would I, that this frankneſs of ſpeech (the Meſſenger of truth, and therefore the faithful keeper of friendſhip) ſhould be unto your Ears unpleaſing or troubleſome; for ſithence your King hath been called the friend and fellow of the Othoman Name, we may not now either forget the duties of love, or loath your friendſhip; ſeeing that our Emperor doth marvellouſly affect you, and is not a little deſirous to ſtrengthen you with his power, and by overcoming your Enemies to encreaſe your power and honour. But in your demands is no equity, no modeſty, ſo that we term you unmodeſt and importunate; and others which favour you not ſo well, call you plainly by your right Names, unreaſonable and ſhameleſs Men; who as too too forgetful of your duties, do moſt fondly trouble the Laws of amity and friendſhip. For Leagues are confirmed by like profit, making even the charge and mutual dangers; but if neglecting your Friends kindneſs and courteſie, you will make no requital, they will quickly grow weary of you. So happeneth it unto you Frenchmen, who ever forgetful and negligent in our dangers, but in your own always mindful and diligent, have ſhewed your ſelves friends unto us when need was, not in deeds and certain aid, but only in bare Letters, and Embaſſages. Tell me I pray you where ever you ſhewed any ſign or token of your good will or aid? Whereby the minds of our Enemies might at the leaſtwiſe have but been kept in ſuſpence of ſome doubtful fear, when as Charles with all the power of the Weſt came into Hungary: And Corone and Patras were in the mean time ſhaken in Greece with the Enemies Fleet; and laſt of all Tunes taken with ſo great a Fleet? But all this we pardon you; yet this it is which is hardly to be endured, that you did not ſo much as once grieve at our ſo great injuries, as you ought to have done; but ſent your gratulatory Embaſſadors unto the bloody common Enemy, who had but even then ſlain ſo many of our people. At length our Emperor came to Aulona to your great profit, about to paſs over into Italy; but neither then in the arrival of our Fleet appeared the good wills of the Apulians towards you, which were of you ſo vainly promiſed, neither did you ſo much as once move to invade the upper part of Italy; ſo neither ſerving our turn, nor well fitting your own, you have always loſt the occaſion of the good ſucceſs of your affairs. But neither then, neither at any time afterwards, needed we your Counſel or united Forces; for the Venetians to their pain felt both our Forces and our Faith; as for the reſt, War, the notable revenger of our wrongs, moſt happily brought to paſs, at ſuch time as you of your own voluntary heads made Peace with the common Enemy, to invade us; and did as unkindly as impudently as it were blow Wind in his Sails. But we, without your help, have notably repreſſed ſo great aſſaults of our Enemies; when as this ſame Hariaden Barbaruſſa put to flight their Fleet at Ambracia and happily ſlew the Spaniſh Pyrats of Caſtrum, and having again recovered our own Cities, took alſo from them ſome of theirs; wherefore we are bound unto you for no deſert, but we had rather forget theſe unkindneſſes, than to fail you whom we have once received into our friendſhip. For we perform our fidelity in deeds; but it is his part to regard the time, to way the danger, to wait occaſion; which will not raſhly commit his actions to the hazard of Fortune. You are come later than you ſhould have done for the ſetting forth of our Fleet; for Summer now well ſpent, followeth the peſtilent time of Autumn, ſo that Mariners cannot in convenient time be taken up, or ſafely thruſt into the Gallies; for in long ſailing, who would not think, but that ſuch a Company of Sailers uſually ſick at the change of an unacquainted Air, would be in danger of their lives? Who would not fear Shipwreck in their return, when as this ſame Hariaden ſo great a Maſter at Sea, driven upon the Acroceraunian Rocks in the Month of Auguſt, loſt ſo many Gallies? A Fleet would be rigged in Winter, furniſhed and ſet forward in the Spring, in Summer is ſafe ſailing and making War. Which that it may be ſo done, we will for the Common-wealths ſake perſwade the Emperor; for the Navy once loſt, cannot upon the ſuddain be again reſtored for much Gold, whereof the Othoman Emperor wanteth no ſtore, heaped up by many Ages. If thou be wiſe take theſe things in good part as friendly ſpoken; but whether the Emperor will pardon thy boldneſs or not, let himſelf conſider; truly we have ſatisfied both him and our ſelves in ſpeaking to thee ſo plainly.

Theſe things ſeverely ſpoken by the Eunuch Baſſa, did ſo much the more trouble Polinus, for that they ſeemed to have been ſent from the mouth of Solyman himſelf, who was thought to have heard all that was ſaid. For behind the Baſſaes as they ſat in Council, was a Window with a braſen Grate, and a Curten drawn before it, that the Emperor when he pleaſed, might unperceived hear the complaints and ſutes of all Nations, and note the manners of his great Counſellors; whoſe care for the adminiſtration of Juſtice was ſo much the greater, for fear of his preſence. Yet did not Polinus for his repulſe, deteſting the double dealing of the Baſſaes, ſo give over his ſute; but winning by gifts the favour of the Capiaga or chief Porter, a Man ever of great authority in the Turks Court, laboured by him to be brought to the ſpeech of Solyman himſelf; who faithfully performed what he had undertaken. So the French Embaſſador brought by him into the ſecreteſt place of the Court, which few Chriſtians had ever been, and ſo unto the preſence of Solyman, recounted unto him how all matters had before paſſed, and moſt earneſtly beſought him not to fail the Kings expectation of the Fleet he had before promiſed, who at that preſent was invading his Enemies in three places. Whereunto Solyman courteouſly and expreſly anſwered, That the opportunity of ſending out of his Fleet was paſt; not by his will, which was always immutable and firm, but by his late coming, and the time of the year half ſpent; but promiſed the next Spring without doubt to ſend unto the King his Friend and Brother, twice ſo great a Fleet as he had deſired againſt Charles their Enemy. With which anſwer, the Embaſſador diſpatched away Dixius into France, upon whoſe arrival, King Francis called back again Henry his eldeſt Son with his Army, from the Siege of Perpenna in Spain.

The Princes of Germany joyn their forces with King Ferdinand againſt the Turk in Hungary.

The Princes and States of Germany, at the requeſt of King Ferdinand and the Nobility of Hungary, about this time decreed with one conſent, to take up Arms againſt the Turks, for the recovering again of Buda, and other the loſt parts of Hungary. For beſides the diſhonour done to their Nation at Exek under the leading of Cazzianer, and again at Buda under the leading of the Lord Rogendorff; they well ſaw, that if they did not ſpeedily relieve the Hungarians overwhelmed with the calamities of the Turks Forces, they ſhould in ſhort time be enforced to fight for their Religion, Children, Wives, and Lives, againſt the ſame mighty Enemy, at their own Doors. For preventing whereof, the Princes and free Cities of Germany, ſet out thirty thouſand Footmen, and ſeven thouſand Horſemen; amongſt whom was Mauritius, afterwards Duke of Saxony, then a young Gentleman about twenty years old. But the General of theſe German Forces, was Joachimus Marqueſs of Brandenburg, a Man more for the honour of his Houſe than the valour of himſelf preferred to that place; yet ſo, that unto him was joyned eight others, Men of great years and experience, by whoſe Counſel he was to be directed. When they were come to Vienna, King Ferdinands power met them; where, beſide ſuch as were taken up in Auſtria, Huganot Governour of Stiria came in with ten thouſand Horſemen. Unto theſe the Noblemen of Hungary, Gaſper Seredius, Andreas Bathor, and Petrus Perenus, a Man of the greateſt authority, power, and experience, amongſt the Hungarians, joyned themſelves, with fifteen thouſand Horſemen; whither alſo Paulus the third of that Name then Biſhop of Rome, ſent three thouſand choſen Footmen out of Italy, conducted to Vienna by Alexander Vitellius, a moſt famous Captain. The Marqueſs with this great Army marched from Vienna alongſt the River Danubius, but ſo ſoftly, that the Hungarian and Italian Captains ſaid plainly, That the beſt part of the Summer and fitteſt time for Wars, was paſſed over in loitering and dallying out the time to no purpoſe; eſpecially Jacobus Medices, who had long before perſwaded the King, to be ready to ſet forward his Forces with the firſt of the Spring, before the Turks could either augment their Garriſons, or put in any new Forces; for that by ſuch reſolute and ſpeedy invaſion, it was like enough he might recover both Peſth and Buda. Which politick and wholſome Counſel ſo well given, King Ferdinand too much crediting the great Men of his Court (liking nothing but what proceeded of themſelves) rejected, expecting the full aſſembly of all his Forces, before the ſetting forth of his Army. At length the Marqueſs was by ſoft marches come to Strigonium (King Ferdinand himſelf ſtaying behind at Vienna) where it was commonly reported, That Solyman fearing to loſe Buda, was either in perſon himſelf coming into Hungary, or elſe ſending down the General of his European Horſemen, who might never ſet foot forward to War, without ſixty thouſand Horſemen. Which news ſo troubled the Germans, that they made no great haſt forward, doubting how they ſhould return again if they chanced not to get the Victory; beſide that, it was thought that the Marqueſs never purpoſed to fight a Battel, or endanger himſelf or his Army for the Kingdom of Hungary, but only to defend the bounds of Auſtria, and by ſhewing the ſtrength of Germany, to terrifie, if he could, the Turks, if they not content with Hungary, ſhould alſo provoke the Germans. But after it was by certain Eſpials from Samandria, known that all that report of the coming of the Turks great Army was but vain, and that there was ſcarce a thouſand Janizaries and twice ſo many Horſemen come to Buda, and that the Turks Fleet was both for number and ſtrength far inferiour to the Kings, they ſet forward again with more chearfulneſs, much encouraged by the forwardneſs of the Hungarians, eſpecially of Perenus; aſſuring them, that if they would without delay march on, and ſpend no more time in vain, they ſhould not find at Buda any ſuch number of Turks as was worth the name of an Army; for that Solyman uſing but every ſecond Year to make War, did that year take his reſt, and was not like to undertake any great expedition. For theſe reaſons all Men being ready chearfully to ſet forward, the Marqueſs appointed to paſs over Danubius; which this Perenus, Huganot, and Medices, all expert Captains liked not of; wiſhing him rather to hold on his way directly ſtill on that ſide the River to Buda, the chief City of the Kingdom. But it was the mind of the General and all his Counſellors, firſt to beſiege Peſth, which might be done with leſs labour and danger, and there having made proof of the Enemies ſtrength and purpoſe, to come to the Siege of Buda; for then would the Souldiers with much more courage and chearfulneſs endure the Siege of Buda, if they had by good fortune firſt beaten them out of Peſth: Which Counſel was both beſt liked and followed, and the Army by two Bridges with great and painful labour made over Danubius (which was in that place divided into two parts) tranſported. At the ſame time Medices an Italian Captain, Admiral of the Kings Fleet, came down the River, and in deſpight of the Turks took the Iſland of St. Margaret, lying in the River a little above Buda, and by force repulſed the Turks Fleet unto the Suburbs of the City. The Marqueſs to avoid the danger of the great ſhot from Buda, after he was paſſed the River, fetcht a great compaſs about, and ſo came to the North ſide of Peſth; for on the South it was defended with the River Danubius, running betwixt it and Buda; and on the Eaſt and Weſt the great Ordnance on the one ſide from the Caſtle of Buda, and on the other from Mount St. Gerrard, did ſo ſcour all alongſt the Walls, that no Man could without moſt manifeſt danger there abide. For Buda ſtanding upon the Hill, and divided from Peſth only with the River, ſo overlooketh and commandeth all the plain Country about Peſth, that without peril no Man can ſtir on any ſide of the City, but Northward towards Agria, covered by the City from the ſhot out of Buda. As the Marqueſs was coming thither, he was told by certain Fugitives, That Balis Governour of Buda (who in that place ſucceeded Solyman the Hungarian Renegate, lately before dead of the Plague) had in Garriſon in Buda two thouſand Horſemen; and that Ulames the Perſian Governour of Boſna, was come unto him with three thouſand more; whereunto Amurathes had alſo joyned another thouſand which he brought out of Dalmatia; and that Segemenes was come thither alſo with a thouſand Janizaries from Conſtantinople; as for the reſt of the Footmen, that they were but wild Country people, fitter for labour than for ſervice in Wars. They told him alſo, that the Enemies Fleet conſiſted of ſixty ſmall Pinnaces, ten Gallies, and a few other great Boats; and that Solyman had commanded his Captains in any caſe to defend Buda and Peſth, to the laſt Man, without regard of any other place. And had propoſed unto the valiant, great rewards; and to the cowardly, extream puniſhment; charging them further, that if need were, they ſhould in time ſend for Achomates the General of his European Horſemen, to Sophia, to aid them.

The Turks upon the approach of the Chriſtians, iſſued out at one of the Gates of the City, and ſkirmiſhed with the Hungarians; but after they had ſufficiently proved one anothers ſtrength, and ſome few were on both ſides ſlain, they retired into the City, and the Hungarians to the Camp. The next day after, Vitellius going out of the Camp near the City with five companies, to chuſe a place for planting the Battery; the Turks at one inſtant ſallying out at two Gates of the City, gave him a hot ſkirmiſh, where at the firſt, the fight was begun with like courage and force; but the Turks ſtill ſending forth new ſupplies both of Horſe and Foot; firſt the Chriſtian Footmen, and after that the Horſemen, not able longer to endure the force of the Janizaries, were conſtrained diſorderly to retire, having loſt in that retreat four of their Captains and two Enſigns; and had not Vitellius with one Company of Horſemen ſerred together, valiantly repulſed the inſolent Janizaries, the loſs had been much greater. Vitellius exceedingly grieved with this loſs, and perceiving the manner of the Enemies fight, encouraged his Souldiers, purpoſing if he could to be fully revenged; and above all others, requeſted Perenus to be ready to joyn with him as occaſion ſhould require. Vitellius lay encamped in the Kings Orchards, walled about as it were a mile, equally diſtant both from the great Camp and from the City; out of theſe Orchards he went with twelve Companies under their Enſigns, commanding the reſt to ſtand ſtill within the Walls, in readineſs at all aſſaies; and ſo fetching a great compaſs about, marched alongſt the River ſide towards the City; neither did the proud Enemy (brag of the former days Victory) make any delay, but bravely ſallied out at the Eaſt ſide of the City, and courageouſly charged them. But Vitellius warned of his former harm, and ſeeing his Enemies come on as he deſired, covered his ſhot with his Pikes, and ſtanding cloſe, received the Enemies charge; his ſhot ſtill playing under the Pikes, oftentimes upon their Knees; many of the Turks were there laid on the ground, whilſt they deſperately fought to have broken the order of the Chriſtians. In the mean time, when many of the Turks Horſemen and Janizaries coming out of the Gates, and divers others beholding the fight were come over the River from Buda, to be partakers of the Victory, had filled the hithermoſt Bank; Vitellius in good time, of purpoſe by little and little retired, as if he had been overcharged; then began the Enemy to give a great ſhout, and more fiercely to aſſail the Chriſtians; their Horſemen alſo clapt behind them, to have there charged them. Which thing Perenus diligently noting, and that the Turks in following of Vitellius were drawn a great way from the Gates, he ſuddainly with his light Horſemen clapt in betwixt the City and the Turks at their backs; after whom followed alſo Mauritius (afterwards Duke of Saxony) with a ſtrong Troop of German Horſemen, of purpoſe to have ſhut them in for retiring back again into the City. But then the Turks perceiving the danger, and finding themſelves ſhut in, ſtood as Men more than half diſmaied, bethinking themſelves which way to take, and ſo began to retire. When Vitellius coming on couragiouſly with his Pikemen and his Harquebuſiers divided into two Wings, charged them fiercely; and the Hungarian and German Horſemen breaking in amongſt them on the other ſide, made great ſlaughter of them, and ſtruck ſuch a fear amongſt the flying Turks, that many of them in running to the Gate, thruſt one another through with their Pikes; divers other were alſo by the Horſemen driven into the River and there drowned. This day Segemenes loſt above an hundred of his Janizaries, and four hundred others. The chiefeſt commendation for this piece of ſervice was given to Vitellius, who had ſo well and ſo quickly revenged himſelf of the Turks; and next him to Perenus, who as a ſkilful Captain had ſo well awaited the time to entrap the Enemy; Neither is Mauritius the young Saxon Prince unworthy his due praiſe, who valiantly charging the Turks, and having his Horſe ſlain under him, was in danger to have been there loſt himſelf, had not Nicholas Ribiſche one of his Followers, covered him with his own Body, until ſuch time as that he was reſcued by others, Ribiſche himſelf preſently dying of his Wounds. This little Victory ſo encouraged the Germans, that the Marqueſs commanded the great Ordnance to be preſently brought forth, and the Battery planted, which was at the firſt placed ſo far off, that it did little harm, although the Wall were both old and thin, not above five Foot thick; and the Ordnance laid either a little too low, or mounted too high, either ſhot ſhort, or quite over the City into Buda; which fault once perceived, the Battery was removed nearer, and a fair Breach ſoon made in the Wall, with the continual beating of forty great Pieces of Artillery. Vitellius was the firſt that offered to aſſault the Breach, ſo that the Germans would preſently ſecond him, which thing they all by holding up of their hands promiſed couragiouſly, but cowardly by and by broke that promiſe; for oftentimes it chanceth, That they which before the danger are readieſt to promiſe their help, are in the very danger it ſelf of all others moſt ſlack. The Hungarians alſo for their parts promiſed not to be behind. The ſilence of the Enemy at the Breach and in the City, was wonderful, ſo that many thought he had been fled back over the River to Buda; for Segemenes Captain of the Janizaries, an old beaten Souldier, ordered all things with as little ſtir as was poſſible; he had received new ſupplies from Ulamas, and had caſt a deep Countermure within the Wall againſt the Breach, and on the inner ſide of the ſame had made a ſtrong Barricado, with Gabions and Wine Veſſels filled with Sand and Earth; behind which ſtood the Janizaries, and next unto them the Turkiſh Archers; and laſt of all the Horſemen, who had left their Horſes to ſerve on Foot. The ſignal for the aſſault once given, four Italian Captains ran deſperately with their Companies by the ruins of the Wall to the Breach; but whilſt they there ſet up their Enſigns, and wondring at the Enemies fortification, were ready betwixt hope and fear to leap down, they were ſuddainly overwhelmed with a ſhour of Arrows and Bullets. Yet Vitellius ſtill encouraging them, brought them ſtill on, who did what they might to have entred; but the German Footmen with their General ſtood ſtill under the Walls, looking on, as Men nothing moved either with the hope of Victory or danger of their Friends; and the Hungarians not ſo much as once looking upon the Enemy, retired; two of the Italian Captains, Rufus and Fiolla were there ſlain, and Carolus Vitellius his Nephew, ſhot in the Shoulder. The Turks with Shot and Stones ſtill repulſed and beat down the Italians, whereof the Germans alſo ſtanding ſtill, felt part, and were more gauled than a Man would have thought Men could have been, that did nothing; for there they ſtill ſtood for ſhame, leſt if they ſhould have alſo firſt retired, they ſhould have encurred a ſecond infamy as bad as the firſt; which thing Vitellius perceiving, would in no caſe depart from the Breach, but wiſhed rather to loſe his Men by whole Companies, than to leave the leaſt colour of excuſe to the Germans, or that they ſhould ſay they ſtaied longeſt, of whom he with greater anger than grief complained, that he was forſaken and cowardly betraid. In time of this aſſault one of the Turks was heard to ſpeak aloud in the Italian Tongue, Why do not you valiant Italians ſpare your ſelves, and give place to thoſe laſie Germans? We all wiſh to ſpare you, and to beat the drunkenneſs out of their moſt cowardly heads, that they ſhould no more hereafter provoke us. At length the Germans weary of their hot ſtanding and nought doing, got them farther off, after whom the Italians forthwith retired; but ſo diſorderly, to be quickly out of the danger of the Enemies ſhot, that if the Turks had at the ſame time ſallied out at all the Gates, it was thought that the whole Camp had been greatly endangered. In this attempt rather than aſſault, ſeven hundred Chriſtians were ſlain outright, and many more hurt, who died afterwards of their wounds.

The Breach aſſaulted by the Italians.

The contumelious Speech of a Turk againſt the Germans.

The Germans and the Italians retire with loſs.

All this while the Marqueſs and Hugonot the great Commanders of the Army, kept themſelves ſo far from Gunſhot, that they were no where to be ſeen, until that Torniellus and Fotiſcu, two valiant Captains, finding them out, wiſhed them for ſhame to ſhew themſelves for the comforting of the Army. A little before night they conſulted with the other Captains, whither they ſhould forſake the Siege, or continue it ſtill; whereof moſt of the Germans beſt liked to be gon, as the ſafeſt way; though Vitellius and ſome others ſpake earneſtly to the contrary. At which time a Spy coming in, brought news that Achomates, Solymans Lieutenant of the European Horſemen, had paſſed over the River Savus at Belgrade, and was coming to Dravus; whoſe coming either cunningly fained, or vainly believed, cauſed the Germans to make a ſhort concluſion, and to reſolve flatly to return to Vienna, fearing that if they ſhould longer continue the Siege, they ſhould be ſtaied againſt their wills by Achomates. Which thing made many of the old German Souldiers to hang their heads for ſhame, and the Hungarians to curſe both the Germans and the hard fortune of their Nation, vainly wiſhing for a General in courage anſwerable to the ſtrength of that great Army. Segemenes perceiving how much the Chriſtian Army was diſcouraged by the laſt days evil ſucceſs, early in the Morning couragiouſly ſent out all the Horſemen, and after them certain Companies of Footmen, to relieve them in their retire; who in many place skirmiſhed with the Hungarians, being nothing inferior unto them either in courage or skill; and the matter was brought to that paſs, as if it had been ſo agreed upon, that many of the moſt notable and expert Souldiers on either ſide encountred together hand to hand in the ſight of the Italians and Germans, the Hungarians mixt with the Turks, and the Turks with the Hungarians, with ſuch fidelity, that they regarded no other Enemy but him whom every one hand ſingled out for himſelf, as if it had been in a triumph for exerciſe hand to hand. It hapned, that a notable Captain of the Turks, deſired to ſee Vitellius, who being ſhewed unto him (for he was eaſie to be known by his Armor) the Turk ran unto him to embarce him for his honour, and ſo departed. About five hundred Horſemen ſo encountred one another hand to hand that day, of whom many were ſlain or hurt. The night following the Battery was removed, and the Army marched towards the River to the Fleet. The Turks perceiving the Chriſtians to be departed, ſallied out of the City on all hands, and with a great cry upbraiding them of Cowardiſe, hardly purſued the Rereward of the Army. Ulamas was come over himſelf from Buda, and ſo eagerly followed the Army, that it could hardly have eſcaped without great danger, had not Vitellius with his Italians made a ſtand, and requeſted the Hungarian and German Horſemen to turn back upon the Enemy; which they at his requeſt did, and not only repulſed the Enemy, but alſo put him to flight, and in the chaſe ſlew many. After which time the Army paſſed on quietly; yet ſeven hundred Germans which were ſick and ſtragled behind the Army, were by the Turks Horſemen miſerably ſlain in the ſight of their Fellows. The Germans thrice foiled by the Turks, firſt at Exek, then at Buda, and now at Peſth, returned full of heavineſs and grief, as they which were now to forget the ſubduing of Hungary, and to become careful of Germany it ſelf. The Army coming to Vienna, was there broken up, and the Italians ſent home into their Country, who for moſt part died by the way, of infection taken in the Camp in ſtrange Air, and a moſt queſie time of the Year.

The Chriſtian Army broken up at Vienna.

But to cover the ſhame of this unfortunate expedition, and to turn Mens talk another way by ſome notable accident; Petrus Perenus the noble Hungarian was the Man pickt out for the purpoſe to fill Mens mouths. He, belayed with the envy of the Court, was for ſuſpicion of aſpiring to the Kingdom of Hungary, by the commandment of King Ferdinand apprehended by Liſcanus, a Spaniſh Captain in the Caſtle of Strigonium, as a Traitor, and preſently delivered to Medices the Admiral, to be conveied up the River to Vienna.

Matters ſurmiſed againſt Perenus.

Vienna. Liſcanus at the time of his apprehenſion moſt covetouſly and uncourteouſly took from him his Chain, and a rich Cloak lined with Sables; which indignity done to ſo noble a Gentleman, ſo much offended the minds of the reſt of the Hungarians, that above twelve thouſand of them thereupon preſently returned home to their own dwellings, curſing the Germans to the Divel. This Perenus was one of the greateſt Peers of Hungary, but of a moſt haughty and magnificent mind, ſo that he would ſometime have almoſt a hundred goodly ſpare Horſes fit for ſervice led before him without their Riders; and would ſometime ſpeak too liberally againſt the bareneſs of King Ferdinands Court, who polled by his Courtiers, hardly maintained his State; which his ſurpaſſing magnificence and princely Port was cauſe enough for the other great Courtiers to envy at his Eſtate, and to ſeek his overthrow; who as Men overcharged with the burthen of another Mans vertue, whereof they never bore the leaſt part, and always gaining by the depraving of other Mens perfection, conſpired together his overthrow, and oftentimes pointing at him with their fingers, would ſay, That he ſavoured of a Crown. This notable Man, as he had many worthy Vertues, ſo was he not without cauſe noted of ambition and unconſtancy; for after that King Lewis was loſt, he diſdaining the preferment of John the Vayvod to the Kingdom of Hungary, took part with King Ferdinand againſt him, in hope as it was thought to be next in honour unto himſelf; but after he ſaw King John again reſtored, and his State ſtrongly ſupported by Solyman, and that all things ſtood doubtful and fickle with Ferdinand, he with like levity ſought means by Abraham the great Baſſa to be reconciled to King John; which was hardly obtained of him by the interceſſion of Solyman himſelf (as is before declared) to whom he gave his Son as a Pledge of his Fidelity. After which time he lived in great Honour and Loyalty all the Reign of King John; but after he was dead, and ſaw George the Biſhop the Kings Tutor doing what he liſt, to reign like a King, he diſdained his Government, and ſolicited by King Ferdinand, revolted again unto him, and furthered him in what he could for the obtaining of the Kingdom. But now falling into the envy of the Court, Malice found out matter enough to work his confuſion. Firſt it was given out, That his Son who had many years been detained in Solymans Court as a Pledge of his Fathers Faith, was even then under the colour of a fained eſcape come into Tranſylvania; when as he had ſecretly agreed with Solyman, that his Father being a Man much favoured of the People, ſhould by promiſing them all poſſible Freedom, allure them to the Turkiſh ſubjection; in reward of which good ſervice he ſhould be made Governour of the Kingdom of Hungary, and put in hope alſo to be made the Tributary King thereof, if it ſhould fortune the young King to die. Beſides that, it was accounted a thing very ſuſpicious, that he had the Winter before uſed great kindneſs and friendſhip toward the Turkiſh Captains, by ſending them great Preſents, and receiving the like again. And laſt of all, his Letters directed to certain Hungarian Captains were produced, wherein he ſeemed to promiſe them as his Friends and Followers, greater entertainment than agreed with his preſent Eſtate. All which things King Ferdinand (of his own diſpoſition not eaſily to be perſwaded to conceive evil of the Germans his Countrymen, were it never ſo apparent or true, but of Strangers any thing) quickly believed, and therefore cauſed him (as is before ſaid) to be apprehended. But Perenus as he was brought by Medices the Admiral to Vienna, when he was come near unto the Gate of the City, and heard that Philippus Torniellus with certain other brave Captains of his acquaintance, were come to meet the Admiral; he requeſted that the cloſe Coach wherein he rid might be opened, and that he might have leave to ſpeak to thoſe noble and valiant Gentlemen. Which thing was eaſily granted, for that the Nobility and approved valour of the Man ſeemed unto them which had the charge of him, unworthy of ſuch reſtraint of liberty or impriſonment, yea or of the leaſt ſuſpicion thereof. So he turning himſelf towards them, ſpake unto them in this ſort:

The lamentable ſpeech of Perenus to Torniellus and the other Captains, concerning his apprehenſion.

Wretched I, noble Gentlemen (ſaid he) whom deſpightful envy hath circumvented guiltleſs; but much more miſerable King Ferdinand, whom domeſtical Thieves bereave of Subſtance, of Friends, and Honour all at once. For ſo it cometh to paſs, that by this inconſiderate wrong done unto me, he ſhall utterly loſe the love and fidelity of the Hungarian Nation, and may therefore for ever not without cauſe deſpair for the obtaining of the Kingdom of Hungary, ſithence that it is not lawful for me (inferiour to none of my Nation in Birth, and having for my good and faithful ſervice well deſerved reward of a juſt King) ſo much as to rejoyce for the deliverance of my Son from the Captivity of the Turks, but that by my ſiniſter fortune, dreadful death in ſtead of incomparable joy muſt be preſented to mine Eies. For will theſe malicious Pick-thanks, guilty of their own Cowardiſe, the wicked Contrivers and Witneſſes of my wrongful Accuſation, ſpare me being laid faſt and in durance, which never ſpared the Kings Honour? For every Man of what Nobility ſoever, be he never ſo guiltleſs, when he is once in hold, muſt be content to endure, not what he hath deſerved, but what his hard fortune aſſigneth. Yet my upright mind and clear conſcience, which thing only God the moſt juſt Judge leaveth as a comfort to Men in miſery wrongfully accuſed, delivered me of this care; and ſo will the Marqueſs our General, to whom I before upon a miſtruſt foretold, that ſuch a danger would ſhortly befal me, and that I had rather be ſlain guiltleſs, than to withdraw my ſelf from Trial; which thing I told him at ſuch a time as I was ſo guarded with mine own ſtrength, that I feared no Mans force. I beſeech you do me this honourable favour, as to requeſt King Ferdinand in my behalf quickly and honourably to proceed to the Trial of my Cauſe, and according to his own princely diſpoſition, and the will of others, to diſcern betwixt his faithful Friends and fained Flatterers. Truly we are too too unfortunate Captains, if for a little evil ſucceſs we ſhall be ſo adjudged as Men that had overthrown their Fortune. Cazzianer peradventure received the juſt puniſhment he had deſerved, for the ſhameful forſaking and loſing of the Army at Exek, when as he poſſeſſed with an uncouth fear, forgot the duty of a General, more afraid of death than diſhonour; for when he had voluntarily committed himſelf to ſafe cuſtody, he was ſo generally condemned of Cowardiſe, that deſpairing to defend his Cauſe, he brake Priſon, and as wickedly as unfortunately revolted to the Turks; But neither was I of late the General, neither were we vanquiſhed, although we prevailed not, but honourably retiring, valiantly repreſſed the inſolency of the purſuing Enemy. As for the Kingdom of Hungary, I might then well have affected the ſame, and eaſily have deſerved it at Solymans Hands, when as King Ferdinand after the death of King John was making his preparation for that War; at which time my Friends and Followers at my devotion, with the love of the Hungarians towards me, ſeeming of no ſmall impor- tance for the obtaining of the Victory, might have miniſtred no unreaſonable or unſeaſonable hope to have drawn a Man into courſes not altogether beſeeming a Chriſtian. Wherefore I have, and will ſo long as I live fight againſt the Turks, if King Ferdinand ſhall ſhew himſelf an indifferent Judge in this accuſation, falſly ſurmiſed againſt me by the malice of mine Enemies.

When he had made an end of ſpeaking, the Admiral courteouſly perſwaded him to have good hope in the clemency of the moſt juſt King; and ſhortly after performed his requeſt; for he and Torniellus taking the King as he was Hunting, entreated him to deal favourably with Perenus. For all that, Perenus could not obtain that his cauſe might be openly heard, but was committed to ſafe keeping, there to remain in perpetual Priſon; but whether it was for the miſpriſion of new Treaſon, or for revenge of his old unconſtancy, is uncertain. Thus three the only great Princes left of the Hungarian Blood, equally worthy of the Kingdom, Valentine, Maylat, and Perenus, ſnarled almoſt in like Snares of envy, cut off all hope of raiſing a King to their ſeditious and therefore miſerable Countrymen; when as Perenus lay too late bewailing his unconſtancy in perpetual Priſon; and the other two faſt in Chains near unto the Euxine Sea, expected death the end of their miſeries. This end had the Wars taken in hand againſt the Turks by the general conſent of the Germans in the year 1542. which many thought might worthily be compared with the greateſt loſſes of thoſe times; when as King Ferdinand having in vain ſpent a great maſs of Treaſure (the fitteſt ſtay for the imminent War) and loſt the opinion before conceived of the ſtrength of Germany; had now as a weak Prince, and ſubject to injury, provoked him againſt the Turks, bold enough otherwiſe, but as then inſolent for their late Victories.

1543. Polinus the French Kings Embaſſador ſtill following the Turks Court, ceaſed not by all means to ſolicite Solyman, with his Gallies to aid the King his Maſter in the invaſion of the Dominions of Charles the Emperor, in Italy, Sicily, and Spain. In which ſute he was ſo croſſed by Solyman the Eunuch Baſſa, then Viſier, that he was almoſt in deſpair of ſpeed; for the Malicious Eunuch being himſelf a great Sea-man, and envying the Honour of Barbaruſſa (who was to be employed in that ſervice) ſought by keeping him out of all honourable Actions, to diminiſh his former Glory; and concerning the preſent, proteſted openly as he ſat in Council, That he ſaw no other cauſe why the Turkiſh Emperor ſhould to his great charge and the common danger, ſend out ſuch a Fleet, but to ſerve Barbaruſſa his own turn. But Solyman having diligently heard, and deeply conſidered of that the Baſſaes had ſaid, rejected their opinions, who would not he ſhould have given the French King any aid; and honourably decreed according to his promiſe, whatſoever ſhould enſue thereof, to ſend his Fleet unto the King by Barbaruſſa. Two days after, the French Embaſſador before in deſpair, but now revived with that Decree, was ſolemnly Feaſted by Ruſtan Baſſa (Solymans Son in Law) and by Solyman the Eunuch Baſſa; for ſo it was their great Maſters pleaſure, both of them joying of him for the friendſhip confirmed betwixt the two Princes by ſending this Fleet. After which, divers Gifts were beſtowed upon the Embaſſador and his chief Followers; and at ſuch time as he was to take his leave, Solyman gave him great charge of his Navy, that it might be ſafely kept, and ſo after the ſervice done, again returned; and withal delivered him Letters unto King Francis, wherein after the glorious rehearſal of his proud Titles, he writ unto him as followeth:

Solyman granteth to ſend his Fleet by Barbaruſſa to aid the French King againſt the Emperor.

We have upon a brotherly Bounty granted unto Polinus your Embaſſador, ſuch and ſo great a Fleet as you have deſired, throughly furniſhed for all aſſaies; whoſe direction we have commanded Hariaden our Admiral to follow, and by your appointment to proceed againſt the Enemy. But you ſhall do well and friendly, the Wars once happily ended, to ſend back again my Fleet to Conſtantinople. All things ſhall undoubtedly fall out according to your own deſire and mine, if you ſhall carefully take heed that Charles the Spaniſh King your perpetual Enemy, do not again deceive you with the motion of a deceitful Peace. For then ſhall you bring him to a moſt indifferent Peace, when you have brought upon his Countries all the calamities of War.

Solymans Letters to the French King.

Polinus taking his leave of Solyman then lying at Hadrianople, returned to Conſtantinople, where he found Barbaruſſa with an hundred and ten Gallies and forty Gallions, ready to put to Sea, which he had with incredible celerity rigged up and furniſhed. And ſo ſetting forward the eight and twentieth of April in the year 1543, and paſſing the Straits of Heleſpontus, he arrived firſt at Cariſtius, in Eubœa; and from thence to Malea, where he was by contrary Winds caſt into the Bay of Lacedemon, and there ſtaied nine days before he could double the Cape of Metapanium, called in ancient time Tenarus; After that he came to Methon, and from thence croſſing the Ionian, came to the Strait of Meſſana; where the Turkiſh Pyrats being come with their Galliots within the ſight of Rhegium, began to land their Men. They of Rhegium ſeeing ſo great a Fleet, and the Turks already landing, fled out of the City for fear; but the Caſtle was ſtill kept by Didacus Gaietanus a Spaniard, who refuſed to have any parly with Polinus the French Embaſſador, and with ſhot out of the Caſtle ſlew certain of the Turks; wherewith the reſt being enraged, brake into the City, and finding it deſolate, ſet it on Fire, ſore againſt the will of Polinus and Barbaruſſa, who ſought to have found out the Authors thereof, and to have puniſhed them accordingly.

After that, certain Pieces of great Ordnance were landed and planted againſt the Caſtle, which with a few Shot ſo terrified the Captain, already troubled with the crying out of his Wife, that he without any more ado yielded himſelf and the Caſtle with all therein, into the hands of the Enemy; unto whom with his Wife and Children, Barbaruſſa at the requeſt of the French Embaſſador granted both life and liberty; the reſt he ſhut up in a Church, and gave the Spoil of the Caſtle to his Souldiers. There was in the Garriſon of the Caſtle about ſeventy Spaniards, but many more Citizens, which were all carried away Priſoners. One of the Captains Daughters, a young Gentlewoman of exceeding Beauty, had with her good Grace ſo warmed the withered affection of the old Pyrat Barbaruſſa, that he (now fitter for the Grave than for Marriage) became amorous of her perſon; ſo that taking her from her Father, and entring her into the Mahometan Superſtition, he made of her as of his Wife; inſomuch that certain Months after he welcomed and bountifully entertained the Captain as his Father in Law, coming to ſee his Daughter at the Port called Portus Herculis in Tuſcany, where the Turks Fleet then lay. Barbaruſſa ſailing alongſt the Coaſt of Italy, came to

Oſtia, in the Mouth of the River Tibur, and brought ſuch a fear upon the City of Rome, that the Citizens were ready generally to have forſaken the City; had not Polinus by his Letters to Rodolphus the Cardinal, then the great Biſhop Paulus his Legate in the City, in part ſtaied the ſuddain Tumult. The Biſhop himſelf was then at Buxetum, a Town betwixt Cremona and Placentia, travelling (in ſhew) with the Emperor, to have made a Peace betwixt him and the French King; but labouring in ſecret to have bought of him the Dukedom of Millan, for Octavius his Kinſman the Emperors Son in Law. Polinus his Letters written to the Cardinal at Rome, and ſent by the Governour to Tarracina, were to this effect.

The French Embaſſadors Letters to comfort Rodolph the Cardinal, the Popes Legate in Rome.

This Fleet which is by Solyman ſent for the defence of France by Barbaruſſa his Admiral, is by his appointment at my command; ſo that it is not to hurt any but our Enemies. Wherefore make it known to the Romans and others dwelling alongſt the Coaſt of the Popes Territory, That they fear of us no Hoſtility; for the Turks will never violate the Faith of their Emperor ſolemnly given unto me; and you know moſt aſſuredly, that the French King deſireth nothing more, than that the Eſtate of Rome might not only be kept in ſafety, but alſo flouriſh moſt glorouſly, and be therefore preſerved from all injury. Farewel.

Solyman cometh with a great Army into Hungary.

In like manner he alſo comforted up them of Neptunianum and Oſtia, ſo that they brought unto the Turks all manner of Victual, and ſometimes for four Sheep or a couple of Oxen redeemed a good Priſoner taken in ſome place of the Kingdom of Naples. Yet for all this, the Romans did not ſo much credit the Embaſſadors promiſe in the behalf of the Turks good dealing, but that many of the weaker ſort fled out of the City into the Country by night, although the chief Magiſtrates did what they might to have ſtaied them. When Barbaruſſa had thus lien three days in the Mouth of the River Tibur, and there watered, he paſſed alongſt the Coaſt of Etruria and Liguria, without doing any harm; and ſo ſailed directly to Marſeilles. Where leaving him with his Fleet for a while, expecting the French Kings further pleaſure, we will again return unto Solyman, who at the ſame time that Barbaruſſa was ſpoiling the Frontiers of the Emperors Dominions in Italy, came with a great Army into Hungary, for the more aſſured poſſeſſion of that Kingdom, whereafter he ſaw King Ferdinand ſo much longed. And becauſe he would make all ſure before him, he ſent Amurathes Governour of Dalmatia, and Ulamas the Perſian Governour to Boſna, to beſiege Walpo, a ſtrong Town ſituate upon the River Dravus, not far from Exek, famous for the overthrow of the Chriſtian Army under Cazzianer; after whom followed alſo Achomates the great Commander of his European Horſemen. This Town (part of Perenus his poſſeſſions) was againſt all theſe Forces kept and worthily defended by Perenus his Wife (her Husband then lying in Priſon at Vienna) and her Friends by the ſpace of three Months; but was at laſt by the treacherous Souldiers delivered to the Enemy, together with their General; whom when they could by no means perſwade to conſent to the yielding up thereof, but that he would needs hold it out to the laſt, they took him perforce, and ſo delivered him with the Town to the Turks; who received him with all courteſie, and uſed him honourably; but thoſe traiterous Souldiers, whether it were in deteſtation of their Treachery, or for the ſpoil of them, were all put to the Sword; the juſt reward of their Treaſon. The reſt of the Citizens were taken by the Turks to mercy, and well uſed. The Biſhop and chief Men of Quinque Eccleſiæ (a famous City not far off on the other ſide of Dravus) hearing of the loſs of Walpo, and terrified with the greatneſs of the Turks Army, fled for fear, leaving none but the meaner ſort of the People in the City, who willingly yielded the ſame unto the Turks. The next Town of any ſtrength was Socloſia, belonging alſo to Perenus; which for a while held out againſt the Turks, for that divers Gentlemen of the Country which were fled into the City, encouraged the Citizens to ſtand upon their defence. But after much harm done on both ſides, when they were no longer able to hold out, they retired into the Caſtle, in hope to have ſo ſaved their lives and liberty by yielding; but Amurathes was ſo offended with them, that he would come to no reaſonable compoſition, or promiſe them any thing more, than that they ſhould at their pleaſure come forth; and ſo as they came out at the Gate, ſlew them every Mothers Son, thereby to terrifie others from making like reſiſtance.

Solyman cometh with his Army to Strigonium.

Solyman underſtanding of all theſe things, gave thoſe Towns which were taken, to Amurathes the General; and having put all things in readineſs, departed from Buda with all his Army to beſiege Strigonium; which was then kept by Liſcanus and Salamanca, two proud covetous Spaniards, with a Garriſon of one thouſand three hundred Souldiers, whereof ſome few were Spaniards and Italians, and the reſt Germans. Paulus Biſhop of Strigonium got himſelf out of the City betimes, deſpairing of all mercy if he ſhould have fallen into the power of Solyman, by whoſe interceſſion he had been once before reconciled to King John, and had again revolted from him to King Ferdinand. The Caſtle of Strigonium was ſituate upon a high Hill overlooking Danubius running underneath it; the Walls were built even without any Flankers, after the old manner of building before the invention of Guns; for which cauſe Vitellius and Torniellus two expert Captains (the year before ſent from the King to view the place, and the manner of the Fortification) were of opinion, that the City could hardly be defended, if it were beſieged by any ſtrong Enemy; being ſubject alſo unto a Hill not far from the Gates of the City. Againſt which inconveniences the old Garriſon Souldiers which Wintred in Strigonium, caſt up new Bulwarks and Fortifications, and after the manner of windy headed Men, making great boaſt before the danger, what they would do, ſeemed to wiſh for the coming of Solyman. But after that the Barbarous Enemy had with his Tents covered the Fields and Mountains round about the City, and withal brought a gallant Fleet up the River, all thoſe brags were laid in the Duſt, and every Man began to grow doubtful of his own ſafety; for that they being but few (although Men of good worth) were to withſtand the infinite number of ſuch Enemies, as oftentimes uſed moſt deſperately to expoſe their lives to all manner of dangers. This their fear was alſo encreaſed by the coming of certain Meſſengers from Solyman, who underſtanding of what Nations the Garriſon conſiſted, ſent unto the City three of his own Guard, one a Spaniard, another an Italian, and the third a German, all Renegate Chriſtians; that every one of them might without an Interpreter ſpeak unto their Countrymen in their own Language; Theſe Men admitted into the City, offered great rewards and large entertainment in the Name of Solyman, to ſuch as would in time yield; denouncing all torture and extremities unto them which ſhould endure the ſummons of the Cannon. Whereunto it was anſwered by the Captains, That thoſe faithful and valiant Souldiers, who had repoſed their laſt hopes in their Arms, were neither to be won by gifts, nor terrified with threats. With which anſwer the Meſſenger returned, and the ſame day the Turks great Ordnance were planted upon the Hill before the Gate of the City, and the weakeſt parts of the Walls round about the City, ſo well pickt out by the Turks to be aſſaulted, as that they could not more skilfully or commodiouſly have been choſen out of them which had within moſt diligently viewed every thing; ſo that it is to be thought that the Chriſtians wanted not only Fortune againſt the Turks, but alſo Faith amongſt themſelves. Salamanca diſtruſting the Fortifications of the Suburbs, retired into the City, contrary to that he had before vainly boaſted. Achomates General of the European Horſemen, laid ſiege to that part of the Wall which was next to the Biſhops Gardens; Ulamas the Perſian beſieged the Tower near unto the Gate towards Buda: The Aſapi or common Souldiers were by their Captains brought on to dig Trenches, and caſt up Mounts, as was thought moſt convenient. It is incredible to be ſpoken, with what fury the great Ordnance were diſcharged without ceaſing; inſomuch that the Tower with a great part of the Wall near unto it, ſhaken with continual Battery, fell down with ſuch violence, as if all had been ſhaken with a moſt terrible Earthquake; neither was any Man able to ſtand upon the Walls, but that the Janizaries with their Harquebuſies out of their Trenches, and from their Mounts, would moſt certainly fetch him off; and many which ſtood within farther off, were with the Turks Arrows, falling from high as if it had been out of the Air, grievouſly wounded. But that which moſt troubled the Defendants, and did them greateſt harm, was the Stones, which beaten in ſunder with the great Shot, and not to be avoided, did with their Pieces kill or maim the Souldiers near hand: With which dangers they were enforced to forſake the uttermoſt Wall, and to caſt up new Fortifications within, that they might with leſs danger defend the place. Neither in the Enemy wanted courage to aſſail the Breach; thrice they deſperately attempted to have entred, and were always with loſs repulſed. In which aſſaults, amongſt others, Bultaces Sanzack of Selymbria, and a Man of great account among the Turks, was loſt. Whilſt the Defendants were thus buſied, many of the Souldiers and Mariners which came up the River with all things neceſſary for the Army, from Buda, went on ſhore, and lay in the Suburbs of the City in ſuch ſecurity, as if there had been no Enemy nigh; which thing they in the City perceiving, ſuddainly ſallied out upon them fearing no ſuch matter, and ſlew many of them before they could arm themſelves, and drave the reſt of their Fleet; ſo that betwixt fighting and flying there was about two hundred of them ſlain. Zimar a Perſian, Admiral of the Fleet, in reſcuing of them which to ſave their lives fled unto the River, was ſhot through with a ſmall Shot and ſlain. Whilſt theſe things were in doing, and the Turks having in many places ſore ſhaken the Wall, did with greater force daily aſſail the City, and the Defendants with their continual loſs, and out of all hope of relief, were more and more diſcouraged; an old Calabrian Engineer which had long time ſerved King Ferdinand, fled out of the City to the Turks; who being courteouſly entertained by Solyman, and examined by the Baſſaes of many things concerning the ſtrength and ſtate of the City, ſatisfied them in all that they deſired; and further, directed them in planting their Batteries in places moſt convenient for the ſpeedy taking of the Town. In the mean time whilſt the Turks were with reſtleſs labour battering the Walls, and working in their Mines, it fortuned that a gilt brazen Croſs which ſtood upon the top of the Steeple of the Cathedral Church, was by the continual ſhooting of the Turks thereat, at length beaten down; at the ſight whereof, it is reported that Solyman after the ſuperſtitious manner of that Nation taking the chance as a token of good luck, cried out preſently, Strigonium is won.

The ſtout anſwer of the Captains.

The terrible battery of the Turks at Strigonium.

The Turks repulſed thrice at the aſſault of the Breach.

A Chriſtian Fugitive diſcovereth the ſtrength and ſtate of the City unto the Turks.

Liſcanus and Salamanca fearfully conſulting of the event of the Siege, and ſecretly conferring together, reſolved to ſave themſelves, and to give up the Town. Liſcanus was no great Souldier, and yet by continual ſpoil grown exceeding rich, and therefore thought it but folly to buy the Name of a reſolute Captain at too dear a price, with the loſs of his Life and Wealth. The like feeling was alſo in Salamanca, who preferred the ſafety of himſelf and of that which he had got in long ſervice, before all credit and honour, were it never ſo great. This their purpoſe was not kept ſo ſecret, but that it was noiſed abroad amongſt the common Souldiers, of whom almoſt the third part was now either ſlain, or with wounds or ſickneſs grown weak; yet were they all of opinion generally, that they were ſtill ſtrong enough to defend the Town. But the under Captains and Antients uſing to flatter their Generals, liked well of the motion, to yield unto Solyman upon reaſonable conditions, rather than to expoſe themſelves to moſt certain death, which ſhould nothing better King Ferdinands cauſe. Not long after, an Antient was by night let down over the Wall; and having by an Interpreter received the Turks Faith, called forth Salamanca, that he might upon better conditions go through with them for the yielding up of the Town. Who without further delay coming out, went to Achomates; before he went, commanding them which defended the Water Tower next to the River ſide, a place of great danger, for ſafegard of their lives to get them into the City; who terrified with that news, and haſtily retiring, were by the vigilant Turks which lay at the ſiege thereof, perceived; who ſuddainly breaking in, ſlew ſuch as were not yet gone, and poſſeſſed the Caſtle. But Salamanca being brought before the great Baſſaes, when he had ſtood upon many nice terms, and required many things to have been granted him, obtained no more, but that they ſhould without delay yield up the City, and put themſelves wholly to the mercy of Solyman. So the Spaniard being there ſtaid, himſelf writ to Liſcanus, how he had ſped; willing him forthwith, if he loved his own ſafety, to yield the City, without ſtanding upon further terms. Liſcanus upon receit of theſe Letters coming forth to the Souldiers, declared unto them the neceſſity of yielding up of the Town, and what hope there was to eſcape with life and liberty. But whilſt the Souldiers filled with indignation, ſtood as Men in doubt what to do, Halis Commander of the Janizaries came unto the Gate, and with chearful rather than ſtern countenance required to have it opened unto him, according to the agreement made by Salamanca in the Camp; which was forthwith opened by Liſcanus, and the Keys delivered unto him. The Janizaries entring peaceably into the City, poſſeſſed themſelves of the Walls and Fortreſſes round about, commanding the Chriſtian Souldiers to give place, out of whom they choſe all the beardleſs Youths, and commanded the reſt to caſt down their Harquebuſies and other Weapons in a place appointed, which they all for fear did, expecting nothing but ſome cruel execution to be done upon them by the barbarous Enemy. Which their fear was the more encreaſed by a ſtrange accident then unluckily chancing; for whilſt the Souldiers did as they were commanded, with their Harquebuſies caſt their Flasks full of Powder alſo, one of them ſuddainly took fire of a Match which was by chance caſt in amongſt them with fire in it, which firing the reſt, blew about all that heap of Weapons among the Turks, which ſo filled them with anger and fear of ſome ſuddain Treachery, that they fell upon the Chriſtians and ſlew divers of them; until ſuch time as Halis (perſwaded that it was a thing hapned rather by chance than malice) commanded his Janizaries to ſtay their fury. This tumult appeaſed, Halis cauſed proclamation to be made, That all ſuch Chriſtian Souldiers as would ſerve Solyman in his Wars, ſhould have ſuch place in his Army as their quality required, with bountiful entertainment; yet of all the Chriſtian Souldiers were found only ſeventy, which careful of their lives, accepted the offer, fearing that the Turks would upon ſuch as refuſed, exerciſe their wonted cruelty. Halis entertaining them courteouſly, ſent them away with the other youths whom he had before culled out, down the River to Buda; the other Souldiers he took into his protection, and uſed their labour to help the Turks to make clean the Caſtle. But Liſcanus, who to ſave his Gold had made Shipwreck of his honour and reputation, was glad to give unto Halis the fair Chain of Gold which he had moſt covetouſly and inſolently before taken from Perenus; when as Halis (who would otherwiſe have taken it from him by force) by way of military courteſie now craved it of him, as a ſtrange kind of ornament among the Turks; with which gift he was in hope to have ſaved the reſt of his Coyn. But fortune favoured not ſo much the covetous Coward; for when he was about to depart away with his Horſes of ſervice, which he kept very good, and had cunningly ſtuffed the Saddles full of Gold, thinking ſo ſlily to have conveyed it; the Turk laughing at him, took from him his Horſes furniſhed as they were, ſaying, That he which was to go by Water needed no Horſes. So was the covetous Wretch at once quit of the great Wealth which he had in long time evil got. The Captains with the reſt of the Souldiers diſpoiled of the Arms, were conveyed over the River of Danubius, and ſo travelled on foot to Poſſonium, where the Count Salme by the commandment of the King apprehended Liſcanus, Salamanca, and ſome other of the Captains for ſuſpicion of Treaſon, and committed them to ſafe cuſtody, there to anſwer for their cowardly yielding up of the City.

Solyman entreth into Strigonium, and there ſetteth up the Mahometan Superſtition.

Solyman entred into Strigonium the tenth of Auguſt in the year 1543. and there converting Chriſtian Churches into Temples for the Mahometan Superſtition, firſt ſacrificed for his Victory (as he had before done in Buda) and after with all ſpeed ſo ſtrongly fortified the City, as if he would thereby for ever have taken from the Chriſtians all hope of recovering the ſame again, deriding the ſlothful negligence of the Germans, who poſſeſſed of it fourteen years, had neglected all that time to fortifie it. Not long after, Solyman leaving Oſſainus a valiant Captain Governour of Strigonium, and ſending his Tartarian Horſemen to ſpoil the Country on the left hand, as far as Alba Regalis; went himſelf to beſiege the Caſtle of Tatta, called in ancient time Theodota. The Garriſon Souldiers terrified with the loſs of Strigonium, and the ſight of the Turks Army, upon the firſt ſummons yielded the Caſtle without reſiſtance, and were ſo ſuffered quietly to depart. That Caſtle after the manner of the Turkiſh Diſcipline, (who with few and thoſe very ſtrong Holds keep their Provinces in ſubjection) was by Solymans commandment preſently raſed down to the Ground. Torniellus General of the Italians cauſed Hanibal, Captain of the Caſtle, to have his Head ſtruck off for his cowardly yielding up of the place he had taken charge of; thereby to admoniſh others, which had the charge of ſtrong places, not to refuſe an honourable death in defence of their Country, for fear of an ignominious death attending their Cowardiſe.

A cowardly Captain worthily rewarded.

Solyman goeth to Alba Regalis.

The deſcription of Alba Regalis.

The Citizens of Alba will not ſuffer the City to be deſtroyed.

Tatta thus laid in the Duſt, Solyman marched with his Army towards Alba, ſurnamed Regalis, for that the Kings of Hungary by an ancient cuſtom uſed there to be Crowned and alſo buried. Buda, Strigonium, and Alba Regalis, three princial Cities of the Kingdom of Hungary ſtand in manner of a Triangle, almoſt equally diſtant one from another, about a hundred miles in compaſs. Buda and Strigonium are ſituate upon the River of Danubius; but Alba ſtandeth more into the Land, ſtrongly ſeated in the midſt of a great Lake, but not ſo wholſomely, eſpecially in the Summer time, the Winter Waters then decreaſing, and groſs vapours ariſing with the heat of the Sun. From the City through the Mariſh or Lake, unto the firm Land, lie three broad and high Cauſeys (in manner of the ſtreaks of a Cart-wheel) well built, with fair Houſes and Gardens on either ſide, and a broad way in the middle, whereby Men paſs in and out of the City. At the end of every Cauſey toward the Land were caſt up ſtrong Bulwarks, which the Citizens uſed not to watch but in dangerous times of War; ſo that by theſe Bulwarks, the Houſes of the Suburbs ſtanding upon theſe Cauſeys, were ſafe from the danger of the Enemy, the Lake filling up all the ſpaces betwixt the Cauſeys; which, what for the Depth, what for Mud; Flags, and Bulruſhes, growing in it, was not by Horſe or Man to be paſſed through. And the City it ſelf ſtanding in the midſt of the Lake, compaſſed round about with a ſtrong Wall, and a deep Ditch always full of Water, was hardly to be beſieged; for which cauſes a great number of the Country people upon the coming of Solyman, fled into it with their Cattel, as unto a moſt ſure hold. In the City lay in Garriſon two Companies of Germans, and two hundred Horſemen, unto whom were joyned five hundred Hungarian Horſemen, ſuch as in time of Peace lived by Robbing, and are by an infamous name called Uſarcus, unto theſe the Italian Count Torniellus, who with his Italians was come as far as Javarinum, or Rab, ſent four Captains with their Companies, ſuch as were moſt forward in that ſervice; after whom followed Barcotius, Captain of the Kings Guard, with a Company of Horſemen, appointed by the King for General. Who was no ſooner come into the City, but news was brought of Solymans approach. Whereupon he in haſt called together the other Captains, with Birrous then Mayor of the City, and other the chief Citizens to conſult with them, What was beſt to be done for the defence of the City, but eſpecially, Whether the Suburbs of the City, ſtanding upon thoſe three broad Cauſeys, were to be deſtroyed or not? That ſo the City ſtanding in the midſt of the great Mariſh, might both with leſs labour and danger be defended. This queſtion was ſeriouſly debated, and great reaſons alledged; at laſt the Citizens cried out with one voice againſt the the matter, and ſaid, That they would never ſuffer thoſe goodly Suburbs, wherein were ſo many Churches and fair Buildings as might compare with the City it ſelf, to be ſo ſhamefully deſtroyed, to the utter undoing of ſo many rich Citizens; for what could be (ſaid they) more diſhonourable or lamentable, than to the encouraging of the barbarous Enemy, to ſhew ſuch a token of extream fear; and with their own hands to burn and deſtroy thoſe ſtately Buildings, which might by ſtrong hand be well enough defended againſt the Enemy, if they did not play the ſhameful Cowards. Of which opinion with the Citizens was alſo Octavianus Seroſactus an Italian Captain; alledging that both the City and the Suburbs might both with like danger be defended; foraſmuch as they were equally fortified with the benefit of the Mariſh, and if the worſt ſhould happen, the Defendants might yet ſafely enough retire into the City. At laſt ſtanding up as one thruſt forward, both with the publick hard Fortune and his own, ſaid, Valiant Gentlemen, what ſhew will you give of your valour, or what honour ſhall you have of your ſervice, If you ſhall defend ſo famous a City, by deforming of it your ſelves, and cutting off the Suburbs, as it were the Arms thereof, before the danger, upon too haſty deſperation? Verily you ſhall do nothing, either in the ſervice of the King, or the honour of your ſelves, except this City (if God ſo pleaſe) be of you whole and ſound valiantly defended. Upon this Speech they all ariſe, the wiſer ſort and of greateſt experience giving place to the importunity of the ignorant and ſimple. Barcotius himſelf full of care, and overcome with the vain opinion of the greater part, yielded alſo unto that fatal reſolution of ſaving the Suburbs. For it often falleth out, that they, who wiſely weighing dangers in the ballance of reaſon, and do therefore fearfully reſolve of the event of things, and do thereupon oftentimes give more hard and reſolute judgment of things than Men of greater courage; yield neverthleſs to be partakers of other Mens follies, yea even to moſt aſſured death, rather than by maintaining their fearful opinion, to be deemed Cowards. So fell it out with Barcotius the General, who ſetting a good countenance on the matter which nothing liked him, went out to the Souldiers, declaring unto them the reaſons why the Suburbs were to be defended; exhorting them with like valour on their parts to anſwer that honourable reſolution, promiſing to provide whatſoever ſhould be neceſſary for the obtaining of the Victory; aſſuring them of great rewards and preferment, which ſhould by their good ſervice deſerve the ſame. Hereupon the Suburbs were by the common labour of the Souldiers and the Citizens quickly fortified, the great Ordnance in places convenient orderly planted, and Watch and Ward kept by the Captains and their Companies by their turns day and night. But the Turks drawing near to the City, bent their Forces only againſt the Suburbs of the Gate leading towards Buda; for that they perceived the Mariſh was in that place drier than the other, and the ſandy Ground more unfit for the making of Bulwarks and other Fortifications for the ſafety of the Defendants, than in other places where the ground yielded better Turf. Barcotius perceiving the Enemies purpoſe, drew all the Italians and Germans from the other Gates into the Suburbs of the Gate of Buda, leaving the Country-people which were fled into the City, and the Citizens, in their places. At the firſt coming of the Turks, the Hungarian and German Horſemen, with the Italian Footmen, ſallied out of the Suburbs, and after certain light skirmiſhes retired. Which manner of fight was continued by the ſpace of three days without any great harm done on either ſide; for the Captains had warily commanded, That the Souldiers ſhould not adventure out too far. But after that Solyman himſelf was come and had with the multitude of his Tents beſet the City far and near, to the terror of the beholders, the Chriſtians ſhut up all the Gates, and ſallied out no more. Which thing cauſed the wild Hungarian Uſarous (uſed to open skirmiſhes) to provide for themſelves in time, and not to ſuffer themſelves to be coupt up (as they termed) within the Walls of the City; ſo for faſhion ſake, asking leave to be gone (who were not againſt their wills to be ſtaied) they by night departed, being not to be entreated by the General or Citizens to ſtay, and by known ways eſcaped through the Woods from the Enemy. In the mean time the Turks were come with their winding Trenches within ſhot, and with their Arrows and ſmall Shot ſo ſcoured the top of the Bulwark, that no Man could there poſſibly appear but he was ſtraight wounded; and ſuch was the fury of the great Artillery; that it had in ſhort time battered in ſunder the Planks and Timber which kept in the ſandy Mould, whereof the Fortreſs was made, more for ſhew than for ſtrength; in ſuch ſort, that the great Shot flying quite through all, ſlew and wounded many that were a far off; in which diſtreſs of the Defendants, the Turks Aſapi with ſmall danger filled up the Ditches of the Bulwark, and divers places of the Mariſh with Earth and Wood, which they brought continually from a Wood thereby with ſix hundred Waggons, ſo that in the ſpace of twelve days they had made a firm way for them to paſs over upon, both to the Bulwark and the Suburbs; a work before thought impoſſible to have been performed.

The Turks with incredible labour fill up the Ditches and Lake, and by plain force aſſault the Bulwark of the Suburbs towards Buda.

The Ditches thus filled up, the Turks valiantly came on, ſeeking by plain force to enter the Bulwark. Firſt came on the Aſapi, whom as Men of leaſt worth the Turks Captains uſe to thruſt to the firſt danger; after whom followed the Horſemen, now on foot, with Swords and Targets, or elſe their Horſemens Staves, covering the Janizaries, who upon their Knees with their Harquebuſiers ſore gauled the Defendants. This hot fight endured above three hours with equal hope and courage; but the Turks ſtill relieved with freſh Souldiers, repulſed the Chriſtians, and gained the uttermoſt Bulwark; nevertheleſs the Italian Fort was that day valiantly defended, the very Women and Religious helping to defend it; in which aſſault a tall Hungarian Woman, whoſe courage far exceeded the weakneſs of her Sex, thruſting in amongſt the Souldiers upon the top of the Fort, with a great Sythe in her hand at one blow ſtruck off two of the Turks Heads, as they were climbing up the Rampier.

A notable Act of an Hungarian Woman.

This aſſault was given the nine and twentieth of Auguſt, on which day the Turks had before taken Belgrade, and alſo ſlain King Lewis at the Battel of Mobachz; and were therefore after their ſuperſtitious manner in obſervation of their fortunate and unfortuate days, in good hope to have then taken the City; wherein they were much deceived, being not able at that time further to enter, but enforced again to retire. Wherewith Solyman offended, ſent for Abraham, Achomates, and Halis (the chief Captains in that aſſault) into his Tent, and reproved them ſharply, for that the Bulwark being ſo valiantly and fortunately won, they had not with more courage proſecuted the Victory, but cowardly (as he thought) given it over, being in a manner already won; and therefore with ſtern countenance commanded them to prepare all things ready within three days for a freſh Aſſault, and never to return unto him, except they did win the City. Whereunto the Captains anſwered no more (for were they never ſo guiltleſs, they might not before him ſtand to excuſe themſelves) but that they would in ſhort time accompliſh his deſire. Wherefore having made all ready, and encouraged the Souldiers to this laſt Aſſault, they terribly aſſailed the Rampiers, and brought a great fear upon the Defendants; for taking the benefit of a thick Miſt (as it oftentimes chanceth in mariſh grounds) they were with great ſilence (contrary to their manner) got up to the top of their Rampiers, and come to handy blows, before they were well diſcovered. The Fight was for the time fierce and terrible; but the Janizaries prevailing, at length put the Germans to flight, and after them the Italians alſo, ſo that now well was he that could run faſteſt towards the City. But that their haſty Flight little availed, when as they were to paſs out by a little narrow Gate in manner of a Wicket; and they in the City, without regard of them that fled, had plucked up the Draw-Bridge over the Ditch. For naturally it cometh oftentimes to paſs, that the fear of the preſent danger, without bluſhing excuſeth our foul dealing. So the barbarous and fierce Enemy purſuing the flying Chriſtians at the Heels all the length of thoſe Suburbs with moſt cruel execution, many notable men, ſome fighting, ſome flying, were there ſlain; amongſt whom was Octavianus Seroſactus, Author of the evil Counſel whereof inſued that calamity. Barcotius the General flying on Horſeback to the little Gate, which was not to be paſſed through, and crying in vain to them that fled, to have the great Gate opened, was by the coming of the Janizaries ſlain; whoſe Head and right Hand full of rich Rings, was by the barbarous Enemy carried about in deriſion upon a Launce. The reſt of the flying multitude finding the little Gate ſhut up with the Bodies of the dead, and the Bridge maliciouſly drawn up, deſperately threw themſelves into the deep Ditch; where ſome of them labouring to ſwim out, were caught by the Legs and Arms by other that could not ſwim, and both together drowned. Some hardly crauling over, were ſhot in the Head or Back with the Turks Arrows; otherſome ſticking faſt in the Mud, were as if it had been in ſport ſhot to death by the Turks; ſome few there were which got over, and were ſaved.

The Suburbs of Alba Regalis won by the Turks.

The miſerable ſlaughter of the flying Chriſtians.

There was yet left in the City the General of the German Horſemen, and Uſcaſades of Cremona, an Italian Captain; theſe two gathering the remainder of the Souldiers which were left, placed them upon the Walls; but the Citizens were ſtruck with ſuch a fear, that they could not tell which way to turn themſelves. For now Birrous the Maior, with the Aldermen and other chief Citizens, ſeeing the ſlaughter of the Italians and Germans, were ſo overcome with deſpair, that they thought no hope of their well doing was to be repoſed in making of any farther reſiſtance, but only in the mercy of Solyman. Wherefore Birrous ſpake unto the Turks from the Wall, That he might ſafely ſend Embaſſadors to Solyman, to intreat with him upon reaſonable conditions, for the yielding up of the City; which thing Achomates eaſily granted. With theſe Embaſſadors for the Citizens, went alſo the Generals of the German Horſemen, and Carolus Rufus an Italian Captain (who of all others had born himſelf moſt valiantly in all the Aſſaults, to the great admiration of the Turks) to intreat for the ſafety and liberty of the Souldiers. The Embaſſadors being brought before the great Baſſaes, requeſted, That yielding the City, the Citizens might injoy their Lives and Liberty; whereunto they were ſo anſwered, as that it ſeemed they ſhould not all be pardoned; yet was the general fear well diminiſhed, for that the puniſhment reſpected but ſome few. Rufus was courteouſly entertained; and eaſily obtained, that the Italians might in ſafety depart with Bag and Baggage to Vienna; the like grace alſo had the General of the Germans for his Souldiers. Solyman the Eunuch Baſſa, offered unto Rufus honourable entertainment, if he would have ſerved Solyman; which when he refuſed as bound to King Ferdinand by Oath, in honour of his Valour he gave him a rich Cloak wrought with Flowers of Gold. The Embaſſadors returning into the City, and telling how they had ſped, delivered the Citizens of a great fear. Shortly after the City being yielded, Achomates by open Proclamation in the Market-place, commanded the Italians and Germans to make themſelves ready againſt the next day to depart, and to take good heed that no Hungarian went with them; he alſo ſtraitly charged the Citizens to keep their Houſes until the ſtrange Souldiers were departed. At the time appointed, the Italians and Germans ſet forward, conducted by Homares with a Company of the Turks Horſemen, who faithfully defended them againſt the Tartars, running up and down the Country after the Spoil; neither was any thing taken from them but their Dags, which the German Horſemen after a new faſhion carried at their Saddel Bows; theſe the Turks greatly deſired, delighted with the novelty of the invention, to ſee them ſhot off with a Firelock without a Match. But after the departure of Homares, they were in their travel ſet upon by the Hungarians, with whom they had many hot skirmiſhes, and had hardly eſcaped unſpoiled, had they not been reſcued by the Kings Souldiers lying in Garriſon in the Caſtles as they paſſed along the Country. The few which remained, after many troubles came at laſt to Vienna, more like Ghoſts than Men.

Embaſſadors ſent to Solyman to entreat upon conditions for the yielding of the City.

Solyman entring quietly into the City, firſt viſited the Sepulchers of the Hungarian Kings, and gave out Proclamation, That the Hungarians ſhould fear of him no harm; for that he was not come to conquer them, but to deliver them from the Bondage of the Germans, and ſo to reſtore again that entire Kingdom unto Stephen the right Heir of King John. But within three or four days after, he called out the chief Citizens into a Field not far off, wherein the Bodies of condemned men were wont to be buried, as if he would have there taken an Oath of their Fidelity; whither, after they were all aſſembled in the beſt manner they could, as to ſome ſolemn Feaſt, the cruel Tyrant (without regard of his Faith or Promiſe) cauſed them all to be ſlain. Howbeit ſome report, that he cauſed them only to be put to death which bare office in the City, at ſuch time as they revolted from the Obedience of the Queen and the Infant King, unto Ferdinand, and had then brought in German Souldiers; and that he ſent the reſt into exile to Buda and Belgrade. So Solyman leaving Balibeius Governor of Alba Regalis, and Mahometes ſometime Governor of Belgrade, his Lieutenant General for the whole Government of that Kingdom, returned again toward Conſtantinople (Winter now beginning to approach) after he had that Summer won Strigonium and Alba Regalis, two of the chiefeſt Cities of Hungary. All this while King Ferdinand had raiſed no Power worth the ſpeaking of, to withſtand ſo mighty an Enemy; only at Vienna lay ſeven thouſand Germans and four thouſand Italians, at ſuch time as Solyman departed from Alba Regalis, which were ſhortly after diſcharged.

Solyman entreth into Alba Regalis.

Solyman returneth to Conſtantinople.

Whiles Solyman thus lay at the Siege of Alba Regalis, he ſent his Tartarian Horſemen which ſerved him to ſmall purpoſe in the Siege, to ſpoil the Country round about; theſe ſavage People doing much harm, were in divers places circumvented by the Hungarians, and about three thouſand of them ſlain; one of them being taken Priſoner, had found in his Knapſack half a Child of about two years old, the loathſome remainder of his barbarous feeding.

Barbaruſſa all this while lying with his Fleet (as we have before ſaid) at Marſeilles, fretted exceedingly, that he had to his diſhonour undertaken ſo long a Voyage by Sea, to pleaſure him which was not able (as he ſaid) to direct his own deſigns to any certain reſolution, but ſhamefully ſuffered the beſt time of the year for ſervice, negligently to paſs away without any thing doing; the blame whereof would (as he ſaid) be imputed to him at Conſtantinople; and that Solyman, who deſired to aid the King his Friend and Confederate, and by all means to annoy his Enemies, would take in evil part to have it reported, that he had with ſo great charge ſet out ſo great a Fleet, and ſo far off, to help his Friend hardly beſet with his Enemies, and to have done nothing; beſides that, he took on like a Turk, that he who in time of ſervice never uſed negligently to let ſlip the leaſt opportunity, ſhould now blemiſh his former credit and eſtimation, by lying ſtill all that Summer in the Harbor of Marſeilles, where his Souldiers grew lazy with doing nothing. Wherefore Polinus going to the King, told him of the proud Turks great diſcontentment for lack of ememployment; and returning to Barbaruſſa, brought order from the King, that he ſhould lay Siege to Nice a City of Provence, then holden by the Duke of Savoy. This City ſtanding upon the Sea, was by one of the French Kings for a great ſum of Mony pawned unto the Duke; which Mony, King Francis had many times offered to have repaid, but could never get the City out of the Dukes hands. Unto which ſervice, the French King ſent alſo his Fleet of two and twenty Gallies and eighteen Ships, wherein were embarked eight thouſand Footmen, and Victual for many days. This Fleet departing from Marceilles, keeping cloſe by the Shore, came to the Port called Monoc; whither two days after came Barbaruſſa alſo with an hundred and fifty Gallies. From thence Polinus by commandment from the King writ to the State of Genoa, That they ſhould not fear of that great Fleet any Hoſtility, which was not to hurt any but them of Nice, and not them neither if they would yield themſelves. For more aſſurance whereof, he obtained of the Turks divers Genoa Captives, which had long time been chained in their Gallies, and courteouſly ſet them at liberty, and ſent them home without ranſom. After that, he friendly exhorted the Citizens of Nice, to yield themſelves again unto their ancient and lawful Prince, renowned for his Bounty and Power; rather than to adventure their State to all extremities for that poor and diſtreſſed Duke, who between the Emperor and the French King, diſpoiled of the greateſt part of his Dominions, ſaw no other end of his miſeries, but to leave that little which yet remained, as a Prey to the one or to the other, that ſhould firſt lay hand thereon. Whereunto the Magiſtrates of the Town anſwered, That they knew no other Prince or Sovereign but Charles their Duke; wherefore he ſhould deſiſt farther to ſolicite them by Letters or Meſſengers, whom they would make no other account of but as of their Enemies. Wherefore the Frenchmen and Turks landing their Forces, laid Siege to the Town in three places. The Citizens had but a little before newly fortified their Walls, by the direction of Paulus Simeon, Captain of the Caſtle, and one of the Knights of the Rhodes, a man of great experience; who long before taken at Sea by Pyrats, had ſometime ſerved Barbaruſſa, and therefore perſwaded the Citizens as reſolute men to withſtand the Turks. Which, that they ſhould more conſtantly perform, he took their Wives and Children and weaker ſort of the People into the Caſtle; and from thence furniſhed the Citizens with all things neceſſary for their defence. The City was at once in divers places battered by the Turks and French, both by Sea and Land; ſo that at laſt the Turks had beaten down one of the new built Bulwarks, and made ſo fair a Breach, that with their Enſigns diſplaied, they attempted to have entred; whoſe forwardneſs Leo Strozza (then ſerving the French King with a Band of Italians) imitating, ſought to have entred alſo; but the Citizens ſtanding valiantly upon their defence, manfully repulſed both the Turks and Italians, and cauſed them with loſs to retire. In this Aſſault were ſlain about an hundred Turks; and of Strozza his Souldiers two and twenty. Preſently after, Barbaruſſa with all his force began a freſh Battery, in ſuch terrible manner, that the Citizens ſeeing their Walls in divers places opened, and the few Souldiers they had, ſore wounded, and no hope to be in convenient time relieved, began to parly with the French General from the Wall, concerning the yielding up of the City; upon condition, that they might in all reſpects live under the French King as they had done under the Duke; for performance whereof the General gave them his Faith. But Polinus fearing leſt the Turks ſhould violate this compoſition, and for grief of the loſs of their Fellows, or for hope of the Spoil break into the City, entreated Barbaruſſa to recal his Souldiers, and to cauſe them to go aboard his Gallies. For which cauſe not long after, the Janizaries, as men deceived of their hoped Prey, were about to have ſlain both Polinus and Strozza, as they came from talking with Barbaruſſa.

Nice in Provence beſieged by the French and the Turks.

The Citizens crave parly, and after yield the City.

The Caſtle beſieged.

The City thus yielded, they began to conſult for the taking of the Caſtle; the performance whereof conſiſted firſt in the aſſailing of the Caſtle it ſelf, and then in defending of the City from the ſuddain ſallies of them in the Caſtle; and likewiſe in defending of them which beſieged the Caſtle, ſo that no Enemy ſhould come to raiſe the Siege; of which two things, Barbaruſſa put the French to choice which they would take, ſhewing himſelf ready either to beſiege the Caſtle, or to keep the Field. The French ſtanding in doubt of which to make choice, the proud old Turk ſcorning their ſlow reſolution, and them alſo, as men unfit for the ready accompliſhment of any Martial exploit; cauſed ſeven Pieces of Battery, whereof two were of wonderful greatneſs, to be placed in a trice in a place moſt convenient, and the ſame quickly intrenched and fortified, to the great admiration of the French; with which Pieces he had quickly beaten down the Battlements of the Walls, and Centinel Houſes, ſo that no man was able to ſhew himſelf upon the Walls. The Frenchmen likewiſe on the other ſide did with their great Ordnance continually batter the Caſtle; but with long ſhooting they came to ſuch want of Shot and Pouder, that Polinus was glad to requeſt, that he might either borrow or buy ſome of Barbaruſſa; whereat the Turk fretted and fumed exceedingly, That they ſhould in their own Country ſtand in need of his Proviſion, who at Marceilles had better fraighted their Ships with Wine, than with neceſſaries for the Wars. For the rough and ſevere old Turk could not forbear to taunt them, and oftentimes complained, that he was deluded with the hope of great matters which Polinus had promiſed at Conſtantinople; and that in ſuch a rage, that he would threaten to lay hands upon Polinus, who had brought him from Conſtantinople thither, whereas he muſt either loſe his honour, or having ſpent his Shot and Powder, expoſe himſelf and his Fleet to all dangers. Wherefore being exceeding angry with the French, he ſuddainly called a Counſel of his Captains, and other chief Officers; giving it out, That he would preſently return to Conſtantinople, ſeeing that among theſe cowardly and unskilful men (as it pleaſed him to term them) he found nothing ready or according to promiſe. Yet for all that, when he had chafed his fill, by the fair intreaties and large promiſes of the French General and Polinus together, the Wayward old man was perſwaded to change his mind, and to continue the Siege. But he was yet ſcarcely well pacified, and his mind ſet again upon the Siege, but Letters were intercepted from the great Captain Alphonſus Vaſtius, to Paulus Captain of the Caſtle, wherein he requeſted him to hold out a while againſt the Enemy, till that he, who had already ſent before his light Horſemen, might come alſo himſelf with his Men at Arms, who were upon the way alongſt the Alps by the Sea ſide, and would in two days with the ſlaughter of the Turks put him and his Caſtle out of all fear and danger. Which thing once bruted in the Camp, ſuch a great and ſuddain fear came upon the Turks and Frenchmen (the night following the more to terrifie them proving by chance very rainy and tempeſtuous) that they all forſook their Trenches and great Ordnance, and laying down their Weapons, by narrow Paths climbing over the top of the high Mountain, came down headlong to the Sea ſide to the Fleet. But the day appearing, and no Enemy to be ſeen, they were aſhamed of that they had done, and came again to the Siege. Not long after, when as the Caſtle in all mens Judgment was hardly to be battered, and ſtanding upon a firm Rock, was not but in long time with hard labour and doubtful ſucceſs to be undermined, it was generally thought good to raiſe the Siege. The Turks upon their departure brake into the City, and when they had taken the Spoil thereof, ſet it on fire.

The Turks and French give over the Caſtle of Nice, and ſet fire on the City.

Barbaruſſa retiring with his Fleet to Antipolis, came to anchor at the Iſland Lerina, called of the Mariners Margarita; at which time Vaſtius and the Duke of Savoy, with Auria his Fleet arrived at Villa Franca; in the entrance of which Haven, the Gally wherein Vaſtius went, was like to have been loſt. Four other Gallies by force of ſuddain Tempeſt were driven upon the Rocks, and ſo ſuddainly beaten in pieces with the Surge of the Sea, that the Gally Slaves had not leiſure to ſtrike off their Irons, but were there all drowned, and all the Ordnance loſt. Polinus underſtanding this diſtreſs of the Enemy, ſent one Petrus Angelus to Barbaruſſa, to ſhew him the occaſion offered, and to perſwade him with all ſpeed to haſt thither with his Fleet, as to a moſt aſſured Victory. Barbaruſſa ſeemed to like well of the motion, and promiſed to go, yet he moved not, letted as it was thought with the contrary Wind, which then blew hard at Eaſt, and with the roughneſs of the Sea. But the Wind being fallen, and the Sea become calm, and he contrary to his wonted manner making no haſte, ſet ſlowly forward, and being a little on his way, came again to anchor, and went no further; the Sanzacks and other Captains firſt marvelling, and afterward laughing thereat, ſcoffingly ſaid, That Barbaruſſa did but reaſon to deal kindly with Auria, as his Brother and Friend of his own Profeſſion, for that he had ſome years before received the like Friendſhip at his hands, in letting him eſcape at Hippona, which he now honeſtly paid him again. Whereunto Barbaruſſa both then and afterwards at Conſtantinople anſwered no otherwiſe, but, that he being an old Commander, and half blind, ſaw more in the matter than all thoſe green Captains with their ſharp ſight. Not long after, he returned again to Marceilles, and put into the Haven of Tolon, called in ancient time Taurenta. Vaſtius and the Duke coming to Nice, commended the Captain of the Caſtle, and wondering at the cunning manner of the Turks Fortifications, preferred them in that point before the Chriſtians. Barbaruſſa lying with his Fleet at Tolon, and by the Kings Officers entertained with all poſſible Courteſie, delivered five and twenty Gallies to Salec the famous Pyrate, and Aſſanes his nigh Kinſman; who paſſing the Bay of Narbona, rifled certain Towns in Spain ſtanding upon the Sea-Coaſt, and about the Promontory of Venus (called of the Mariners Creum) took great prize; and in the Haven of Palamos took one Merchant Ship and a Gally; with which Prey they paſſed over to Algiers as they were commanded, there to winter, and with the firſt of the Spring to return again to Barbaruſſa in Provence. That Winter Barbaruſſa repairing his Fleet, was furniſhed with many neceſſaries by the Genowayes, and eſpecially by Auria himſelf, who under the colour of redeeming of Priſoners, willingly furniſhed the Turk with ſuch things as he wanted; for although he profeſſed himſelf one of the Emperors Captains, yet would he not ſhew an Enemies mind, by the unſeaſonable denial of a little Sea Furniture, leſt in ſo doing he ſhould have hurt his Native Country of Genoa, which he ſaw then ſubject to the injury of ſo great a Fleet ſo nigh at Hand. But leave we now Barbaruſſa to winter in Provence, and with the courſe of time turn a little out of the way, to ſee in Muleaſſes King of Tunes, the ſmall aſſurance the greateſt have in higheſt place of worldly honour.

Muleaſſes fearing the coming of Barbaruſſa, departeth from Tunes into Italy, to crave aid of Charles the Emperor.

This Mahometan King, once before thruſt out of his Kingdom by Barbaruſſa, and reſtored again by Charles the Emperor (as is before declared) hearing of his coming with this great Fleet, and imagining nothing leſs than that he ſhould come to the aid of the moſt Chriſtian King, doubted (not without cauſe) leſt it was prepared againſt himſelf. Beſides that, divers great Cities of his Kingdom, namely Conſtantina, Mahemedia, and Mahometa (called in ancient time Cyrtha) Leptis and Adrumentum, were then holden by the Turks, Barbaruſſas Favorites. Wherefore fearing the worſt, about the ſame time that Barbaruſſa was ſailing alongſt the Coaſt of Italy, he paſſed over into Sicily to have met the Emperor at Genoa, and to have obtained of him greater Aid againſt the Turks. At his departure out of Africk, he committed the tuition of his Kingdom to ſuch valiant men as he ſuppoſed would have been unto him moſt faithful: Firſt, he appointed Mahometes (then Maniphet) to govern the City, and Corſus (otherwiſe called Fares) his old Servant to keep the Caſtle; leaving Mahometes his Brother, and Fares his Son, with Touarres a Spaniard (Captain of the Caſtle of Guletta) as Pledges, the one of his Brothers, the other of his Fathers Faith; but unto Amida his Son he committed the leading of his men of War for the defence of his Kingdom againſt the Turks and Numidians. As he was paſſing out of Sicilia to have met the Emperor at Genoa, he was by contrary Coſtly Diſhes.

Winds driven firſt to Cajeta, and afterward to Naples, where he was by the Viceroy honourably entertained, and a Houſe appointed for him richly furniſhed; the Neopolitans wondring at the ſtrange Attire of the People, with the manner of their feeding, and curious plenty of all manner of ſweet Perfumes; for into every Diſh they put in Odors of exceeding price, ſo that it was well known, that a Peacock and two Pheaſants dreſſed after the manner of the Kings Kitchen, coſt above an hundred Ducats; ſo that not only the Dining Chamber, when they were carved up, but all the Houſe was ſo filled with the ſtrange and fragrant ſmell, that all they that dwelt near thereabouts were partakers of that unuſual and delicate Perfume. From Naples he was about to have travelled by Land unto the Emperor, being then in conference with the Pope at Buzetum, (fearing to adventure the Sea, poſſeſſed by the Enemies Fleet) had not the Emperor by his Letters willed him to ſtay ſtill where he was.

Amida riſeth againſt Muleaſſes his Father, and uſurps the Kingdom of Tunes.

But whilſt he made his aboad at Naples, and carefully attended what Courſe Barbaruſſa would take, (who furniſhed with ſo great a Fleet, was departed from Nice diſappointed of his purpoſe) he was by certain Meſſengers advertiſed out of Africa, That Amida his Son was riſen up againſt him, and poſſeſſing himſelf of the Kingdom, had ſlain his Captains, polluted his Wives, and taken the Caſtle of Tunes. With which news he being exceedingly troubled, determined without delay to paſs over into Africk, and though late, yet as he might to remedy his domeſtical troubles, in hope to oppreſs that Rebellion in the beginning, and his Son alſo, before he could gather any ſtrength to reſt upon. Wherefore he with all the haſte he could opened his Coffers and entertained Souldiers, the Viceroy giving leave to all ſuch baniſhed Men as would, to come and give their names to paſs over as Souldiers into Africk; upon report whereof, ſuch a number of Malefactors and condemned perſons came flocking to Naples, that it was thought a ſufficient Army might have been made of ſuch kind of men; every one of them chuſing rather to enter into Pay, and blot out the infamy of baniſhment, and prove the fortune of Wars, than to live wandring up and down the Woods and in danger every hour to be hanged. Of theſe infamous Men, one Joannes Baptiſta Lofredius (a Man well born, but of a fierce and covetous diſpoſition) undertook the leading; he covenanting with Muleaſſes to have three months Pay before hand, levied a thouſand and eight hundred Men, which he preſently ſhipped, and keeping the greateſt part of their Pay to himſelf, paſſed over with the King into Africk, and landed at Guletta.

Muleaſſes turneth into Africk to Guletta.

But how Amida roſe up againſt his Father, and what was the end of that bloody Rebellion, ſhall not be amiſs briefly to rehearſe. There were certain Noblemen of great Authority about Amida when Muleaſſes departed, which at their pleaſure ruled the young Prince, who eaſily hearkned unto their Counſel, and followed the ſame; the chief of theſe was one Mahometes Son of Bohamer, who in the Reign of Mahometes, Muleaſſes his Father, was Maniphet, whom Muleaſſes (poſſeſſed of the Kingdom) put ſhamefully to death by cutting off his Privities, becauſe he had by haſty Marriage deceived him of Rhabamana a Maiden of incomparable Beauty, the Daughter of Abderomen Captain of the Caſtle, whom he moſt paſſionately loved; for which cruel fact, Mahometes his Son had long time conceived a deadly hatred againſt Muleaſſes, which he had many years diſſembled, that he might as occaſion ſerved be the more cruelly revenged. Next unto him was another Mahometes ſirnamed Adulzes, whom Muleaſſes was wont commonly to call his worſt Servant. Theſe two with a few others conſpiring together, gave it out, that Muleaſſes was dead at Naples, and before his death had moſt irreligeouſly (as they accounted it) revolted to the Chriſtian Religion. With which report they perceiving Amida moved, came unto him and perſwaded him quickly to enter into his Fathers Seat, leſt Mahometes his younger Brother (then lying in hoſtage with the Chriſtians at Guletta) ſhould by the favour and help of Touarres, whoſe Garriſon was ever ready, be preferred before him. For Mahometes was eighteen years old, reſembling his Grandfather in Name, Favour, and Diſpoſition, and therefore of the Citizens of Tunes beſt beloved. Wherefore Amida came in poſt haſte out of the Camp to Tunes, to lay firſt hand upon his Fathers Kingdom. The People which as yet had heard nothing of the Kings death, received him with doubtful countenance; and as many ſtood marvelling that he was ſo raſhly come into the City without his Fathers commandment, Mahometes (appointed by Muleaſſes to govern the City) came out and ſharply reproved him as guilty of high Treaſon, perſwading him to return again into the Camp; and ſeeing him ſtay, by force of multitude thruſt him out of the City.

Amida thruſt out of Tunes.

Amida deceived of his expectation, got him out of the way into the pleaſant Country of Martia between Utica and the ruins of old Carthage. But Mahometes Governor of the City, after he had repulſed Amida, got him with all ſpeed by Water to Touarres at Guletta, to know of him more aſſuredly, if any ſuch evil News were brought from Sicily of the death of the King; and to complain of the raſhneſs and intollerable preſumption of Amida. Where ſtaying ſomewhat long in diſcourſing with the Captain, and afterwards returning to the City, he was ſuſpected to have practiſed with the Captain to make Mahometes (the Pledge in Guletta) King in his Fathers ſtead; for ſo the common voice went. The Moors are by nature a faithleſs People, haſty, ſuſpitious, deſirous of News, which true or falſe, they for the time interpret as ſerveth beſt their Factions, whereunto they are exceedingly given. So at the firſt there roſe in the City a doubtful rumor of the making of a new King; the ſuſpicion whereof more and more increaſing, ſet all the City on an uprore. By occaſion whereof, certain of the Citizens, to whom the very name of Muleaſſes was odious, ſpeedily certified Amida (then in the Gardens of Martia, ſighing and grieving at his hard Fortune) how all ſtood, and that now was the time to do himſelf good.

Amida returneth, and poſſeſſeth the Kingdom.

He revived with that unexpected News, and encouraged by the perſwaſion of Bohamer and Adulzes, and other his Followers; reſolved to take hold upon that good offer of Fortune, which would not always frown, and to follow his good hap. So in haſte returning to Tunes, and entring in at the Gate, which he then found open, ran preſently to the Governors Houſe, and finding him not at home, cruelly ſlew all his Houſhold, and with his bloody company went preſently to the Caſtle; where Fares the Captain ſeeking to have kept him out, and boldly laid hands upon his Horſes Bridle to have thruſt him back, was by a deſperate Ethiopian, one of Amida his Followers, thruſt through with a Sword and ſlain; over whoſe Body yet ſprawling, Amida forcing his Horſe, brake into the Caſtle with his Friends, and finding Mahometes Governor of the City, preſently ſlew him alſo. And ſo by this means Amida in the ſpace of an hour (a little before, a man in deſpair) obtained the City, the Caſtle, and the Kingdom together. After that, he murthred his younger Brethren, and embrued with blood, without ſhame polluted his Fathers Concubines. Muleaſſes landed (as we have before ſaid) at Guletta, with ſuch Forces as he had brought with him out of Italy; was adviſed by Touarres the Spaniard, not to adventure with ſuch an handful of Men to go to Tunes, before he were well aſſured of the good diſpoſition of the Citizens towards him; and was the more earneſt with Lofredius not to go, becauſe the Viceroy had expreſly written, That he ſhould in no caſe go any further than Guletta, except the King according to his promiſe had a good ſtrength of the Numidians to joyn with him. But certain of the Noblemen amongſt the Moors, which under the colour of Friendſhip were fled out of the City, and had after the ſolemn manner of their Nation put their Swords unto their Throats, and ſworn to be faithful unto him, wonderfully prickt forward both the King and Lofredius (too haſty of themſelves to their own Deſtiny) bearing them in hand, That Amida upon the firſt ſight of his Father would forſake the City, and betake himſelf to flight. So without more ſtaying, Muleaſſes with Enſign diſplaied ſet forward towards Tunes, Lofredius chearfully following him; Touarres requeſting them in vain to beware of the Moors Treachery. Muleaſſes marching ſtill forward, was come ſo nigh the City; that they might from the Walls deſcry him; when ſuddainly a ſtrong Troop of Moors ſallied out of the Gate with a terrible Cry, and fiercely aſſailed him; whom the Kings Horſemen valiantly received, many falling on both ſides. Muleaſſes in this hot ſkirmiſh fighting couragiouſly againſt his Enemies, was wounded in the Face, and bled exceedingly; which ſo diſcouraged them about him, that they doubting of his life, turned their Backs and fled; when preſently a wonderful number of Horſe and Foot ſuddainly iſſuing out of the Olive Gardens, had beſet Lofredius and his Souldiers round; upon whom the Italians diſcharged certain Field-Pieces; but after they had once diſcharged them, they had no leiſure to charge them again; for the barbarous Enemy came on ſo thick and ſo faſt, that the Italians ſeeing themſelves too weak, and compaſſed in round, let fall their Weapons as Men diſcouraged, and caſt themſelves into the Lake, ſo by ſwimming and taking hold of the little Boats, to ſave themſelves from the Enemies Sword; which Boats ſtood thoſe diſtreſſed Men in great ſtead; for being furniſhed with ſmall Pieces, they did beat back the Moors, who eagerly purſued them even unto the Lake with their Horſes. Lofredius as a Man amazed with the ſuddain coming of the Enemy, took the Lake with his Horſe, and was there unhorſed by the Enemy and ſlain, as were divers with him. Some few there were that fought couragiouſly, chuſing rather honourably to die in the midſt of their Enemies, than ſhamefully to be ſtrangled in the ſtinking Lake. Muleaſſes ſoiled with his own Blood and with the Duſt, flying amongſt the reſt, was known and taken; nothing more bewraying than his odoriferous Perfumes. In this conflict a thouſand three hundred Italians were loſt; the reſt which eſcaped, Touares relieved, and ſhortly after ſhipped them over into Sicily, from whence they travelled home to Naples, but ſo poor, as well ſhewed the miſery of their Fortune. Amida having thus obtained the Victory, was more careful of nothing than to make his Father unfit for Government, which he did by the cutting the ſight of both his Eyes with a hot Penknife; the like Cruelty he uſed upon Nahazar and Abdallas his Brethren, then taken with his Father. After that, he certified Touarres Captain of Guletta, That he had taken a few Youths Priſoners, which he would deliver unto him; and that he had bereft his Father of his ſight, who had deſerved a worſe puniſhment, as he that had long before done the like to his Brethren; but had yet left him his life, as an example to other Tyrants, and to ſhew that he dealt not altogether unmercifully with ſo perfideous a Father; laſt of all, he confirmed (upon certain conditions) the ſame League which his Father had with him; which he well ſaw was to great purpoſe, eſpecially in the newneſs of his Kingdom. Neither did Touarres refuſe the ſame as ſtanding with his preſent profit; for upon this agreement, Amida was to give him certain Mony to pay his Souldiers, and to deliver him the Priſoners he had taken, with the Enſigns and Body of Lofredius. For more aſſurance whereof he gave Sebites his Son, then nine years old, in Hoſtage; yet upon condition, that if an aſſured Peace could not be agreed upon, but that they muſt needs enter into War, then Touarres ſhould forthwith reſtore him his Son Sebites in ſafety. Theſe Capitulations, although they ſeemed not unreaſonable, and were of them well liked; yet Touarres thought it not altogether agreeing with the honour of the Emperor, that he ſhould enjoy the Kingdom, who by moſt horrible Treaſon and deteſtable Villany had thruſt himſelf thereinto without the Emperors leave. Wherefore he entred into a new device to call in the rightful Heir, who might at the Emperors pleaſure (offended with the injury done by Amida) reign in Tunes.

Amida put out his Fathers and Brethrens Eyes.

There was an exile amongſt the Numidians one Abdamelech, ever ſince the time that Roſcetes fled to Barbaruſſa. Him, becauſe he was Muleaſſes natural Brother, Touarres ſent for, putting him in hope of the Kingdom, ſupported by Anemſeba a great Prince amongſt the Numidians, who had all that long time courteouſly entertained him. Neither was Abdamelech ſlow to accept the occaſion preſented, eſpecially incouraged thereunto by the Numidian Prince his good Friend, and the predictions of the Aſtrologers, who had foretold him, That he ſhould die King of Tunes. Which vain kind of Divination having in it no manner of aſſurance, yet cauſeth great minds oftentimes to undertake great attempts beyond reaſon, which falling out with more hap than they were with reaſon foretold, giveth ſome credit to that Vanity, and cauſeth thoſe cold Prophets to be of ſome accounted as great Wizards. And to work this feat, ſuch a time was offered, as a better could not be wiſhed; for Amida having ſet all things in order as he pleaſed in the City, and caſting no peril, was gone to Biſerta, to take order for his Cuſtoms, which was there great upon Fiſhing. Wherefore Touarres to keep his promiſe, ſent back Sebites, Amida's Son, in a Boat to Tunes, and received Abdamelech; who travelling moſt part by night, was ſecretly come to Guletta, and there reſting himſelf and his Horſes a few hours, to prevent the fame of his coming, poſted in haſte with a Troop of his Numidian Followers to Tunes, and paſſing through the City, went directly to the Caſtle, which he entred without reſiſtance of the Warders, ſuppoſing him to have been Amida come from Biſerta; for Abdamelech had after the manner of the Moors covered his Face with a Skarf, as if it had been to have kept him from the Sun and the Duſt, and by that happy ſlight got into the Caſtle before it was known who he was. The Warders perceiving their error, began as Men amazed now too late to betake themſelves to their Weapons, for in making reſiſtance they were quickly ſlain by the Numidians which came in with Abdamelech; who thus poſſeſſed of the Caſtle (the chief ſtrength of that Kingdom) let in his Friends, which were many in the City, by whom he was preſently ſaluted King; the reſt of the Citizens either well liking of the matter, or at leaſt not daring for fear to ſtir.

Abdamelech by Policy obtaineth the Kingdom of Tunes.

Abdamelech dieth and Mahometes his Son is choſen King in his place.

But as in theſe worldly things, for which Men ſo vainly toil, is no aſſurance, ſo this new King ſhortly after fell ſick and died, when he had reigned but ſix and twenty days, and was afterwards Royally interred. After whoſe death, his mighty Friends, with the chief of the Citizens (perſwaded and encouraged by Touarres the Spaniard) choſe Mahometes his Son (a Child ſcarce twelve years old) to reign in his Fathers place; appointing Abdalages Maniphet (Brother to him who Amida ſlew) Abdelchirinus Meſuar, Shyriſſus (a great Man in the Mahometan Superſtition) and Perellus a Chriſtian Knight, to be his Directors and Governors; which four ſwaied all at their pleaſure. But Abdelchirinus tendring the Welfare of his Country, and deviſing out of ſeaſon how to ſet up one of the Royal Blood that were of himſelf able to govern the Kingdom (ſaying, That it was not for the common good to be ruled by a Child) was for his labour by his other three Fellows ſuddainly ſlain, with all his Kindred and known Friends. After whoſe death the other three erected a manner of Triumvirat Government, every one of them laying hand upon one part of the State or other, as liked him beſt. Amida thus ſhut out of Tunes, and having loſt his Kingdom, wandred up and down to Leptis, Cyrapolis, and many other places, craving Aid of every Man to recover his Kingdom, miſerably rent in ſunder (as he ſaid) by moſt wicked Men who inſolently triumphed over the Boy King. Which they of Tunes knew well to be true, and dayly complained of the death of Abdelchirinus, whom they called the faithful Counſellor and Father of his Country. Whilſt Amida is thus trudging up and down, craving help of this and that Prince, proving his Friends, and ſounding his Subjects Affection towards him; Muleaſſes grown miſerable with his long impriſonment and the calamity of his diſaſter Fortune, obtained of the young King his Nephew ſo much favour, as that he might ſometime go out of the Caſtle to the Church; under colour whereof he took Sanctuary, a place in Tunes holden in ſuch reverence amongſt the Moors, as that it was a moſt inviolable Refuge to all ſuch as fled thereunto.

Not long after, at ſuch time as Bernardinus Mendoza the Admiral of Spain came to Guletta with the Spaniſh Fleet, Muleaſſes at the requeſt of Touarres was conveyed out of the Sanctuary to the Lake, and ſo by Water to Guletta, there to be preſent at the Conſultation there holden for the utter ſubverſion of Amida and the driving out of the Turks out of ſuch Cities as they yet held alongſt the Sea-Coaſt in Africa. Muleaſſes had hardly before eſcaped the hands of certain of his Enemies in Tunes, who ſought after his life; preſerved by an old Woman, who moved with pity, hid him from their fury under a great heap of Garlike; and had he not now in good time eſcaped to Guletta, he had again fallen into the hands of his mercileſs Son Amida, who ſhortly after recovered again his Kingdom, and would not as he ſaid himſelf, have ſpared him for the Reverence of any Sanctuary. For the Citizens of Tunes weary of the evil Government of ſuch as were in Authority about the young King, and not a little offended with the King himſelf, for eſpouſing Melucca his Couſin one of Muleaſſes his Daughters, ſecretly encouraged Amida by Letters to repair to the City, promiſing to aid him in recovering his Kingdom. Whereupon he came in ſuch haſte, that the young King had ſcarce time to get out of the City; and Amida entring without reſiſtance, and holpen by his Friends, eaſily obtained again the Kingdom, and exerciſed moſt exquiſite Cruelty upon his Enemies; of whom he cauſed ſome to be torn in pieces and devoured of fierce Maſtives kept hungry for that purpoſe. Perellus he cauſed to be tortured, his Secrets to be cut off, and himſelf afterwards burnt to aſhes in the Market place.

Amida recovereth the Kingdom of Tunes, and takes revenge upon his Enemies.

But Muleaſſes ſtaid not long at Guletta, offended with the Covetouſneſs of Touarres, who (as he ſaid) had not faithfully reſtored ſuch things as he had before put him in truſt withal, but had avaritiouſly in his miſery deceived him of part of his rich Houſholdſtuff, with certain notable precious Stones, and ſome of his Treaſure; whereof the blind King ſo grievouſly complained to Charles the Emperor, that for deciding the matter, they were both commanded to repair unto him into Germany; where in concluſion to end the ſtrife, Touarres was diſcharged of his Government, and Muleaſſes ſent into Sicily, there to be kept of the common charge of that rich Iſland. Muleaſſes by the way coming to Rome, was honourably feaſted by Cardinal Farneſius; at which time he ſhewed himſelf both in his Apparel and Behavior not forgetful his better Fortune; and being brought unto the preſence of Palus the great Biſhop, would do him him no greater Honour but to kiſs his Knee, accounting it too great an indignity to have kiſſed his Foot. He was of Stature tall, and of a Princely Diſpoſition, unworthy of ſo hard a Fortune, had he not in the like manner before unmercifully dealt with his own Brethren.

Barbaruſſa weary of his long lying to ſo ſmall purpoſe in Provence, requeſted the French King either throughly to imploy him, or elſe to give him leave to depart; offering if he ſo pleaſed, to ſpoil all alongſt the Coaſt of Spain, from the Mountain Pyrenei to Cadiz. But he not ignorant what hard Speeches ran of him already in all parts of Chriſtendom, for bringing in the Turks, was loath to leave unto the memory of all Poſterity the foul remembrance of ſo woful a ſlaughter; beſides that, he was adviſed to diſburden his Country of ſuch troubleſome Gueſts, who roving about did much harm in the Province where they lay, and as it was reported, now and then ſnatcht up one Country Peaſant or other, and chained them for Slaves in their Gallies. Wherefore in ſupply of the Turks that were dead, the King gave unto Barbaruſſa all the Mahometan Slaves in his Gallies, to the number of about four hundred, and furniſhing him with all kind of Proviſion, and beſtowing great gifts upon him and his Captains, ſent him away; and with him Strozza with certain Gallies, his Embaſſador to Solyman. So the Turks departing out of Provence, kept alongſt the Coaſt until they came near unto Savona, whither the Germans ſent divers Preſents and freſh Victuals to Barbaruſſa; which he took ſo thankfully, that he proteſted not to hurt any of their Territory. From thence he kept a right Courſe to the Iſland of Elba belonging to the Duke of Florence, over againſt Populona; where underſtanding that one of the Sons of Sinan his old Friend was there kept Priſoner, he writ unto Appianus Governor of the Iſland, for his deliverance, to this effect:

Barbaruſſa his Letters to Appianus Governor of Elba.

I know that a young man a Turk ſerveth thee, the Son of Sinan ſirnamed the Jew (a famous Captain) taken of late at Tunes; him I would have thee friendly to reſtore; which gift I will make thee to underſtand to be unto me moſt acceptable; for this our great Fleet in paſſing by you ſhall faithfully forbear to uſe any hoſtility. But if thou ſhalt in this ſo ſmall a matter refuſe to gratifie me, expect upon the Coaſt of thy Country all the harms that an angry Enemy can do.

Whereunto Appianus (ſhewing his men upon the Walls, in token that he was not afraid) anſwered, That the young man was become a Chriſtian, and therefore might not in any caſe be delivered to the Turks; but that he would in any other thing gratifie him in what he could, and for his ſake uſe the young man as his Son. And to molifie the unkindneſs of his anſwer, he ſent him freſh Victual with other Preſents. But Barbaruſſa offended with the anſwer, landed his men round about the Iſland, and commanded them to make what Spoil they could; which they performed accordingly, hunting the Iſland People up and down the Rocks and Mountains like Hares; until that Appianus not without cauſe doubting the utter Spoil of the Iſland, redeemed his Peace by delivering the young man to Salec the Pyrat, who brought him to Barbaruſſa gallantly attired after the Italian manner; of whom he was joyfully received as the Son of a moſt valiant Captain his old Friend; and thereupon Barbaruſſa ſtaied his Souldiers from doing any further harm upon the Iſland, and gave Appianus great thanks for him. This young Man Barbaruſſa honoured with the command of ſeven Gallies, and afterwards ſent him to his Father then lying at Suetia a Port of the Red Sea, Admiral againſt the Portugals, who greatly troubled thoſe Seas. But the old Jew overjoyed with the ſuddain and unexpected return of his Son, whom he had for many years before given as loſt, in embracing of him fainted, and ſo preſently for joy died.

Barbaruſſa in his return toward Conſtantinople doeth much harm upon the Coaſt of Italy.

This man for Valour was accounted little inferior to Barbaruſſa, but for diſcretion and juſt dealing far beyond him, nothing of ſo furious and waiward a diſpoſition as was he. Barbaruſſa departing from Elba, came into the Bay of Telamon in Tuſcany, and in ſhort time took the City, which he ſpoiled and burnt, but eſpecially the Houſe of Bartholomeus Telamonius; whoſe dead Body but a little before buried, he cauſed to be pluckt out of the Grave, and his Bones to be ſcattered abroad, becauſe he being Admiral of the Biſhop of Rome's Gallies, had in the Iſle of Lesbos waſted Barbaruſſa's Fathers poor Poſſeſſion; and marching by night eight miles farther into the Land, ſurpriſed Montenum, and carried almoſt all the Inhabitants away with him into Captivity. The like miſchief he did at the Port called Portus Herculis, but purpoſing to have taken Orbatello, and there to have fortified, he was by Luna and Vitellius (two valiant Captains before ſent thither, the one by the State of Siena, and the other by the Duke of Florence) repulſed. So though diſappointed of his purpoſe, yet having done great harm, and put the whole Country of Tuſcany in exceeding fear, he departed from thence and landed again at Igilium, now called Gigio, an Iſland about twelve miles diſtant from Portus Herculis, where he quickly battered the Town, and carried a wonderful number of all ſorts into miſerable Captivity; keeping on his Courſe, he paſſing the Cape of Linar, and coming over againg Centumcelle, had burnt that City for the ſame reaſon he did Telamon, had he not been otherwiſe perſwaded by Strozza the French Embaſſador, fearing to draw the French King into further obloquy. From thence he came with a direct Courſe to the Iſland of Iſchia; where landing in the night, he intercepted moſt part of the Inhabitants of the Iſland, as they were flying into the Mountains; and in revenge of the hatred he had conceived againſt Vaſtius at the Siege of Nice, he burnt Forino, Panſa, and Varranium, three chief Towns of that Iſland; but Pithacuſa the dwelling place of Vaſtius, ſtanding upon a broken Rock ſomewhat diſtant from the Sea, he durſt not adventure upon. Then ſcraping along the Iſland Prochita with leſs hurt, becauſe moſt part of the Inhabitants were before fled to Pithacuſa, he put into the Bay of Puteoli, and ſent Salec the Pyrat with part of his Fleet, to make proof if the City of Puteoli might from Sea be battered. Salec drawing near the City, ſhot into it with his great Ordnance, and by chance ſlew one Saiavedra a valiant Spaniard, upon the Walls, and put the Citizens in a great fear leſt the whole Fleet ſhould have landed, they themſelves as then unprovided; but the Viceroy came preſently with a power both of Horſe and Foot from Naples, which Barbaruſſa diſcovering from Sea, as they came down the Mountains, called back Salec; and leaving the Iſland of Capri, and paſſing by the Promontory Atheneum, was about to have ſeiſed upon Salernum, when a Tempeſt ſuddainly ariſing diſperſed his Fleet, and drave him beyond the Promontory Palinurus upon the Coaſt of Calabria, where he did exceeding much harm, eſpecially at Carreato. From thence he departed to the Iſland of Lipari, betwixt Italy and Sicily, which Iſland he miſerably ſpoiled, and with forty great Pieces ſo battered the City, that the Citizens were conſtrained for fear to yield, whom he carried away all Priſoners about the number of ſeven thouſand, of one ſort of People and other, and burnt the City. So loaded with the rich Spoil of Italy and the Iſlands upon the Coaſt, he returned towards Conſtantinople with ſuch a multitude of poor Chriſtian Captives, ſhut up ſo cloſe under Hatches amongſt the excrements of Nature, that all the way as he went almoſt every hour ſome of them were caſt dead overboard; every man deteſting the endleſs hatred betwixt the Emperor and the French King, the very ground of all this and many thouſand other moſt woful and underſerved calamities of the poor Subjects. With this rich Prey and an infinite number of Captives, Barbaruſſa arrived at Conſtantinople in the beginning of Autumn, in the year 1544: where he was honourably received of Solyman, and highly commended for his good ſervice both by Sea and Land.

Mahomet Solymans eldeſt Son dieth.

Solyman triumphing at Conſtantinople of the good ſucceſs he had in Hungary; in the midſt of all his glory, was advertiſed of the death of Mahomet his eldeſt Son, whom of all his Children he held deareſt; whoſe dead Body was ſhortly after brought from Magneſia, and with wonderful ſolemnity, and no leſs mourning, buried at Conſtantinople. How entirely Solyman loved this his Son, well appeared by the great ſorrow he conceived of his death: and not contented to have built him a ſtately Tomb, erected alſo in memorial of him a Mahometan Church, called the Church of Mahomet the Leſſer; for the difference of Mahomet the Great who won Conſtantinople. Whereunto he alſo annexed a Monaſtery and a Colledg, with many things more after the groſs manner of their Superſtition, for the health of his Soul, as he vainly ſuppoſed. After that, Solyman according to his wonted manner, which was but every ſecond or third year, to take in hand ſome notable expedition, ceaſed from Wars by the ſpace of two years; in which time many of the great Princes and worthy Men of that Age died; amongſt whom was Francis the French King. Hariadenus Barbaruſſa that famous Turk of whom we have ſo often ſpoken, who being of great years and no leſs fame, left this life in the year 1547. and was buried at a Houſe of his own called Beſictas, near unto Boſphorus Thracius on Europe ſide, not far from the Mouth of Euxinum, about four miles from Pera, where he had but few years before at one time ſold about ſixteen thouſand Chriſtian Captives, taken out of Corcyra; and to make famous that place appointed for his Burial, he of his own coſt built there a Mahometan Temple, there yet with his Sepulcher to be ſeen; That place was in ancient time called Jaſonium. About which time alſo, died of conceit that famous Captain Alphonſus Davalus Vaſtius, taken away by untimely death when he had lived but forty five years. At which time, Charles the Emperor by his Embaſſador Gerardus Veltunich, concluded a Peace with Solyman for five years, wherein King Ferdinand was alſo included; which Peace was afterwards before the expiration thereof, by Solyman (at the requeſt of Henry the French King) broken.

Solyman returneth to Conſtantinople.

Solyman had now almoſt three years taken his reſt, when it fortuned that Ercaſes Imirza, King of Sirvan, moved with the often injuries of Tamas his Brother the great Perſian King, fled to Solyman at Conſtantinople, to crave aid of him againſt his Brother. Solyman glad of ſuch an occaſion to work upon, entertained him with all courteſie, and promiſed to take upon him his quarrel, and to protect him againſt his unnatural Brother. And when he had made all things ready for ſo great an expedition, paſſed over into Aſia, and after long and painful travel entred at laſt with a puiſſant Army into Armenia, and there in the Borders of the Perſian Kingdom, firſt beſieged the City of Van, which after ten days ſiege was yielded unto him, upon condition, that the Perſian Souldiers there in Garriſon, might with life and liberty depart with their Arms as Souldiers; which was at the firſt by Solyman granted, and ſo the City ſurrendred. From thence Solyman ſent his chief Commanders with a great part of his Army, to burn and ſpoil the Enemies Country, which they for a time chearfully performed; and running far into the Country, ſtrive as it were amongſt themſelves who ſhould do moſt harm; where Imirza amongſt the reſt, for whoſe ſake Solyman had undertaken this War, was as forward as the beſt to waſt and ſpoil his Brothers Kingdom, ſparing nothing that came to hand; the beſt and richeſt things he got, he preſented to Solyman, to draw him on ſtill in that War. But that ſerved not his turn to recover again his Kingdom of Sirvan; for Tamas, without ſhewing any power to withſtand the Turks, had after his wonted manner, cauſed his people to withdraw themſelves far into the Mountain Country, leaving nothing behind them in that waſt Country to relieve them but the bare Ground; ſo that the farther the Turks went, the more they wanted, without hope of better ſucceſs than ſuch as they had before to their loſs made proof of, in their former expeditions into that great Kingdom. The conceit whereof ſo much pierced not the common Souldiers only, but even the Captains themſelves; that to make an end of that long and unprofitable War, taken in hand for another Mans good, they conſulted amongſt themſelves either to kill Imirza, or elſe to diſgrace him with Solyman; Which they ſo cunningly wrought; ſome ſuggeſting falſe ſuſpitions of his treacherous dealing in the proceeding of that War; and others with like craft, under colour of friendſhip giving him warning in ſecret of the danger he was in; the one filling Solymans Head with diſtruſt, and the other Imirzas with fear; briefly to ſhut the matter up in their own terms, They perſwaded the Hare to flie, and the Hounds to follow. Imirza doubting ſome ſuddain miſchief, fled for ſuccour to an old acquaintance of his, one of the Princes of Chaldea, who moſt treacherouſly ſent him in Bonds to Tamas his Brother his moſt cruel Enemy, who glad to have the author of all his troubles with the Turks, delivered into his hands, caſt him in Priſon; and that Solyman nor any other ſhould in his behalf further proſecute the War, or by his means hope for Victory, cauſed him to be in Priſon murthred. In this expedition againſt the Perſian King, Solyman was occupied a year and nine months; all which time the Turks endured great troubles, and were oftentimes hardly diſtreſſed by the Perſians; until at laſt Solyman himſelf weary of that tedious War, wherein he had got neither honour nor profit, thought it beſt ſo to make an end; and thereupon returned again to Conſtantinople in the year 1549.

Dragut a famous Pyrat of the Turks poſſeſſeth certain Cities in Africk.

In the mean time it fortuned, that one Dragut Raiſes a notable Pyrat of the Turks, had craftily ſurpriſed the City of Africa in the Kingdom of Tunes (called in ancient time Aphrodiſeum) and alſo Leptis Parva (and now of the Moors called Mahamedia) and there ſetling himſelf, as in a place both commodious and of good aſſurance, exceedingly troubled the Chriſtians both by Sea and Land, eſpecially ſuch as traded in the Mediterranean. So that the Emperor, moved as well with the manifold injuries done by that Arch-Pyrat upon the Frontiers of his Dominions, as by the daily complaint of his poor Subjects, commanded the Viceroy of Sicily, and Auria his Admiral, to levy a ſufficient power in time to repreſs that Pyrat, before he grew to farther ſtrength. Whereupon, they with a ſtrong Fleet well manned and throughly appointed for that purpoſe, and aided by the Knights of Malta, paſſed over into Africk, and landing their Forces, by the ſpace of three months beſieged the City before poſſeſſed by the Pyrat, which with continual Battery they had at length made aſſaultable. And hearing that Dragut was coming with a new ſupply to relieve it, they with all celerity aſſailed it both by Sea and Land, and in the ſpace of a few hours took it by force the tenth day of September in the year 1550. in which aſſault many of the Enemies were ſlain, and the reſt taken. Auria having thus diſpoſſeſſed the Pyrat, and adviſedly conſidering that the City was not without an infinite charge to be holden by the Chriſtians, among ſo many of the Infidels, raſed it down to the ground, carrying away with him ſeven thouſand Captives, and all the ſpoil of the City. And not ſo contented, did all the harm he could with Fire and Sword all alongſt the Coaſt of Africa, to the intent that the Turks ſhould there find no relief; and took twelve Priſoners out of Monaſterium, a Town not far from the City of Africa; and ſo having done what he came for, returned again into Sicily. Dragut thus at once thruſt out of all he had, with a few of his Friends fled to Solyman to Conſtantinople, and ſo incenſed him with the grievous complaint of the wrong done unto him by the Chriſtians; that in revenge thereof, he reſolved to make War both upon the Emperor and King Ferdinand, notwithſtanding that the five years League he had before taken with him at his going into Perſia, was not yet expired. So with chearful words and courteous entertainment comforting up the deſperate Pyrat, the 1551. Spring following (which was in the year 1551.) he furniſhed him with a great Fleet in moſt warlike manner appointed, to revenge the injury done to him by Auria in Africk. With this Fleet in number a hundred and forty Sail, Sinan one of the Turks great Baſſaes, accompanied with Dragut the Pyrat, by the appoinment of Solyman, departed from Conſtantinople; and cutting through the Seas, arrived at length in Sicily, where they ſuddainly ſurpriſed the Town and Caſtle of Auguſta, which they preſently ſacked. Departing thence, they came to the Iſland of Malta, and there landed their Men in the Port of Marza, otherwiſe called Moxet, near unto the Caſtle, which they battered with certain Pieces of great Ordnance, but ſo as was to no great purpoſe. At which time divers Companies of the Turks running further into the Iſland, made havoke of whatſoever came in their way. After they had thus few days in vain battered the Caſtle, and ſaw themſelves both there valiantly repulſed, and in other places by Ambuſhes and ſuch like means cut off by the Souldiers and Inhabitants of the Iſland, they removed thence to the Road of St. Paul, where they landed their Ordnance with purpoſe to have beſieged the City; but perceiving by a little, what ſmall hope there was to prevail, and ſeeing divers of their Men dying through the extremity of the Heat, they forſook the Iſland and went to Gaules now called Goza, a little Iſland about thirty miles in compaſs, five miles diſtant from Malta Weſtward, ſubject unto the Knights of the Religion; and there landing their Men, miſerably ſpoiled the Iſland, and whatſoever they light upon, and carried away with them of one ſort of People and other ſix thouſand and three hundred Captives into moſt woſul bondage. With which booty they put again to Sea, and ſailed directly to Tripolis in Barbary, called of old Leptis Magna; which City Charles the Emperor had before given to the Knights of Malta, and was at that time by them kept. This City was the Mark whereat the Baſſa and the Pyrat ſhot; for taking whereof they landed their Forces, and by long and winding Trenches approached as near the ſame as they could. Which they did not without great loſs of their people; for they of the Caſtle having great ſtore of great Ordnance, and moſt expert Cannoniers, did with continual ſhot ſo annoy the Turks, that they were oftentimes enforced to retire; yet with much troubleſome labour and no leſs peril, they came at laſt within eight hundred Paces of the Walls; where the Baſſa cauſed his Gabions made of thick Planks, to be placed in the night, and his Battery planted. And the next day (which was the eighth of Auguſt) the Cannon began to play, which was again anſwered from the Caſtle with like, and every hour ſome of the Turks ſlain, the great ſhot ſtill flying into their Trenches, ſo as that day four of the beſt Cannoniers in the Army were ſlain, with certain other Men of good account alſo; and the Clerk General of the Army, a Man of great eſtimation and well beloved of the Baſſa, had his Hand ſhot off, and many other of the Janizaries and common Souldiers either ſlain or hurt; moreover they brake one of their beſt Pieces, and diſmounted four others, which for that day made them to leave the Battery. The next night the Turks approached yet nearer unto the Caſtle, upon whom the Chriſtians in the break of the day ſallied out even unto their very Trenches, and afterwards retired. With the riſing of the Sun (which the Turks have in great reverence) they renued their Battery with greater force than before; yet with ſuch evil ſucceſs, that the Baſſa was almoſt mad for anger; for about the evening the Fire by miſchance got into their Powder, wherewith thirty of the Turks were burnt, many hurt, and one Piece broken. At length the Turks were come ſo near, that they had planted their Battery within a hundred and fifty Paces of the Wall; which they continued with ſuch fury, that they had made a fair Breach even with the Ditch; but what was beaten down in the day time, the Defendants repaired again by night, in ſuch ſort, as that it was not to be aſſaulted. Yet in concluſion, a traiterous Souldier of Provence, before corrupted by the Turks, found means to flie out of the Caſtle into the Camp, where he declared unto the Baſſa the weakeſt places of the Caſtle, by which it might be moſt conveniently battered and ſooneſt taken; and eſpecially one place above the reſt which was againſt the Governours Lodgings; which ſtanding towards the Ditch, and having underneath it Cellars to retire the munition into, could not if it were once battered, well be repaired again or fortified. Which the Baſſa underſtanding, cauſed the Battery there to be planted, laying the Pieces ſo low, that they did eaſily beat the Cellars and Vaults in ſuch ſort, that in ſhort time the Walls were ſo ſhaken, that the Rampiers above through the continual battery, began greatly to ſink; which ſo amazed the Souldiers, ſeeing no convenient means to repair the ſame, that ſetting all honour aſide, they requeſted the Governour, That ſithence the matter began now to grow deſperate, and that the place was not longer to be holden, he would in time take ſome good order with the Enemy for their ſafety, before the Walls were further endamaged. With which motion, Vallier the Governour (an ancient Knight of Daulphiny, and one of the Order) was exceedingly troubled; which Peiſieu another of the Knights, perceiving, he as a Man of great courage, and of all others there preſent moſt ancient, in the name of the other Knights declared unto them, That the Breach was neither ſo great, nor ſo profitable for the Enemy, but that it was defenſible enough, if they would as Men of courage repair the ſame; ſaying, That it was more honourable for worthy Knights and luſty Souldiers, to die valiantly with their weapons in their hands, fighting againſt the Infidels for the maintenance of their Law and Chriſtian Religion, than ſo cowardly to yield themſelves to the mercy of thoſe, at whoſe hands nothing was to be looked for but moſt miſerable ſervitude, with all kind of cruelty; and therefore perſwaded the Governour to hold it out to the laſt. For all that, he overcome with the importunity of ſuch as would needs yield, who with all vehemency urged the imminent danger wherewith they were all like to be overwhelmed, and finding himſelf bereft both of Heart and Fortune, and forſaken of his Souldiers; without farther conſideration, conſented that a white Enſign ſhould be diſplayed on the Walls, in token that they deſired parley; When a Turk preſenting himſelf, they requeſted him to underſtand of the Baſſa, if he could be contented that ſome of them might come to intreat with him of ſome good order to be taken for the yielding up of the Caſtle. Whereunto the Baſſa willingly conſenting, two of the Knights were forthwith ſent out, to offer unto him the Caſtle with the Artillery and Munition, ſo as he would furniſh them with Ships to bring them with Bag and Baggage ſafely to Malta. Whereunto the Baſſa briefly anſwered, That (foraſmuch as they had as yet deſerved no grace, preſuming to keep ſo ſmall a place againſt the Army of the greateſt Prince on Earth) if they would pay the whole charges of the Army, he would condeſcend to their requeſt; or if they would not thereunto conſent, that for recompence, all they within the Caſtle ſhould continue his Slaves and Priſoners; notwithſtanding if they incontinently and without delay did ſurrender the place, he would exempt out of them two hundred. Whereupon the Meſſengers returning in deſpair, were ſtaid by Dragut and Salla Rais, with flattering words and fair promiſes,that they would ſo much as lay in them, perſwade the Baſſa to condeſcend to a more gracious compoſition; fearing indeed that the beſieged through deſpair would reſolve (as their extream refuge) to defend the place even to the very laſt Man. Wherefore they went preſently to the Baſſa, to declare unto him his overſight in refuſing them who voluntarily would have put themſelves into his hands, whom reaſon would he ſhould with all courteſie have received; for that after he had the Caſtle and the Men in his power, he might diſpoſe of them as he ſhould think good. The Baſſa liking well of his counſel, cauſed the Meſſengers to be called again, and with fained and diſſembling words told them, That at the inſtance of Dragut and Salla Rais there preſent, he did diſcharge them of all the coſts and charges of the Army, ſwearing unto them (the better to deceive them) by the Head of his Lord and his own, inviolably to obſerve all that he had promiſed unto them; which they too eaſily believed, and forthwith went to declare the ſame to the Governour, and others within the Caſtle. The Baſſa, the better to come to the effect of his deſire, after theſe Meſſengers ſent a crafty Turk, whom he charged expreſly to perſwade the Governour to come with him into the Camp, for the full concluſion of the giving up of the Caſtle, and for the appointing of ſuch Veſſels as ſhould be needful for their ſafe conduct to Malta; and that if he made any doubt to come, he ſhould make ſhew as if he would there remain in Hoſtage for him; but above all things, to conſider of the ſtrength and aſſurance of the beſieged, and of the diſpoſition of all things there. Which the ſubtil Turk ſo finely handled, that the Governour by the counſel of thoſe who had perſwaded him to yield (notwithſtanding the reaſons of Wars and Duty of his Office forbad him in ſuch manner to abandon the place of his charge) reſolved upon ſo ſmall an aſſurance of the Baſſa, and gave ear to the miſerable end of his Fortune. So taking with him a Knight of his Houſhold (to ſend back unto thoſe of the Caſtle, to declare unto them how he ſped in the Camp) under the conduct of the Turk that was come to fetch him, he went ſtraight to the Tent of the Baſſa; who by the Turk that went firſt in, was advertiſed of the ſmall courage of the Defendants, which he aſſured him to be no better, but that if he thought it good, he might bring them to ſuch order and agreement as he would himſelf. Upon whoſe perſwaſion calling in the Governour Vallier, after he had rigorouſly reproved his raſhneſs, ſaid unto him, That foraſmuch as he had once given his word, if he would pay the charges of the Army, he was content to let them go with Bag and Baggage, otherwiſe he would diſcharge but two hundred. Whereat the Governour greatly moved, anſwered, That that was not according to his laſt promiſe unto the Knights before ſent. But when he ſaw it would be no better, he requeſted him that he might again return to the Caſtle to know the minds of the reſt; which the falſe Baſſa would by no means grant, but only permitted him to ſend back the Knight that he had brought with him, to make report of theſe hard News to the beſieged; as for the Governour, he was ſent to the Gallies with Irons on his Heels. When they of the Caſtle underſtood what had paſſed betwixt the Baſſa and the Governour, they began exceedingly to fear the miſchief then at hand; yet took no other reſolution, but to return the ſaid Knight to the Baſſa, to know whether they ſhould expect from him no better anſwer. Who as ſoon as he was come before him, the Captain of the Caſtle was brought in, of whom the Baſſa asked, Which of the two he would chuſe, either to pay the expences of the Army,or elſe both he and all the reſt to remain his Priſoners? Whereunto the Governour anſwered, That a Slave had no other authority than that which by his Maſter was given him; and that having loſt (beſides his liberty) the power to command, if any thing were yet reſerved in him, could not counſel him to command others to agree unto any thing, but that which was concluded with them which were before ſent. Which thing the Baſſa hearing, for fear that ſuch a reſolute anſwer ſhould come to the knowledge of the beſieged, and cauſe them to become deſperate; having taken counſel with his other Captains, he took the Governour by the Hand, and with a ſmiling and diſſembling Countenance told him, That he would without any doubt let them depart as he had promiſed; and that therefore without fearing any thing, he ſhould cauſe them all to come out of the Caſtle. But the Governour, becauſe he had been before deceived, would not truſt to his word, but ſaid unto him, That he might command him that was come from the Caſtle, for that he knew they would now do never a whit the more for him. So the Baſſa turning towards the other Knight, commanded him forthwith to go unto them in the Caſtle, and to cauſe them to come forth, ſwearing again as before, by the Head of his great Lord, and his own, That they ſhould all be delivered and ſet at liberty, according to the conventions firſt agreed upon. Which the Knight believing, went to report to them this good news; which they received with ſuch joy, that without further care or conſideration of their miſhap ſo near, they ran in haſte with their Wives, Children, and beſt Moveables, ſtriving who ſhould firſt get out. But they were no ſooner iſſued, but they were by the Enemies ſpoiled of all they had, and taken Priſoners; part of the Knights were ſent to the Gallies, and the reſt to the Baſſa. Who being by the Governour put in remembrance of his Faith twice given, anſwered, That there was no Faith to be kept with Dogs, and that they had firſt violated their Oath with his great Lord, unto whom at the giving over of the Rhodes, they had (as he ſaid) ſworn never more to bear Arms againſt the Turks. The Caſtle was forthwith taken and ſpoiled, and about two hundred Moors of that Country that had ſerved the Knights, cut in pieces, and thereupon, a great Peal of Ordnance diſcharged, with great cries and ſhouts in ſign of their Victory. Thus the ſtrong Caſtle and ancient City of Tripolis in Barbary was delivered unto the Turks the fifteenth day of Auguſt, in the year 1551. Whilſt the Baſſa lay at this Siege, the Lord of Arramont, who had many years lien Embaſſador from Francis the French King at Conſtantinople, and was now ſent again by Henry the Second, came to the Turks Camp, being requeſted ſo to do by the great Maſter of the Rhodes, to have diſſwaded the Baſſa from that Siege; wherein he nothing prevailed. Yet now grieved to ſee how the faithleſs Turk, contrary to his Oath, moſt villanouſly intreated the Governour

Governour and the other Knights, lying at his feet as Men half deſperate; was ſo bold as to put him in mind of his promiſe, confirmed by his Oath; which if he would not keep, that yet at the leaſt according to his own voluntary offer, he would releaſe two hundred of them; but he excuſed himſelf as before, ſaying, That no Faith was to be kept with Dogs, which had firſt broken their own Faith. Yet afterwards he condeſcended, that two hundred of the eldeſt and ſuch as were moſt unfit for ſervice (amongſt whom was comprehended the Governour and certain other old Knights) ſhould be ſet at liberty; who were forthwith ſent aboord the French Embaſſadors Gallies, and by him tranſported to Malta; where they were but hardly welcome, for that they had ſo cowardly ſurrendred a place, which they might much longer have defended. The next day after the Caſtle was delivered, which was the ſixteenth of Auguſt, the proud Baſſa for joy of this Victory made a ſolemn Dinner, whereunto he invited the French Embaſſador, and Vallier the late Governour; which they refuſed not to come unto, in hope to recover ſome more Priſoners. This great Feaſt for the more Magnificence was kept in the Caſtle-Ditch againſt the Breach, where were ſet up two ſtately Pavillions, the one for the Baſſa, and the other for the Embaſſador and his Company, where he was honourably Feaſted with wonderful plenty both of Fleſh and Fiſh and good Wines, which they had found in the Caſtle; which ſervice was done with Muſick of divers ſorts, and Officers in number above a hundred, apparelled for moſt part in long Gowns of fine Cloth of Gold, Tuffed or Fringed; and the other of Velvet or Damask. The Baſſa was no ſooner ſet down, but all the Ordnance of the Fleet were diſcharged with ſuch a noiſe and thundring, that it ſeemed the Heavens and Skies did ſhake. The Table being taken up, the Embaſſador and the late Governour Vallier, entred into the Pavillion of the Baſſa, and beſide the two hundred Men which he had promiſed, obtained twenty more, upon the Embaſſadors promiſe, That he ſhould for them cauſe to be releaſed thirty Turks taken at Malta, at the landing of the Army there. The Turks having in their hands an ancient Gunner of the Caſtle, called John de Chabas born in Daulphine (to the end that this triumphant Feaſt ſhould not be unfurniſhed of ſome cruel ſacrifice of the Chriſtian Blood) for that he had in time of the Siege ſhot off the Hand of the Clerk General of the Army, brought him into the Town, and when they had cut off his Hands and his Noſe, put him quick into the Ground to the Waſt, and there for their pleaſure ſhot at him with their Arrows, and afterward to make an end of him cut his Throat. The Baſſa ſhortly after departing out of Barbary, left Dragut the Pyrat Governour of Tripolis, honouring him with the Title of the Sanzack of that place; from whence he many years grievouſly moleſted the Moors near unto him by Land, and the Chriſtians by Sea. The ſame year 1551. Solyman notwithſtanding the five years Peace before taken with King Ferdinand at his going into Perſia, ſent Achomates his Lieutenant in Europe with a great power into Hungary, who with Halis the Baſſa of Buda invaded the upper part of Hungary, and firſt took the City of Temeſwar, and contrary to their Faith given, ſlew the Garriſon Souldiers; after that, they took alſo the Caſtle of Zolnok, forſaken by the Chriſtians, and certain other ſmall Caſtles. But laying Siege to Erſam, they were partly by the valiantneſs of the Defendants, and partly by the coming on of Winter enforced to forſake the Siege, and to get themſelves into their Wintering places.

Queen Iſabel, King John his Widdow, ſeeing the Turks daily encroaching upon that little they had left her, and that ſhe was not able by any means to defend Tranſylvania againſt them, by the advice of George Biſhop of Veradium her old Counſellor, agreed with King Ferdinand to deliver unto him the Government of the Country, with all the Royal Dignity of Hungary, for which ſhe was to have of him Caſſovia, and a yearly Penſion of an hundred thouſand Ducats. Which agreement made and throughly concluded by Baptiſta Caſtalius an Italian (whom Charles the Emperor had but a little before ſent to aid King Ferdinand) the Queen returned into Polonia, her native Country; and ſo King Ferdinand by that means obtained almoſt all the Province of Tranſylvania, and what elſe the Queen had in Hungary. But the Biſhop a little before made a Cardinal, being ſuſpected by Baptiſta the Italian, that he favoured the Turks Faction more than King Ferdinand, and by that means ſought to get the Government to himſelf, was by the Italians device ſuddainly murthred in his own Houſe at Veradium; an end good enough for ſo troubleſome a Prelate.

Halis the Baſſa of Buda proud of the good ſucceſs he had the year before, underſtanding that divers of the chief Hungarians had withdrawn themſelves into the Caſtle of Agria, purpoſed in himſelf with all his power to beſiege it, and there to take them. So aided by Achomates, Chaſan, and other of the Turks Sanzacks and Captains by Solymans appointment ready at his call, he came with an Army of thirty five thouſand Turks, and the tenth of September in the year 1552. encamped round about the Caſtle; where after he had placed his Artillery, he began a moſt furious Battery. But doubting to prevail that way, he attempted alſo to undermine the Caſtle, omitting nothing that could be deviſed for the taking thereof; but all in vain, for the Hungarians by the good direction of Stephanus Dobus their Captain, couragiouſly endured the Siege and very manfully repulſed the Enemy. At length, the twenty ninth of September the Enemy with twenty eight Enſigns of ſelect Souldiers gave a freſh aſſault to the Caſtle, and were by the Defendants enforced ſhamefully to retire; at which time four and twenty Barrels of Gunpowder by miſchance caught Fire, and beſides that it blew up divers Captains and Souldiers, did much harm in the Caſtle, to the great diſmaying of the Defendants. After that, the Turks with incredible pertinacy the twelfth of October fiercely aſſaulted the Caſtle from morning until night, and for deſire of revenge and hope of ſpoil left nothing unattempted for the gaining of the place; but were by the greater valour of the Hungarians beaten back, and with great loſs enforced at laſt to give over the aſſault. Thus the Baſſa nothing prevailing by force, attempted by great promiſes and large offers to have brought them out; which he underſtanding to be nothing regarded, and his Letters ſcornfully burnt, brought on his Souldiers again, and gave unto them in the Caſtle a moſt furious aſſault, but with no better ſucceſs than before; for having loſt many of his beſt Souldiers, he was enforced to retire. So after he had in vain ſix weeks beſieged the Caſtle, he was glad to raiſe his Siege, and to retire to Peſtum. After whoſe departure there was found twelve thouſand great Shot, wherewith he had battered the Wall. In this Siege ſix thouſand Turks were ſlain, and of the Hungarians but three hundred. King Ferdinand glad of this Henry the French King, who together with his Kingdom had (as it ſeemed) received the hereditary Quarrels of Francis his Father againſt Charles the Emperor, had by his Embaſſador the Lord of Arramont ſo wrought the matter with Solyman, that the more to trouble the Emperor, he ſent a great Fleet into the Tyrrhenum or Tuſcan Sea, which in the year 1553, and the year following, did great harm upon the Coaſts of Calabria, Sicilia, Sardinia, as alſo in the Iſlands of Elba, Corſica, Cerbe, and Maiorca, and ſuch like places on the Frontiers of the Emperors Dominions; yet were the Turks in moſt places notably again repulſed by the people of thoſe Countries. The ſame year Solyman, ſeduced by Roxolana (ſometime his fair Concubine, but then his imperious Wife) and Ruſtan Baſſa his Son in Law, moſt unnaturally murthred his eldeſt Son Muſtapha, the mirrour of the Othoman Family; Which tragical Fact (the like whereof both for the treacherous contriving and inhuman execution hath ſeldom times been heard of) I have thought good here in due time to ſet down, in ſuch ſort as it is by moſt credible Writers of that time reported.

Solyman after the manner of the Othoman Kings (who to avoid the participation of their Sovereignty, uſe not oftentimes to Marry, but otherwiſe to ſatisfie their pleaſure with ſuch beautiful Concubines as it pleaſeth them to make choice of out of the faireſt Captives of all Nations, moſt daintily brought up for that purpoſe in the Court) had by a Circaſſian Bondwoman a Son called Muſtapha, who for his wonderful towardlineſs and rare perfection, was amongſt the Turks had in ſuch expectation and admiration, as that they in nothing accounted themſelves more happy, than in the hope laid up in him; whoſe noble carriage was ſuch, as thereby he ſo poſſeſſed the minds of all Men in general, (but eſpecially of the Men of War) that he was reputed the glory of the Court, the flour of Chivalry, the hope of the Souldiers, and joy of the People. Whilſt he thus grew, encreaſing both in years and favour, it fortuned with Solyman as it doth with Men delighted in change, that he became amorous of Roxolana, of ſome called Roſa (but more truly Hazathya) by condition a Captive, but ſo graced with beauty and courtly behaviour, that in ſhort time ſhe became Miſtreſs of his thoughts, and Commandreſs of him that all commanded; and that which more eſtabliſhed her in poſſeſſion of his love, ſhe had in time made him Father of four fair Sons, Mahomet, Selymus, Bajazet, and Tzihanger, and one Daughter called Chameria Married to Ruſtan or Ruſtemes the great Baſſa. In this height of worldly Bliſs nothing troubled her more than the exceeding credit of Muſtapha, Solymans eldeſt Son by the Circaſſian Woman; who honoured of the greateſt, and beloved of the reſt, ſtood only in her light, imbarring her and hers (as ſhe thought) of the hope of the Empire, which he now above all things ſought to bring to one of her own Sons; which the better to compaſs, ſhe under the colour of great good will and love, procured that Muſtapha the young Prince and his Mother ſhould as it were for their greater honour and ſtate, with a Princely allowance be ſent into Caramania to govern that great Country, far from the Court. Which was no great matter for her to bring to paſs; for that the Turkiſh Emperors uſually ſend their Sons after they come to any years of diſcretion; unto ſuch Provinces as are far from the Court, attended upon with one great Baſſa and ſome grave Doctor of their Law, ſo to acquaint them with the manner of Government; the Baſſa inſtructing them in matters of civil Policy, and the Doctor in matters concerning their ſuperſtition; and yet by ſending them afar off, to keep them from aſpiring to the Empire by the favour of the Court; (a thing of the Turkiſh Emperors not unworthily feared even in their own and beloved Children.) Roxolana having at once thus cunningly rid the Court of the great Competitors both of her Love and of the Empire (things of all others enduring no Partners) reſted not ſo, but began ſtraitway to plot in her malicious Head the utter deſtruction of him, to whom all others wiſhed all happineſs This ſhe ſaw was not to be brought to paſs without ſome Complices; wherefore after ſhe had in her ſecret conceit diſcarded many, of whom at firſt ſhe had reaſonable good liking; at laſt ſhe made choice of Ruſtan Baſſa her Son in Law, upon whom ſhe would ſet up her reſt. This Ruſtan was a Man baſely Born in Epirus, altogether compoſed of diſſimulation and flattery, ever ſerving his own turn, were it never ſo much to the hurt or grievance of others; by which means he, although none of the beſt Souldiers, was yet by many degrees grown up to be the greateſt Man in the Court, and Solymans Son in Law; him ſhe probably thought to wiſh the ſucceſſion of the Empire to one of her own Sons, his Wives full Brethren, rather than to Muſtapha her half Brother. Beſide that, ſhe was not ignorant how that Ruſtan as one careful of the Emperors profit (the readieſt way to preferment) had abridged the Penſions and Fees of the Officers and Servitors in Court; which he perceiving to pleaſe the Emperor, proceeded ſo far therein, that he attempted to have cut off, if it had been poſſible, ſome part of Muſtapha his princely allowance; for which doing, ſhe knew how odious he was to all the Courtiers (whereof he made ſmall reckoning) but eſpecially to Muſtapha, inſomuch that it was thought he would not forget ſo notorious an injury, if ever he ſhould obtain the Empire. Hereupon ſhe brake with Ruſtan upon the matter, whom ſhe found ready enough of himſelf to do what in him lay to further her miſchievous deſire.

To begin this intended Tragedy, ſhe upon the ſuddain became very devout, and being by the favour of Solyman grown exceeding rich, pretended as if it had been upon a devout Zeal for the health of her Soul, after the manner of their Turkiſh Superſtition, to build an Abbey, with an Hoſpital and a Church; which ſo godly a purpoſe ſhe imparted to the Mufti or chief Mahometan Prieſt, demanding of him, if ſuch works of Charity were not acceptable unto God, and available for her Souls Health. Whereunto the Mufti anſwered, That thoſe works were no doubt gracious in the ſight of God, but nothing at all meritorious for her Souls Health, being a Bondwoman; yet very profitable for the Soul of the great Emperor Solyman, unto whom as unto her Lord, both ſhe and all ſhe had appertained. With which anſwer of the great Prieſt ſhe ſeemed to be exceedingly troubled, and thereupon became wonderful penſive and Melancholy, her chearful countenance was replete with Sadneſs, and her fair Eies flowed with Tears, her mirth was mourning, and her joy heavineſs. Which thing Solyman perceiving, and ſorry to ſee his love upon conceit ſo to languiſh, ſent her word to be of good chear, and to comfort her ſelf; promiſing in ſhort time to take ſuch a courſe as ſhould eaſe her of all her griefs; which he forthwith did, ſolemnly manumiſing her from her bond Eſtate. So great a favour obtained, Roxolana with great chearfulneſs began thoſe meritorious works by her before intended, as if ſhe had thought of nothing but Heaven, whereas indeed her thoughts were in the depth of Hell. When ſhe had thus a good while buſied her ſelf in paving the way to Heaven, as was ſuppoſed; Solyman not able longer to forbear the company of her, in whom his Soul lived, after his wonted manner ſent for her by one of his Eunuchs, who ſhould have brought her to his Bed-Chamber. To whom ſhe with her Eies caſt up to Heaven, demurely anſwered, That her life and whatſoever elſe ſhe had was at her dread Sovereigns command, but again to yield her Body unto his Appetite ſhe might not in any caſe do, without the great offence of the High God, and manifeſt Breach of his ſacred Laws, which permitted her not now voluntarily to yield him that, being free, which he before without offence might command of his Bondwoman; and becauſe ſhe would not ſeem to uſe this as an excuſe, ſhe referred her ſelf all in things to the grave judgment of the learned and reverend Mufti, with whom ſhe had before at full conferred. This ſhe did, preſuming of the Sovereignty ſhe had over that great Monarch, whom ſhe right well knew ſhe had ſo faſt bound in the pleaſing Fetters of his affection towards her, as that ſhe was ſure enough of him without a Keeper. Solyman raviſhed with her love, and well the more for her denial, ſent for the Mufti, requiring his judgment in the matter; who before inſtructed in all points, agreed with that Roxolana had ſaid, aggravating the heinouſneſs of the Fact, if he ſhould proceed to enforce her as a Slave, who being now free, he might not without great offence touch unmarried. Whereupon Solyman more and more burning in his deſires, became a freſh Suter to her for Marriage, whom he had ſo often before commanded; which his Sute eaſily obtained, (as the Mark ſhe had all this while aimed at) he with all ſpeed to the great admiration of all Men, and contrary to the manner of the Mahometan Emperors, ſolemnly Married her, appointing for her yearly Dowry five thouſand Sultanyns.

Roxolana plotteth the confuſion of Muſtapha.

This Woman of late a Slave, but now become the greateſt Empreſs of the Eaſt, flowing in all worldly Felicity, attended upon with all the pleaſures her Heart could deſire, wanted nothing ſhe could wiſh, but how to find means that the Turkiſh Empire might after the death of Solyman be brought to ſome one of her own Sons. This was it that had (as is before ſaid) long troubled her aſpiring mind, and in the midſt of all her Bliſs, ſuffered her yet to take no reſt. Noble Muſtapha, Solymans eldeſt Son, and Heir apparent of the Empire, although far abſent, was yet ſtill before her Eies preſent; his credit, his valour, his vertues, his perfections were all bars to her deſires; he was the only Cloud that kept the Sun from ſhining on her; if he by any means might be taken away, then wanted nothing that ſhe deſired. Which to bring to paſs, the wicked Woman laboured cunningly by little and little to breed in Solymans Head no ſmall ſuſpicion of Muſtapha, That he being a young Man of a haughty Spirit, deſirous of Sovereignty, generally beloved, and ſwelling with the immoderate favour of the Men of War, which were all at his devotion, left nothing elſe to be expected from him, but when he ſhould (as did his Grandſier Selymus) lay hand upon the Empire, and work his aged Fathers deſtruction. This miſchievous Plot by her deviſed, was not a little furthred by Ruſtan the great Baſſa, by whom paſſed all great matters; who nothing omitted, that could be ſlily deviſed for the diſgrace or confuſion of the young Prince. For he as a great ſecret, craftily told all them that were ſent Governours into Siria, that Muſtapha was ſecretly ſuſpected by his Father, of aſpiring to the Empire, and therefore charged them particularly, carefully to obſerve all his actions, with the manner of his Life and Government, and by their Letters diligently to advertiſe him of whatſoever they ſhould ſee or hear; bearing them in hand, that the more ſuſpiciouſly or odiouſly they ſhould write of him, the more gracious and acceptable it would be unto the great Sultan. Wherefore he by theſe Men oftentimes certified of the princely diſpoſition, courage, wiſdom, valour and bounty of Muſtapha, whereby he had won all Mens Hearts, doubted that he would at length be preferred to the Empire; yet durſt he not for all that adventure to temper with Solyman about that deteſtable conſpiracy againſt the innocent Prince, but ſtill delivering the Letters to the malicious Woman, left the reſt by her ungracious head to be wrought. And ſhe ſtill as occaſion beſt ſerved her purpoſe, ceaſed not with pleaſing allurements and flattery (wherein ſhe was moſt excellent) to infect Solymans mind, that whenſoever he ſhould chance to have any ſpeech of Muſtapha, ſhe might take the fitter occaſion to bring forth thoſe Letters. Neither was ſhe in her drift deceived, but having found a fit opportunity, with Tears trickling down her Cheeks (which to ſerve their turns ſubtil Women ſeldom want) ſhe told the Emperor in what danger he ſtood; recounting amongſt other things, how Selymus his Father had by ſuch means deprived Bajazet his Grandfather, both of his Life and Empire together; and therefore moſt inſtantly beſought him, as if it had altogether proceeded of a careful love, by that example warned to look to himſelf. But theſe light arguments of ſuſpicion ſeemed as they were indeed, unto Solyman ſcarce probable; ſo that ſhe little prevailed thereby. Which thing ſhe well perceiving, and inwardly grieved thereat, converted her cruel mind to other miſchievous devices, and ſought by all means how to poiſon the young Prince; neither wanted there wicked Men, as it were vowed to all kind of miſchief and villany, ready to have performed what ſhe deſired, had not Gods providence withſtood ſo horrible a practice. For whereas certain rich Apparel was by her ſent unto him in his Fathers name, he fearing the worſt, would not touch it before he had cauſed it to be worn by one of his Servants; by which curious warineſs (as it was thought) he for that time prevented the Treaſon of his wicked Stepdame, and made her malicious practice manifeſt to the World. Yet reſted ſhe not ſo, but was ſtill plotting new devices, tending all to one purpoſe; for being grown to that height of honour and power as never was Woman in the Othoman Court, and by the means of Trongilla a Jew (as it was thought) having bewitched the mind of the Turkiſh Emperor, ſhe ſtill grew more and more in favour, and obtained that her Sons might by turns be ſtill preſent in Court; of purpoſe, that by their daily preſence and continual flattery, they ſhould more and more procure their Fathers love; and if by chance Muſtapha ſhould come thither, ſhe might have the better means to diſpatch him; if not, to expect ſome other fit time, when ſhe might by ſome one or other mean take him away. But Muſtapha never coming (for why, the Emperors Sons uſe not without their Fathers leave to go out of the Provinces aſſigned unto them, or to come to Conſtantinople, but after the death of their Father to receive the Empire, attended upon with a number of Souldiers) ſhe eaſily deviſed another practice, that her Sons ſhould wait upon their Father, not in the City only, but in the Provinces alſo; ſo that Tzihanger, ſirnamed Crouchback, always followed his Father in the Camp. Certain years thus ſpent, and ſhe ſtill hammering her miſchievous devices; at length Fortune favouring her wicked deſire, got from the Baſſa which had the Government of Muſtapha and the Province of Amaſia (for as we have ſaid, every one of the Kings Sons hath with him one Baſſa, which is as it were his Lieutenant in adminiſtration of Juſtice and Martial Affairs) certain ſuſpicious Letters, wherein was contained, that there was a Speech of a Marriage to be made between Muſtapha and the Perſian Kings Daughter; which thing he thought good to give knowledge of to the Counſel, that if any harm ſhould enſue thereof, he might be out of all ſuſpicion. Theſe Letters being brought to Ruſtan, he thought he had now as good as half brought to paſs the long deſired ruin of Muſtapha; ſo making no ſtay, he opened the matter to Roxolana, and afterwards both together went to the Court, and declared all the matter to the Emperor; in doing whereof, they forced both their ungracious wits to fill his head, yet doubtful, with ſuſpicion, and to poſſeſs his mind with the fear of his own moſt dutiful Son; ſaying, That he as a proud and ambitious young Man, raviſhed with the deſire of ſo glorious an Empire, ſought againſt the Laws both of God and Nature, to take his Father out of the way, that ſo he might with more ſpeed ſatisfie his aſpiring mind. And to give the more credit to this their moſt falſe ſuggeſtion, they warned him of the alliance by him purpoſed with the Perſian King the ancient Enemy of the Othoman Emperors; wiſhing him to beware leſt Muſtapha ſupported by the ſtrength of Perſia, and the favour of the Sanzacks and Janizaries, whoſe love he had by bounty purchaſed, ſhould in ſhort time when he feared leaſt, together deprive him both of his Life and Empire. With theſe and ſuch like accuſations they ſo prevailed with the aged Man, whom they never ſuffered to reſt in quiet, that he at length reſolved to work his ſafety (as he ſuppoſed) by the death of his own Son, in this ſort:

Roxolana and Ruſtan together put Solyman in fear of his Son Muſtapha.

In the year 1552 he cauſed proclamation to be made almoſt in all the Provinces of his Empire, That foraſmuch as the Perſians without reſiſtance with a great Army invaded Syria, burning and deſtroying the Country before them, he to repreſs that their outragious inſolency, was enforced to ſend thither Ruſtan Baſſa with an Army; which according to his appointment was in ſhort time raiſed. Now when all things were in readineſs, as if it had been for ſuch a War as was pretended, he commanded Ruſtan, with as much ſecrecy and as little tumult as was poſſible, to lay hands upon Muſtapha, and to bring him bound to Conſtantinople; which if he could not conveniently effect, then by any other means to take him out of the way.

Solyman ſends Ruſtan Baſſa with an Army to take Muſtapha.

With this wicked and cruel charge Ruſtan with a ſtrong Army marched towards Syria. Muſtapha underſtanding of his coming, without delay with ſeven thouſand of the beſt Horſemen in all Turky made towards Syria alſo; whereof Ruſtan hearing, and perceiving that he could not (as he deſired) conveniently execute the cruel command of the unnatural Father, forthwith turned his back, and treading the ſame ſteps he came, returned with his Army to Conſtantinople with ſuch ſpeed, that he endured not to behold the very Duſt raiſed by Muſtapha's Horſemen, much leſs his preſence; giving it out, That he certainly underſtood that the Province was in quiet, (as indeed it was) and that he thereupon returned. But unto Solyman he told another Tale in ſecret, which he maliciouſly had deviſed, That he by moſt apparent ſigns and manifeſt preſumptions had perceived the whole Army ſo inclined towards Muſtapha, that if he ſhould have attempted any thing againſt him by plain force, he ſhould have been utterly forſaken, and had therefore in ſo dangerous a caſe left the matter as it was to his grave further direction. This Tale ſuſpiciouſly told, raiſed in the wicked and unnatural Father (nothing degenerating from the natural cruelty of his Anceſtors) new and great ſuſpicions, whereof to diſburden his diſquieted mind, he conceived with himſelf a moſt horrible device. Wherefore the year following, which was the year 1553, he raiſed a great Army; giving it out, That the Perſians had with greater power than before invaded Syria, and that therefore he for the love of his Country, and defence of his Empire, was determined to go thither with his Army, and in perſon himſelf to repreſs the attempts of his Enemies. Wherefore the Army being aſſembled, and all things neceſſary orderly provided, he commanded to ſet forward, and in few days after followed himſelf; who coming at length into Syria, preſently by truſty Meſſengers commanded Muſtapha to come unto him at Aleppo, for there he lay encamped. And yet for all theſe ſhadows, the matter was not ſo cloſely by Solyman conveied (although he was exceeding careful thereof) but that his mortal and deadly hatred againſt his Son was perceived by the Baſſaes and other great Men about him; inſomuch that Achmat Baſſa by a ſecret and truſty Meſſenger gave him warning thereof, that ſo he might in time the better provide for the ſafegard of his life. Neither could Muſtapha himſelf but marvel, that his aged Father without any apparent reaſon ſhould come ſo far with ſo great an Army; yet truſting to his own innocency, though wonderfully troubled and perplexed in mind, he reſolved (although it were with the extream danger of his life) to obey and yield to his Fathers command; for he thought it more commendable and honourable to incur the danger of death, than living to fall into the foul ſuſpicion of diſloyalty. In ſo great a perplexity of mind, after he had with himſelf much diſcourſed too and fro, what courſe he were beſt to take, at length he boldly and reſolutely asked the Doctor, whom (as we have before ſaid) he had always with him in his Court, Whether the Empire of the World, or a bleſſed Life were of Man more to be deſired? To whom the Doctor frankly anſwered, That the Empire of the World, to him that would enter into the due conſideration thereof, brought with it no felicity, more than a vain ſhew and outter appearance of good, nothing being more frail or uncertain than worldly Honour, bringing with it fear, vexation of mind, tribulation, ſuſpicion, murder, wrong, wickedneſs, ſpoil, ruin, and captivity, with infinite miſchiefs of like nature, not to be deſired of him that would attain to true felicity, by which means the bleſſed Life was to be loſt and not gained: But they unto whom God had given the grace rightly to conſider and weigh the fragility and ſhortneſs of this our Eſtate (which the common ſort deemeth to be the only life) and to ſtrive againſt the Vanities of this World, and to embrace and follow an upright kind of life, had had undoubtedly a place aſſigned for them in Heaven, and prepared by the great God, where they ſhould at length enjoy life and bliſs eternal. This anſwer of the great Doctor wonderfully ſatisfied the troubled mind of the young Prince, foreſeeing as it were the approach of his own end, and ſo ſtaying not any longer diſcourſe, forthwith ſet forwards towards his Father, and making great haſt, came at length to his Fathers Camp, and not far off pitched his Tents in the open Field. But this his ſo haſty coming the more encreaſed the ſuſpicion in the mind of his wicked Father; niether ſpared Ruſtan in the mean time with his crafty and ſubtil devices to augment the ſame; for by a ſign given he cauſed the Janizaries and chief Men in the Army to go as if it had been for Honours ſake to meet Muſtapha; which they all without delay preſently did at his command, and ſo all together ſet forward. In the mean time he the moſt crafty Varlet, with troubled countenance (for he could notably diſſemble) as a Man half diſmayed came in haſte into Solymans Pavillion, and falſly told him, That the Janizaries and almoſt all the beſt Souldiers of the Army were of themſelves without leave gon to meet Muſtapha, and that he feared what would enſue thereof. Which news ſo troubled the old Tyrant, that he became pale for fear, and going out of his Tent, and finding them gon, eaſily believed all to be true that the falſe Baſſa had told him. Neither wanted Muſtapha ſtrange warning of his end ſo near at hand; for the third day before his ſetting forwards toward his Father, falling aſleep in the Evening, he thought he ſaw his Prophet Mahomet in bright Apparel to take him by the hand and lead him into a moſt pleaſant place, beautified with moſt glorious and ſtately Palaces, and moſt delicate and pleaſant Gardens; and pointing to every thing with his Finger, to ſay thus unto him, Here reſt they for ever, which in this World have led an upright and godly Life, following Vertue, and deteſting Vice; and after that turning his Face to the other ſide, to have ſhewed him two great and ſwift Rivers, whereof the one boiled with Water blacker than Pitch, and in them appeared (as he thought) numbers of Men wallowing and tumbling, ſome up, ſome down, crying horribly for mercy; And there (ſaid he) are puniſhed all ſuch as in this frail life have been malicious workers of iniquity; the chief of whom (as he ſaid) were Emperors, Kings, Princes, and other great Men of the World. Muſtapha awaking, and troubled with this melancholy Dream, called unto him his Doctor; and having told him all the matter, asked him what the ſame might ſignifie? Who ſtanding a great while in a muſe (for the Mahometans are exceeding ſuperſtitious, attributing much to dreams) full of ſorrow and grief at length anſwered, That this Viſion (for ſo it pleaſed him to term it) was undoubtedly to be feared, as preſaging unto him the extream peril of his Life, and therefore requeſted him to have great care both of his Life and Honour. But Muſtapha as he was of a notable ſpirit and courage, regarding nothing that anſwer, ſtoutly replied, What, ſhall I ſuffer my ſelf to be terrified and overcome with childiſh and vain fear? Why rather haſte I not couragiouſly and reſolutely to my Father? And ſo much the more boldly, becauſe I know aſſuredly I have always (as reaſon was) reverenced his Majeſty, that againſt his Will I never turned mine Eies or Foot againſt his moſt Royal Seat, much leſs affected his Empire, except the moſt high God had called him to a better life; neither then without the general good liking and choice of the whole Army, that ſo I might at length without Murder, without Blood, without Tyranny, well and juſtly reign and in Love and Peace inviolate live with my Brethren; for I have ſet down with my ſelf, and choſen, if it be my Fathers pleaſure ſo, rather to die in his Obedience, than reigning many years, to be reputed of all Men, eſpecially my Competitors, a Rebel or Traitor. Having thus ſaid, he came unto his Fathers Camp, and pitching his Tents (as we have before ſaid) ſuted himſelf all in White, in token of his Innocency, and writing certain Letters (which the Turks when they are about to go to any place of danger, uſe to write, and always to carry with them, for they are wonderful fooliſh in their Superſtition) and putting them in his Boſom, attended upon with a few of his moſt truſty Followers, came with great reverence towards the Tent of his Father, fully reſolving to have kiſſed his Hand, as their uſual manner is. But when he was come to the entrance of the Tent, remembring that he had yet his Dagger girt to him, he entred not until he had put it off; becauſe he would not come into his Fathers ſight with any Weapon, if happily ſo he might clear himſelf of his Fathers needleſs ſuſpicion. So when he was come into the more inward Rooms of the Tent, he was with ſuch honour as belonged to his ſtate chearfully received by his Fathers Eunuchs. But ſeeing nothing elſe provided but one Seat whereon to ſit himſelf alone, he perplexed in mind, ſtood ſtill a while muſing; at length asked where the Emperor his Father was? Whereunto they anſwered, That he ſhould by and by ſee him; and with that caſting his Eye aſide, he ſaw ſeven Mutes (theſe are ſtrong Men bereft of their Speech, whom the Turkiſh Tyrants have always in readineſs, the more ſecretly to execute their bloody Butchery) coming from the other ſide of the Tent towards him; at whoſe ſight ſtrucken with a ſuddain terrour, ſaid no more, but Lo my death; and with that, ariſing, was about to have fled; but in vain, for he was caught hold on by the Eunuch and Mutes, and by force drawn to the place appointed for his death; where without further ſtay, the Mutes caſt a Bow-ſtring about his Neck, he poor Wretch ſtill ſtriving, and requeſting that he might ſpeak but two words to his Father before he died. All which the Murtherer (for no addition is ſufficient ſignificantly to expreſs his unnatural Villany) both heard and ſaw by a Travers from the other ſide of the Tent; but was ſo far from being moved with compaſſion, that thinking it long till he were diſpatched, with a moſt terrible and cruel voice he rated the Villains enured to blood; ſaying, Will you never diſpatch that I bid you? Will you never make an end of this Traitor, for whom I have not reſted one Night theſe ten Years in quiet? Which horrible commanding ſpeeches, yet thundering in their Ears, thoſe butcherly Mutes threw the poor innocent Prince upon the ground, and with the help of the Eunuchs forcibly drawing the knotted Bow-ſtring both ways, by the commandment of a moſt wicked Father, ſtrangled him. With like barbarous Cruelty, he ſhortly after cauſed Mahomet his Nephew (Muſtapha his Son) to be ſtrangled alſo.

glad of his Brothers coming. But as ſoon as he came unto the place where he ſaw his Brother lying dead upon the ground ſtrangled, it is not to be ſpoken how he was in mind tormented. He was ſcarcely come to the place where this deteſtable Murther was committed, when his Father ſent unto him certain of his Servants to offer unto him all Muſtapha's Treaſure, Horſes, Servants, Jewels, Tents, and withal, the Government of the Province of Amaſia, but Tzibanger filled with extream heavineſs for the unmerciful death of his well beloved Brother, ſpake unto them in this ſort. A wicked and an ungodly Cain, Traitor (I may not ſay Father) take thou now the Treaſures, the Horſes, the Servants, the Jewels, and the Province of Muſtapha. How came it into thy wicked, cruel, and ſavage Breaſt, ſo ungratiouſly and contrary to all Humanity, I will not ſay the Reverence of thine own Blood, to kill thy worthy, warlike, and noble Son, the Mirror of Courteſie, and Prince of greateſt hope, the like of whom, the Othoman Family never yet had, nor never ſhall? I will therefore my ſelf provide that thou, nor none for thee ſhall ever hereafter in ſuch ſort ſhamefully triumph over a poor crooked Wretch. And having thus much ſaid, ſtab'd himſelf with his own Dagger into the Body, whereof he in ſhort time died; Which ſo ſoon as it came to the old Tygers Ears, it is hard to ſay how much he grieved. His dead Body was by his Fathers commandment carried from Aleppo in Syria, to Conſtantinople, and afterwards honourably buried on the other ſide of the Haven at Pera. For all this bloody Tragedy, his covetous mind was not ſo troubled, but that he could forthwith command all Muſtapha's Treaſures and Riches to be brought to his Tent; which his Souldiers in hope to have the ſame given among them for a Prey, willingly haſted to perform. In the mean time the Souldiers which were in Muſtapha's Camp, not knowing what was become of their Maſter, ſeeing ſuch a multitude of Souldiers thruſting into their Camp without all order; to repreſs their tumultuous inſolency, ſtept out in their Armor, and notably repulſed them, not without much Bloodſhed.

The Tumult appeaſed by Achomat Baſſa.

At length, the noiſe of this ſtir was heard by the reſt of the Kings Souldiers, who ſeeing the Tumult to increaſe more and more, ran in to help their Fellows; ſo that in ſhort time there began a hot skirmiſh and cruel fight on both ſides, inſomuch that two thouſand were ſlain, and more wounded; neither had the broil ſo ended, had not Achomat Baſſa a grave Captain, and for his long experience of no ſmall Authority amongſt the Souldiers, kept back the Janizaries, and ſtaid their fury; and turning likewiſe to Muſtapha's Souldiers, by gentle and mild words and courteous perſwaſions, in this manner appeaſed their rage. What my Brethren (ſaid he) will you now (degenerating from your a[illegible]nt Loyalty, for which you have been for ſo many Ages commended) impugn the command of the great Sultan our dread Sovereign? Truly I cannot ſufficiently marvel what thing ſhould move you, whom I have hitherto proved to have been moſt worthy and valiant Souldiers, in this civil conflict to draw thoſe Weapons againſt your Fellows and Brethren, which you have moſt fortunately uſed againſt the Enemies of the Othoman Kings; except you mean thereby to make your ſelves a joyful ſpectacle unto your Enemies, who grieving to ſee themſelves overcome by your Victorious Weapons, may yet rejoice among themſelves to ſee you turn the ſame one upon another. Wherefore my Sons, for your ancient honours ſake, be careful that you do not by this your inſolency loſe the reputation of your Wiſdom, Loyalty, and Valor; for which you have hitherto been above all others commended; reſerve theſe your Weapons which you have now too too much uſed among your Fellows, againſt your Enemies, of whom you may get more Praiſe and Honour. This Speech of the old Baſſa ſo mollified the ſtout Souldiers, that they freely permitted all that was in Muſtapha's Tents to be carried to Solymans; but ſo ſoon as the death of Muſtapha was blown into the Ears of the Janizaries and the reſt of the Army in Solymans Camp, another Tumult roſe among them worſe than the firſt: They were quickly all up in Arms again, and with a great noiſe confuſed with Tears and Lamentation, as they were in rage and fury, brake violently into Solymans Pavillion with their drawn Swords; which ſtruck the Tyrant into ſuch a fear, that deſtitute of all Counſel in himſelf, he was about with the extream peril of his life to have fled; but being holden by his Friends, and making a Vertue of Neceſſity, upon the ſuddain adventured to do that which at better leiſure he would ſcarcely have thought upon; for going forth out of his Tent, but with a pale and wan Countenance, he ſpake unto the enraged Souldiers thus: What Broil is this? what Stir? what ſo great Inſolency? what mean your inflamed, fierce and angry Looks? know you not your Sovereign? and him that hath power to command you? Have you ſo reſolved to ſtain the ancient and invincible honour of your ſelves and your Anceſtors, with the Blood of your Lord and Emperor? Whilſt he was yet thus ſpeaking, the Souldiers boldly anſwered, That they denied not, but that he was the Man whom they many years before had choſen for their Emperor; but in that they had by their own Valour got for him a large and mighty Empire, and in like manner preſerved it; that was therefore of them done, that he ſhould for the ſame govern them vertuouſly and juſtly, and not to lay his bloody hands without diſcretion upon every juſt Man, and moſt wickedly embrue himſelf with innocent Blood; and that they came thither armed, they did it (as they ſaid) moved with juſt cauſe to revenge the unworthy death of guiltleſs Muſtapha; and that for that matter, he had no juſt cauſe to be angry with them. Wherefore they required, that they might publickly clear themſelves of the Treaſon whereof they were accuſed by Muſtapha's Enemies, and that the Accuſer might be brought forth to juſtifie his Accuſation; proteſting, that they would never lay down their Weapons, until the Accuſer made his appearance in Jugdment, and commenced his Accuſation judicially, upon pain to endure the like puniſhment if he failed in proof. Whilſt theſe things were in doing, the hainouſneſs of the late committed fact cauſed every Man to ſhed Tears, ſo that Solyman himſelf ſeemed to be ſorry for the Murther ſo lately by himſelf committed; wherefore he promiſed unto the Souldiers whatſoever they required, and did what he could to appeaſe their angry minds. For all that, they in the mean time, leſt he ſhould craftily ſlip away and deceive them of that he had promiſed, and of the expectation of ſuch things as they had required, with a marvellous care and diligence all kept Watch and Ward.

The Janizaries up in Arms againſt Solyman for the unworthy death of Muſtapha.

The ſtout ſpeech of Solyman to the Janizaries.

The fierce anſwer of the Janizaries to Solyman.

Ruſtan diſgraced by Solyman, flieth to Conſtantinople.

Solyman to appeaſe this fury of the Janizaries, deprived Ruſtan Baſſa of all his Honours, and took from him his Seal whereof he had the keeping, and delivered it to Achomates Baſſa. But Ruſtan worthily ſtrucken with fear and horror, ſeeing himſelf now in no ſafety in his own Tents, fled ſecretly to Achomates, asking his Counſel what were beſt for him to do, and what Courſe to take in ſo doubtful and dangerous a caſe? To whom the Baſſa anſwered, that it were beſt for him to uſe the great Emperors advice, and to do what he commanded. Which anſwer well ſatisfied Ruſtan; and ſo he which of late gave other Men acceſs unto the Emperor at his pleaſure, was now glad by his old Acquaintance and Friends to prefer this poor ſuit, To know his pleaſure what he would have him to do; from whom he received this anſwer, That he ſhould incontinently without further delay get him out of his ſight, and out of the Camp; which the Baſſa ſaid he could not conveniently do, being by his diſpleaſure and the Souldiers rage diſfurniſhed of all things neceſſary for his departure. Whereunto Solyman ſent him anſwer again, That he could give him neither longer time nor delay, and that it were beſt for him without more ado to be gone for fear of further harm. Whereupon Ruſtan guilty in conſcience of his moſt horrible Villany and Treachery, accompanied but with eight of his moſt faithful Friends inſtead of his late world of Followers, poſted in haſte to Conſtantinople, and there (not without danger of his Head) with Roxalana and other the complices and contrivers of the Treaſon againſt Muſtapha, in great fear expected the event of his Fortune.

This young Prince Muſtapha thus ſhamefully murthred by his own Father, was for his rare Vertues generally beloved of the Turks; but of the Souldiers moſt for his Martial Diſpoſition, and readineſs for the effuſion of Chriſtian Blood. The opinion they had conceived of him was ſuch, and their love ſo great, that they never thought there was any in the Othoman Family, of whom they expected ſo much for the enlarging of their Empire; inſomuch, that ever ſince, when in their private or publick Actions they fail of any great hope, they uſe this Proverb even at this day taken from him, Gietti Sultan Muſtapha, Sultan Muſtapha is dead; as who ſhould ſay, our hope is all loſt. Achomates Baſſa the great Champion of the Turks, a Man of exceeding Courage, not ignorant of the ſmall aſſurance of the great Honours of that State, at ſuch time as he received the Seal from Solyman, boldly told him, That as he did then frankly beſtow it upon him, ſo he would at one time or other to his no leſs diſgrace take it from him; to whom Solyman ſolemnly promiſed with an Oath, not to diſplace him ſo long as he lived. For all that, he had not long enjoyed that honour, but that Solyman falling in diſlike with him, and willing again to promote Ruſtan Baſſa to that great honour, greater than which there was none in the Turks Court, which by reaſon of his Oath he could not do ſo long as Achomates lived; To ſave his Oath, and to prefer his Son in Law (whom he had indeed diſplaced only to pleaſe the tumultuous Janizaries) reſolved to have Achomates put to death. Of which his purpoſe Achomates altogether ignorant, and one Morning after his wonted manner coming into the Divano in all his Honour, upon the ſuddain received word from Solyman, that he muſt preſently die, and forthwith was the Hangman ready to have ſtrangled him, as was given him in charge; whom the ſtout Baſſa thruſt from him with his hand, with countenance and chear in ſhew no more troubled than if the matter had nothing concerned him. And looking a good while round about him, eſpied at laſt an honeſt Man whom he had before many times pleaſured, whom he moſt earneſtly requeſted for all the kindneſs ſhewed unto him, to do him that laſt favour as to ſtrangle him with his own hand, which ſhould be unto him the greateſt good turn that he could poſſibly deviſe, deteſting nothing more than to die with the hand of the Executioner. Which thing, when he after much intreaty had undertaken to perform, Achomates willed him, that he ſhould not at one twitch ſtrangle him outright, but letting the Bowſtring ſlack again, give him leave once to breath and then to diſpatch him; which his requeſt was by his Friend accordingly performed, and he in that ſort ſtrangled; wherein it ſeemeth, that he was deſirous, firſt to taſte of Death, and not to die all at once. Immediately after whoſe death, Ruſtan Baſſa was again reſtored to his place of chief Viſier, and had the great Seal delivered unto him; which honour he enjoyed about ſix years after, and ſo at laſt died of the Dropſie. This was the end of theſe two great Baſſaes Achomates and Ruſtan, who in that time ſwaied that great Empire, under Solyman, and of whom we have ſo much ſpoken. It is reported, that Solyman having appointed Achomates to die, ſhould ſay, It is better for his great Heart once to die, than to die a thouſand times, in ſeeing his Honour taken from him and beſtowed upon another.

The Turks Gallies by the ſolicitation of the French before brought down into the Tuſcan Sea, did much harm upon the Coaſts of Calabria and Sicilia in this year 1554, as they had the year before, and ſo did divers years after. At which time alſo Pandulphus Contarenus the Venetian Admiral ſcouring alongſt the Seas, carefully looking to the Frontiers of the Venetian Eſtate, chanced to meet with the Baſſa of Callipolis, who in the year before had rifled certain Venetian Merchants; in revenge of which injury he ſet upon him, and after a great Spoil made both of the Turks and their Gallies, he ranſacked Dirrachium then one of the Turks Port Towns in Dalmatia.

1555.

The next year 1555, the ſame Baſſa recovered his ſtrength; but not daring to be too buſie with the Venetians, ſurpriſed the Iſlands of Blumbis and Elba, ſubject to the Duke of Florence, and withal ſent Letters to Solyman, to perſwade him to take up Arms againſt the Venetians, as they which had broken the League.

1556.

Zigeth beſieged by the Baſſa of Buda.

At the ſame time, Haly the Baſſa of Buda by Policy ſurpriſed the ſtrong Caſtle of Baboza in Hungary; and was in good hope by the like fineneſs to have taken the Town and Caſtle of Zigeth, a place of great importance; but failing of his purpoſe, he came the next year 1556, with a great Army, and the thirteenth day of June encamped before the Town, wherein was Governor Marchus Horwath a valiant Captain, with a Garriſon of notable Souldiers. Shortly after he began a moſt terrible Battery; during which time the Chriſtians ſallying out divers times, ſlew many of his Men; who for all that uſed ſuch diligence, that the twentieth of June they won the uttermoſt Wall, and after five hot Aſſaults were in hope at the ſixth to have won the Caſtle alſo; but the Chriſtians perceiving the danger, reſolutely ſallied out, and having ſlain eight hundred of them, drave the reſt again from the Wall. Yet the Turks gave it not ſo over, but with a great number of Carts laboured to have filled up the Marriſh and Ditches about the Town, which their Attempt was by the induſtry of the Defendants alſo defeated. The Baſſa perceiving how hardly the Town would be won by force, attempted to have perſwaded them to have yielded it up by compoſition; but failing therein of his purpoſe, began again the twelfth of July to aſſault the City, which Aſſault he maintained five days together without intermiſſion, ſtill ſending in freſh Men inſtead of them that were wearied or ſlain; yet was the City for all that by the Valour of the Chriſtians notably defended. So when he had in vain proved the uttermoſt of his Forces, he raiſed his Siege the one and twentieth day of July and departed; but within ſix days after, he retuened from the City Quinque Eccleſiæ, and and aſſaulted the City afreſh; but was at length glad to give over the Siege and be gone, when he had loſt of his beſt Souldiers above two thouſand, and of the Defendants ſlain but an hundred and twenty. After his departure there was ten thouſand great Shot found, wherewith he had battered the Town and the Caſtle, which was for this time thus worthily defended. The Turks in the mean time after their wonted manner ceaſed not to do what harm they could in the Tuſcan Sea, and had again miſerably ſpoiled the Iſland of Corſica; for withſtanding of whom the Biſhop of Rome exacted of his People a great Subſidy, and finely ſtript the Jews of their Mony, and ſeiſed upon their rich Merchants Goods in his Territory. At whoſe earneſt ſuit Solyman in their behalf writ unto the Biſhop as followeth:

Sultan Solyman, moſt Mighty Emperor of Emperors, the Son of Selymus, Emperor of Emperors, to whom God give eternal Victory; to Pope Paulus the Fourth, Greeting.

Solymans Letters to the Pope in behalf of the Jews Merchants.

Moſt excellent and moſt mighty Lord of the Profeſſors of the Meſſias Jeſu, and Lord of Rome, the Almighty keep thee. At ſuch time as thou ſhalt receive our Seal, thou ſhalt underſtand by our Letters, that certain Hebrews have come unto us, complaining, that they are oppreſſed of thee with too grievous Exactions, when they come to traffique at Ancona; This burthen I requeſt thee to take from them, and to reſtore again unto them their Goods, that thereby they may be able to pay to us our Tribute; which if thou (as I hope thou wilt) ſhalt do, thou ſhalt feel our Favour. Farewel. From Conſtantinople the laſt of the bleſſed Month * Rambeluch, in the year of our great Prophet Mahomet, nine hundred threeſcore and four.

Haly Baſſa beſiegeth Zigeth again.

Haly Baſſa grieved with the late repulſe he had received at Zigeth, came again the next year, and beſieged it, at which time King Ferdinand ſent Nicholaus Polwiler and the Count Serinus with a Power raiſed in Suevia and Auſtria, to recover Baboza, a Caſtle betwixt Zigeth and Stiria, before ſurpriſed by the Turks; of whoſe coming the Baſſa having intelligence, roſe with his Army and departed from Zigeth, which he had for certain Months hardly beſieged, and not far from Baboza met with Polwiler and Serinus; who joyning Battel with him, after a hard and ſharp Fight overthrew him and put him to Flight. This Victory with the coming down of young Ferdinand, King Ferdinands Son, Archduke of Auſtria with new Supplies, ſo terrified the Turks in that part of Hungary along the River Dravus, that they for fear forſook Baboza, Sammartin, San-Lawrence, and divers other ſmall Caſtles which they had before taken, and fled to Quinque Eccleſiæ.

Haly Baſſa overthrown.

The Governor of Zigeth encouraged herewith, ſallying out with his Garriſon, ſlew many of the Turks in their Flight towards Quinque Eccleſiæ, and meeting by chance with a Troop of Horſemen, which were bringing the Turks Pay, overthrew them, took the Mony, and ſo with an exceeding rich Prey returned to his Caſtle. At which time alſo Adam the Governor of Rab, otherwiſe called Javarinum, having burnt the Suburbs of Alba Regalis, and driven away many thouſands of Cattle, at a Town called Sian overthrew five hundred Turks, and as many fugitive Chriſtians, and ſo with a great Prey and little or no loſs at all of his Men returned.

Henry the French King ſoliciteth Solyman to invade the King of Spain his Territories

Henry the French King at the ſame time in Wars with Philip King of Spain, and troubled with the loſs of his Army overthrown not far from Saint Quintins (at which time the Duke Montmorency Conſtable of France and General of the Army, with his Son and divers other of the Nobility of France were taken Priſoners) by his Embaſſador Michael Condignac ſolicited Solyman to have by Sea invaded Naples and Sicilia, ſo to have withdrawn the Spaniſh Forces out of France, to defend their own Frontiers. Which thing Solyman, offended with the inſolency of the Embaſſador, refuſed to do; yet nevertheleſs commanded his adventurers all alongſt the Coaſt of Africk, to infeſt thoſe Seas, and to do what harm they could upon the Coaſt of Italy and Sicilia; which they ſo diligently performed, that the Viceroy of Sicilia was fain for defence of thoſe Countries to lie in readineſs with his Gallies in the Ports of Cajeta and Naples.

In the mean time the Guiſe, Lord Grand Prior of the Knights of Saint Johns in France (and Brother of Francis the Duke of Guiſe, General of the French Kings Army in Italy, who upon the overthrow received at Saint Quintins, called out of Italy, ſhortly after took Cajais) Admiral of the Gallies of Malta, went out toward the Eaſt with four Gallies well appointed, to lie in wait for the Turks, and by fortune met with two great Ships laded with the Turks Merchandize, which he took; and by and by after, light upon four of the Turks Gallies, with whom he had a great Fight; yet at length having ſunk one of them and burnt another, he took the other two. After which Victory returning towards Malta to have repaired his Gallies and cured his wounded men, he was met with four other great Gallies of the Turks; who deſirous to revenge the loſs of their Fellows, ſet upon him, and he ſeeing now no remedy, but that he muſt needs fight couragiouſly, encountred them. But foraſmuch as he had in the two Fights before loſt ſome of his Men, and ſeventy two of the Knights in the Gallies lay ſore wounded, he, by the Counſel of the Captains retired towards Malta; but by the way one of his Gallies was taken by the Turks, with two and fifty Knights of the Order; yet with the reſt and the Prizes before taken, he recovered the Iſland of Malta, where he ſtaied that Winter; and the next Spring ſailed into France to be partaker of thoſe troubles, which beginning ſhortly after, have but of late taken end.

The immoderate Fortune of the great Sultan Solyman, was not in any thing more contrary to his deſire, than in the proof of thoſe his Children, of whom the World held the greateſt expectation. Muſtapha his eldeſt Son, the Mirror of Courteſie, and rare hope of the whole Turkiſh Nation, the ſuſpitious Tyrant had moſt unnaturally cauſed to be murdered in his own preſence, to the grief of all his Subjects in general, as is before declared; poor Tzibanger was dead for ſorrow; and Mahometes his eldeſt Son by his beſt beloved the fair Roxolana, was departed this life alſo. So that now remained unto him only Selymus, the unworthy Heir of ſo great an Empire, and Bajazet his younger Brother, the lively image of his Father, both Men grown, and the Sons of the ſame Roxolana; but ſo far differing the one from the other both in Feature of Body and Diſpoſition of Mind, as if they had not been of the ſame Kindred and Line. Selymus the elder Brother, moſt like unto his Mother, was in the ſecret determination of the aged Emperor his Father appointed Heir of that moſt mighty Empire. Bajazet much reſembling his Father, was on the other ſide ſtrongly ſupported by the care and entire love of his Mother; which whether it proceeded of a ſecret commiſeration of his inevitable Deſtiny, or that he had by Loyalty or other means ſo won her Favour, is not known; but every Man ſaw, that if it had lien in her Power, ſhe would undoubtedly have preferred him before his elder Brother Selymus, and have placed him in the Empire; but ſhe muſt needs give way to her old Husbands Will, firmly and irremovably ſet down, that the Deſtinies ſo permitting, none ſhould reign after him but his eldeſt Son Selymus. Of which his purpoſe and reſolution Bajazet being not ignorant, began moſt circumſpectly to look about about him, if he could by any means fruſtrate that forcible neceſſity, and exchange his certain deſtruction with an Empire; in which his deep and dangerous cogitations he was not a little comforted by the favour and love of Roxolana his Mother, and of Ruſtan the great Baſſa his Brother in Law; who together had in any other matter been able to have overruled the aged Emperor. Whereupon he reſolutely ſet down himſelf, rather to end his days by making proof of good or bad Fortune, than upon the death of his Father (which by Courſe of Nature could not now be far off) to be as a Sacrifice baſely butchered by ſome vile Hangman of his Brothers. Bajazet ſo reſolved, and now already fallen out with his Brother Selymus, took occaſion upon the general diſcontentment of the People and others, for the unworthy death of Muſtapha their late joy, to begin thoſe ſtirs which he had before with himſelf plotted, and ſo to make a Head, whereunto he might afterward join the Body alſo; for why, that worthy Muſtapha had left behind him ſo great deſire of himſelf, that now it wearied many to live after him, they had ſo placed all the hope of their good Fortune in him, unto whom nothing was more deſired than to revenge the wrong done unto him, or elſe to run the ſame hard Fortune with him; otherſome guilty of the immoderate Affection they had born unto him yet living, and fearing to be called to give an account thereof, thought any ſtate better and more aſſured than that wherein they preſently ſtood, and therefore ſought all occaſions of new ſtirs, how to ſet all in an hurly burly; only a Captain was wanting, Muſtapha could not again be revived, yet might he be ſtrongly ſuppoſed to live. This device pleaſed Bajazet, as beſt fitting his purpoſe, being not ignorant of this diſpoſition of the People. Wherefore by certain of his moſt faithful and truſty Followers he found out a certain obſcure Fellow of a notable audacity, which ſhould take upon him the Name and Perſon of Muſtapha, whoſe Stature alſo and Countenance and Proportion of Body differed not much from Muſtapha himſelf; he, as if he had by chance eſcaped, firſt began to ſhew himſelf in that part of Thracia, which is above Conſtantinople, and lieth toward Danubius, not far from the Countries of Moldavia and Valachia, and was for that cauſe both fitteſt for Rebellion, and alſo beſt ſtored with Horſemen, who of all others moſt honoured Muſtapha. Hither he comes as if it had been from a long journey, ſlenderly accompanied, and as if he had been deſirous at the firſt not to have been known; his Followers being demanded (as it chanced) who it was, did rather fearfully give them that asked, occaſion to gheſs, than plainly to tell them, that it was Muſtapha; neither did he himſelf much deny it; whereby the People became more and more deſirous to know him. Which beginning thus laid, he afterward began to rejoyce of his fortunate coming thither, and to give God thanks for his ſafe arrival there amongſt his Friends; he tells them, That at ſuch time as he was ſent for by his Father, he durſt not come into his ſight, or commit himſelf unto him in his Fury, but by the counſel of his Friends to have with great promiſes perſwaded one that was marvellous like unto himſelf to go in his ſtead; by whoſe danger he might make proof of his Fathers mind towards him; who before he was admitted to the ſpeech of his Father, was without hearing miſerably ſtrangled, and ſo caſt out before his Pavilion, at which time there were many (as he ſaid) which perceived the deceit, but the greater part remained in error, deceived with the Lineaments and Countenance of the miſerable dead Man, who was much altered with the terrible pains of death, and ſuppoſing it to have been him indeed that was ſlain. Which thing as ſoon as he underſtood, he thought it not good longer to ſtay, but preſently to flie and to provide for his own ſafety; and ſo flying with a few of his own Followers, thereby the more ſecretly and ſafely to eſcape; and having paſſed above Pontus by the People of Boſphorus, was now come thither, where he was in good hope to find much help and comfort in the Fidelity of his Friends, whom he requeſted not now to forſake him, or to make leſs account of him diſgraced by the malice of his Step-Mother, than they had before in time of his Proſperity. For that he was aminded to revenge the injury done unto him, and by force of Arms to defend himſelf; for what elſe had he now left? being by no other means preſerved, but by the death of another Man; that he had ſufficiently proved how his Father ſtood affected towards him, and that he now lived by his miſtaking, not by his Kindneſs. The cauſe of all which his troubles was his Stepdame, who (as he ſaid) with her inchantments led the ſilly old Man (now almoſt doating for Age, and mad for love) whither ſhe would at her pleaſure, and by her Agent Ruſtan Baſſa forced him forward headlong into all kind of miſchief; but that God be thanked he wanted not his Friends, by whoſe help he would find a way out of theſe miſeries, and take revenge of his Enemies; for why, he had as yet couragious Hearts, and the Janizaries with the greater part of his Fathers Family on his ſide, and that great multitudes of People would flock unto him upon brute of his Name; ſo that they which did now mourn for him as dead (in number many) would by heaps run to help him being alive; ſo that they there preſent would only courteouſly receive him as a Gueſt, and protect him now diſtreſſed, till ſuch time as his welwillers and Friends might repair unto him. And this at laſt he gave out not in ſecret, but openly to all Men whereſoever he came. The ſame things did they alſo report, whom he made the People to believe to have been the Companions of his Flight; which was alſo confirmed by divers of good Account and Authority, whom Bajazet had before dealt withal to that purpoſe. So that a great number of Men altogether unknown to Bajazet, were by that means ſeduced; for this matter was ſo cunningly wrought, that many of them that had known Muſtapha alive, and ſeen him laid dead before his Fathers Pavilion, yet liſted not greatly to believe that which they knew, but eaſily ſuffered themſelves to be perſwaded that this was the true Muſtapha. But the Companions and Followers of Muſtapha (in whoſe minds the lively Countenance and Remembrance of him was throughly ingraven) nothing could deceive; yet blinded partly with fear, partly with grief and deſire of revenge, and wiſhing rather to adventure any thing, than longer to live without Muſtapha, were the firſt Men that came to offer their ſervice to this counterfeit Muſtapha; and would not ſuffer other Men to doubt but that this was the very Muſtapha, which was falſly reported to have been ſlain. As for the deceiver himſelf, he either kept with him, or entertained them that came, ſome with fair promiſes, ſome with courteous Speeches, and many alſo with Mony and Rewards, which he made them believe he had reſerved of the Relicks of his better Fortune; for Bajazet had before notably provided, that nothing ſhould in this behalf be wanting unto him for the countenancing of his Credit. So within the ſpace of a few days ſuch a multitude of Men was reſorted unto him, as might almoſt have made a whole Army.

Solyman angry with the Sanzacks, for not ſuppreſſing the ſuppoſed Muſtapha, ſendeth Partau Baſſa againſt him.

When Solyman upon the ſuddain was advertiſed by the fearful Meſſengers and Letters of the Sanzacks thereabouts, what a danger was like to enſue by the concourſe of ſo great a Multitude of People to this counterfeit Muſtapha; he preſently ſuſpecting (as the truth was) that this was not done without the privity of one of his Sons, thought it not a thing to be neglected, and therefore by his Letters reproved the Sanzacks thereby, that they had ſuffered the matter to run ſo far, and had not in the beginning as their Duty was, ſuppreſſed the ſame, grievouſly threatning them, if they did not with all ſpeed ſend unto him in bonds that counterfeit Companion with the reſt of his Complices. Which that it might be the eaſilier by them performed, he promiſed to ſend one of the chief Baſſaes, namely Partau Baſſa (who had married the Widow of Mahometes the eldeſt Son of Roxolana, of whom we have before remembred) and with him a ſtrong power of the Souldiers of the Court; but if they would have themſelves excuſed, that they ſhould of themſelves diſpatch the matter before the coming of that Aid. This Partau led after him certain Squadrons of Souldiers, not ſo many in number, as notable for their Fidelity; for Solyman had cauſed the moſt faithful of his Colonels, Captains, and Corporals, to be culled out; wiſely doubting leſt his Souldiers, either led with Affection, or corrupted with Reward, might take part with him againſt whom they were ſent. For the common ſort of the Janizaries ſtanding in ſuſpence at the fame of Muſtapha, and expectation of ſome great novelty, favoured that broil, and wiſhed all on an hurly burly; neither was the matter indeed without danger. The Sanzacks after they had received this ſtrait charge from Solyman, conſidering how much it ſtood them upon to make a ſpeedy diſpatch, began now to incourage one another to beſtir themſelves, to make all the ſpeed poſſible, and with all their Power on every ſide to oppoſe themſelves againſt the attempts of this new found Muſtapha, labouring to ſtay ſuch as were coming unto him, and to diſperſe ſuch as were already come, by ſhewing them the greatneſs of the danger, and threatning them with all extremities. In the mean time Partau Baſſa came on with his Army, and was not now far off; when (as in like caſe it oftentimes falleth out in things not yet ſufficiently confirmed, and by celerity prevented) the Souldiers of the counterfeit Muſtapha ſeeing themſelves beſet on every ſide, began to fear, and at firſt ſome few to ſlip away; but afterwards all, without regard of ſhame or of their promiſe, to forſake their Captain and flie every Man whither he thought beſt. The Captain ſeeking likewiſe to have made ſhift for himſelf, was with the chief of his Counſellors and Followers taken by the Sanzacks and delivered unto the Baſſa, who with a ſtrong Guard ſent them all in bonds to Conſtantinople; where Solyman by moſt exquiſite Torments drew from them all the ſecret devices of his young Son Bajazet, and that he had purpoſed after ſuch a Head made by this ſuppoſed Muſtapha, as he thought covenient, to have upon the ſuddain joined himſelf with a great Power, and ſo as ſhould beſt ſerve for his purpoſe, to have gone directly to Conſtantinople, or elſe againſt his Brother Selymus. But whilſt he goeth ſomewhat too ſlowly about his buſineſs, his unripe Counſels were by his Fathers Celerity oppreſſed.

Muſtapha and his Companions drowned by night

Of all which matter Solyman now throughly aſſured, cauſed the ſuppoſed Muſtapha and his Companions at Midnight to be drowned in the Sea; thinking it not good to have theſe things commonly known, and to have his domeſtical wounds yet bleeding, laid open to the view of his Neighbour Princes. Nevertheleſs being mightily offended with Bajazet for ſo great an inſolency, he ceaſed not to caſt in his mind how to be revenged upon him; which his Wife Roxolana, a Woman of great Wiſdom, was not ignorant of.

Roxolana intreateth Solyman for Bajazet her younger Son, and obtaineth his pardon.

Who after a few days, at ſuch time as the old Mans Fury was overpaſt, falling of purpoſe into talk with him about the matter, ſhe laid together in her Sons behalf, and alledged the indiſcreetneſs of Youth, the neceſſity of the Fact, and the example of his Anceſtors in like caſe, that it was ſo provided for by nature, that every Man ſhould be careful of himſelf and his, and that all Men did indifferently ſhun Death, that young Men were by evil Counſel eaſily ſeduced and made to forget their Duty. That it were reaſon he ſhould forgive him this firſt Fault; which if he amended, then was it a great gain for the Father to have ſaved his Son; but if he ſhould again fall into relapſe, there would not want time to puniſh him for both Faults; And that if ſo be he would not pardon him for his own ſake; yet he would vouchafe to pardon him for hers, entreating now for him for whom ſhe had before groaned, and not to be cruel upon him, one of the Pledges of their Love, in whom reſted the Blood of them both; for in what woful caſe ſhould ſhe be, if of thoſe two Sons (all that God had left her) the Fathers Severity ſhould bereave her of the one? Wherefore ſhe requeſted him to moderate his Anger, and to prefer his Clemency before his juſt Indignation; foraſmuch as God himſelf of all Power and Might, did not always deal with Sinners in Severity, but for moſt part in Mercy; whereas otherwiſe all mankind would not ſuffice his Wrath. And would Mercy in any place be more fitting, than in the Father towards his Child? She promiſed further, that Bajazet ſhould from thenceforth remain in moſt dutiful Obedience towards his Majeſty; and upon his ſo great Clemency, to convert the fear wherein he now lived, into a World of Duty and Devotion. Honourable minds (ſhe ſaid) were retained with nothing more than with Kindneſs and Courteſie; that the remembrance of that his Fatherly Forgiveneſs ſhould be a ſtay unto him, for ever doing the like again; at laſt, that ſhe would promiſe for him, and take upon her, that he ſhould for ever afterwards ſatisfie his Fatherly expectation in all kind of Duty and Loyalty. Which words mingled with Tears and other Womanly Geſtures, ſo wrought with Solyman, being otherwiſe too much in her power, that he reſolved to forgive the Fault; yet ſo, that he ſhould come and ſubmit himſelf, and receive from him his charge. This careful Mother foreſlows no time, but by Letters ſecretly advertiſed Bajazet not to fear to come unto his Father at ſuch time as he ſhould be ſent for; aſſuring him that there was no danger, for that his Father was by her means appeaſed, and he again brought into his favour. With which good News Bajazet well comforted, reſolved to go at ſuch time as he was ſent for; yet full of fear, and oftentimes looking back unto his Brother Muſtapha, whoſe dreadful example ſufficiently warned him what a danger he adventured himſelf unto. Yet he came to the place appointed for the Parley, which was in a common Inn at a place called Careſtran a few miles from Conſtantinople; for ſuch is the ſuſpicious manner of the Turkiſh Tyrants of theſe times, not to ſuffer any of their Sons that be Men grown, to ſet their Foot within the Gates of Conſtantinople, as dangerous for ſoliciting the Souldiers of the Court, and ſo conſequently for the altering of the State. Bajazet was no ſooner lighted from his Horſe, but his Fathers Guard was preſently ready to receive him, commanding him to lay aſide his Sword and Dagger; which thing though it be an uſual matter in others that are admitted to the preſence of the Turkiſh Emperor, yet might it then in the mind of his guilty Son raiſe a great fear. But his kind Mother (who had before ſeen in what fear and perplexity he would come) had conveighed her ſelf into a Chamber faſt by the entrance of the ſame Houſe Bajazet was to paſs, where out of a little Caſement covered with a thin Linnen Cloth, ſhe called unto him in paſſing by, in theſe few words, Corcoma oglan, Corcoma; which is as much to ſay, Fear not my Son, fear not; with which ſhort Speech Bajazet was not a little both comforted and encouraged. But as ſoon as he was come into his Fathers Preſence, and had done his Duty, Solyman commanded him to ſit down by him; then began the grim Sire grievouſly to reprove him of raſhneſs and want of diſcretion in taking up Arms, which he could not otherwiſe conceive of but as taken up againſt himſelf. And admit they were as he would have it, and the beſt that he could make of it, taken up againſt his elder Brother, yet was it nevertheleſs a great preſumption and moſt wicked Fact. Neither was there any want in him, but that the whole ſtate of the Mahometan Religion (which at this day reſteth upon the Othoman Family) had by his Domeſtical Diſcord been ſore ſhaken, and brought in peril of utter ruin, to the great Injury, Reproach, and Contempt of his Majeſty, a moſt deteſtable and horrible Crime, which could not with condign puniſhment be revenged. Yet for all that, he had determined to pardon him, and to ſhew himſelf rather a kind Father, than a ſevere Judge; ſo that he would from thenceforth leave the care of future things to God; foraſmuch as none of theſe things are done by our appointment, but that Kingdoms and Monarchies are beſtowed as beſt pleaſeth him; ſo that if it were his Deſtiny to enjoy the Empire after his death, he ſhould be ſure thereof as of a thing that would of it ſelf come unto him, and was not by any Mans power to be kept from him, as that which was by God ordained for him; but if it were otherwiſe appointed by God, then were it a mad thing for him to labour in vain to ſtrive againſt the Will of God, and as it were to fight with God. Wherefore he ſhould now as one well warned, ceaſe to rage and ſtorm, and not to moleſt his quiet Brother, or trouble him his aged Father; for that if he ſhould again fall and raiſe new ſtirs, it would aſſuredly fall upon his own head, neither would any place of mercy be found for his ſecond offence, and that he ſhould then find him not as now, his gentle Father, but a moſt ſevere and revenging Judge. Which when he had ſaid, and Bajazet had thereunto briefly anſwered as the time would permit, rather craving pardon for his Treſpaſs, than excuſing that was not to be excuſed, and promiſing from thenceforth to live moſt loyally at his Command; Solyman according to the manner of that Nation called for Drink, which he commanded to be given to Bajazet, who not daring to refuſe it, although he had rather have ſo done, drank thereof what he thought good, doubting leſt that ſhould have been his laſt; of which fear his Father forthwith delivered him by drinking a good draught of the ſame Cup. So Bajazet, though guilty, having with better ſucceſs ſpoken with his Father than had his Brother Muſtapha, returned again to the former place of his charge.

Bajazet returneth to his charge.

This hapned in the year 1555, from which time Bajazet ſo long as Roxolana his Mother lived, behaved himſelf with all dutiful and Brotherly Kindneſs both towards his Father and his Brother; and that rather for to keep her favour, and not to cut off the hope which he had only in her Affection towards him, than for any confidence he had in his Fathers Kindneſs, or for any Love he bare to his Brother; the regard of her being the only thing that kept his fierce Nature in quiet. But ſhe dead about two years after, he as a Man bereft of all hope of long Life, and diſcharged of all Bonds of Duty, fell to his former Courſe, and began more grievouſly than before, to revive the old grudges betwixt him and his Brother, ſometime ſeeking by ſecret practices to have him made away, and other ſometimes by open force entring into his Province, which was not far off, there evil intreated ſome of his Brothers Followers as he light upon, for their Maſters ſake, omitting nothing which he thought might tend to the diſgrace of him whom of all other he wiſhed dead. He had alſo certain of his Favorites at Conſtantinople, by whom he cunningly wrought by all means to gain the Love of the Souldiers of the Court, and doubted not as occaſion ſerved to paſs over thither himſelf, and there to lurk in ſecret with ſuch as were of his Faction, and privy to his Deſignments. Of all which things Solyman had knowledg, but eſpecially by Letters from Selymus, wherein he was alſo adviſed to have care of his own ſafety; for that he was far deceived, if he perceived not, that theſe Preambles of Bajazets wicked intentions, would at laſt turn upon his Head, who regarded neither God nor Man, ſo that he might alone reign; unto whoſe unruly deſires his Fathers Welfare was no leſs a bar, than was his Brothers, and therefore through his Sides was his Life ſhot at, which Treaſon had (as he ſaid) been of long time plotted, and now occaſion ſought to have the ſame performed; wherefore he ſhould take heed that he were not by ſuch Treachery overwhelmed before he were aware thereof; That for himſelf he could eaſily bear with the injuries of his Brother Bajazet, yet could not chuſe but be moved with the greatneſs of his Fathers dangers. By which means Solymans hatred againſt Bajazet was ſtill more and more increaſed. Wherefore he by Letters put him in remembrance of his Duty, how courteouſly he had uſed him, and again what he had on his part promiſed; that there would not alwaies be place for forgiveneſs; that he ſhould therefore ceaſe to wrong his Brother and trouble his Father; that he had but a ſhort time to live, and that after his death God would aſſign each of them their Fortunes. But all this was to no purpoſe with Bajazet, fully ſet down to hazard whatſoever, rather than as a Beaſt to have his Throat cut by his Brother; which thing he as plainly ſaw would betide him in the Reign of Selymus, as if it had been then in execution. Yet he anſwered to his Fathers commands not impertinently, but his deeds agreed not with his ſayings, neither did he alter any thing of his intended purpoſe. Which thing as ſoon as Solyman perceived, he thought it beſt to take another Courſe, and to remove his Sons both farther from himſelf, and alſo farther the one from the other. Wherefore he gave them to underſtand, That it was his pleaſure that both of them within a certain prefixed time ſhould depart out of their Governments (Bajazet being then Governor of Cutai, and Selymus of Magneſia) and that now Bajazet ſhould remove to Amaſia, and Selymus to Iconium. Selymus was without imputation, and altogether in favour with his Father; yet becauſe no occaſion ſhould be given Bajazet to fall into extremities if he ſhould have been removed alone, Solyman to ſeem indifferent, commanded them both to remove; unto which command it was adjoyned, that the further they were off one from another, they ſhould be ſo much the nearer in mind and Brotherly love: for as much as nearneſs of dwelling of the Great, did many times hinder their good agreement, whilſt by forwardneſs of Officers many things are on both ſides done to the grieving of their Maſters; and that they ſhould in any caſe do as they were commanded, and that he which ſtaid longeſt ſhould not be free from the ſuſpicion of Contempt.

Bajazet unwilling to go to Amaſia, ſeeketh delays.

Selymus made no long ſtay, as he that knew a great part of all this to be done for his ſake; but Bajazet hung back, and being gon a little on his way, ſtaid, complaining of the unlucky Province of Amaſia, ſtained with the Blood of his late Brother the Noble Muſtapha, to be aſſigned unto him as ominous, and that he could be better contented with any Province whatſoever, than that, where the deadly remembrance of the miſerable end of the neareſt unto him in Blood, ſhould be ever before his Eyes, to the wounding of his Heart; Wherefore he requeſted that he might at leaſt winter in thoſe places, or elſe there from whence his Brother was now departed; but Solyman would in no wiſe hearken unto him. Now Selymus gon before certain days Journies with ſuch Troops as his Father had ſent him beſide his own, for fear of Bajazet, who yet ſtaid loitring and trifling on the time, ſuddainly returning and fetching a compaſs about, ſhewed himſelf at his Brothers Back, marching towards Pruſa in Bithynia, the ancient Seat of the Turkiſh Kings; which he did not without the privity of his Father, who liked not of the lingring of Bajazet; for what if he, having gained the good Will of the Janizaries, ſhould have gon either to Pruſa, or directly to Conſtantinople? what a danger might have grown thereby to Selymus, yea unto the whole State in general? In this common fear, Solyman thought it beſt for Selymus there to ſtay, from whence they might moſt conveniently help one another, if Bajazet ſhould (as was feared) turn himſelf upon either of them. Yet was not Selymus ſo ſtrong as to adventure to joyn Battel with his Brother, whom he knew ready to put all to the hazard of one day. But when Bajazet (contrary to his expectation) ſaw Selymus behind him, and that he had got nothing by his long delay, but that his Brother ſhould be the undoutbed Heir of the Empire if his Father ſhould die, which was then by reaſon of his ſickly conſtitution of Body dayly more and more feared; he writ unto his Father, accuſing his Brother, That he could not more manifeſtly in any thing declare how maliciouſly he was affected towards him, than by taking that indirect Courſe, to no other purpoſe but to aſpire unto the Empire, and to have a ſhort cut over to Conſtantinople, if he ſhould have any news of his Fathers death, which he ſtill gaped after; which his longing, if his Fathers longer Life ſhould delay, then by the ſecret Miniſters of his Treaſon to diſpatch him, and by the murdring of him to poſſeſs himſelf of the Empire; and yet neverthelaſs, this man as a moſt dutiful and obedient Son, to be of him much made of, and as it were put in his Boſom. Whereas he on the contrary part meaning well, into whoſe conceit never any ſuch thought came, but was ever at command, was not had in any regard, but caſt off and contemned, whoſe greateſt requeſt was but to ſhun an unfortunate ominous Province. After that, he converted his ſtyle to Prayers, requeſting again of his Father, to gratifie him with ſome other Province, if it were but that from which his Brother was departed, or with any other whatſoever, ſo that it were more lucky than that of Amaſia; for anſwer whereof he ſaid he would ſtay where he was, to the end that finding favour in his requeſt, he ſhould not have need further to retire; but if he ſhould not obtain his requeſt, that then he was ready to go whitherſoever his Father ſhould command. It was not altogether for nought that Bajazet found fault with Amaſia; being the manner of the Turks, of the ſmalleſt things of all to divine upon the greateſt. But Solyman underſtood the matter otherwiſe; who not ignorant of his Sons Tears, knew right well that he in them ſought for nothing elſe but a more commodious place for him to raiſe new ſtirs in, than was Amaſia, ſo far diſtant from Conſtantinople. So Bajazet by many delays did what he could to fruſtrate his Fathers appointment, ceaſing not in the mean time to augment his ſtrength, with new Souldiers, to provide Armor, Mony, and whatſoever elſe ſerving for defence of himſelf, and the impugning of his Brother. Which Solyman took in no other part, than as intended againſt his own perſon; yet would he ſeem as not to have any ſuch underſtanding of the matter; for why, the wary old Sire would not by taking knowledg thereof, drive headlong his Son, who was already running too faſt of himſelf. Beſides that, he was not ignorant that the Eyes of all Nations were bent upon this diſcord of his two Sons; and therefore he deſired by all means, that theſe Grudges might be with as little ſtir as was poſſible, appeaſed. Wherefore he anſwered Bajazet courteouſly, That concerning his Government of Amaſia, he could not alter it, as reſolutely ſet down as well for his Brother as himſelf, and that therefore they ſhould do well to go both to their appointed places, as he had before commanded. As for the reſt, they ſhould be of good comfort, for that he would take ſuch order, as that neither of them ſhould have juſt cauſe to complain.

Solyman to be ſure that his two Sons ſhould go to their appointed Provinces, ſendeth Partau and Mehemet, two of the Viſier Baſſaes, to ſee them brought thither.

Partau Baſſa the fourth of the great Baſſa's of the Court was appointed to go with this Meſſage to Bajazet, and Mehemet third of the ſame great Baſſa's with like charge to Selymus, becauſe the matter ſhould ſeem to be done with all indifferency; and both of theſe great Men commanded not to depart from them they were ſent unto, before they were both come unto the places of their Government whereunto they were aſſigned. Which Solyman wiſely did, to keep them both within the compaſs of Duty by the preſence of ſuch two grave Counſellors. Which thing Selymus took in good part, but Bajazet not ſo; who having reſolved with himſelf to ſet all on a hurly burly, thought nothing more unfit for his deſigns, than to have one of his Fathers greateſt Counſellors ſtill at his Elbow as Cenſor of all his Speeches and Doings; wherefore having courteouſly entertained him, and rewarded him according to his Ability, he diſmiſſed him (though unwilling to depart) making this excuſe, That he would uſe him as his Patron and Defender with his Father, foraſmuch as he had no other in Court to defend his cauſe, promiſing miſing not to be unto him an unworthy or unthankful Client; and to carry word back again unto his Father, That he would above all things have care of his command, if he might ſo do for his Brother Selymus, whoſe Injuries and Treacheries he had much ado to brook. Partau the great Baſſa ſo ſent away, aſſured Solyman what the very mind and purpoſe of his younger Son was.

Solyman makes preparation againſt Bajazet, and ſendeth Aid to Selymus.

And albeit that Bajazet to make it ſeem as if ſomething had been done by that Embaſſage, made ſhew as if he would have preſently gone towards Amaſia; yet Solyman nevertheleſs fearing the worſt, made all the preparation he could againſt him, commanding the Beglerbeg of Grece, although then ſick of the Gout, to make haſte, and with his Horſemen to paſs over with all ſpeed to aid Selymus; and Mehemet Baſſa but lately returned, he ſent forthwith back again for the ſame purpoſe to Selymus, with certain of the moſt truſty Companies of the Janizaries; and the old Man in readineſs, made ſemblance as if he would himſelf in perſon have gone over alſo.

The Janizaries unwilling to go againſt Bajazet.

But the Janizaries and other Souldiers of the Court came with evil Will together, deteſting that War between the Brethren, as altogether abominable; for againſt whom ſhould they draw their Swords? was it not againſt the Emperors Son, and happily the Heir of the Empire? Wherefore this War might (as they ſaid) well enough be let alone, as altogether unneceſſary, and not they to be inforced to imbrue their Hands one in anothers Blood, and to pollute themſelves with ſuch Impiety; as for that which Bajazet did, was to be holden excuſed, as proceeding from neceſſity. Which Speeches of the Janizaries being brought to Solymans Ears, he forthwith declared them to the Mufti (who in all matters of doubt they flee unto as unto a moſt ſacred Oracle) demanding of him, how he was to be intreated, who of himſelf preſumed whiles he yet lived, to levy Souldiers, raiſe an Army, ranſack Towns, and trouble the State of the whole Empire? and what alſo he deemed of them that were his Followers and took part with him? and laſt of all, of them alſo that refuſed to bear Arms againſt him, and ſaid that he had in ſo doing nothing offended? Whereunto the Mufti anſwered, That both the Man and his Partakers were all worthy of death, and that ſuch as refuſed to take up Arms againſt him, were as prophane and irreligious Men, to be accounted deteſtable. Which the great Prieſts anſwer was publiſhed unto the People, and by the chief Chiaus ſent to Bajazet, to ſee if he might be therewith moved.

Bajazet his meſſage to his Father, requeſting him not to meddle between him and his Brother.

Within a few days after, there came to Conſtantinople one of the Chiaus (whom Bajazet had intercepted, being ſent from Solyman to Selymus) by whom Bajazet gave his Father to underſtand, That he was in all Duty his, and that he had not taken up Arms againſt him, neither refuſed to be unto him in all things obedient; but that he had only to do with his Brother, and with him to fight for his life, by whoſe Sword he muſt die, or elſe he by his, for that a miſchief was to be by one of them performed; which quarrel he was reſolved to try whiles he yet lived, and that therefore he ſhould do beſt not to meddle in the quarrel, or to give Aid to either. But if ſo be he would needs (as the report was) paſs over the Sea to aid Selymus, he ſhould not think eaſily to get him into his hands, for that he knew right well, if the worſt came, how to eſcape and ſave himſelf; and would before he could get over into Aſia, make ſuch ſpoil with Fire and Sword, as never had Tamerlane or other the cruelleſt Enemy of the Turks that ever was. Which Meſſage did not a little trouble Solyman. And withall it was reported, That the Town of Axuar, where one of Selymus his Sons ruled as Sanzack, was already taken by Bajazet and ſhamefully ſacked.

Selymus departeth towards Iconium.

But Selymus hearing that his Brother was gone toward Amaſia, and now on his way as far as Ancyra, being out of all ſuſpicion of danger which he feared upon the way ſo long as his Brother was yet lingring in thoſe quarters, haſted now towards Iconium, which was with a ſtrong Garriſon kept for him; for amongſt other cares wherewith Solyman was vexed, it was not the leaſt, That Bajazet intercepting Iconium, ſhould get into Syria, and from thence into Egypt, an open Country, and not yet throughly eſtabliſhed under the Turkiſh Government, neither forgetful of the old Government of the Mamalukes, and therefor deſirous of change; from whence it would have been an hard matter to have driven Bajazet, eſpecially the Arabians being always ready and at hand at every light ſtir, where any hope of Prey was; out of which Province alſo in caſe of extremity he might eaſily tranſport himſelf into any of the Chriſtian Kingdoms. Solyman therefore took great care, that this paſſage, which might ſeem the laſt refuge of Bajazets devices, might be ſtopped up; and concerning the ſame, had given commandment unto moſt of his Commanders in Aſia, to be always in readineſs to aid Selymus whenſoever he ſhould call. With them Selymus lay encamped under the Walls of Iconium, attending every ſtirring of Bajazet, reſolving there to expect further Aid from his Father, and not by untimely fight to commit his ſafety to the hazard of one doubtful Battel.

Bajazet ſtaieth at Ancyra, and there raiſeth his Forces.

But Bajazet on the other ſide not unmindful what a matter he had taken in hand, ſlept not thereupon, but firſt entertained a valiant ſort of Horſemen which the Turks call Chiurts, and are ſuppoſed to be of that People which were ſometimes called Gordij, Men for their known Valour famous. He yet lay in the Plain and open Fields by Ancyra, of the Commodities of which City (which were indeed great) he made great uſe; In the Caſtle thereof he beſtowed his Concubines and Children; of the rich Merchants he took up Mony to be repaid with the uſe upon the good ſucceſs of the War; and from thence he took whatſoever was needful for the arming and furniſhing of his Men. Beſides his own Family, which was very great, and thoſe Chiurts which we ſpoke of, many repaired unto him which had been in former time beholden to his Mother, his Siſter and Ruſtan the great Baſſa; many alſo of the Reliques of the valiant Muſtapha and Achomates the great Baſſa, valiant Men and expert Souldiers, who deſired to revenge the unworthy death of their Lords and Maſters, even with their own. Neither was there wanting an exceeding Rablement of ſuch as weary of their preſent ſtate, deſired ſome new innovation and change.

The deſcription of Selymus.

The commiſeration alſo of the State of the unfortunate Bajazet, eaſily drew many to take part with him, whoſe whole truſt was in his Valor; they favoured the young Prince, lively reſembling his Father; when as in Selymus appeared no likeneſs of himſelf, but the expreſs Lineaments of his Mothers Face and Body, a Woman whilſt ſhe lived generally hated of all the People; he went heavily as overcharged with his greeſie Paunch, blub cheeked, and exceeding red faced; ſo that the Souldiers in ſport would ſay, he was fed with green Mault; he was altogether given to his eaſe, and ſpent his time in Drunkenneſs and Sleep, neither was he courteous of Speech nor willing to deſerve well of any Man; for he would not (as he ſaid) offend his Father by being popular, ſo was he only of his Father beloved, and of all other Men hated; of all kind of Men he moſt miſliked of them that ſet all their hope in a bountiful and courageous Prince. The ſame Souldiers were alſo wont to call Bajazet, Softy (that is to ſay) a Man given to quietneſs and ſtudy ; but after they ſaw him take up Arms, and for the ſafeguard of himſelf and his Children ready to adventure any thing, they began to admire him as a Man of Valour and Courage; and to ask among themſelves, Why his Father ſhould reject him of ſuch worth, the the expreſs image of himſelf, and prefer before him that gorbellied Sluggard, in whom no Spark of his Fathers Valour was to be ſeen? This his entring into Arms was no Fault, being thereunto by neceſſity enforced, for, had not Selymus their Grandfather done the like? whereof no better example could be found; whom the force of neceſſity conſtrained not only to take up Arms againſt his Brother, but alſo to haſten the death of his Father; and by ſo doing, purchaſed unto himſelf and his Poſterity the Empire; which ſo gotten, if Solyman did not unjuſtly poſſeſs, why might not his Son uſe the ſame Courſe? why ſhould he ſo rigorouſly revenge that in his Son, that was ſo lawful in the Grandfather? Although there was (as they ſaid) great difference between that Selymus and this Bajazet; for that this Man intended no harm againſt his Father, but wiſhed him long to live; neither yet againſt his Brother, if he might by his leave but live, if he would but once ceaſe to do him wrong; that it was always accounted lawful to repel Force by Force, and to ſhun preſent Death, if the Deſtinies would ſo permit. By ſuch Affections and Motives, Bajazet his Power increaſed dayly; which being now grown almoſt to the greatneſs of a full Army, he thought it not beſt to uſe longer delay, but to march forthwith againſt his Brother to fight with him one Battel for his Life, State, and Empire; accounting it ſome commendation (although in vain) to have attempted ſo great an Enterpriſe. His purpoſe was (as Solyman feared) to get into Syria, which if he could bring to paſs, he then doubted not of the reſt. Selymus ſtrengthned with his Fathers Power, lay waiting for his coming before Iconium, well appointed of all Warlike Proviſion; his Army was exceeding ſtrong, and in it many notable Commanders, Martial Men of great experience, whom his Father had joyned unto him; who all lay covered with their great Ordnance planted in places moſt convenient. But Bajazet nothing terrified therewith, as ſoon as he came within ſight of his Brothers Army, exhorted his Souldiers in few words to play the Men, for that now was come the time they wiſhed for, and place for them to ſhew their Valour in; wherefore they ſhould ſhew themſelves couragious and valiant, and he would make them all rich and fortunate; he told them, that their Fortune was now in their own hands, to frame it every Man as he would himſelf; ſo that if any of them were weary of their preſent ſtate, there was the Field wherein they might exchange it with a better and therein lay down the miſeries of their former lives; that of him they ſhould if they overcame, expect Riches, Promotions, Honours, and whatſoever elſe, the Rewards of valiant Men; that with the Victory of one Battel, all their deſires ſhould be ſatisfied, were they never ſo great; which Victory was by the Valour which reſted in them to be gotten, and his Brothers Army, the heartleſs Followers of a heartleſs Captain, overthrown; for as his Fathers Souldiers that were with his Brother, they were in Body preſent, but in Mind altogether on his ſide; that it was only Selymus that withſtood his Welfare and their Felicity, whom they ſhould therefore valiantly ſeek for in Field as their common Enemy; and not to be afraid of his Multitude, foraſmuch as Victory was to be gained, not by Number, but by Valour; and the moſt Mighty God of Heaven and Earth was ſtill preſent, not with the moſt, but with the beſt: Beſides that, he willed them to remember with what a cruel Enemy they were to fight, who thirſted after nothing more than their Blood: And to conclude, he willed them all, not to look upon his Words, but his Deeds; and ſaid, If as you ſhall ſee me fighting for your profit, you ſhall likewiſe fight for mine Honour, I dare then aſſure you of the Victory. Which ſaid, he with great Courage charged the Enemy, and fighting himſelf long time amongſt the foremoſt, and there performing all the parts of a valiant Souldier, and worthy Captain, was for his notable Valor no leſs commended of his Enemies, than of his own Souldiers. The Battel was bloody and terrible, and many fell on both ſides. But after that they with wonderful obſtinacy had a great while fought with doubtful Victory, ſo that forty thouſand Turks lay there dead upon the ground; at length the Victory began to encline to that ſide whereon ſtood the greater Strength, the juſter Cauſe, and better Counſel. Many of the Enemies being ſlain, and many of his own People alſo loſt, Bajazet was enforced to retire; which he did ſo leiſurely, and without ſhew of any fear, that it ſeemed to the Beholders, he had well near as well gained as loſt the Field; neither durſt Selymus purſue him, but ſtood ſtill faſt in the ſame place, never more glad of any thing, than to ſee his Brothers back. But Bajazet after he had in contempt of his Fathers command thus run his own Courſe, and ſatisfied his own deſire, though diſappointed of his purpoſe, and not able to perform the journey by him intended into Syria, turned now his Courſe, and began in good earneſt to go to Amaſia his appointed Province.

Solyman ſpeedily advertiſed of the event of this Battel, forthwith paſſed over into Aſia; for as the great Baſſaes his Counſellors thought it not convenient for him to go over the Strait before the Victory; ſo after it was certainly known, they thought it not good longer to ſtay, leſt the overthrow of Bajazet might give occaſion to ſuch as ſecretly favoured his quarrel, to ſhew themſelves, and ſo to raiſe greater Troubles. Beſides that, the fame of his paſſage over, would (as they ſaid) much avail both to the diſcouragement of Bajazet, and the terrifying of his Friends; and therefore it was by them thought good, haſtily to purſue him, now overthrown, and not to ſuffer him to gather Courage by the example of his Grandfather Selymus, Solymans Father; who had been more terribly vanquiſhed than when he ſtood in his whole ſtrength, and might ſeem by that means to have eſpecially prevailed, for that he was at firſt unfortunately overthrown. Neither were theſe things without reaſon foreſeen; for it is almoſt incredible, what admiration and love this battel (although unfortunate) did get to Bajazet; men wondred that he durſt with ſo ſmall a power, and as it were but an handful of Men, encounter with his Brother far better appointed, and alſo ſupported by his Fathers Strength; not fearing either the diſadvantage of the place, or the Fury of the great Artillery; and to have behaved himſelf in the battel not like a young Souldier, but an old and expert Commander. Selymus might at his pleaſure boaſt of himſelf as they ſaid (to his Father) for the Victory; but Bajazet was the man that deſerved to have overcome; and that Selymus might to any thing aſcribe the Victory, rather than to his own Valour.

Theſe and ſuch like Speeches, as they made Bajazet gracious amongſt the people generally; ſo doubled they his Fathers cares, and encreaſed his hatred, to wiſh him the rather dead. For why, he was reſolutely ſet down, not to leave any other Heir of his Empire than Selymus his eldeſt Son, always Loyal and Obedient unto him; whereas the other he abhorred as Stubborn and Rebellious, gaping after the Empire whilſt he yet lived; of whom he was therefore ſo much the more to ſtand in dread, by how much he was reputed to be of more valour, and for the aid he had now ſo openly given to Selymus. For theſe cauſes he paſſed over the Strait into Aſia, with purpoſe not to go far from the Sea Coaſt, but as it were a far off with his favourable aſpect to countenance Selymus his proceeding; doubting by coming too near with his Army, to endanger himſelf by the ſuddain revolt of the Janizaries, which he above all things feared.

Augerius Busbequius Epiſt. 3 legationis Turcicæ.

I my ſelf (ſaith the Author of this Hiſtory) ſaw him departing out of Conſtantinople the firſt of June in the year 1559, when as within a few days after, I my ſelf was alſo ſent for thither; for the Baſſaes thought it not amiſs to have me in the Camp, and to uſe me courteouſly as their Friend, for which cauſe I was aſſigned to lodge in an Inn in a Village near to the Camp, where I lay very well, The Turks lay in the Fields round about; but lying there three months I had good leiſure and opportunity to ſee the manner of their Camp, and in part to know the order of their Martial Diſcipline. So I attiring my ſelf in ſuch apparel as the Chriſtians commonly uſe in thoſe places, went up and down with one or two Companions at my pleaſure unknown. Firſt I ſaw the Souldiers of all ſorts moſt orderly placed, and that, which he would ſcarce believe that knoweth the manner of our War, there was in every place great ſilence, and as a Man may ſay, dumb quietneſs, no brawling, no inſolency, no not ſo much as a word or laughter paſſing in ſport or drunkenneſs. Beſides that, wonderful cleanlineſs, no Dunghils, no Excrements that might offend either the Eies or Noſe, for all ſuch things the Turks do either bury or carry them far out of ſight. They themſelves ſo oft as they are enforced to diſcharge the burthen of Nature, dig an hole with a Spade and bury it, ſo is all their Camp without filth. There was not to be ſeen any Drinking or Feaſting, no Dicing (the great ſhame of our Wars) the loſs of Mony or time at Cards or Dice, the Turks know not. I met only with a rough Hungarian and his Companions, a Souldier, who heavy himſelf, to the Lute rather houled than ſung a doleful Ditty, containing the laſt words of a Fellow of his dying of his wounds upon the green Bank of Danubius, wherein he requeſteth the River, becauſe it ran to the place where he was born, to carry news to his Friends and Countrymen, that he died an honourable death, and not unrevenged, for the encreaſe of his Religion, and honour of his Country; wherunto his Fellows ſighing, bare a Foot, O happy and thrice happy Wight, would Fortune with thee change we might. For the Turks are of opinion, That no Mens Souls go more ſpeedily to Heaven, than of ſuch valiant Men as die in Battel, for whoſe welfare their Maidens daily make Prayers and Vows. I would alſo needs go through their Butchery, where their Beaſts were killed, to ſee what Fleſh was to be ſold; where I ſaw but four, or at moſt five Weathers hanging ready dreſſed, and that was the Butchery for the Janizaries, which I deemed to be in that Camp not fewer than four thouſand. I marvelled that ſo little Fleſh ſhould ſuffice ſo many Men; but I was anſwered, That few of them did eat Fleſh, for that moſt part of them had their Victuals tranſported from Conſtantinople. Then I demanding what it was, they ſhewed me a Janizary ſitting by, who in an earthen Diſh had killed a Turnep, an Onion, a Head of Garlick, a Parſenep, and a Cucumber, all ſauced with Salt and Vineger, or more truly to ſay, with Hunger; whereon he fed as ſavourly as if they had been Feaſants or Partridges; his Drink was the common Drink of all living Creatures, even fair Water. By which frugal kind of Diet, they provide both for the health of their Bodies, and the ſparing of their Purſe; and that I marvelled the more at, it was the time that their great Faſt, or to ſpeak after our faſhion, their Lent was at hand; at which time with us Chriſtians, even in well ordered Cities, much more in Camps, all Rings with Playing, Dancing, Singing, Crying, Quaffing, Carouſing; and in brief, with Madding and Phrenſie. So that it is not vainly reported, That a Turk ſent about that time Embaſſador into Germany, coming home reported, That the Chriſtians on certain days did riot, and became mad, until they beſprinkled with a certain kind of Aſhes in the Church, came to themſelves again, and ſo recovered; and that it was a wonderful thing to ſee, how much they were changed by the efficacy of that remedy, that they ſeemed not to be the ſame Men; meaning indeed the diſordered manners of the Chriſtians at Shrovetide, and the Ceremonies uſed on Aſhwedneſday: Which thing they to whom it was told, ſo much the more marvelled at, for that the Turks have many medicines which cauſe madneſs, but few or none which preſently eaſeth the ſame. And they upon thoſe days that go before their great Faſts, change nothing of their wonted manner of Life to the worſe; but rather contrariwiſe prepare themſelves to abſtinence, by taking ſomewhat from their uſual fare, the better to endure the ſuddain change of their Faſt; which they ſo preciſely obſerve, that upon their faſting days they will not ſo much as taſte a Cup of Water, or waſh their Mouths with Water all the day long, before the Stars appear in the Sky; which maketh their Faſts, eſpecially in Summer when the days be long and hot, to be unto them very tedious.

Preſents ſent from the Emperor Ferdinand to Solyman.

Whiles I thus lay in the Camp, there came unto me one Albertus a learned Man with certain Preſents from the Emperor to Solyman, which were, certain gilt Plate, and a moſt curious Clock, which was carried upon an Elephant like a Caſtle; and ſome Crowns to be diſperſed among the Baſſaes; which Solyman would needs have preſented unto him in the Camp in the ſight of the whole Army, to make it the better known what friendſhip was between him and the Emperor, and that he needed not to fear any danger from the Chriſtian Princes.

Bajazet goeth to Amaſia, and ſeeketh for his Fathers favour.

But to return again to Bajazet, from whom we have a while digreſſed; he after the Battel at Iconium had retired himſelf to Amaſia, the place of his Government, as though he would have now there quietly lived, if his Father would ſo give him leave. He had now ſatisfied his youthful deſires and grief, and ſeemed willing from thenceforth to ſatisfie his Fathers better expectation; and therefore ceaſed not by Letters and fit Men to prove his Fathers mind. Neither did Solyman ſhew himſelf ſtrange from ſuch a reconciliation; at firſt he eaſily gave the Meſſengers audience, read his Sons Letters, and courteouſly returned anſwer; ſo that it was commonly reported in the Camp, that the Father and the Son would agree, and that the old Man would pardon the youthful Prank already paſt, ſo that he would from thenceforth remain dutiful. But all this was by the Counſel of the Baſſaes, nothing but deep diſſimulation in the crafty old Sire, until he had ſhut up Bajazet, and ſo got him alive into his hand; for it was feared, leſt he deſpairing of pardon, ſhould with ſuch a power break into the Borders of Perſia (now the only place left for his refuge) as might prevent the watchful diligence of his Lieutenants upon thoſe Frontiers; whom Solyman charged by continual Letters ſo to ſtop all the paſſages into Perſia, as that there ſhould not be any crany for Bajazet to flie out by. In the mean time, if any came within his reach that were ſuſpected to have taken part with Bajazet, or favoured his proceedings, thoſe he cauſed to be tortured and ſecretly made away, and among them ſome whom Bajazet had of purpoſe ſent to excuſe themſelves. For Solyman fearing leſt Tamas the Perſian King (more mindful of his old Quarrels than of the late enforced Peace) ſhould hardly with much ado ſuffer his Son to be got out of his hands if he ſhould flie thither, and ſo again raiſe a long and dangerous War, did therefore what he poſſibly might to oppreſs him before he ſhould come thither. Which his purpoſe although it was covered with all ſecrecy, yet was it not hidden from ſome of Bajazet his Friends, by whom he was oftentimes warned not to truſt his Father, but to beware of Treaſon, and in any caſe ſpeedily to provide for his own ſafety. But Solyman thinking he had now ſo provided as that he could by no means eſcape, and happily the more to deceive his Son, appointed to return with his Army to Conſtantinople the day after their Eaſter day. But Bajazet, upon the very Feaſt day having performed the ſolemnities thereof, commanded all his things to be truſſed up at Amaſia, and ſo ſet forward upon his unfortunate Journy towards Perſia; knowing right well, that he went to the ancient Enemy of the Othoman Family, but yet fully reſolved to make proof of any Mans mercy, rather than to fall into the hands of his angry Father. Now were they all ſet forward, except ſuch weak Souls as were not thought able to endure the labour of ſo long a Journy, among whom was left Solyman, Bajazet his youngeſt Son, but then newly born; which guiltleſs Babe, with his Mother, Bajazet thought better to leave unto the mercy of his Grandfather, than to take him with him, a poor Companion of his woful and miſerable flight; whom Solyman as yet uncertain of his Fathers Fortune, commanded to be Nurſed at Pruſa. Bajazet ſo gone from Amaſia, uſed ſuch celerity in his Travel, that almoſt in every place he prevented the fame of his coming, and light upon many that were appointed to have ſtaid his paſſage, before they were ready or aware of his coming. The Baſſa of Sebaſtia he thus deceived; There was two ways, whereof the one of them being intercepted, would greatly hinder his Journy, and that the Baſſa had already taken; wherefore he ſent certain, as if they had been Fugitives, to tell the Baſſa that he was already gone the other way. Which the Baſſa believing, left the place he had before taken, and riſing with all his power to purſue him the other way, whereby it was told him he was gone, left that way free and open for him to paſs by.

The Baſſa of Erzirum deceived by Bajazet.

Solyman much grieved with the flight of his Son.

The Baſſa of Erzirum he deceived alſo by another not much unlike ſhift; from whom when he was not far diſtant, and knowing that in paſſing through his Country, he was to endure great danger, he ſet upon him with a wile, ſending unto him certain of his Followers with commendations; who afterwards lamentably complaining of the young Princes calamity, to move the Baſſa to pity, at laſt requeſted that he would give him leave to ſhoo his Horſes in his Territory; telling him, that he came unprovided of all things, and therefore deſirous in that fruitful Country to refreſh his Horſes a day or two, and to new ſhoo them. Whereunto the Baſſa courteouſly anſwered, That he would not let him to take whatſoever he needed. But whether it was for the compaſſion that he had upon the ſtate of Bajazet, or for the ſecret love he bare him, or that he thought by that means the eaſier to entrap him, is doubtful; and happily prevented by Bajazets quick ſpeed, had not as yet ſufficient time to draw together his Souldiers. He ſent alſo unto Bajazet certain ſmall Preſents, ſeeming to be glad of his welfare and coming; who nevertheleſs kept on his way, reſting no part of the day, and but a little of the night. The Baſſa of Erzirum underſtanding that Bajazet came ſtill on, made what haſt he could alſo, and joyned his power to the reſt of the Baſſaes which followed after; for many Baſſaes and Sanzacks hearing that Bajazet was fled from Amaſia, purſued faſt after him, being charged by Solyman upon pain of their Heads to bring him back either alive or dead; but all in vain, by reaſon of his ſpeedy departure, and for that he made more haſt to flie, than they did to follow. Yet it coſt no Man dearer than this Baſſa of Erzirum, of whom we have now ſpoken, whom Solyman for this cauſe diſplaced; and Selymus afterwards ſlew, with two of his Sons, young ſtriplings whom he had before in deſpight ſhamefully abuſed againſt nature. Yea Selymus himſelf and Mahomet the great Baſſa, with the Berglerbeg of Grecia, followed alſo after Bajazet, though it were a far off. This his departure grieved Solyman above meaſure, aſſuring himſelf (as the truth was) that he was fled into Perſia; wherewith he was ſo much moved, that he could ſcarcely contain himſelf, but would needs have gone with all his power in all haſt againſt the Perſian, to have terrified him at hand from relieving his rebellious Son. But theſe his raging fits his grave Counſellors moderated, by declaring unto him what danger he ſhould adventure himſelf unto, by reaſon of the doubtful faith of his beſt Souldiers. And what if Bajazet (as he was a deſperate and ſuddain Man) ſhould in the mean time turn about above Pontus and the Fens of Meotis, and ſo fetching a compaſs come to Conſtantinople, and proclaiming a general liberty in his abſence, poſſeſs himſelf of the Empire. By which wholeſome perſwaſion Solyman ſtaid his ſo haſty a Journy; but Bajazet all the way as he went, writ upon the the Gates and Doors, That he would give double pay to all ſuch as ſhould follow him; which cauſed Solymans Captains to have their own Souldiers in diſtruſt, and the more for that they might oftentimes hear amongſt them, ſpeeches of great good will and love towards Bajazet.

The eager purſuit of the Baſſaes and Sanzacks.

After long flying, he was at length come to the River Araxis, which ſeparated the Turks Kingdom from the Perſian; which having paſſed over, and yet not ſo in ſafety, he left certain of his Followers upon the Bank of the River to keep the Sanzacks (who ſtill eagerly purſued him) from paſſing over; whom the Sanzacks eaſily repulſed, and ſo paſſing the River, entred a great way into the Perſian Kingdom, until ſuch time as that they were met withal by certain of the Nobility of Perſia with great Troops of Horſemen; who demanding of them what they meant, and what they ſought for in another Mans Kingdom, dom, were anſwered by the Turks, That they purſued their Kings fugitive Son. To whom the Perſians replied, That they did not well, contrary to the League with their Lord and Maſter, to come in Arms beyond the Bounds of their own Kingdom; and that there was a ſtrong League between King Tamas and Solyman which it behoved them to regard; as for Bajazet, their King would conſider what was convenient for him to do, and not in that point forget himſelf; in the mean time they ſhould do well to get them out of that Country wherein they had nothing to do. Whereupon the Turks forthwith left this purſuit and retired.

But by and by came Meſſengers from the Perſian King to Bajazet to ſalute him, and to demand the cauſe of his coming, and alſo to ſee what ſtrength he brought with him; which as ſome account was about twenty thouſand. To whom Bajazet declared, That he by his Brothers injuries and Fathers hard dealing, driven out of his Country, was fled unto the ſacred Majeſty of the Perſian King, as his moſt aſſured refuge, who, as he well hoped, in compaſſion of Mans inſtability, would not reject him ſo diſtreſſed, and otherwiſe deſtitute of all help. Whereunto the Perſian replied, That he had done very unwiſely to come unto him that was in League and Amity with his Father; whereof one condition was, That they ſhould account the Enemies of the one, the Enemies of the other; and the Friends of the one, the Friends of the other. Which Law to break, he accounted a thing utterly unlawful; nevertheleſs ſeeing the matter was ſo faln out, he was welcome as unto his Friend, who in his behalf would leave nothing unattempted to reconcile him to his Father, which he deſpaired not to bring to paſs. So Bajazet meeteth with the Perſian King, but in an evil hour, although at their firſt meeting there was great welcome, friendly countenance, chearful looks, mutual kindneſs, often conference, and great feaſting one of another; things whereby the ſecret thoughts of hollow hearts are beſt concealed; there was alſo a motion made of a ſtraighter bond of alliance, and one of the Perſian Kings Daughters promiſed to Orchanes one of Bajazets Sons; and he put in hope that the Perſian King would never reſt in quiet, until Solyman had made him Governour either of Meſopotamia, Babylon, or Erzirum (which Governments were by the Perſians greatly extolled) and that he might there live without fear of his Brother, far from him and his Father alſo; where if any thing ſhould fall out otherwiſe than well, he might have his Brother the Perſian King a ſure refuge to retire unto, and ſo ſafe from all danger. Which ſpeeches were happily given out, of purpoſe to avert Bajazet his thoughts from the feeling of the preſent danger; who ſeemed unto himſelf ſo aſſured of the love and friendſhip of Tamas the Perſian King, that at ſuch time as he ſent his Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople, for a reconciliation to be made between Solyman and him (as was commonly ſuppoſed) he willed the ſame Embaſſador to tell his Father, that he had loſt a Father at Conſtantinople, and found another in Perſia. But whether the Perſian delt ſincerely in this behalf for Bajazet by his Embaſſadors, which where many, may well be doubted. Like it is, that there was more fained ſhew of double diligence, than of true meaning therein; and the rather to feel the mind of Solyman, than to do any good to the poor diſtreſſed Prince; and the rather, for that in the mean time all things were ſeriouſly plotted that might tend to his deſtruction. Which were no ſooner grown to their full ripeneſs, but there was of purpoſe a motion made, That ſuch a multitude as followed this young Prince lay ſo cloſe together, that there was not in one place Victual ſufficient for them, and that it was therefore more convenient to have them billited in the Country thereabouts; which would be more commodious, as well for the better victualling of them, as for divers other purpoſes alſo. Truth was, that Tamas the Perſian King, far unlike his noble Father Iſmael, ſtood in doubt leſt he brought up a Serpent in his Boſom. Yet there were many which thought, that it was not the Perſians mind at firſt to have deſtroyed Bajazet, but to have been thereunto enforced by the practice of ſome of his Familiars and Followers; who not regarding the courteſie of the Perſian King, nor the Laws of Hoſpitality, perſwaded Bajazet to thruſt him out of his Kingdom; whereof there was many evident Tokens. And among other things it was told King Tamas, that one of Bajazets chief Captains ſhould ſay, What mean we? Why ſtay we to kill this heritical King, and to poſſeſs his Kingdom? For we ſhall no doubt by his Treachery all come to deſtruction. And that upon ſuch occaſion the King was conſtrained to condeſcend to a device more neceſſary than honourable. Bajazet had no great power, but moſt of them were valiant Men, and Souldiers of great experience, ready to adventure upon any thing; of whom the Perſian not without cauſe ſtood in ſome fear. He knew his Kingdom to be neither ancient nor yet well aſſured, as gotten by his Father by the counterfeit ſhew of a reformed Religion; and who could aſſure him, but that amongſt ſo many Nations over whom he Lorded, that there were many weary of the preſent State, and ſo deſirous of novelties? Unto whom nothing could chance more fitting than the coming of Bajazet, a noble and valiant young Gentleman; and that more was, deſperately ſet; that as yet he himſelf might of right rather ſeemed in the power of his Gueſt, than he in his; and that therefore he was to alter the matter, and not longer to entertain him as his Gueſt, but to coupe him up as a moſt dangerous wild Beaſt. Which to do, the eaſieſt way was to diſperſe his power, and ſo to take him unawares; for that he could not without much Bloodſhed be openly taken in the midſt of his ſtrength, eſpecially by the dainty Perſian, of long time not uſed to War, and as yet not come together; againſt Bajazets Souldiers, Men of great activity and experience. So was the matter cunningly imparted unto him for the diſperſing of his Forces, and all the Commodites to enſue thereof alledged; which Bajazet might not well gainſay, although many of his wiſe Followers (Men of great reach) did ſhrewdly ſuſpect the ſequel. But what could he refuſe, upon whom neceſſity lay ſo heavy? Where no other hope was left? Where he lived as it pleaſed another Man; and that again too, where once to doubt of the fidelity of his Hoaſt, might be imputed to him for the greateſt Treachery? So theſe moſt valiant Souldiers, the poor Princes faithful Followers, never again to ſee one another, are diſperſed into divers Country Villages, and beſtowed where the Perſians thought good. Not many days after, at a time pickt out for the purpoſe, they in number few, and diſperſed in a ſtrange Country, were encloſed by many and ſlain; their Horſes, Armor, Apparel, and whatſoever elſe, became a prey unto the Murtherers. At the ſame inſtant was Bajazet and his Sons caſt in Bonds alſo, and that to his greater grief as many report, taken as he was ſitting merrily at Dinner at the Kings Table. The Perſian King ſeemed to have foreforeſeen much in this his hard dealing with Bajazet; as if that he, being a valiant and couragious young Prince, and much better Souldier than his Brother, ſhould have ſucceeded his Father in his Empire, much trouble and peril might have grown thereby, both to himſelf and his Kingdom; and that it ſtood far better with the ſafety of his Eſtate, that Selymus (a Man wholly given to voluptuouſneſs and eaſe) ſhould reign over the Turks; in whoſe time he might as it were promiſe unto himſelf all peace and ſecurity; and therefore it was thought that he would never let Bajazet go alive out of his hand, but rather make him away in Priſon, as if he had there died for melancholy and grief. Well he was aſſured, that after he had ſlain his Followers, and impriſoned himſelf and his Sons, he would never be Friends with him that had ſo notably wronged him. Bajazet thus ſhamefully impriſoned, Meſſengers ran continually too and fro betwixt the two old Princes Solyman and Tamas. Amongſt the reſt, the Perſian King ſent a ſolemn Embaſſador unto the Turk with Preſents, namely curious Tents, coſtly Carpets, an Alcoran containing the Myſteries of their Superſtition, and certain ſtrange Beaſts. The cauſe of his coming was pretended to be for a reconciliation to be made between Solyman and his Son; which Embaſſador was honourably entertained and feaſted by the great Baſſaes. Now was poor Bajazet in ſmall hope of life, his cruel Father ſtill craving to have him delivered into his hands to be ſlain; and the Perſian yet denying to deliver him, and ſeeming to defend him, but not (as was thought) altogether faithfully. Solyman left no means unattempted to have wrung him from the Perſian, ſometimes he ſpake him fair, putting him in mind of his League, wherein it was agreed, That they ſhould both have the ſame Friends and the ſame Enemies; otherwhile he terrified him with great words, and denouncing of War, except he would deliver him his Son; he furniſhed with ſtrong Garriſons all the Frontiers of his Dominion towards Perſia, he filled all Meſopotamia and the Banks of the River Euphrates with Souldiers, eſpecially with them of his own Guard, and ſuch as he had before uſed in the Battel againſt Bajazet; over whom commanded Mehemet Baſſa the third of the Viſier Baſſaes, and Selymus the Beglerbeg of Grece (for Selymus was ſoon weary of the Field, and ſo betime returned home;) he alſo incited the Georgian People to take up Arms againſt the Perſians; who wiſely anſwered, That they had not ſuch confidence in their own ſtrength, as to provoke King Tamas; but let Solyman himſelf come with his Army, and when they ſaw him preſent in the Field, then they knew what they had to do, and that he ſhould then well ſee that they wanted neither diſcretion nor valour. And becauſe he would leave nothing unproved, he made ſhew as if he would in perſon himſelf have gon to Aleppo in Syria, and ſo have on that ſide invaded the Perſian; neither was the Perſian King altogether out of fear, having to his coſt many times proved what Solyman was able to do. But the unwillingneſs of the Souldiers, and their minds altogether eſtranged from that War, eaſily ſtaied the raging Turk; they deteſted that War, and forſook their Enſigns, a great number of whom (eſpecially Horſemen) without leave of their Captains returned to Conſtantinople; and being commanded again to the Camp, went indeed, but with ſuch countenance and chear as well declared how they were affected, and what they would do if occaſion ſerved for them to revolt.

The miſerable eſtate of Bajazet.

The agreement between the Perſian King and Solyman for the deſtruction of Bajazet.

For which cauſe, after that Solyman perceived that Bajazet could not alive be got from the Perſian (excuſing himſelf by fear of revenge by him whom he had ſo grievouſly offended, if he ſhould by any means eſcape) he thought it beſt to follow that which was next, and to have him there ſlain; which he was in good hope to compaſs, and the rather, for that the Perſian had but lately written unto him, That he could not but much marvel to ſee him deal ſo ſlenderly in a matter of ſo great importance; That he on his part had ſent him divers Embaſſadors; and that he on the other ſide had ſent him nothing but common Meſſengers with Papers, which cauſed him to think that he made no great account of the matter; wherefore he ſhould do well to ſend unto him Men of account and place, with whom he might confer and conclude alſo according to the weightineſs and exigence of the cauſe; beſides that, he was (as he ſaid) not a little in his debt, for that Bajazet and his Followers had been unto him no ſmall charge before he could get him into his power; all which it were good reaſon he ſhould have conſideration of. Whereby Solyman perceived that Mony was the thing the Perſian King ſought after; and therefore rather than he would in an unfit time of his life intangle himſelf in a dangerous and unneceſſary War, he determined by the counſel of his Baſſaes, rather with Mony than with the Sword to fight with the Perſian King. Hereupon was Haſſan Aga (one of the chief Gentlemen of his Chamber) appointed Embaſſador into Perſia, with whom was joyned the Baſſa of Maras, a Man both for his age and place, reverend; who departing with a large Commiſſion almoſt in the depth of Winter, with great ſpeed and wonderful toil by thoſe long and difficult ways, arrived at laſt at Casbin the Seat of the Perſian King, having by the way loſt divers of their Servants and Followers. Being come to the Court, the firſt thing they deſired was to ſee Bajazet, whom they found ſhut up in a cloſe Priſon, pale and wan as a Man forlorn, with his Hair and Beard ſo long and overgrown, as that he was not to be known before he was new Trimmed, which done, then appeared the lively reſemblance of his wonted countenance and favour, ſo that Haſſan verily knew him to be him; for he had been brought up with him of a Child in the Court, and for this cauſe eſpecially had Solyman ſent him thither to be aſſured that it was he. At length after long diſcourſe and conference between the King and the Embaſſadors, it was agreed upon, that the King ſhould receive from Solyman full recompence of all the charges he had been at, and of the harms by him ſuſtained ſince the coming of Bajazet into Perſia, with ſuch further reward as ſo great a good turn deſerved; which things performed, that then it ſhould be in Solymans power to have Bajazet made away. With this news Haſſan poſteth to his Maſter at Conſtantinople, who forthwith cauſed the promiſed Reward, together with ſuch charges as the Perſian King demanded, to be made ready, and with a ſafe convoy to be ſent unto the Borders of Perſia, where they were of the Perſians received. Preſently after returneth Haſſan the appointed Executioner of the unfortunate Bajazet; for ſo Solyman had ſtraitly charged him to ſtrangle him with his own hands. Which thing this new made Hangman accordingly performed, and with a Bow-ſtring ſtrangled the unfortunate Prince; who is reported to have requeſted of the Executioner, that he might but ſee his Children before he died, and take of them his laſt farewel; which poor requeſt could not be granted, but he forthwith commanded to die. This was the wo-ful end of the unlucky attempt of Bajazet, a Prince of far more worth than was Selymus his Brother, who in ſeeking to ſhun the death he feared, haſted the ſame before his time. Such as was the Fathers end, was alſo the end of his four Sons, Omer, Amurat, Selym, and Muhamet; of whom the three eldeſt were ſtrangled at Casbin with their Father, whoſe dead Bodies together with his, were ſolemnly brought to Sebaſtia and there buried. The youngeſt but new born left at Amaſia, and ſent by his Grandfather to Pruſa (as is before ſaid) to be there nurſed, was now upon the death of his Father commanded by his ſaid Grandfather to be ſtrangled alſo. The Eunuch ſent by Solyman to have done the deed, and loth to do it himſelf took with him one of the Porters of the Court, a deſperate and otherwiſe a hard hearted Ruffian, a Man thought fit to have performed any villany; he coming into the Chamber where the Child lay, and fitting the Bow-ſtring to the Childs Neck to have ſtrangled him, the innocent Babe ſmiling upon him, and lifting it ſelf up as well as it could, with open Arms offered to have embraced the Villain about the Neck and kiſſed him. Which guiltleſs ſimplicity ſo wounded the ſtony hearted Man, that he was not able to perform the intended butchery of the poor ſimple Child, but fell down in a ſwoun and there lay for dead. The Eunuch ſtanding without the Door marvelling at his long ſtay, goes in, and finding the Ruffian lying along upon the ground, with cruel hand performed that the other could not find in his heart to do, and ſo ſtrangled the guiltleſs Child as had been given him in charge. Whereby it evidently appeared, that it was not the mercy or compaſſion of Solyman that ſo long cauſed the guiltleſs Infant to be ſpared, but rather the opinion generally received amongſt the Turks, who meaſuring all things by the good or bad ſucceſs, refer all things that fall out well, unto God as the Author thereof, be they never ſo ungraciouſly begun; and therefore ſo long as it was yet uncertain what ſucceſs the attempts of Bajazet would have, Solyman ſpared the Infant, leſt upon his Fathers good hap he might ſeem to have ſtriven againſt the will of God. But now that his Father was dead, and his quarrel by the evil ſucceſs thereof condemned as it were by the ſentence of the Almighty, he thought it not good longer to ſuffer him to live, leſt of an evil Bird might come an evil Chick. I had ſometime (ſaith the Reporter of this Hiſtory) great reaſoning with my Chiaus about this matter; for falling into talk with him of Bajazet, he began bitterly to inveigh againſt him for taking up Arms againſt his Brother. Whereunto (ſaith this Author) I replied, That in mine opinion he was worthy both to be pittied and pardoned, for as much as he was of neceſſity enforced either to take up Arms, or elſe ſhortly after to yield himſelf to the ſlaughter. But he ſtill exclaming againſt him, I ſaid unto him, You blame poor Bajazet of great wickedneſs for bearing Arms againſt his Brother; but Selymus Solymans Father you blame not, who upon like occaſion took up Arms both againſt his Father and his Brethren; yet he therein did nothing amiſs, nor in your judgment blame worthy. And rightly, (ſaith the Chiaus) for the event of the matter ſheweth ſufficiently, that that which he did was done by the appointment of God, and that he was from Heaven predeſtinated thereunto; whereas in Bajazet the event ſheweth the clean contrary. So that which falleth out well, be it by never ſo wicked means compaſſed or brought to paſs, they take it as done according to the will of God; but if it fall out otherwiſe, they judge it as a thing condemned by God himſelf; depending wholly upon the good or bad event of things, and therefore judging them to be well done, or otherwiſe.

The rare force of innocency.

This year 1558, Charles the Fifth that noble Emperor (of whom we have in the courſe of this Hiſtory ſo often ſpoken) who weary of the World, had two years before delivered all his hereditary Kingdoms and Principalities to his Son Philip, did now the twenty fourth of February, on which day he was born, by his Embaſſadors ſolemnly ſent for that purpoſe, reſign that Empire with all the Honours and Titles thereof unto his Brother King Ferdinand, requeſting the Princes Electors to confirm the ſame unto him, which they did the thirteenth of March next following. So living as a private Gentleman in that ſolitary life whereunto he had to the wonder of the World certain years before retired himſelf from all worldly Affairs, the one and twentieth day of September following died of a Fever, when he had lived eight and fifty years, and thereof reigned thirty nine; a Man no doubt to be worthily accounted amongſt the greateſt Chriſtian Emperors that lived before him. About which time alſo died his two Siſters, Mary the Queen of Hungary, and Elenor the French Queen, both Ladies of great Honour.

1559. The Chriſtian Princes ſet out a Fleet for the recovery of Tripolis in Barbary.

The Knights of Malta, who of long had been Suitors to the great Biſhop and the King of Spain, for the recovery of Tripolis in Barbary, about nine years before taken from them by the Turks; at which time they alſo ſurpriſed the Iſland of Zerbi upon the Coaſt of Barbary betwixt Tripolis and Tunes, from whence they much troubled the Chriſtians travelling by thoſe Seas; had now at length ſo much prevailed, that the King commanded a great Fleet to be now forthwith made ready in September in the year 1559, to meet together in Sicilia, and from thence to go directly againſt the Enemy by Malta. Unto which Fleet, the great Biſhop, the Duke of Florence, and the Knights of Malta, with many other valian Men out of divers parts of Chriſtendom, joyned their Forces alſo; ſo that at length there was a hundred Gallies and Ships met together under the conduct of Andreas Gonzaga the General. But whilſt this Fleet from divers places was long in coming thither, the Duke of Medina Celi came before with part of the Fleet to Malta, and in the Haven of Marza Moxet expected the coming of the reſt, who about the end of the year came thither. But whilſt they were wintered expecting the Spring, many of the Souldiers fell ſick and died. At length the time of the year fit for their ſetting forward being come, the Captains conſulted amomg themſelves, Whether they ſhould firſt ſet upon Tripolis, or the Iſland of Zerbi, otherwiſe called Mening; The Knights of Malta being of opinion, that it were better firſt to beſiege Tripolis, and that with all ſpeed, before Dragut ſhould come thither to furniſh it with Souldiers and Proviſion. Others thought it better firſt to invade the Iſland of Zerbi, where the Army might be relieved with plenty of all things neceſſary, and from whence they might at all times of danger in ſafety retire, and from thence afterward as time ſhould ſerve, to go to Tripolis. Which unfortunate counſel was by the greater part agreed upon. Wherefore in Februnary the year following they departed from Malta, and ſailed directly to Zerbi. In the mean time Dragut the moſt famous Pyrate of that time amongſt the Turks, and Governour of Tripolis, was come thither with eight hundred of the Turks Janizaries, and had notably ſtrengthned the City with Men, Victual, and new Fortifications; and preſently ſent Meſſengers to Solyman at Conſtantinople, to certifie him of the arrival of the Chriſtian Fleet in Africk. But the Chriſtians coming to the Iſland of Zerbi, were at the firſt landing encountred by the Moors, whom they repulſed, and ſo at pleaſure landed. This Iſland is not far from the Main, here and there full of Bogs and Mariſhes, other River hath it none, and in the midſt is ſomewhat Hilly. It was inhabited with about thirty thouſand Men, which dwelt in low Cottages, ſimply apparelled; yet is the Iſland reaſonably fertil, yielding Dates, Olives, Barley, Mill, and ſuch like. When the Chriſtians were there landed, they ſent for Caravanus a poor King amongſt the Moors (from whom Dragut had before taken that Iſland) to uſe his counſel for their better proceeding in that War. In the mean time they agreed with eight thouſand Men to beſiege the ſtrongeſt Caſtle in the Iſland; in going whereunto, the Spaniards went foremoſt, the Germans next, and laſt of all the Italians. By the way as they went they light upon ten thouſand Moors which lay in ambuſh in a Wood, to have upon the ſuddain ſet upon them unawares; but being diſcovered, and ſeven hundred of them ſlain in skirmiſh by the Spaniards, the reſt fled. So coming to the Caſtle they planted their Battery, and laid hard Siege unto it. The Captain of the Caſtle finding himſelf too weak long to hold out, fled ſecretly with his Turks, leaving the Caſtle for the Moors to defend; who upon condition that they might in ſafety depart, yielded the Caſtle to the Spaniards; for keeping whereof, Varona and Cerda two Spaniſh Captains were there left with their Companies. Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Caravanus the Moor King came to the Camp of the Chriſtians and there talked with the General; in whoſe hoary Countenance reſted a reverend Majeſty; his Apparel was after the Moors faſhion of white Linnen, with him came alſo the King of Tunes his Son. In talking with the General his manner was to ſit flat upon the Ground, and wiſely diſcourſed how the Turks were to be removed out of Africk. But in the midſt of theſe diſcourſes, when ſuch a thing was leaſt feared, ſuddainly a Pinnace brought news from Sea, That Pial Baſſa the Turks great Admiral was coming thither with a great Fleet of eighty five Gallies, and that more were daily repairing unto him on every ſide. Which was indeed true; for Solyman underſtanding from Dragut the Arch-Pyrat, that Iſland to be by the Chriſtians now poſſeſſed and fortified, thought it not (in his ſo great power and flouriſhing Eſtate) to ſtand with his honour to ſuffer, but rather to give aid unto the Moors of that Iſland, a people agreeing in Religion with himſelf, and therefore commanded Pial Baſſa his Admiral to take in hand that expedition. Who thereupon rigged up a great Fleet well appointed and ſtrongly manned with a number of the Turks beſt and moſt approved Souldiers, as well Janizaries as others; yet all both doubtful and fearful of the long Journy, as alſo of the fame of the Enemies with whom they were to encounter; for why, the Turks had conceived a great opinion of the valour of the Spaniards, as knowing great Wars both of ancient and later times to have been by that Nation (to the immortal praiſe thereof) moſt happily performed; they remembred Charles the fifth, and daily heard much of King Philip, the Heir both of his Fathers Vertues and Kingdoms; which made them ſo careful, that many of them before their ſetting forth (as in times of greateſt danger) made their Wills, and ſo departed from Conſtantinople, taking their leave of their Friends, as if they ſhould never have thither returned again. So that all the City was in a confuſed fear; neither was there any Man, whether he went or ſtaid, that hung not in ſuſpence with the doubtful expectation of the event of that War. Howbeit Pial with his great Fleet, with long ſailing and a proſperous Wind was at length come welnear as far as Malta, and knowledge thereof (as aforeſaid) given unto the Chriſtian Fleet at Zerbi. With which unexpected news the Chriſtians there were not a little troubled; nevertheleſs they fortified the Caſtle with new Fortifications and Bulwarks, and fell to agreement with the principal Man amongſt the Moors of the Iſland, (who commanded the reſt, and had before pluckt down the Enſigns of Dragut, and ſet up the King of Spains) that he ſhould yearly pay unto the King of Spain (as he had before unto Dragut) ſix thouſand Crowns, one Camel, four Oſtriches, four Sparrow-Hawks, and four blew Falcons; a Tribute fit for ſuch an Iſland.

Pial Baſſa Solymans Admiral ſent to remove the Chriſtians out of Zerbi.

But ſhortly after, viz. the ninth of May, the Great Maſter of Malta by another Pinnance gave the Chriſtians at Zerbi again to underſtand, That the Turks Fleet was even now at hand, and already departed from the Iſland of Gozo, well appointed and ſtrongly manned; and that therefore he adviſed them with ſpeed to hoiſe Sail, and to get them to ſome place of more ſafety, or elſe to come to him to Malta, for fear of being by ſo great a power of the Turks ſuddainly oppreſſed. Whereupon John Andreas Auria the Admiral ſent unto the General, requeſting him to come aboord, that ſo they might before the coming of the Turks Fleet, retire themſelves to ſome place of more aſſurance. But he for all that ſtaied ſtill at the Caſtle, where the Chriſtians had built four ſtrong Bulwarks; whereof they had named one Auria's, another Gonzaga's, the third the Viceroys, and the fourth the Knights, not yet all perfectly finiſhed; as for the Caſtle it ſelf they called it Philip-Alcazer, by the name of the King. But whilſt the General is thus buſie, and vainly hopeth to keep both the Caſtle and his Ships, he the next day deſcrying from far the coming of the Turks great Fleet, haſted with the Admiral to be gon; and putting twice to Sea, was both times by a contrary Wind driven again into the Haven, ſo that he and the Admiral had much ado in time to get them into the Caſtle; for the Wind was ſo favourable for the Turks, and brought them ſo faſt on, that the Chriſtians diſmayed with their ſuddain coming, knew not now well what to do, or which way to turn themſelves. But by good hap, the greater part of the Ships and fourteen Gallies were got out and gon the night before, and the Great Maſter had in April called home his Gallies, wherewith and ten others of his own he afterwards defended the Frontiers of his Iſland. As for the reſt of the Fleet that ſtaied for the General and the Admiral, ſome few Gallies eſcaped by flight, other ſome ran themſelves a ground, ten of which were preſently taken by the Turks, as were the reſt alſo that were left, although they for a while did what they might to have ſaved themſelves. The night following, the Viceroy and the Admiral ſecretly ſtole out of the Caſtle, and ſo by good Fortune in two ſmall Frigots fled to Malta. Caravanus alſo the Moor King, with the Prince of Tunes, got them away into the Main. Gonzaga the Viceroy departing from Malta into Sicilia, provided as he might for the ſafety of that Country. Auria in the mean time gathered together the remainder of the diſperſed Fleet, having loſt in this unfortunate expedition ſeventeen Gallies, with a great part of the Ships.

Part of the Chriſtian Fleet oppreſſed at Zerbi by the ſuddain coming of the Turks.

Now in the Caſtle was left as General, Don Alvarus de Sandes, a valiant Gentleman of great ſpirit and long experience, with five thouſand Footmen, ſome Germans, ſome Italians, but for the moſt part Spaniards; beſides a thouſand other that were no Souldiers. So that the Turks beginning to beſiege the ſame the ſeventeenth of May, were by them many times notably encountred, and in their aſſaults repulſed. Unto this Siege at length came Dragut the Pyrat, who with fifteen great Pieces which he brought with him from Tripolis, encreaſed the fury of the Turks Battery. Neither were the Chriſtians in the mean time wanting unto themſelves, having in the Caſtle forty great Pieces of Artillery, wherewith they ſlew a number of the Turks and Moors; and ſometimes ſallying out, fought with them hand to hand; and having ſlain and wounded many, retired again into the Caſtle. In this manner the Siege continued three Months with many an hot and deſperate skirmiſh; during which time, nothing more troubled the Defendants than Thirſt in that hot and dry Climate and intemperate time of the year; for why, in the Caſtle there was but one great Ciſtern, which although it yielded ſome good ſtore of Water, yet was it not enough to ſuffice ſo great a multitude, but was by meaſure ſtill ſparingly given out to the Souldiers ſo far as it would ſerve, no Man having more allowed him than would ſuffice to keep him alive; the quantity whereof ſome augmented by diſtilling of the Sea Water, and mingling it with their allowance, and ſo well eaſed their thirſt, until ſuch time as having ſpent all their Wood, they wanted that poor help alſo. There might a Man have ſeen many poor Souls lying upon the ground half dead, gaping and ſtill crying out nothing but Water, Water; in whoſe dry Mouths, if any Man upon compaſſion vouchſafed to pour a little Water, they as Men revived therewith would preſently ſit up, until that for thirſt they fell down again, and ſo at length as Men roaſted gave up the Ghoſt. Thus many died daily, beſide them whom the chance of War and other Diſeaſes without help conſumed in ſo great a diſtreſs. Don Alvarus the Governour conſidering the great extremity they were now brought unto, attempted with Don Sanchius de Leyva Admiral of the Neapolitan Gallies, Belingerius de Requeſenes Admiral of the Sicilian Gallies, and ſome others, by night to have eſcaped away into a Gally which lay under the Caſtle, but in doing thereof were perceived by the Turks, and ſo all taken. Whereupon ſuch Souldiers as ſickneſs and the Enemies Sword had yet left alive, pinched with extream neceſſity, forſaken of their beſt Captains, and out of all hope of relief alſo, covenanting for their lives only with the Enemy, yielded themſelves into moſt miſerable Captivity. In this unfortunate expedition periſhed about eighteen thouſand Chriſtians, ſome with ſickneſs, ſome drowned, but moſt ſlain, beſide the loſs of a great part of the Fleet alſo.

The Caſtle of Zerbi beſieged by the Turks.

The Caſtle of Zerbi yielded unto the Turks.

Of this Victory Pial ſent news by one of his Gallies to Conſtantinople, which for the more maniſeſting thereof, dragged at the Poop thereof a great Enſign of the Chriſtians, with the Picture of Chriſt Crucified therein. Which was no ſooner come into the Haven, but that the rumor of the overthrow of the Chriſtians was forthwith blown through the whole City, the Turks exceedingly rejoycing one with another for the news of ſo great a Victory; yea many of them not ſo contented, came by heaps to the Gate of the Houſe where the Emperor Ferdinands Embaſſador lay, and there meeting with his Servants, by way of deriſion asked them, if they had any Brethren, Kinſmen, or Friends, in the Spaniſh Fleet at Zerbi, for if you have (ſaid they) you ſhall ſhortly ſee them here. Beſides that, they with many words moſt inſolently bragged of their own Valour, and ſcorned the Cowardiſe of the Chriſtians; asking, who were able to withſtand them, now that the Spaniard was alſo overcome? All which with much more the Embaſſadors Men with great grief were enforced to hear, but there was no remedy, ſeeing God had ſo appointed it. Shortly after, in September, the victorious Fleet returned to Conſtantinople, dragging with it the Priſoners, Spoils, and Gallies of the Chriſtians, a ſight no leſs pleaſant unto the Turks, than heavy unto the Chriſtians; and that night it lay at Anchor near unto the Rocks in the face of the City, with the greater Pomp and Glory to come the next day into the Haven. At which time Solyman himſelf was come down into a Gallery near unto the Havens Mouth, adjoyning unto his Garden, the better to ſee the coming in of the Fleet, and the Chriſtian Captains ſet there to ſhew upon the Poop of the Admiral Galley, namely, Don Alvarus de Sandes, Don Sanchius de Leyva, Don Billingerus de Requeſenes, all of late great Commanders; as for the Chriſtian Gallies all diſarmed and unrigged, ſo to ſeem the more contemptible in compariſon of the Turks, they were towed at the Tail of the Turks Gallies. They which then ſaw Solymans countenance, perceived not in him any ſign at all of any inſolent joy. I my ſelf (ſaith * Busbequius, then the Emperor Ferdinands Embaſſador there) ſaw him two days after going to the Church with the ſame countenance he had always, with the ſame ſeverity and gravity, as if this Victory had nothing concerned him, nor any thing chanced ſtrange or unexpected; ſo capable was the great Heart of that old Sire, of any Fortune, were it never ſo great; and his mind ſo ſetled, as to receive ſo great applauſe and rejoycing without moving. Within a few days after, the Chriſtian Captives (before almoſt ſtarved with Hunger) were brought to the Court; many of whom could ſcarce ſtand upon their Legs, ſome others for weakneſs fell down and fainted, and otherſome died outright; they were all ſcornfully led in Triumph, with their Arms diſordered and ſcornfully put upon them; the Turks in the mean time inſulting round about them, promiſing unto themſelves the Empire of the whole World; and vainly asking, What Enemy they were to fear, now that the Spaniard was overcome? Alvarus Sandes, as chief of all the Priſoners, being brought into the Divano before the Viſier Baſſaes, and demanded by Ruſtan Baſſa, What his Maſter meant, being not able to defend his own, to invade other Mens? anſwered, That it beſeemed not him to judge thereon; and himſelf to have done but his Duty, with ſuch faithfulneſs as was meet to put in execution what he was commanded by his Lord, although he had no good Fortune therein. After that, he beſought the Baſſaes upon his Knee, to ſpeak for him unto Solyman, for that he had at home a poor Wife, with certain ſmall Children, for whom he requeſted him to ſpare him. Whereunto Ruſtan Baſſa (contrary to his manner) courteouſly anſwered, his Sovereign to be of a mild and gentle Nature, and that he was in good hope his Pardon might be of him obtained; ſo was he commanded away unto Caradines his Caſtle, towards the Black Sea. But he was not gone far, but that he was called back again; for that the great Chamberlain, a Man in great credit with Solyman, had not as yet ſeen him; for which cauſe he was ſent for back again; wherewith he was not a little troubled, fearing leſt the Baſſaes having changed their minds, would have put him to death. The reſt of the Captives of the better ſort were committed to the Caſtle of Pera, and amongſt them, Don Sanchius de Leyva, with his two baſe Sons, and alſo Don Billingerus Requeſenes; which two great Men, with Don Alvarus de Sandes, were nevertheleſs afterwards with much ado and almoſt beyond all hope, at the requeſt of the Emperor, and by the dexterity of his Embaſſador, by Solyman ſet at liberty; although he had before denied them unto Salviat the French Kings Embaſſador, who had been an earneſt interceſſor for them. Yet before they were delivered out of Priſon, the Mufti or Turks great Prieſt was asked his opinion, Whether it were lawful, for a greater number of Turks to exchange a few Chriſtian Captives (for the Embaſſador beſide the Rewards he had promiſed unto the Baſſaes, to further the matter, had alſo undertaken, that forty common Priſoners of the Turks ſhould be ſet at liberty for them) whereunto the Mufti anſwered, That the Doctors of their Law were of divers opinions concerning that queſtion, ſome ſaying that it was lawful, and ſome not; howbeit as then it was by him reſolved upon, unto the more favourable part, and the exchange allowed.

There were amongſt the Priſoners taken at Zerbi, beſides theſe Noblemen of whom we have before ſpoken, two other noble Gentlemen right honourably Born, Don John of Cardona, Don Billinger his Son in Law, and Don Gaſto the Duke of Medina his Son, to whom yet but a Youth, his Father nevertheleſs had given an honourable place in the Army. Of theſe two Don John had wiſely taken order for a great ſum of Mony to be left in the Iſland of Chio, by the way as the Turks Fleet went to Conſtantinople, from whence he afterwards in ſafety got into Spain. But Gaſto was by Pial Baſſa (upon hope of a great ranſom) purpoſely hid out of the way, which had like to have wrought his deſtruction; for Solyman having got an inckling thereof by the inſtigation of Ruſtan, laboured for nothing more than to have Gaſto found out, ſo to have a more juſt occaſion for the putting of Pial to death, being taken tardy in ſo manifeſt a fault. But all that labour was ſpent in vain, Gaſto being by death taken away, but whether by the Plague (as ſome reported) or by Pial his means (as it were more like) leſt the truth ſhould be found out, is uncertain. But certain it was, that being with great care ſought for by the Duke his Fathers Servants, he could never be heard of more; So that it was thought Pial for the ſafegard of his own life, not to have ſpared Gaſto his Priſoners life. Who nevertheleſs for a long time lived in great fear, and not daring to come to Conſtantinople, took occaſion with a few Gallies to wander about amongſt the Iſlands of Ægeum, as if he had there ſomething to do; but indeed ſo ſhunning the ſight of his angry Lord, for fear he ſhould have been compelled in Bonds to have anſwered the matter. Until at length he appeaſed at the requeſt of Suleiman Baſſa (the Eunuch and Solymans great Chamberlain) and of Selymus, Solymans Son, granted him his Pardon in theſe words well worth the marking, out of the Mouth of an Infidel Prince: Well have he from me pardon and forgiveneſs for ſo great an offence; but let God the moſt juſt revenger of all villanies take of him due puniſhment after this life. So fully he ſeemed to be perſwaded that no evil deed ought to remain without puniſhment, either in this life or in the life to come.

One of the Imperial Enſigns of Charles the fifth redeemed from the Turk.

There was in this expedition a Colonel of the Turks well acquainted with Busbequius the Emperors Embaſſador, then lying at Conſtantinople; into whoſe hands (in that diſcomfiture of the Chriſtians) by chance was come the Imperial Enſign of the Gallies of Naples; wherein within the compaſs of an Eagle, were contained the Arms of all the Provinces belonging to the Kingdom of Spain. Which fair Enſign the Embaſſador underſtanding him to purpoſe to give for a Preſent unto Solyman, thought good to prevent the matter, and to get it from him; which he eaſily obtained, by ſending him two Sutes of Silk (ſuch as the Turks make reckoning of) for it; ſo providing that one of the Imperial Enſigns of Charles the Fifth, ſhould not to the eternal remembrance of that overthrow, remain ſtill with the Enemies of the Chriſtian Religion. This ſo miſerable a calamity received by the Chriſtians at Zerby, made that Iſland, before little or nothing ſpoken of, to be ever ſince famous.

The death of the noble Andreas Auria.

About this time to end this unfortunate year withal, the twenty fifth day of November died Andreas Auria (that ſecond Neptune) being ninety four year old; a Man in his time of great fame, and of the greateſt Princes of that age had in no ſmall reputation, but eſpecially of Charles the Fifth, in whoſe ſervice he did much for the benefit of the Chriſtian Common-weal, being for moſt part imployed in his greateſt Wars againſt the Turks and Moors. Yet amongſt all the notable things done to his immortal Glory, the kindneſs by him ſhewed unto his native Country was greateſt; which oppreſſed by the French, he ſet at liberty; and when he might have taken upon him the ſole Government thereof (as had divers others before him) moderating his deſires, and reſpecting the only good thereof, appeaſed the great diſſention that had of long reigned therein; and eſtabliſhed ſuch a form of Government, confirmed with ſo good and wholſome Laws and Orders (no Mans liberty infringed) as that it hath ever ſince to his eternal praiſe, in great wealth, ſtate, and liberty thereby flouriſhed.

1561: A great Shipwreck

The Turks the year following, with their Gallies robbed and ſpoiled divers places upon the Coaſts of Italy, Sicily and Malta; againſt whom Philip King of Spain ſending forth his Gallies, by force of Tempeſt loſt twenty five of them, the eighteenth day of September, together with Mendoza Admiral of that Fleet.

Ferdinand the Emperor, having with long ſute and much intreating obtained Peace of Solyman, and being now well ſtricken in years, and careful both of the State of the Empire and of the advancement of his poſterity, began to deal with the Princes Electors for a choice to be made of a King of the Romans, who after his death might without the trouble of Germany, ſucceed him in the Empire; commending unto them his Son Maximilian, a Prince of great hope, then King of Bohemia. Whereupon an aſſembly of the Princes Electors was appointed to be holden at Franckford; who there meeting at the appointed time, with general conſent the twenty fourth day of November in the year 1562, choſe Maximilian the Emperors Son King of the Romans, and with all the accuſtomed ſolemnities Crowned him; who alſo the year after was at Presburg the eighth of September with much ſolemnity Crowned King of Hungary. Unto this ſolemn aſſembly of the Empire at Franckford, Solyman the Turkiſh Emperor ſent Ibrahim Baſſa, otherwiſe called Abraham Strozza (a Polonian born, of whom we have before ſpoken) his Embaſſador with Preſents and and Letters to Ferdinand the Emperor, to confirm the Peace for eight years betwixt them before concluded ; who the ſeventeenth day of November in preſence of the Emperor, the King of ths Romans, and all the Princes Electors, had Audience ; where after much glorious Speech in ſetting forth his Maſters greatneſs, with his love towards the Emperor and his Son the new choſen King, as wiſhing unto them all happineſs, he delivered his Letters of credence unto the Emperor ; the Copy whereof I have not thought amiſs here to ſet down, for that therein is notably to be ſeen the moſt inſolent Pride of that barbarous Prince, and miſerable eſtate of the rent Kingdom of Hungary, divided as it were at his pleaſure betwixt him and the Emperor.

Solymans proud Letters to the Emperor Ferdinand.

I the Lord of Lords, Ruler of the Eaſt and of the Weſt, who am of power to do and not to do whatſoever pleaſeth me, Lord of all Grecia, Perſia and Arabia, Commander of all things which can be ſubject to King and Command; the great Worthy of theſe times, and ſtrong Champion of the moſt wide World, Lord of all the White and Black Sea, and of the holy City of Mecha, ſhining with the brightneſs of God, and of the City of Medina, and of the holy and chaſt City of Jeruſalem, King of the moſt noble Kingdom of Egypt, Lord of Ionia, and of the City of Athens, Senau, of the ſacred Temple of God, Zebilon and Baſſio, Rethſan and Magodim, the Seat and Throne of the great King Naſhin Rattam, and Lord of the Iſland of Algiers, Prince of the Kingdoms of Tartary, Meſopotamia, Media, of the Georgians, Morea, Anatolia, Aſia, Armenia, Walachia, Moldavia, and of all Hungary, and of many other Kingdoms and Territories, whereof I am Emperor ; the moſt mighty Monarch Sultan Solyman, Son of the great Emperor Sultan Selym, who have power from God to rule all People with a Bridle; and ſtrength to break open the Gates and Bars of all Cities and ſtrong Places: Into whoſe mighty hand are delivered all the ends of Worlds, none excepted. I the Ruler of the Eaſt, from the Iſland of Tſein unto the fartheſt bounds of Africa, whom God hath appointed a mighty Warrior in the edge of the Sword; amongſt whoſe moſt mighty Kingdoms the impregnable Caſtle of Ceſarea is reputed for the leaſt, and in whoſe hereditary Dominions the Kingdom or Empire of Alexander the Great is accounted of as a trifle; with me is the ſtrength of the whole World and vertue of the Firmament. Foraſmuch as thou King Ferdinand, which art the mighty Lord of Chriſtendom, and the choſen Veſſel of the mighty Chriſtian Faith, created and elected Emperor of the Roman People, of Bohemia, Vandalia, Crabatia, and many other Countries King and Lord, &c. Not long ſince ſent unto our Court (which is the refuge of all Kings, the protection and ſanctuary of all that flie thereunto, and the Throne of Grace for all Princes of theſe times which repair unto it) one Augerius Busbeck, thy faithful Counſellor and Embaſſador, with Letters of conſideration, to renew with us a Peace, and to enter into a further league and bond of Amity: Which Letters bear date the year from the Prophet Jeſu (upon whom and our Prophet Mahomet reſt the brightneſs and peace of God) 1562, the firſt day of June, requeſting of us, That granting you Peace for eight years, we would not with any Hoſtility hereafter moleſt your Cities, Caſtles, Countries, or Subjects, but to ſuffer them to live in ſecure Peace and Tranquility, &c. Unto which your petition we anſwer you, That from henceforth for the whole ſpace of eight years ſhall be betwixt us on both parts to be continued a new, true, and firm League ; of which agreement, peace, and confederation, theſe ſhall be the conditions. Firſt, That you our beloved ſhall be bound to ſend yearly to our Court as a Pledge of this League thirty thouſand Hungarian Ducats, with that remainder which you owe unto us for the two years laſt paſt; For which we promiſe unto you, that we from henceforth during this eight years League, will take no part either by way of hoſtility or friendſhip with King Johns Son, foraſmuch as belongeth to his hereditary Countries, whether they be in the hither part of Hungary, or on the further ſide of Teiſſe: All which for all that, by Law of Arms belong unto us. And the ſame King Johns Son in the time of this eight years League ſhall be alſo bound in ſuch ſort to perform unto us his obedience, as that from henceforth it ſhall not be lawful for him to uſe any War or Hoſtility againſt you, neither to trouble your Subjects with Fire or Sword, nor to ſurpriſe your Cities, Caſtles, or Towns; or by violence to take away or exact of your People or Subjects, their Sheep, their Cattel, their Goods, Mony or Revenues. We alſo our ſelves ſhall have no right, nor take occaſion to drive away your People, to burn your Countries, or carry away any Captives ; but rather in this eight years ſpace religiouſly keep Peace and Concord with you. And under theſe conditions of Peace ſhall alſo be comprehended Michael Balaſchus, Nicholas Batho, with all their Goods and Territories, and divers other ſuch like, which ſhall be ſubject unto you and King Johns Son. To be brief, if happily any of yours or King Johns Sons Subjects ſhall have now before in time of War thruſt one another out of his Goods, Lands, or Poſſeſſions, whereof new quarrels or diſcord may ariſe ; we will and decree, that all ſuch controverſies, quarrels and claims ſhall be deferred until this definite time of the League expired. Beſide, if by chance any diſſention ſhall hereafter ariſe betwixt us about our juriſdiction, which can by no means be compoſed and ordered ; we will that yours ſhall in the mean remain as yours, and ours as ours ; all contention and enmity ſet apart ; alſo many Towns ſituate here and there by Danubius and Tatta, ſhall be ſuffered to uſe the ſame Law which they did in former time; ſo that the Souldiers which are yet in Garriſon in the Caſtle of Tatta, ſhall have no right to infeſt or vex thoſe Towns ſituate near unto Danubius. Furthermore, if after this Peace concluded, any of your Noblemen or Gentlemen ſhall fortune to have any of our Noblemen by revolt or other occaſion whatſoever, Captives, they ſhall diſmiſs them and ſet them at liberty, to return unto their Friends freely without hurt or ranſom ; that ſo the Concord and Peace begun betwixt us, may be the more firmly kept, and our Subjects live in more ſecurity. All and every one of theſe things we grant and promiſe to be of us from henceforth until the end of the aforeſaid eight years, without all fraud or guile religiouſly obſerved and kept ; and for that purpoſe have cauſed theſe our Letters of this Peace and Confederation to be publiſhed from our Royal Palace ; And moreover, have not only provided, that the Copy of the ſame ſhould together with our edict be proclaimed to all and every the Generals, Captains, Lieutenants, of our Armies both by Sea and Land, in all the parts of our Empire, and to all our mercenary Souldiers, but have alſo ſtraightly commanded, that it ſhall be firmly and ſincerly kept. We will alſo, that this agreement of Peace and Amity ſhall comprehend and concern our two chief Governours or Vayvods of Vallachia and Moldavia, ſo that none of your People of Hungary, Crabatia, Sclavonia, or other your Countries or Iſlands whatſoever, ſhall in any ſort be moleſted or grieved by our Subjects. And if it ſhall fortune that ſome ſhall on your part out of their Caſtles ſet upon our Subjects, or by force take away their Goods, the ſame Men ſhall in any caſe be bound to make thereof reſtitution. Alſo if any ſhall flie from us, and carry away with them the Mony or Goods of their Maſters whom they ſerved, or if the like ſhall be done by any of yours flying to us, then the ſame Goods on both parts are to be of right demanded and recovered again, and the Fugitives to the example of others to be corrected and puniſhed; foraſmuch as fugitives Goods of right appertain unto their Lords and Maſters. Furthermore it ſhall be lawful for your Captains and Commanders to fortifie or build Caſtles, Cities, or Towns, in the Borders of Hungary, and to put into the ſame, Victual, Armor, and ſuch like; but ſo, that they do none of theſe things out of their own limits. And during the time of this League, it ſhall not be lawful to take or carry away any of your Subjects Priſoners either into Hungary or in other places of your juriſdiction; which for all that, if it ſhall by any chance happen, that then ſuch Captives without delay be ſuffered ſafely to return home again. Furthermore, whatſoever Chriſtians ſhall have any buſineſs to do in our magnificent Court or any part of our Dominions, as are Embaſſadors, Officers, Servants and ſuch others; unto all theſe we not only grant and permit, that they may come and go about their buſineſs, and ſo again depart from our Court or Provinces; but alſo have willed and commanded them to be well and courteouſly entreated by our Subjects, and furthered with the interpretation of our Language. And if it ſhould fortune any contention or diſcord to ariſe betwixt our Subjects on either ſide, about the Bounds and Limits of Lands, or other ſuch like cauſes; ſuch controverſies we will to be decided and determined by diſcreet and indifferent Men on both parts, and the Authors of ſuch diſcord and variance, to be puniſhed as ſuſpected perſons and breakers of the League. We alſo prohibite thoſe Skirmiſhes or Combats, which were wont to be ſometimes on both ſides made upon the Borders. And deſire, that the form of this League and Peace, and every Article thereof, may be publickly read and ſet up in ſundry places of your Dominions; and commandment given, that they may with due obedience and reverence be obſerved and kept. Which we likewiſe have now before promiſed faithfully and aſſuredly to perform; and your Embaſſador whom a few Months agon you ſent unto us, in your name requeſted the ſame of us, and hath with earneſt Prayers moved us, by Imperial Oath and theſe Letters of Credence to witneſs, that we did ratifie and confirm the ſame; as if we our ſelves ſhould ſpeak to you in preſence. Wherefore we have given to him theſe our Letters of Pacification to you directed, that your Generals, Souldiers, and Subjects, may be bound alſo to obſerve and keep all theſe things; wherefore, ſo long as nothing contrary to this League ſhall be done on your part; ſo long in like manner all theſe Articles of Peace ſhall be of me accepted and aſſured. For witneſs and confirmation whereof I ſwear this Oath; By the true and living Creator of Heaven and Earth, by the true ſigns of our great and reverend Prophet, by my Imperial Power, and by my true Faith; that nothing contrary or repugning unto the aforeſaid Articles, Conditions, and Promiſes of the eight years League agreed upon betwixt us, ſhall be attempted or done by any our Governours, Generals, or Vayvods, &c. Commanding moreover, all our ſworn Governours of our moſt mighty Empire in Walachia and Moldavia, and King Stephen himſelf, and others which have the Government of our Empire confining upon you, That they all and every of them as well as our ſelves, ſhall juſtly, faithfully, and religiouſly accept, reverence, and keep theſe conditions of Peace, towards your Subjects, Cities, Caſtles, Towns, and other things appertaining to you; and in the leaſt thing not to hurt, injure, or wrong any your Subjects. In brief, we ſhall as far as our part concerneth us, give unto this moſt mighty and great new made love and friendſhip, ſo great honour, reverence, and authority, that that which may even in the leaſt things be had, ſhall not on our part be wanting. In token whereof, we have ſuffered certain Chriſtian Captives, whom by your Embaſſador you requeſted to have ſet at liberty, frankly to return unto you without ranſom; out of which Captivity they could never have been redeemed, if in regard of this our amity and friendſhip we had not granted them liberty; truſting that you will in like ſort ſet at liberty ſuch of ours as you have Captives. Given at our Imperial Palace and Seat in the moſt mighty City of Conſtantinople, the firſt day of September, in the year of our great and reverend Prophet 969.

Preſents from Solyman to the Emperor Ferdinand.

The ſame Embaſſador after he had delivered theſe Letters, preſented unto the Emperor the Gifts he had brought from his great Maſter; which was two great Cups of natural Cryſtal curiouſly wrought and ſet with Stones of great price; a couragious Turky Horſe with a Saddle and Trappings wrought with Gold, and ſet with precious Stones, and garniſhed with Chains of pure Gold; and four of the faireſt Camels that were to be got in all Conſtantinople. In delivering of which Preſents the Baſſa made his excuſe, that the Horſe and Camels had loſt their beauty, being with four months Travel from Conſtantinople, grown ſomewhat lean and weary.

1564. The death of the Emperor Ferdinand.

New troubles in Hungary.

The Turks purpoſing war, craftily ſue for Peace.

This Peace thus concluded betwixt the Emperor Ferdinand and Solyman, held firm until the death of Ferdinand, who about two years after in the year 1564 upon St. James's day died, being ſixty years old; whereof he reigned as Emperor not full ſeven years. In whoſe place ſucceeded Maximilian his Son, before choſen King of the Romans. But immediately after the death of Ferdinand, the Captains on the Frontiers of that part of Hungary which was holden for the Emperor on the one ſide, and the Turks Captains with the Vayvod of Tranſylvania on the other ſide, weary of their eaſe, began contrary to the form of the League, to ſurpriſe ſtrong Holds and Towns one in anothers Confines, whereof enſued much trouble; The Author whereof was Melchior Balas the Emperors Lieutenant in that part of Hungary which bordereth upon Tranſylvania, who firſt ſurpriſed certain Towns upon the Frontiers thereabouts; in revenge whereof the Vayvod ſuddainly ſet upon Sackmar a Town in the Emperors Territory, which he took, and therein Balas his Wife and Children. In deſpight whereof Balas ranſacked and burnt Debrezin a great Town of the Vayvods. But not long after, the Vayvod Solymans Vaſſal, aided by him with four thouſand Turks and three thouſand Moldavians, did much harm upon the Frontiers of that part of Hungary which belonged unto the Emperor; and firſt took Hadad, and afterwards beſieged Ungar. In requital whereof, Maximilian the Emperor ſent Lazarus Suendi a valiant Captain; who with an Army of eight thouſand beſieged the ſtrong Caſtle of Tokay, which he took the fifth of February, in the year 1565, and after that took the rich Town of Erden. In the mean time Solyman, who had in himſelf fully purpoſed to be revenged of all theſe injuries (as well appeared by that he did the year following) to ſtay the Emperor from proceeding father, until ſuch time as he were at better leiſure to be revenged, (for as then he was making great preparation for Malta) ſent Marcus Lilineſius a Renegate Tranſylvanian of Cibinum, his Embaſſador to Maximilian, to put him in remembrance of the League made with his Father, and to wiſh him to have regard how he further proceeded to the Breach thereof. Whereupon the Emperor, becauſe he would not ſeem unwilling to hearken to peace, commanded his Lieutenants and Captains no more to invade Tranſylvania or that part of Hungary which the Turks held. Howbeit that whilſt this Embaſſador was thus entreating of Peace at Vienna, the Baſſa of Temeſwar in the Borders of Tranſylvania, made divers incurſions into the Borders of Hungary, and with ſix thouſand Souldiers beſieged the ſtrong Caſtle of Jula, and the Turks in great number came daily into Tranſylvania. At which time alſo Suendi General of Maximilian his Forces upon the Frontiers, by Meſſengers ſent for that purpoſe, wiſhed him not to give any credit unto the Turks Embaſſador, who meaning nothing but War, under the colour of Peace ſought nothing elſe but to take him upon the ſuddain unprovided. Neither ceaſed theſe troubles thus, but daily grew from evil to worſe; for in June the Tranſylvanians beſieged Erden, before taken by the Imperials, and after two months Siege had it yielded unto them. In the mean time Chernovich the Emperors Embaſſador to Solyman, returned from Conſtantinople; aſſuring him, that the great Turk for all his fair ſhews of Peace, meant indeed nothing but Wars, for which he was (as he ſaid) making great preparation both by Sea and Land. Whereupon the Emperor began to raiſe new Forces; which thing divers Noblemen both of Germany and other places hearing of, came unto him with his Followers; and amongſt other Romerus one of the Knights of Malta, and divers others of his Brethren, with five Companies of Souldiers well appointed, ſent thither by George Hochenheim Grand Prior of that Order in Germany, and then confirmed one of the Princes of the Empire. At the ſame time alſo, the Turks being buſie upon the Borders of Styria, and the places thereabouts, were many times cut off by Charles the Archduke; who taking them at an advantage, ſlew at one time three thouſand of them. Yet for all this, the Turks Embaſſador was ſtill at Vienna treating for Peace, and ſo cunningly handled the matter, that whereas Eccius Salma a valiant Captain, had corrupted the chief Judge with certain others of Alba Regalis, to have betrayed the City unto him; for performance whereof they had delivered their Wives and Children as Hoſtages, and he was now upon his way from Rab, which is but eight miles off, in an aſſured hope to have ſurpriſed the City; he was ſuddainly by Letters in poſt from the Emperor, called back again, for corrupting the hope conceived of Peace; and ſo was that notable deſignment unfortunately diſappointed; of which practice the Turks having knowledge, afterwards moſt cruelly executed forty of the Conſpirators, impaling ſome of them upon ſharp Stakes, and hanging others upon Iron Hooks by the Jaws until they were dead. Shortly after the Turks took Neoſtat, which was not long after again recovered by the Emperor.

At the ſame time one of the Turks Spies was taken at Zigeth, who but thirteen days before was ſent from Conſtantinople, of purpoſe to view the ſtrength and ſituation of that place; he being brought before Charles the Archduke, and examined, ſaid, That Solyman would aſſuredly the next Spring come in perſon himſelf into Hungary, to beſiege the ſtrong Caſtles of Zigeth and Jula. At which time alſo Count Serinus took certain other of the Turks Spies, by whom he was certainly advertiſed of Solymans coming the next year; and amongſt others, Scaphir Vayda the Baſſa of Buda his chief Counſellor. Beſide this, the Countrymen Contributors both to the Imperials and the Turks, were now ſtraightly commanded by the Turks to pay no more contribution Mony unto the Imperials; Whereupon it was eaſily gathered, that all that talk of Peace was as Suendi had oftentimes written, nothing elſe but to delay the time, and to put them in ſecurity. Beſide that, the Turks made incurſions daily into one place or other of the Emperors Territories, ſhewing their ancient hate, and ſowing by thoſe light Skirmiſhes, as it were the Seed of a greater War againſt the next Spring; which the Emperor now out of doubt of (being alſo warned thereof by many Letters from his Friends) put ſtrong Garriſons into his frontier Towns, eſpecially into Rab and Zigeth. But knowing that to be but a poor help againſt ſo puiſſant an Enemy, he reſolved as his Father and Uncle had done before, to reſt upon the ſtrength of the Empire, and againſt the next year to call a general aſſembly of the Princes of the Empire at Auguſta, for the better underſtanding of the common Enemy. The Wars thus beginning again in Hungary, Solyman at the ſame time in revenge of the manifold harms done unto his Subjects by the Knights of Malta, (whoſe hand he found ever againſt him in all his dealings with the other Chriſtian Princes) made great preparation both by Sea and Land; purpoſing, as ſeemed by the manner thereof, to have raſed the memorial of thoſe worthy Men from off the Earth. Whereunto, beſide the natural hatred which he bare againſt all Chriſtians in general, and them above the reſt in particular, he was much incited by Caſſanes, Barbaruſſa his Son, King of Algiers, and Dragut Governour of Tripolis; by whoſe perſwaſions he cauſed a ſtrong Fleet to be rigged up, commanding the Lieutenants and Governours of his Ports and Havens all alongſt the Sea Coaſt, to put to their helping hands, and to be ready againſt the next Spring. And not long after, underſtanding partly of his own certain knowledge, and partly by the relation of others, in what good forwardneſs things were; he calling together a great aſſembly of his chief Princes and Men of War, delivered unto them his mind as followeth:

Solymans Oration to to his Captains for the invaſion of Malta.

What thing I have this forty years always wiſhed, which was to have ſo much leiſure from other Wars, as to pluck out of their Neſts, and utterly to root out theſe croſſed Pyrats, which vaunt themſelves to be the Bulwark of Chriſtendom; That ſame me-thinks I have by the favour of God and Muhamed his Prophet, at this time obtained. For we have ſo repreſſed the attempts of the Perſians, that they cannot let us; and in Hungary, from whence certain dreadful motions were reported, we our ſelves will ſhortly do thoſe things which ſhall enforce our Enemies to hide their Heads in the heart of Germany, and to ſue to us for Peace. You your ſelves daily hear the pitiful complaints of our Subjects and Merchants, whom theſe Maltaſes, I ſay not Souldiers, but Pyrats, if they but look into thoſe Seas, ſpoil and make prize of; whoſe injuries or revenge, all Laws both of God and Man require. Neither can any thing happen unto me more pleaſing or more honourable, than if I may before I die accompliſh theſe things, that is, to win Malta, and to leave all things in order in Hungary and Polonia; except perhaps ſome Man think it a harder matter for us to thruſt theſe croſſed Companions from the Rocks of Malta, than for our Anceſtors to have driven them from Jeruſalem, and ſo quite out of Syria; and for our ſelves to have forced them out of the ſtrong Iſland of the Rhodes. But this ſome will ſay is nearer unto Italy, from whence aid may eaſily be ſent, and the place defended by a Fleet. Believe me, they will never adventure to fight with us at Sea, who remember themſelves to have been there by us ſo often overthrown; Beſide that, ſo little a place cannot contain any great Garriſon; neither if it could, could it long feed them. Wherefore unto thus expedition we have determined with the firſt of the Spring to ſend a moſt ſtrong Fleet; and even now we have already commanded all our Sea Captains and Adventurers which acknowledge our command, to be there preſent with their Ships. The King of Algiers will be there, the Garriſons of Alexandria are in readineſs, ſo alſo is Dragut with his appointed Fleet. As for our own it is by mine own appointment rigged up; unto which Fleet I doubt not but that all the ſtrength of the Weſt will give place. Which thing (worthy Captains) we ſpeak, truſting upon the help of Almighty God and Muhamed his great Prophet, with your known and approved Valour; Now remaineth only, that every one of you think with us, how this War may beſt be mannaged, and ſo to refer your devices unto us; which that you may the better do, Lo, I here deliver unto you the ſituation of the whole Iſland, and project of all their Fortifications which we have received of moſt expert and skilful Men.

Valetta the Grand Maſter advertiſed of Solyman his purpoſe.

Solymans purpoſe thus made known, and the matter well conſidered, after that they which beſt knew the ſtrong places and manners of the Maltæſes, had declared their opinions what they thought to be moſt expedient; it was decreed, That they ſhould with all ſpeed ſet forward; wherefore Victual and other things neceſſary for ſuch an expedition being with wonderful celerity prepared, they expected but Wind. Of theſe things John Valetta a Frenchman, Grand Maſter of Malta and of the Knights of the Order, being both by Letters and Meſſengers advertiſed (for he had always fit Men his Intelligencers at Conſtantinople, who warily noted the purpoſes and actions of Solyman) was not afraid, but knowing that of God depended the Victory, and that Men were to watch, labour, and foreſee; he aſſembled a Council of his Knights, and in few words ſpake unto them in this ſort:

Valetta his Oration unto the Knights.

What Solyman prepareth (moſt noble and valiant Knights) and what a great War he provideth againſt us, you with me of late right well underſtand, wherefore it is needleſs for me to uſe any long Speech with you concerning that matter. The Enemy is known, his inſatiable ambition is known, his ſtrength is known, and his mortal hate againſt us and the Chriſtian Name is ſufficiently known. Wherefore let us all as one firſt reconcile our ſelves to God, and then provide all things as ſhall be needful for the War. In brief, noble Knights, to reconcile our ſelves unto God, and to appeaſe his diſpleaſure, two things are of us to be performed; whereof the one conſiſteth in amendment of Life, with a holy Converſation; the other in the religious worſhipping of him, with a firm and conſtant truſt in his help, with Prayer, which is called Godlineſs. By theſe means our Anceſtors obtained many Victories againſt the Infidels in the Eaſt. Neither is it to be doubted, but if we ſhall in theſe things joyn together, we ſhall alſo fruſtrate all the force and fury of this proud Tyrant. But foraſmuch as God uſually helps them which labour and take pains, and not the negligent and ſloathful, we muſt of neceſſity joyn unto them thoſe helps, which both our profeſſion and the courſe of War requireth; which partly conſiſteth in our ſelves, and partly in the other Chriſtian Princes. For Victual, Armor, Mony, and other ſuch things as in Wars are requiſite, we will ſo provide, that no Man ſhall juſtly complain, that we ſpared either coſt or pains. I will pour out all my ſtore, neither will I for deſire of life refuſe any danger. As for the Chriſtian Princes, I cannot perſwade my ſelf that they will lie ſtill in ſo fit an opportunity, and in ſo great a danger, not of our eſtate only, but much more of their own. Verily I will not ſpare to exhort every one of them both by Letters and by Meſſengers, which in part we have already done; and I doubt not but we ſhall have aid enough from the Pope, the Emperor, and the King of Spain (ſuch is their Chriſtian Zeal) and they I hope ſhall move the reſt. As for you, the Princes and very Light of this ſacred Order, and the reſt of our Brethren, moſt valiant Knights, I am well aſſured you will ſo fight for the moſt holy Chriſtian Religion, for your Lives and Goods, and for the glory of the Latine Name, againſt a moſt cruel Tyrant, the rooter out of all true Religion, of all Civility and good Learning, the Plague of the World, hated of God and Man; as that he ſhall feel the ſting of the Croſs which he ſo much contemneth, even in the City of Conſtantinople, yea in his Houſes of Pleaſure. For we ſhall not have now to do with him in the Iſland of the Rhodes, far from the help of our Friends, (from Aſia, from Europe, from Egypt encloſed with our Enemies both by Sea and Land) but in the Eies of Italy and Spain, in places ſtrongly fortified, from whence the Enemy may eaſily be circumvented; which that it may ſo fall out, let us not ceaſe to pray unto Almighty God, and to crave his ready help.

The Knights make preparation for the Turks coming.

When the Grand Maſter had thus ſaid, all that were preſent promiſed with one aſſent rather to loſe their Lives, than in any part to fail the Common Cauſe, or to come into the power of Solyman. After that publick Prayer and Supplication was made in every Church through the Iſle, and three Colonels choſen out of all the Knights; one an Italian ſirnamed Imperator, another Borneas a Frenchman, and Quatrius a Spaniard the third, all adviſed Men, and moſt expert Souldiers, who ſhould with all diligence provide all things neceſſary for the War. By whoſe appointment the Suburbs and Trees which might any way be hurtful to the fortified places, were overthrown, the Fortifications were throughly viewed, the Garriſons ſtrengthned, and all manner of Proviſion moſt plentifully diſtributed; and Letters from the Great Maſter ſent unto the Great Biſhop and other Chriſtian Princes, requeſting their aid againſt the Common Enemy. Meſſengers were alſo diſmiſſed into divers places, to certifie both the Knights of the Order and others, of the Turks great preparation.

Solymans Fleet departeth from Conſtantinople.

Solymans Fleet departing from Conſtantinople the two and twentieth day of March, in the year 1565, kept a direct Courſe towards Peloponeſus, and ſo came to Methone; where Muſtapha Baſſa one of the Turks greateſt Captains, a Man of ſeventy five years, and General of the Land Forces, muſtred the Army, wherein were numbred ſeven thouſand Horſemen of them which are of the Turks called Saphi; out of the leſſer Aſia, conducted by the Governour of that Country, and two Lieutenants of Cicilia, five hundred; and of the Iſland of Lesbos, now called Metylene, four hundred; he had of the Janizaries four thouſand five hundred, led by two Colonels appointed by Solyman; for that the chief Captain of the Janizaries, which they call the Aga, never departeth from the City but when the Sultan goeth himſelf. Beſides theſe was a certain kind of Men amongſt the Turks, who live of the Revenues of the Church; of them there was in the Army thirteen thouſand, who had at Conſtantinople vowed their Lives for their Superſtition. Out of Thracia and Peloponeſus were come two Colonels and one Lieutenant, with twelve hundred Horſemen, and three thouſand five hundred Volunteers out of divers Countries. There alſo Pial Baſſa Solymans Admiral took view of the Fleet, wherein were found a hundred and thirty Gallies, two and twenty Ships for burthen, ſome greater, ſome leſſer, beſides one that was caſt away near unto Methone, where was loſt ſix thouſand Barrels of Powder, thirteen thouſand great Shot, and four hundred Spahi; beſides theſe, there were ten Gallies from the Rhodes commanded by Halyport a Man of ſeventy years; two Gallies from Mitylene, and about ſeventeen Galliots and other ſmall Pyrats Ships. With this ſtrong Fleet the Turks departing from Methone the thirteenth of May, arrived at Malta the eighteenth of the ſame Month, and put into a Haven in the North-Eaſt part of the Iſle, which the Inhabitants call Marzaſiroc; but perceiving themſelves not to be there in ſafety, they removed to another Port called Major.

The deſcription of Malta.

The Iſland of Malta lying betwixt Africa and Sicilia, might be doubted whether it were to be accounted in Africk or Europe, but that the ancient Coſmographers, and the Moors Language, which the Malteſes have always uſed, claim it for Africk; it is in length from the North-Eaſt to the South-Weſt twenty Miles; and in the broadeſt place twelve. It regardeth Africk Southward, over againſt Leptis Parva; and Sicilia towards the North, but more towards Pachinum than Lilybeum; and is in circuit about threeſcore Miles. It ſeemeth to have taken the name of Melita, of Mel or Hony, whereof it yieldeth plenty. The Trees there bear Fruit twice a year, and they have oftentimes twice Harveſt, eſpecially of Barly and Cotten Wool; yet is the Iſle in ſome places ſtony, gravelly, and bare of Wood; nevertheleſs it beareth Figs, Apples, Almonds, Grapes, and other Fruit Trees planted by the induſtry of Man, Date Trees alſo, but not fruitful; it beareth Thiſtles of ſuch bigneſs that the Inhabitants uſe them for Wood; freſh Water is there wonderful ſcarce, and ſuch Wells as they have are filled with Rain in Winter, for in Summer they are either clean dry, or elſe the Water becometh brakiſh. The Inhabitants are ſo burnt with the Sun, that they differ little in colour from the Æthiopians; they are of a wholeſome conſtitution of Body, ſpare of Diet, induſtrious, rather painful than Warlike, dying more for Age, than of Sickneſs; their Buildings, except it be in the City, which is in the midſt of the Iſland, and in the Suburbs, are long and low (like unto the Moors) covered with Turf or Reed. It is commonly ſuppoſed, that Saint Paul was by Shipwrack caſt upon this Iſland, but it is with greater reaſon to be thought that it was the other Melita in the Adriatick betwixt Corcyra and Illyria, and better agreeth with that which Luke writeth of the Apoſtles Trouble and Shipwrack in the Adriatique, out of which Sea, it is not to be gathered by the Text, that Paul and the reſt were driven. But again to our purpoſe; That ſide of Malta which reſpecteth Sicilia, hath in it many good Harbors and commodious Havens fit for ſhipping; where beſides the Port of Marzaſiroc towards the Eaſt, where the Turks Fleet firſt landed, and the Port of Saint Thomas, with another called Scala not far off, it hath two other notable Havens, the one called Major, and the other Marzamoxet, divided the one from the other by a narrow piece of ground; which with a ridg runneth in length from the South to the North almoſt in manner of an Iſland, having the Haven Major on the Eaſt, Marzamoxet on the Weſt. Upon the head of this high ridg ſtandeth the Caſtle of Saint Elmo, of great ſtrength both by Nature and Art. As a Man entreth into the Haven Major, upon the left hand are four Promontories pointing far into the Haven on that ſide, almoſt in manner of Iſlands making ſo many Bays; upon the firſt ſtandeth the Gallows, whereof alſo it taketh name; upon the very point of the ſecond, on a rough and high Rock ſtandeth a moſt ſtrong Caſtle, called the Caſtle of Saint Angelo, whereunto adjoyned the Town, ſeparated from the Caſtle only with a Wall and a Ditch, and is placed in a hollowneſs cut out of the main Rock, ſtrengthened alſo with the Sea and the induſtry of Man; and is of ſome called the Burg, of others the new City; in this Caſtle reſideth the Grand Maſter, and the Souldiers in the Burg; upon the third Promontory ſtandeth another ſtrong Caſtle, which they call alſo the Burg of Saint Michael; the fourth Promontory is not inhabited, from whence the Sea runneth alongſt the winding Banks almoſt into the midſt of the Iſland, unto a place called Aqua Marſia. Again, after the Port Marzamoxet, Weſtward is the Harbor of Saint George; and after that another called Bennorrat; then followeth the Port Saint Paul, no leſs than the Port Marzaſiroc; after which cometh the Port called Salinarum Sinus; but on that ſide of the Iſland towards Africk, is only one Port called Milliaria; near unto the Iſland of Malta lie certain other little Iſlands, as Gauloſo, now Goza, two other called Cuminia, and another called Piper, all ſubject to the Malteſes.

Acts 27 & 28.

Thus much I have thought good to ſet down concerning the Turks Fleet, and for the deſcription of thoſe places wherein this great action was performed, the brute whereof then filled the World. Now ſhall it not be amiſs, in like manner to declare upon what ſtrength, next unto God, Valetta the Grand Maſter ſtood againſt ſo mighty and puiſſant an Enemy. Firſt, there was in the Iſland a thouſand and three hundred Mercenaries, ſome Spaniards, ſome French, ſome Florentines, and the reſt of Naples; there was alſo a thouſand Seamen of the Knights Fleet, and five hundred in the Town of Saint Angelo; and of the Country People which were fled into the ſtrong places five thouſand, Men not altogether unskilful of the Wars; there were alſo five hundred Knights of the Order, beſides Prieſts and Squires; for of theſe three ſorts of Men are they which are called Brethren of the Order. This was the number of them which defended the Caſtles and Towns of Saint Elmo, Saint Angelo, and Saint Michael, whereunto they were proportionably divided; and in the City it ſelf, which is called Melita, being in the middle of the Iſland, was two hundred Souldiers and as many Citizens, with three hundred of the Country People all Horſemen, commanded by Jo. Vagno a valiant Captain. Beſides this, every place was furniſhed with plenty of Victual, Armor, Weapons, Artillery, and whatſoever elſe was needful for the enduring of a long Siege, and a War that ſhould want many things; and that which paſſed all the reſt, Minds armed with invincible Courage againſt whatſoever ſhould chance, which oftentimes maketh of the vanquiſhed, Victors. All theſe things being in readineſs and orderly diſpoſed, as ſoon as they underſtood that ſeven and twenty of the Turks Gallies had put into the Haven Marzaſiroc, and were there landing their Men; Gyon Admiral for the Order, a valiant and couragious Knight, marched thither with five hundred Harquebuſiers, to have skirmiſhed with them; but as ſoon as the Turks ſaw them coming, they retired again to their Gallies. On the other part where the other Fleet lay, two hundred of the Turks going on ſhore, met by chance with Riverius a Frenchman, and eight Knights more, who having his Horſe killed under him, and one of his Companions ſlain, fell with the reſt into the hands of the Enemy. Whilſt theſe things were in doing, a certain Chriſtian Mariner fled out from the Turks to the City Melita; who diſcovered the Enemies purpoſe, telling them, That the Turks by the appointment of Muſtapha had determined to have landed the greateſt part of their Forces, preſently to have beſieged ſome ſtrong place; had not Pial Baſſa the Admiral exclaimed aginſt it, doubting to be left too weak at Sea; ſaying plainly, That he would attempt nothing before the coming of Dragut, who was every hour expected. For Solyman had expreſly commanded, that they ſhould do nothing without his Counſel; ſo great an opinion had he of his Policy and Valour. But whether this report was true or otherwiſe, the Turks for all that returning with their Fleet to the Port Marzaſirock, landed twenty thouſand Souldiers and five Field Pieces, and ſo intrenched themſelves. This done, Pial Baſſa with ſeven thouſand went to view the Caſtle of Saint Michael; but for fear of the great Shot durſt not to come nigh it; nevertheleſs they of the Town ſallying out, couragiouſly skirmiſhed with the Turks; in which conflict, Curſelinus, ſirnamed Parda, accompanied but with one Spaniard, ſo furiouſly aſſailed the Enemy, that he took from him one Enſign, and ſlew one of the Sanzacks a great Commander, with divers others. When Pial was come again into the Camp, the General began to conſult with the other Captains, whether it were better to lay Siege to the Caſtle of Saint Elmo, or to the Town of Saint Michael; in concluſion it was agreed upon, that they ſhould with all their Forces beſiege the Caſtle of Saint Elmo. And going up the Hill to view the Caſtle, they were incountred by the Garriſon Souldiers, in which Fight ſome few were loſt on both ſides. Thus by degrees things growing hotter and hotter, the Grand Maſter thought it good to certifie Garzias of Toledo Viceroy of Sicily, how things ſtood, that he might the ſooner rig up his Fleet to come to their reſcue. Wherefore he commanded one Gally to put out of the Haven by night, and to paſs over into Sicily, with Salvagus one of the Knights ſent thither on Meſſage. In the mean time the Turks caſt up a Mount to have battered the Caſtle of Saint Elmo, and beaten the Gallies in the Haven Major, and ſo to have opened a way for their Fleet to have entred; but they were not able long to keep that Mount, for they had ſcarcely well ended the Work, but it was forthwith by the continual thundring Shot out of the Caſtle beaten down again; which thing greatly abated the Turks Courage. About that time, Ochial came to the Fleet with ſix Ships, drawn out of them which were left for the defence of Alexandria, and in them nine hundred Souldiers. The Turks beaten from their firſt Mount, caſt up another on an higher ground, whereon they placed three great Pieces of Ordnance, wherewith they annoied not only the Haven wherein the Fleet of Malta rid, but the Caſtle of Saint Angelo alſo, the Great Maſters Seat, and with a rolling Trench drew nearer and nearer unto the Caſtle of Saint Elmo; which although they had at firſt in vain attempted, hindred by them which were in the Caſtle; yet at laſt with much labour and travel they brought it to perfection; for the Turks in that kind of work, ſtill performed by their multitude, are accounted to excel others. Wherefore in ſhort time they planted their great Ordnance in ſuch ſort, as that they might batter both the Caſtles of Saint Elmo, and Saint Michael. There was in the Turks Camp a Gentleman of Spain, but then a Slave unto a Turk, who underſtanding the Enemies purpoſe for the beſieging of the Caſtle of Saint Elmo, by a Chriſtian Fugitive advertiſed the Great Maſter thereof; Whereupon he forthwith ſent Cerda and Miranda with two Companies of Spaniards into the Caſtle, who were afterwards a great ſtrength unto the Caſtle, and hindrance unto the Enemy. At length came Dragut Governor of Leptis, long looked for of the Turks, with thirteen Gallies, and in them a thouſand and ſix hundred Souldiers; after whom followed ten Galliots from Bona, and in them two Companies. In the mean time Salvagus the worthy Knight (ſent before into Sicilia) came to Meſſana, and having certified the Viceroy of the ſtate of Malta, was by him commanded to return to Malta in a Galliot, conducted by two Gallies of the Great Maſters; which having brought him near unto the Iſland, returned again into Sicilia; but he with his Galliot (not without moſt manifeſt danger) in the third Watch of the night brake into the Town through the midſt of the Enemies Fleet, with the loſs but of one of his Followers. Where having delivered unto the Great Maſter what he had in charge from the Viceroy, he was the ſame night ſent back again by the Great Maſter into Sicilia, to certifie the Viceroy, That he had need of more Aid, requeſting him with all ſpeed to ſend him ſome Supply, whereby he might the better hold out againſt the force of ſo great an Enemy. Salvagus diſcouraged neither with the labour nor the danger, preſently committed himſelf again to Sea, and in ſhort time arrived in the Port of Siracuſa, where finding the two Gallies we before ſpake of, he ſent them to Malta, as he had in charge, with four hundred Souldiers, among whom were divers Knights of the Order, and certain skilful Canoniers; willing them to ſhun the Weſt part of the Iſland, whereas they muſt needs come into the Enemies ſight, and to paſs by the Eaſt end thereof, which was further about, but ſafer; and turning Southward, to land in the Port Miliare, and from thence by the low places of the Iſland to convey the Souldiers by night to the City Melita, which was but four miles off; from whence they might eaſily paſs to the Caſtle of Saint Michael. This order taken, he went to Meſſana, and there declared to the Viceroy the danger of the War, with the ſmall number of the Defendants, requeſting of him a thouſand Footmen, which with thoſe already ſent, he thought would ſuffice to hold out the Siege until he with his whole Fleet might come to relieve them. But whilſt theſe things were ſlowly provided (which with much difficulties and delay could hardly be brought to paſs, the Chriſtian Princes as it were ſleeping in ſo great a danger) the Turks upon the ſuddain the third of June aſſaulted the Caſtle of Saint Elmo, in hope with ſhort ſcaling Ladders to get over that part of the Rampiers which was neareſt unto the Bulwark of the Caſtle. But the Defendants, in the Ditch which before had no Flanker to ſcour the ſame, had of Earth and Faggots made a large ſtrong Flanker, from whence the Caſtle alſo helping them, they valiantly reſiſted the Enemy, and filled the Ditches with the dead Bodies of the Turks. Who for all that, truſting to their multitude (wherewith rather than with true Valour, they obtain ſo many Victories) thruſt ſtill on until they had by obſtinate force (although long firſt) gained the Flanker; whereby they commanded all that part of the Ditch towards the Port Marzamoxet. In which place they with wonderful celerity ſo fortified themſelves, that they could not be hurt by the Defendants; wherein they were much holpen by their own great Ordnance planted on the other ſide the Haven Marza; for with it they drave the Defendants from the place, beat down the corner of the Rampier, and battered the Front of the Bulwark, whoſe whoſe hight and greatneſs troubled the Enemy, but was not ſo commodious for the Defendants,for that it was made without any Flankers. But night coming on, five thouſand of the nine thouſand Turks which gave the Aſſault, tarried there; wherefore the Chriſtians conſtrained to forſake the place, retired themſelves into the Caſtle.

Saint Elmo again aſſaulted.

The Turks in the mean time covered with the darkneſs of the night, with ſacks filled with Tow and Earth, filled up the Ditch which was under the Bulwark, but neither of any great wideneſs or depth; which done, they gave a freſh Aſſault, wherein above eight hundred of them were ſlain, part Janizaries, and part Spahi, and beſides them many wounded, of whom the moſt part remained half dead in the Ditch, where they periſhed, and could not be relieved. Of the Chriſtians was loſt five and forty, amongſt whom were five Knights of the Order, Guardampes an Avergnois, Maſius a Colonel of Narbona, Contilia a Spaniard, Somaia a Florentine, and Neimec a German.

New Supply ſent into the Caſtle Saint Elmo.

The ſame night the Great Maſter thinking, as reaſon was, that they in the Caſtle of Saint Elmo might want help, ſent two hundred of his Knights and as many other Souldiers into the Caſtle; who if they had been more, together with the four hundred which were before in the Caſtle, might happily have driven the Turks both from the Rampiers and the Flanker, and alſo kept the place longer. But foraſmuch as the Great Maſter wanted Souldiers, and had therefore ſent Salvagus into Sicily, for new Supplies (as we have before ſaid) he in the mean time couragiouſly expected their coming, refuſing no labour or pain; yet bewailing ſometime with himſelf the unfortunateneſs of the Chriſtian Princes, by whoſe negligence ſo fit an occaſion for the overthrow of the barbarous Fnemy was let ſlip;

The Great Maſter diſappointed of a Supply by the fearfulneſs of the Ship-Maſter.

But above all things, he marvelled exceedingly that no help yet came; eſpecially thoſe two Gallies, which (as we have ſaid) were in all haſte ſent by Salvagus; but they by the Maſters default kept not the appointed Courſe; for firſt whereas they ſhould have ſhunned the Weſt part of the Iſle, and have turned towards the Eaſt, they ſhaped their Courſe Weſtward to the Iſland of Gaulos, the Maſter vainly affirming, that he ſaw certain of the Turks Galliots lying before Port Mileria; which was afterwards well known not to have been ſo; for the truth was, that he for fear (whereby notable deſigns are many times fruſtrated) durſt not go forward. Whereby it came to paſs, that the Great Maſter was diſappointed of ſo neceſſary a Supply; which thing much grieved both the Viceroy and others, but eſpecially Salvagus. For he ſaw it would come to paſs, that if the Turks ſhould take the Caſtle of Saint Elmo (the moſt aſſured Bulwark and defence of the Iſland of Malta) the other places muſt of neceſſity be brought into extream danger, all the way to relieve them being thereby ſhut up. And that it might be taken, ſeemed not to him impoſſible, the Enemy having already taken one Fort, and laying hard Siege almoſt on every ſide of that little Pile. The due conſideration of theſe and ſuch like things grieved the minds of skilful Men, eſpecially ſeeing ſuch ſlack preparation in a caſe requiring ſuch preſent relief. Yet in the mean time Souldiers were taken up at Rome by the commandment of Pius Quartus then Biſhop, to be ſent to Malta; and by his example to ſtir up other Princes to ſend Aid unto this ſacred War, he gave an hundred pound of Gold to Cambianus Legat for the Order, and commanded Gunpowder and other neceſſaries for that War to be taken out of his Caſtle Saint Angelo, that ſo he might ſeem to be wanting in nothing that was in him to perform. Over theſe Souldiers, in number ſix hundred, he appointed Pompeius Columna General, and commanded Camillus Medices his Legate to accompany him. With theſe went many voluntary Men, of purpoſe to lay down their lives for the eterniſing of their Names in ſo religious a War, and that with ſuch an ardent deſire, as that every little delay ſeemed unto them a year. Wherefore coming to Naples, they there found John Andreas Auria with eleven Ships, the Prince of Populonia with nine, Lanicius with three; and three others ſet forth by other private Gentlemen. In theſe Ships were embarqued all thoſe Footmen which came from Rome, and ſo tranſported to Meſſana, where the Kings Fleet was providing. But whilſt the Chriſtians make ſlow preparation, conſidering the greatneſs of the danger, the Turks not ignorant thereof, reſolved to prove the uttermoſt before the ſtrength of the Chriſtians were ready or drawn together. For the Caſtle of Saint Elmo once taken, they aſſured themſelves with more eaſe to carry the reſt; for that thereby they ſhould firſt have the Haven Marzamoxet in their power, where their Fleet might in ſafety ride ſo long as they pleaſed; and the riſing ridge betwixt the two Havens was commodious for them both to batter the Town of Saint Michael, and to keep the Haven Major, ſo that none could without their leave paſs in or out thereat.

Saint Elmo again aſſaulted.

Wherefore upon theſe and other ſuch like conſiderations they began again to batter the Caſtle of Saint Elmo, as it had been with Thunder; which furious Battery they continued by the ſpace of four days together without intermiſſion.

The Turks repulſed.

The night following they ſuddainly with great force gave an Aſſault, and with their ſcaling Ladders had almoſt gained the top of the Wall; when the Chriſtians deſirous of nothing more than to come to handy Blows, drave them down again with ſuch a violence, that never after they durſt ſet Ladder to the Wall, until the very laſt conflict. Whilſt things were thus hot at the Caſtle of Saint Elmo, Dragut his Souldiers upon a bravery, as if they had been the only Men, went to a place called Martia Scala, which is between the Gallows and Saint Thomas's Rode, as if they would have done more than the reſt; which the Chriſtians beholding out of the Town of Saint Angelo, to repreſs their inſolency, ſallied forth upon them, and ſo welcomed them, that they were glad after they had received a great loſs, forthwith to retire to the place from whence they came. Of the Chriſtians were ſlain Bonnemius a Frenchman, one of the Knights, and ſeven others.

The ſame time Monferratus was by the Great Maſter ſent into the Caſtle of Saint Elmo, to command there as Governor inſtead of Brolia; for that he with watching and pains taken in defence thereof, was fallen ſick. The ſame Brolia had many times before written to the Great Maſter, That the Caſtle was ſo well fortified and furniſhed of all things needful, as that he thought it impoſſible to be won by the Enemy; and had with chearful Speech and brave Behavior, ſo encouraged the Knights, and other the Defendants, that they fought againſt their Enemies with more than Mens Strength, and greater Courage than is to be believed. Neither were the Turks for that diſcouraged, although they were with great loſs ſtill repulſed; but for certain days battered the Caſtle with greater fury than before, and immediately gave an Aſſault; for they had made a Bridge over the Ditch, of Maſts and Sail Yards, of ſuch a breadth, The Turks make a Bridge over the Caſtle Ditch. A horrible Battery.

that ten Men might go thereon in rank; and had placed about the Ditch four thouſand Harquebuſiers, and brought all their Fleet unto Saint George's Shore, not far from the Caſtle. And when they had by the ſpace of eighteen days ſore ſhaken it, and torn the Walls with thirteen thouſand great Shot, and were now in hope even preſently to win the Caſtle; ſee, Beragamus a Biſcain, one of the Knights, and Medranus a Spaniſh Captain, with certain other valiant Men, ran to the Bridge, and to the great admiration of the Beholders, oppoſed themſelves againſt the multitude of the Miſcreants. The Fight hand to hand was on both ſides both fierce and terrible; and now one of the Turks had advanced a Turkiſh Enſign upon the Bulwark, which whilſt Medranus layeth hand upon, and the Turk one the other ſide ſtrugleth to clear himſelf from him, in ſtriving together, they fell down both dead, ſhot thorow with one Bullet by one of the Turks. At which time the four hundred which we ſaid were but a little before ſent thither by the Grand Maſter, ſtood in good ſtead; for ſeeing all brought to ſo great a danger, ſome of them (whilſt otherſome fought with the Enemy) thruſt Barrels of Gunpowder under the Bridge, ſome caſt down Wild-Fire, Stones, and whatſoever elſe came to hand, upon the Enemy, and others farther off with their Harquebuſies ſore gauled the Turks; ſo in ſhort time the Bridge was burnt and blown up, which in the fall thereof, overwhelmed eight hundred Turks; the reſt (as they might) retired, few whole, but moſt part wounded. In this conflict the Chriſtians pluckt down two Enſigns; the one Muſtaphaes, the other Draguts; which the Turks had ſet up upon the very Battlements of the Walls. On the other part toward the Southweſt, a Band of the Turks had got to the top of the higheſt Rampier; which as ſoon as they in the Caſtle of Saint Angelo perceived, thinking to have beaten them off with a great ſhot, ſlew by miſchance ſeven of the Defendants upon the ſame Rampier, as they were going too and fro; but to recompence that error, at the next ſhot they rent in ſunder four of the Turks Captains, with twelve other of their moſt forward Souldiers. Whilſt they were here fighting, other Turks in the mean time had caſt up a Trench on that ſide of the Caſtle toward Saint Angelo; out of which they were quickly driven with Fire, Stones, and other ſuch like things thrown down upon them by the Defendants. The Turks valiantly on every ſide repulſed, retired into the Camp, when they had in this Aſſault loſt two thouſand of their beſt Souldiers, and of the Chriſtians ſlain almoſt an hundred, and wounded as many more. The ſame day Valetta the Grand Maſter perceiving the Port Marzamoxet not to be very ſtraitly kept by the Turks, commanded a light Brigandine to be carried out of the Haven, over land, to the place Martia Scala, that from thence he might ſend into Sicilia; for he (as reaſon was) conſidering in what danger the Caſtle Saint Elmo ſtood, by Letters certified the Viceroy and the Biſhop of Rome thereof, and of ſuch things as were there done; requeſting them of ſpeedy relief. The copy of the Letters ſent to the Viceroy, I have here ſet down; as for thoſe which were ſent to the great Biſhop, becauſe they were almoſt of the ſame purport, I have purpoſely omitted.

To Garzias of Toledo, Viceroy of Sicilia, and Admiral of the Fleet, Greeting.

The Great Maſters Letters to Garzias Viceroy of Sicilia

S*ince the time that I ſent* Salvagus, I have ſent unto you two Letters, which I cauſed to be ſent by Melita into Gaulos; which I pray God be come to your hands. After that, when as neither Meſſengers nor Letters came unto us from you, I commanded a man with Inſtructions to haſte to Meſſana, who when he had certain nights attempted to go out, and was at laſt got out; he was ſcarcely gone two miles, but he ſaw the Turks with might and main making after him; whom to eſcape, he was glad to run his Pinace on ground; And caſting his Letters into the Sea, to forſake his Boat, and by flight to ſave himſelf. Now the Turks having removed their Fleet out of the Port Vulturnus, I conſidering how much it concerneth to certifie you of thoſe things which are here done, commanded a Brigandine to be carried to Martia Scala; for ſeeing that the Turks Fleet is gon to another part of the Iſland, I hope my Letters will without let in ſhort time come unto you. And the things I would have you to know, are theſe: The fifteenth of this month, all the Enemies Fleet (a little before night) paſſed by this Port; the coming on of the night letted, that we could not well perceive the weakneſs thereof, whilſt the Gallies almoſt unarmed, were with much difficulty towed forth; want of Water, cauſed them chiefly to depart out of the Port Vulturnus, and peradventure fear of your Fleet. For, as I have heard, they have intelligence, that an hundred and fifty Sail lie at road in the Port of Meſſana; for which cauſe alſo, they have not put themſelves into the Port of Saint Paul, but have placed their Fleet above the Port Marzamoxet; yet a good part of their Gallies lie at the Port Saint George, ſo to be nearer unto their Land Forces; yet is not the nearneſs ſuch, but that if your Fleet come upon the ſuddain, they will with the ſame fear retire to their Fleet, that they would if they were farther off. No man is now to be ſeen at Vulturnus, for they have left their firſt Camp at Saint Katharines and Saint Johns, having burnt all the Country Villages, and now lie with their Fleet as I have ſaid; and with their Army at the Caſtle Saint Elmo, which God hath as yet kept, and as I hope will; which thing is even for this to be hoped for, which was but yeſterday done; when as our moſt valiant Souldiers (by the help of God) for the ſpace of four hours couragiouſly endured a moſt terrible Aſſault. The Turks having alſo made a Bridge Weſtward toward the Port Marzamoxet, we have four times repulſed them to their great loſs; yet not without ſome loſs alſo on our part, amongſt whom Medranus, a worthy Captain was to my great grief ſlain. With this Victory our Men are ſo encouraged, that I am in hope the Caſtle may be defended until your coming, eſpecially the Enemies battery not ſo furiouſly now as before maintained. If I were relieved with certain Companies of freſh Souldiers, or at leaſt with thoſe our two Gallies, I would never think that this Caſtle could be taken from us; In defence whereof, whilſt we every hour look for help, we have ſpent both our Men, and whatſoever Warlike Proviſion we had elſe. We are reſolved although it coſt us all our lives, to go thither, relying upon you; who, as we hope for your Devotion and noble Courage, will not be unmindful of our Health and Welfare; but knowing the danger whereinto we muſt needs fall, if you ſhall defer to aid us, will ſend us out of hand certain Bands of Men, eſpecially when they may ſo eaſily be ſent; for now that the Turks are departed from the Eaſt part of the Iſland, our Souldiers may be landed at the Black Rocks. Our lives lie in your hands, on whom (next unto God) reſteth all our hope; Wherefore we moſt inſtantly requeſt you not to forſake us; committing our ſelves, and all that ours is, to your Compaſſion and Protection. Fare you well from Malta the ſeventeenth of June.

Theſe Letters received and the diſtreſs of the beſieged Caſtle perceived, the Viceroy was (as of right he ought) greatly moved, and made ſemblance as if he had been deſirous to have brought forth his whole Fleet againſt the Turks. But foraſmuch as the Supply of Ships from Genoa and Spain was not yet come, and that without them he thought it not good to adventure the Fortune of a Battel; he forthwith ſent John Cardona with four Gallies, whereof two were of Malta; and with Cardona joyned one Robles Camp-Maſter, with a ſelect Company of Spaniards; with whom went alſo about eighty Knights of Malta, who ſtayed at Meſſana, awaiting ſome fit occaſion to paſs over; amongſt whom were theſe chief Men of the Order, Pariſot the Great Maſters Nephew, Vincentius Caraffa, Boninſcana and Maldonatus, both Spaniards, Centius of Aquitania, and ſome others; Who although letted by Tempeſt and other occaſions, they came too late to Malta, as ſhall be hereafter declared, yet ſerved they in great ſtead; and had they come in time, before the Caſtle Saint Elmo was loſt, happily it might have been ſtill kept.

Four Gallies ſent to the Great Maſter for the relief of Malta.

The Turks making no more account of ſo great a ſlaughter of their Men, than of ſo many Sheep, deſperately renewed the Fight, as Men reſolved to endure all extremities. And firſt they moſt horribly thundred day and night with their great Ordnance upon the Caſtle; afterwards they aſſaulted the Breaches with ſuch a multitude and force, that if true Valour and hope of Immortality had not excluded all fear out of the hearts of the Defendants, the terror of the Aſſault had inforced them either to have fled or yielded. Dreadful was the Fight, and had they not been obſtinately ſet down on both ſides, the one to win the Caſtle, the other to defend it, that day had ended the quarrel. Five hours endured that moſt terrible Aſſault, at length the Turks repulſed by the Valour of the Chriſtians, retired; yet did they not for all that paſs the night following in quiet, but with their great Ordnance did ſo beat the Defendants, that they had much ado to keep the Turks from ſcaling the Walls; which that they ſhould not then dare to attempt, was with exceeding endeavour provided for by the Chriſtians; of whom in this Aſſault was loſt two hundred, and of the Turks an infinite number. And Dragut himſelf, whilſt he there performed the duty both of a General, and moſt valiant Souldier, got a blow on the Head with a Stone, whereof in two days he died; his dead Body was afterwards carried to Tripolis, and there honourably buried.

The Commanders of the Turks Army, ſtill more and more enraged with this Valor of the Chriſtians, and the ſlaughter of their Men, gathering all their Fleet together, commanded them to compaſs about the Caſtle, of purpoſe to give thereunto their laſt Aſſault, with all their Forces both by Sea and Land; and to ſend new Supplies of freſh Souldiers one after another, until they had taken the Caſtle. And therefore they with great induſtry prepared Bridges, Ladders, Engins, Armor, Weapons, Shot, and whatſoever things elſe was needful for the Aſſault. Which Valetta perceiving out of his Caſtle Saint Angelo, and fearing (as meet was) leſt they in the Caſtle ſhould not be able longer to endure ſo great a fury, called together in Counſel his Knights, two days before the Turks gave their laſt Aſſault; and told them, That they all as well as he, ſaw in what danger they which defended the Caſtle Saint Elmo were; and that he doubted not, but that every one of them (upon a Godly Zeal and Compaſſion) was no leſs moved with the ſlaughter and danger of their Fellows and other their Chriſtian Souldiers, than with their own; wherefore he requeſted them, to declare what they thought beſt to be done for their ſafety; yet ſo, as that they ſhould not haſtily determine any thing, that agreed not with the ancient Valour and Honour of their ſacred Military Profeſſion. Which motion once made, and their opinions in brief delivered, a Decree was made, That foraſmuch as the Caſtle could not longer be holden, regard ſhould be had for the ſafeguard of them that were therein; for which purpoſe it was agreed, that twelve Pinnaces ſhould be ſent to fetch them away. But before, three Knights were choſen who ſhould in haſte the night following go thither, and tell them what was in the Counſel agreed upon, and carefully to conſider in what ſtate the Caſtle was, which if the Defendants thought was to be abandoned, they ſhould poiſon the Water, and cloy the great Ordnance, that it might not afterwards ſtand the Turks in ſtead. The three Knights ſent thither, was Medina a Spaniard, Rocca a Frenchman, and Conſtantinus Caſtriot an Italian; who not without danger of their Lives (being oftentimes ſhot at by the Turks) got into the Caſtle, and declared unto them that were there in Garriſon, how careful the Great Maſter and the reſt were of them. And they on their ſide, firſt of all gave thanks to the Grand Maſter and the reſt, for the regard they had of them; and afterward concerning the Caſtle, ſaid, That if they conſidered the ſtraitneſs of the place, the ſmall number of the Defendants, and multitude of the Enemy, they ſhould well perceive in what danger they were, if the Turks ſhould often with ſuch obſtinacy renew the Aſſault; yet foraſmuch as they had ever hitherto felt the help of God ſo preſent, who had ſtill mercifully defended them againſt the rage of the Enemy, and wanted nothing needful for the defence of the place; the keeping whereof they had requeſted of the Grand Maſter as an honour, although they knew right well it could not without moſt manifeſt danger of their Lives be holden; yet they would for all that keep it to the laſt Man; for that perhaps the like honourable occaſion for them to ſhew themſelves in, ſhould never again be offered; wherefore they had (as they ſaid) reſolved in that place to ſpend their lives for the Glory of God and the Chriſtian Religion. The Courſe of this Life (they ſaid) was but ſhort, but that Honour and Fame was for ever; and whereas death is to all Men prefixed, it were to be wiſhed, that the Life which is to Nature due, ſhould rather ſeem to be by us frankly given to God and our Country, than reſerved as Natures Debt; which if it ſhould ſo happen, they would ſo uſe the matter, as that the barbarous Enemy ſhould have neither pleaſure nor joy, which ſhould not coſt him much Blood even of his beſt Souldiers. This they willed the Knights to tell the Great Maſter, and to requeſt him not to be too careful of them, but to promiſe to himſelf thoſe things of them which beſt beſeemed reſolute Men, eſpecially of them who had vowed themſelves to that ſacred War. This anſwer of greater reſoultion than fortune, received; the three Knights, when they had diligently viewed the Caſtle, returned to the Grand Maſter; who calling to Counſel his Knights, and having heard the anſwer of the beſieged, would needs hear alſo what what opinion the three Knights themſelves were of concerning the keeping of the Caſtle; of whom Caſtriot was of opinion, That the place was ſtill to be defended, and that if he were there to command, he would undertake to perform it; and there rather to loſe his Life than to forſake it, after he had once taken upon him the charge thereof. But Rocca the French Knight was far of another mind, and ſaid plainly, that the place could not poſſibly be holden againſt ſo ſtrong an Enemy; and that if Julius Cæſar himſelf were alive, and ſaw to what ſtrait the place was brought (eſpecially all the Rampiers being either beat down or ſore ſhaken, and ſuch a power of obſtinate Enemies lying round about it) he would never ſuffer ſo many valiant Souldiers to be loſt, but quit the place, and reſerve his Men to a further ſervice; for why, it was the part of valiant Men to perform ſo much as was of Men to be performed; but to ſtrive to do more, was no Manhood at all; wherefore he thought it beſt to do that which Men uſe with Members mortified, whoſe recovery is deſperate; in which caſe we doubt not to make a ſeparation, ſo to ſave the reſt of the Body with Life. The Spaniſh Knight in moſt part agreeing with Caſtriot, ſaid, That he thought it not good, that the place ſhould ſo eaſily be forſaken; firſt, for that the Ditches and Bulwarks were yet defenſible; and then becauſe he ſaw ſo great a conſent among the Defendants, and ſuch a chearfulneſs to withſtand the Enemy, which thing (as he ſaid) preſaged Victory.

Theſe opinions of the Knights thorowly in Counſel debated, and every particular well weighed, it ſeemed good to the greater part, that they which were in the Caſtle ſhould for certain days yet hold it out; eſpecially becauſe it was not the manner of the Knights of the Order eaſily to abandon their ſtrong Holds, but rather to keep them to the laſt, that even therein the barbarous Enemy might perceive with whom he had to do, and ſo ſee his Pride abated. For if they ſhould have forſaken the place, they might have been thought to have done it for fear; whereby the Enemies inſolency might have been increaſed, and the honourable Order of thoſe ſacred Knights diſgraced.

The Turks furiouſly aſſault the City.

But the Turks intentive to that they had before determined, the three and twentieth day of June aſſembling all their Forces both by Sea and Land round about the Caſtle, in the dead time of the night on every ſide ſet up ſcaling Ladders, made Bridges, wrought Mines, and with two and thirty great Pieces of Artillery battered the reſt of the Walls yet ſtanding, and preſently gave a moſt terrible Aſſault. The Defendants on the other ſide beat down ſome, repulſed other, ſlew many, ever more careful how to wound the Enemy, than to ſave themſelves; and where he preſſed faſteſt on, there to ſhew their greateſt Valour. Great were the Outcries made on both ſides, mixt with Exhortation, Mirth and Mourning; the face of the whole Fight was divers, uncertain, cruel, and dreadful; and now it was the third hour of the day, when ſtill the Victory ſtood doubtful; and had not the fury of the great Ordnance been ſo terrible, that it now had beaten down all the Walls unto the very Rock whereon the Caſtle ſtood, the Defendants might for ſome longer time have endured the Enemies Force. But the very Rock bared both of Walls and Defendants, and more than four hundred ſlain, a Man could now ſcarcely ſhew himſelf, but he was preſently ſtruck in Pieces. Monſerratus Governor of the Caſtle, and Garas of Eubœa, Men of equal Valour, Integrity, and Honour, were both ſlain with one ſhot; for a ſhort and tranſitory Life made Partakers of Immortality together. Yet the reſt which ſtood in defence of the Caſtle, nothing terrified with ſo great a loſs and ſlaughter of their Fellows, but augmented rather as it were with new Courage from above, fought with greater Force than before, overthrew the Turks Enſigns now ſet up in the Caſtle, ſlew the Enſign-bearers, Captains, and Colonels; now reſpecting nothing more, but honourably to lay down their Lives for their Religion and the obtaining of immortal Fame. By this time the Sun was mounted to the middle of Heaven, great was the Heat, and Men exceeding weary; the murdring ſhot never ceaſed, and ſuch was the multitude of the Enemy, that he ſent in freſh Men inſtead of them that were wearied or wounded. On the other ſide, the ſmall number of the Chriſtians, and thoſe weakned with Labour, Watching, Thirſt and Wounds, did what Men might; yet at length were overcome by a greater Force, and ſo the Caſtle by the Turks won, but with ſuch ſlaughter of their Men, that it was a wonder that ſo many ſhould be ſlain of ſo few. The Defendants were all ſlain, every Man in valiant Fight.

Barbarous Cruelty exerciſed by the Turks upon the dead Bodies of the Knights.

Here may I not in ſilence paſs over the inhuman and more than barbarous Cruelty of the Turks againſt the dead Bodies of the ſlain Knights, that thereby may appear, that Cruelty never wanteth whereon to ſhew it ſelf mercileſs, yea even after death. The Turks after they had taken the Caſtle, finding certain of the Knights yet breathing, and but half dead, firſt cut their Hearts out of their Breaſts, and then their Heads from their Bodies; after that, they hanged them up by the Heels in their red Clokes with white Croſſes, (which manner of Attire they after an ancient Cuſtom uſe in time of War, as they do black in time of Peace) in ſight of the Caſtles, Saint Angelo and Saint Michael. And yet Maſtapha the Turks General not ſo contented, commanded them afterwards to be faſt bound together, and ſo caſt into the Sea, whoſe dead Bodies were in few days after by the Surge of the Sea caſt up into the Haven Major, and known by their Friends, were by the commandment of the ſorrowful Great Maſter honourably buried. With which the Enemies moſt barbarous Cruelty he was ſo moved, that he commanded that no Turk ſhould from that time be taken priſoner, but to be preſently ſlain. And thereupon all that were before taken, were forthwith put to the Sword, and their Heads caſt over the Walls on that ſide towards the Enemy. From the beginning of the Siege to the taking of the Caſtle, of the Chriſtians were ſlain a thouſand three hundred, amongſt whom were an hundred and thirty of the ſacred Knights of the Order all worthy to be regiſtred in the Book of everlaſting Fame.

Valetta encourageth his Souldiers after the loſs of the Caſtle St. Elmo.

The Caſtle of Saint Elmo thus loſt, Valetta although his mind (as he had good cauſe) was inwardly attainted with exceeding grief, yet made ſemblance otherwiſe, becauſe he would not daunt the minds of his Souldiers; telling them, that nothing was hapned unprovided for or unforeſeen. This was (as he ſaid) the Will of God, and the chance of War, that ſometimes one, ſometimes another ſhould be overcome; and that cowardiſe, not ſuch Valour as was in them that were gon, gave occaſion to living Friends to lament; yet that the Enemy was not for that to be feared, who had alſo received ſuch a loſs, as he might thereby rather ſeem conquered, than a victorious Conqueror; whereas the loſs of his Knights was recompenced with Honour and Immortality, things of themſelves ſufficient to inflame all noble minds to behave themſelves valiantly. As for himſelf (he ſaid) that truſting not in his own ſtrength, but in the help of Almighty God, he had not yet caſt off the hope of Victory over the relicks of the diſcomfited Enemy; and that he well hoped, they were all of the ſame mind, wherein he moſt earneſtly requeſted them to perſiſt unto the end. When he had thus ſaid, he being a Man armed againſt all Fortunes, withdrew himſelf a little aſide; where caſting many things in his troubled mind, he determined to ſend Letters to Petrus Meſquita, Governour of the City of Melita, to certifie him and the Knights of the Order that were at Meſſana, and the Viceroy, of the loſs of St. Elmo; the Copy whereof, becauſe that in them evidently appeareth the Chriſtian mind of him the Great Maſter, I have thought good here to ſet down as followeth:

Valetta his Letters to the Governour of Melita.
